

3669

T

S.T.C. 15241

the French of Padane

1—1^o

A. A. D.

Div: 10.

Ph: 5.

B: 14.

Arg. A. D. 15

Arg. A. D. 16
1652
J. J. J. J.

These
For my very loving friend Frances and her

ll

16

THE FRENCH
ACADEMIE.

FVLLY DISCOVERSED
and finished in foure Bookes.

1. Institution of Manners and Callings of all Estates.
2. Concerning the Soule and Body of Man.
3. A notable description of the whole World, &c.
4. Christian Philosophie, instructing the true and onely meanes to eternall life.

This fourth part neuer before published in English.

All written by the first Author, PETER de la
PRIMAUDAYE, Esquire, Lord of Barre, Chauuncellour, and Steward of the French Kings House.

LONDON,
Printed for THOMAS
ADAMS.

1618.

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS AND WORSHIP-

FVL GENTLEMAN AND HIS SINGULAR good friend, Mr. IOHN BARNE

Esquire, T. B. C. wisheth grace and peace in this life, and euerlasting happinesse in the life to come.

I R, hauing at length finished the Translation of this FRENCH Treatise of morall Philosophy, I presume the rather to recommend it to your Worships fauour, because your selfe did first commend it vnto me for the variety of excellent sayings and examples wherewith it is replenished. And surely I perswade my selfe, that howsoever for want of a skilfull Translator it hath lost much of that grace, which otherwise it might haue had, yet by reason of the marerit selfe, and good disposition obserued throughout the whole booke, it will be of some account with so many as preferre the soundnesse of substance before the swelling froth of curious parales. True it is, that many words vsed by the Authour, and retained by me, are almost the same with the original tongues from whence they were deriued, and peraduenture wil sound harsh at the first in their eares that neuer heard them before: but if they will haue patience a while, and let them passe to and fro vpon the file off their teeth, no doubt but in short time they will be as smooth as other Greeke and Latine words which now are taken for meere English. I might here alleadge reasons to prooue the necessity of retaining such words in translating: namely, that many of them are proper names and words of Art; that as all occupations and handicrafts haue their seuerall names of instruments belonging to their science, so is it with Philosophy, and with euery part thereof: but I make no doubt of finding the Reader fauourable in this point, considering that it tendeth to the enriching of our owne language, and hath bene practised by the learned of all nations that haue gone before vs, as is euident to such as are skilfull in the tongues. Concerning the profite of this booke, I referre the Reader either to the title thereof, which promiseteth no more (in my opinion) than is performed with aduantage in the body of the same; or else to the Authours Epistle to the Reader, wherein he setteth downe a summary of that doctrine, which is afterward handled more at large. Wherein howsoever hee hath very excellently behaued himselfe, and (as I am perswaded) gone farre beyond those that haue handled the same matter before him, yet considering each mans infirmity to bee such, that he attaineth not to perfection in any worke, neither speaketh all things that are to bee spoken of the same thing, nor yet is free from error in those things which he speaketh or writeth, I exhort all that shall peruse this Treatise following, so farre onely to approoue euery sentence and example of life, as it may bee prooued out of the recordes of holy Scripture. Moreouer, as many as are desirous to bee bettered by the reading of this booke, they must thinke seriously vpon the end vnto which this Authour had regard when he penned it, which was the same that Aristotle had in writing his Ethicks or booke of Manners: namely, The practise of vertue in life, and not the bare knowledge and contemplation thereof in braine. And, lest any man should haue that opinion of these Morall precepts, which all men haue of Platoes Common wealth, or of Aristotles Felicity, of Tullies Orator, or of Moores Vtopia, that they containe in them rather an Idea of good life, than such a platforme as may bee drawne from contemplation into action, he hath ioyned workes with words, practise with precept, and the fruits of rare examples with the faire flowers of Philosophicall instructions. But many are so farre from conceiuing any such excellency in them, that so soone as they heare the name of Philosophy, they thinke they haue sufficient cause to condemne as hurtfull, all the writings of Philosophers, alleadging that sentence of Saint Paul. Beware lest there bee any man that spoile you through Philosophy: not considering that the Apostlie doth in the very next words expound himselfe, and sheweth that he meaneth nothing else but the deceitfull conclusions of mans reason, disagreeing from the doctrine of Christ reuealed vnto vs in his word. I grant that the word of God is onely perfect, and containeth in it an absolute rule both of piety towards God, and humanitie towards men; but it followeth not therefore, that we may not vse the benefit of humane precepts, or tread in the steps of heathen men, so farre forth as their learning and liues dissent not from the truth of holy Scriptures. Will any man refuse pearles because they are offered him in base vessels? or not vse a light, because it is not put into a siluer candlestick? And shall we passe ouer without profite, so many good precepts and worthy examples of learned men; because they proceede Arist. lib. 2. Eth. cap. 2.

The Epistle Dedicatory.

*Aug. lib. de doct.
chr. ca. 40.*

*Aug. lib. 8. de ciuit. Dei. cap.
6, 7, 8. &c.*

Aristotle de Mundo.

ceede from the twilight of naturall knowledge, and not from the cleere sunne-shine of the word of God. Let vs rather hearken to Saint Augustine, in his second booke of Christian doctrine, where hee hath these words agreeing very fitly to this matter: As for those (saith he) that are called Philosophers, if they haue uttered any truth agreeable to our faith and doctrine (especially the Platonists) we are not onely not to feare it, but rather to challenge it from them as from vniuersall possessors thereof. For as the Egyptians had not onely idols and heauy burdens, which the people of Israel were to detest and flee from, but also vessels and ornaments of gold, silver and raiment, which that people at their departure out of Egypt challenged couerly to themselves for better vses, although not of their owne authority, but by the commandement of God, &c. So the doctrine of the Gentiles hath not onely counterfeit and superstitious fgeries and heauy packes of needlesse labour, which euery one of vs departing from their society vnder our Captaine Christ ought to detest and shunne: but also liberall Arts meet to set forth the truth by, and certaine profitable precepts of manners, yea some true points concerning the worship of one onely God. What their knowledge was concerning themselves, and their duty one toward another, the whole Treatise following expresseth at large, vnto which I had rather referre you than vse any needlesse repetition in this place. And as for the other point concerning the knowledge of one onely God, it is most certaine, that from the light of Nature holpen with industry, study, and education (according to the wisdom and dispensation of God) many notable conclusions proceeded from sundry of them, as Augustine himselfe sheweth by a long discourse in his eight booke De Ciuitate Dei, where among other he alleadgeth these out of Plato: That God is a spirit, and of a farre more excellent nature than the soule of man, or any other spirit whatsoever: that God is one and the same, and alwaies like vnto himselfe: that God is the light of our mindes, whereby we attaine to all our knowledge and vnderstanding: that no man is therefore blessed and happy, because he hath abundance of wealth, honour, strength, beauty, or of any external thing, nor yet for any gift of the minde, but because he enioyeth God the soueraigne good. How diuinely doth Aristotle write of God, and of his fatherly prouidence, in his Treatise De Mundo dedicated to Alexander? I know that many with force of reason carrying them thereinto, haue vehemently suspected, that this peece of worke came neuer out of his shop. Which although it be graunted for true, yet the booke doth euidently declare, that the Author thereof was a meere heathen man, and directed onely by his pure Naturals, when he wrote it: which being sufficient to shew how farre the darknes of nature doth comprehend the light and knowledge of heauenly things, is as much as I require. This treatise being wholly occupied in these two principall points: namely, in the description of the vniuersall frame of the world, and in the declaration of the nature of God the worke-master thereof, I will briefly set before you the summe of the last part, which the Philosopher painteth out vnto vs very notably in liuely and orient colours. First he acknowledgeth, that All things are of God, that they consist and haue their being by his power, that no nature whatsoever is able to continue, if it be not maintained and preserued by him. And in setting out the manner of working whereby this mightie power of God is forceable in the gouernment of all things, he goeth beyond the common reach of naturall men, affirming, that although God be present euery where, yet not by any bodily or local presence, as the common received opinion then was: That all things whatsoever wee perceiue by sight, hearing, or any other sense, were full of Gods, and as Seruius blasphemously taught of late yeeres, That God was an essentiall part of euery creature, but that he gouerneth all things by his power and vertue, whereby he effecteth whatsoever pleaseth him. Again, as hee subscribeth to the almighty power and prouidence of God in the being and rule of all things, so he laboureth to make knowne the great wisdom of God by the contemplation of the excellent course of nature, which is certain without inconstancy, beautiful without blemish, & diuerse without disorder. For what can be more certaine than the ordinary course of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, which haue continued in their appointed race from time to time, and from one age vnto another? What greater certainty then that which to our comfort appeareth in the naturall turnes and returnes of times and seasons, of Sommer, and Winter, Spring and Autumne, day and night? in regard of which constant continuance of the irrevocable order appointed by God in this whole frame, the world is called by the Hebrewes gloiam: and in the Epistle to that people, it is expressed by this word Aion, (which many times signifieth perpetuity) Heb. 1. 2. & 11. 3. Concerning the beauty and glorious shew thereof, what thing more beautifull then the glittering face of the heauens decked and adorned with starres both great and small, as it were with iewels and precious stones of all sorts? And for this selfe same cause it receiued that name of monde from the Grecians, and of Mundus from the Latines.

Lastly, if we looke either to the variable motions of the Spheres in the ethereall region, or to the contrary qualities of the elements in the aery and lower part of the world, or to the variety of fowles, fishes, beasts, plants, graine, stones, mettals, &c. and consider withall what a sweete harmony ariseth from all these, as it were from a well tuned instrument that hath strings of all sorts, or like to a liuely picture that hath all kinds of colours mingled in it, or to a well ordered city compounded of sundry occupations, callings, and conditions, of poore and rich, young and old, bond and free, we may see if we haue but halfe an eye, and feele if we be blinde, that in this rare peece of worke and frame of the world, there is most excellent conuaince without confusion, great variety concurring in vnity, and diuersity of all kindes without disorder. All this and much more is attributed by the Authour of that booke De Mundo, (Aristotle, or some other heathen Philosopher) to the onely working of the power of the inuisible God, of whom (saith he) we must conceine that for his power he is most mighty, for his beauty most excellent, for his life immortall, and for his vertue most absolute: and therefore hee cannot bee seene of any mortall creature, but is notwithstanding knowne by his workes. For all accidents in the aire, in the earth, and in the water, may truly be called the workes of God, who containeth and preserueth this world, of whom (as Empedocles saith) proceeded,

All things that were, that are, and shall be here,
Plants, Men, Beasts, Birds, and Fish in waters cleere.

But this Philosopher not contenting himselfe with this consideration and view of God in his workes, entrecth into a deeper meditation of his nature, by setting downe a very good exposition, and as it were a Commentary vpon those names and titles, which vsually were attributed in his time vnto God, thereby to make his powerfull gouernment ouer all the world more knowne vnto men. Although (saith he) that God be but one, yet we call him by many names, as Zwā and Dia: because we liue by him αὐτῷ, because he is of an immutable nature, αὐτοῦ, because nothing is done by chance, but according to his most certaine decree: ἀπαρῖτα, because no man can possibly auoide him, or fly from him: αἰῶνα, because hee abideth for euer. And as for that fable (saith hee) of the three sisters of destiny, I meane of Clotho that spinmeth, of Lachesis that draweth out to a iust length, and of Atropos that cutteth off the thread

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

of mans life, it is to be vnderstood of God only, who (as it was said in old time) is the beginning, midst, and end of all things. To conclude, there is a iustice that is neuer separated from God, which is the reuenger of all transgressions committed against the law of God, wherein euery one must be well instructed that would be partaker of humane felicity & happines.

Now iudge, I pray you, whether a Christian may not with profite enter into this Schoole of nature, and reape commoditie by this litle light of naturall knowledge; which as it serued to make them without excuse that were endued therewith, because they knowing G O D, did not glorifie him as G O D, neither were thankfull, but became vaine in their imaginations: so it is to be feared, that those selfe same men shall rise vp in iudgement against vs that professe Christianitie, and condemne vs in that great and terrible day. For how many of vs want that knowledge of the eternall power, diuinitie, and prouidence of God, which was in Parmenides, Plato, Aristotle, and others, indued onely with the light of nature, whereby they were ledde from the view of the creatures, to the consideration of the invisible things of God? And if we look into the liues of men in these dayes, and consider what neglect there is of those duties which God commandeth vs to exhibite one to another, we shall soone see, that many a million of carnall gospellers come farre short euen of those ciuill apparant and halte vertues of the heathen, and may therefore be sent backe to learne holinesse of Socrates, iustice, and innocencie of Aristides, charitie of Cimon, vpright dealing of Phocion, fidelitie in performing promises of Regulus, Lib. 6. Strom.
mat. moderation of Camillus, parsimonie of Curius, grauitie of Cato, and what not of heathen men, whose sight in these things was better at mid-night, then ours is at mid-day? But my meaning is not to approoue that Apocryphal tradition of Clemens Alexandrinus, who saith, that As the law was a Schoolemaster to the Iewes to lead them to Christ: so Philosophy was to the Grecians to bring them to saluation. Now although this erroneous doctrine be as contrary to truth as darknesse is to light, and as hell is to heauen, yet did Andradus defend it in a booke set forth by him at their instigation (as him selfe protested) who were of greatest authority in the late Tridentine Council. Dorth not the Lord by the mouth of Esay tell vs, that there is no light in them that haue not recourse to the law and to the Testimony, and speake not according to his word? Esay 8. 20. Doeth not our Sauour Christ send vs to the Scriptures for euerlasting life? Iohn 5. 39. How then dare any professing Christianitie, affirme, that Philosophers by the light of nature, and knowledge of Philosophie, without the direction of the writte word of God, were made partakers of the righteousnes that cometh by faith, and so consequently of eternall happinesse? But to let this blaspheinous mouth passe, let vs make that account of the writings of men which they deserue, and reape that commodity by them, which we may without preiudice to the written word. For my meaning is not in commending Philosophie, to giue greater credit vnto it, or further to alow the vse therof, the may stand with the maiestie of the holy and sacred Scripture, which being the Mistris of all human arts & disciplines, vseth them as her handmaids to serue and obey her. Therefore as it is vnseemly for a maid-seruant to go before her mistresse, to speake before she be spoken vnto, or to vse three words for one, especially in company where seruice and modestie is most required: so it becometh not the Embassadors of Gods word (vnto whom indeed the knowledge of tongues and human arts is a singular help) to vse these gifts otherwise then as handmaids in their studies and meditations to serue the Scripture to the more plaine and pure exposition of it, seeing they are sent to edifie others, and not to set out themselves. Now when they stuffe a great part of their speech with Poeticall fictions, Philosophicall sayings and examples (as also they are wont to alledge Hebrew, Greeke, and Latine sentences, to draw men into admiration of their great learning) they set the mistris behinde, and giue the first and chiefe place vnto the handmaidens. Is not this To make the crosse of Christ of none effect? 1. Corinth. 1. 17. To vse that kind of preaching that standeth in the enticing speech of mans wisdom, and not in plaine euidence and power? is it not To build faith vpon the wisdom of men, and not vpon the power of God? 1. Corinth. 1. 4. 5. If disagreement of matter and forme bee vnseemly, how vndecent is it in spirituall doctrine to vse a carnall and humane kinde of teaching, 1. Corinth. 2. 13. to allay the strength of the word of Christ with the waverish sayings and fables of men? to put vpon the naked and glorious face of God the beggerly clokes of Poets and Philosophers?

When the Lord hath sanctified, not the corruptible seed of the sayings of men, but the incorruptible seed of his owne most holy word to the begetting of faith, are not these new begetters ashamed to bring in another way of regeneration? When Gods will is to haue his children nourished with the sincere and vnmixed milke of his word, dare man vse the infusion of water, to the weakening of them whom he ought to confirme? When the King hath appointed for his Sonnes and Daughters the purest and finest wheate, shall the Steward, as if they were swine, prouide Acornes for them? But I detain you too long from entring into the pleasant walkes of this Platonickall Academy and Schoole of Morall Philosophie, which being hewen out of the choicest timber of all Countries, was raised vp, and set together in France, and is newly rough-cast (as you see) by an English workeman: whose earnest desire is to haue this small labour of his knowne to other, and receiued of you as a monument of his gratefull minde towards your Worship, for the manifold benefits which he hath from a childe receiued at your hands. In consideration whereof I am bolde; or rather bound, to offer my selfe together with these my first fruits vnto your good liking beseeching him that turned your bountifull heart towards me, to knitt it so neere vnto himselfe, that he may be your chiefe riches in this life, and your onely happinesse in the world to come. Thus commending you and that good Gentlewoman your wife with all yours, to the grace of God, I take my leaue of you, this 17. of October:

Your Worships euer bounden in the Lord,

T. B. C.

FIDELI SVO AMICO, T.B.C. GALLICAE ACADEMIAE μεταφρασις.

Si quis in nativo solo collocatus, honestis quibus suis circumfluens voluptatibus, nec ulla necessitate eo impulsus, se tamen amicorum hortatu in turbulentissimas maris tempestates coniceret, ut preciosam margaritam a suis multum desideratam compararet: certe & laudanda foret eius in tantis laboribus subeundis alacritas, & postquam secundo vento visus sit, summa cum letitia excipendus illius redditus. Peregre, ut mihi visum est, profectus es aliquantisper (charissime amice) & licet ea fuit vita tua conditio, ut bonis literis te obiectans, in ijs tanquam in tua patria consistere potuisses: voluisti tamen amicorum rogatu fluctibus te obycere, & per aliquos scopulos velut in Gallica regione navigare, ut hanc splendidissimam gemam, Academia nepe florētissimā, nobis etiam amicis tuis communicare posses. Appulisti tandem ad portum, syrtis oēs praeuertus es; exoptatā margarita tuo opere assequuti sumus: non possumus ergo quin & tuā in istis laboribus suscipiendis voluntatem libenter agnoscamus, & in iisdem exantlandis felicitatem libere pradicemus. Quamvis vero multorum in oculis viles cere caput Philosophia, cuius abditos thesauros in lucem protulisti: eiusmodi tamen sunt, quorum autoritas propter hominum levitatem nullius est momenti, & quos vere perstringit illud sermone tritum proverbium, Scientia non habet inimicum nisi ignorantiā. Quis in Maronem Bathyllo atrocior? Quis in Vlissēm Thersie acerbior? Quis Dialecticis argutis Epicuro infestior? Et quales, quāso, sunt, qui canino latratu impetunt Philosophiam, nisi qui huius Regina ades ne a limine salutarum? Si ergo apud istos forsitan sordescant tua vigilia, ne dimittas tamen animum. Neque enim tam acre est eorum iudicium, ut iam pertimescas, nec lingua adeo virulenta, ut vel minimam labeculam tuo nomini aspergere possit. Ne Solis quidem lumen caco incundum est: saluberrima pharmica ab imperitiis conculcantur: pretiosissima gemma a gallo Aescopico spernuntur: & ipsa Philosophia, vita lucerna, mentis medicina, gemma lucidissima, a caecis, solidis, brutis contemnitur. Si aut cum Neoptolemo apud Ennium philosophantē putassent, licet paucis, aut cum Dīno Paulo Epicopias duntaxat aditū reiecissent; nos minime repugnantes habuissent: Quum vero vna cum Apollonio philosophiam ludibrio habeant, eamque ab omni vetustate constitutam cum Arcefila penitus labefactent, nullo modo audiendi, aut ferendi sunt. Ac sicut Dicaearchus & Aristoxenus, quia difficilis erat animi, quid aut qualis esset intelligentia, nullum omnino animum esse dixerunt: ita isti, quorum obtusa acies philosophia insignes fructus aspicere nequit, nullum esse omnino philosophia vsum clamant.

Perum enim vero, habeat Philosophia suam laudem, sit vita dux, morum magistra, virtutis columna, & ei tanquā regina solum suum tribuatur. Tua tamen laudes nulla erunt, nulla te manebit laurea, nullum hic est tuum inventum, nullum tui accuminis specimen nisi velis tanquam ignavus miles de spolijs aliorum sudore partis gloriari & latronum more aliorum bona, alijs impressis notis, tanquam tua venditare. Siccine vero? quid ita tandem? Novi ego (mi amice) animi tui endolem, nullamque (ut ingenuē dicam, quod longa me docuit experientia) quāquam in te contemplari potui: & quamvis nulla benefacta lucem reformident, ea tamen semper laudabiliora duxisti, quā sine venditione & populo esse facta sunt, nullumque theatrum virtuti conscientia maius indicasti. Cuius rei vel hoc vnicum satis est argumentum, quod non (sicut illi philosophi de contemnenda gloria scribentes sua nomina libris apposuerunt) voluisti hoc tuum opus tuum in fronte nomen gerere, sed publicum potius commodum quam priuatam gloriam respiciens, incerto maluisti librum prodire auctore, quam nos certa carere utilitate. Gloria autem individua virtutis comes, vide, ut te quamvis fugientem sequatur. Neque enim nibili est tua industria aestimanda, quamvis alterius vestigijs instituti, nec parvi duccenda sunt tua vigilia, licet alterius opera prius elucubrata fuit ista Academia. Aurum & argentum alunt ipsa terra viscera: illis tamen nonnihil debemus quorum sudore ista metella effodiuntur. Omne fere genus mercaturae aliquibus in locis sua sponte nascitur; suo tamen honore minime spoliandi sunt mercatores, quorum cum periculo vitaeque crebra iactura, tanta nobis bona comportata sunt. Sit itaque Primaudayi aurea ista Academia, illius sit pretiosissima hanc supellex; tibi tamen aliquid interia laudis relinquatur, cuius industria nisi se oportune interposuisset, Anglis nostris nihil inde emolumentum redundasset. Neque est quod quispiam agere ferat, si Philosophia Graeca ac Romana veste ut plurimum induta, iam incipiat Britanico quoque vestitu incedere Bonum enim (ut pulchre philosophus) quo communis, eo melius: & philosophia ipsa Soli haud dissimilis, in omnes terrarum orbes radios suos disseminare cupit. Argivorum res gesta celebres facta sunt primo ab Homero: neque tamen lusit suam operam Virgilius, cum easdem suo carmine celebravit. Philosophia diu Gracia regionibus & septis inclusa permansit: nunquam tamen consenset Ciceronis laus, qui eam ipsam Latinis literis illustravit. Et gratā (vix spero) memoria tuos labores prosequuntur omnes quibus factum est, ut Academia ista, Gallicis antea circumscripta terminis, Anglis iam tandem immorescat. Mahe igitur virtute (charissime amice) & maiores tibi addant spiritus ista primitia ad maiora, si iusta se offerat occasio, suscipienda. Spero etenim aliquando eventurum, ut, sicut in Philosophico certamine vires tuae se exeruerint, ita etiam in Theologico pulvere pari saltem felicitate exspantur. Interim bene vale. 13. Octobr.

Tui studiosissimus, G. I.

To

TO THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING OF FRANCE and POLONIA, HENRIE the third of that name.

SIR, if we credit the saying of Plato, Common wealths begin then to be happy, when Kings exercise Philosophie, and Philosophers reigne. The Wiseman speaking more diuinely, exhorteth Kings to loue and to seeke after wisdom, that they may reigne vpon earth righteously, and in heauen eternally. And truly from wisdom and Philosophie, as from a liuely fountaine floweth the gift of governing by good lawes & good example, of defending by prowesse and of nourishing by wisdom and providence, which are the bands of al perfection requisite in an excellent & absolute Prince; that desireth to govern his kingdom according to pietie & iustice. These three great & excellent gifts depending of God, as euerie other grace doth, one of those meanes wherby he useth most commonly to enrich them that haue the reines of worldly government in their hand, is to imprint in their hearts a loue and desire of learning and sciences. But because they cannot so perfectly vnderstand them by reason of their great and burdensome charge, as private men may, who quietly enjoying the fruit and benefit of their Kings labors, addict themselves to no other profession, their Maiesties are so much the more pricked forward to loue, to inquire after, and to honor such their subiects, as are best able to set before their eies those vertuous and learned instructions that are drawne out of the fountaines of arts and disciplines. This moued Antigonus king of Macedonia to write thus to Zeno the Philosopher: I am assured that I excell thee in the goods & fauour of Fortune, and in the renoune of such things, but I know withal, that thou art far about me, and goest beyond me in that true felicitie, which consisteth in the knowledge & discipline of studies. Therefore I desire earnestly that thou wouldest come vnto me: wherein I pray thee denie me not, that I may enjoy thy conuersation and company, as well for mine owne profit, as for the profit of all the Macedonians my Subiects. For he that instructeth a Prince, doth also profit as many as are vnder his charge. The selfe same loue of knowledge was the cause, that all the festiuall ornaments of that great lover of vertue Ptolemie Philadelphus King of Egypt, were graue questions as well of pietie as of Philosophie, which hee propounded to be handled and concluded by those learned men whom he ordinarily maintained in his traine.

Sir, the example of these two noble Kings shining wholly in you, who greatly loue and fauour learning, and the professors thereof, and open the gate of that holy and vertuous discipline, which was so much cherished by auncient men, that they may daily bee instructed the better in the dutie of their charges, doth promise to your good subiects & vassals, that by the grace of God they shall see vnder your reigne, the euill of those sinister effects defaced, which haue issued from these long troubles and ciuill warres. Whereof all men haue conceived a more certain hope, because they see that you labor with a holy zeale and good affection, to restore pietie and iustice to their former strength and beautie, which were in a manner buried in France: and that you haue gloriously crowned that worke, which that great King Francis your grandfather did happily begin, to the end that artes and sciences might flourish in this kingdom. The dinner of that Prince of famous memory, was a second table of Solomon, vnto which resorted from euery nation such as were best learned, that they might reape profite and instruction. Yours, Sir, beeing compassed about with those who in your presence daily discourse of, and heare discoursed many graue and godly matters, seemeth to be a Schoole erected to teach men that are borne to vertue.

The Authors Epistle to the king.

vertue. And for my selfe, hauing so good hap during the assembly of your Estates at Blois, as to be made partaker of the fruit gathered therof, it came in my minde to offer vnto your Maiestie a dish of diuers fruits, which I gathered in a Platonicall garden or orchard, otherwise called an ACADEMIE, where I was not long since with certaine yong Gentlemen of Anjou my companions, discoursing together of the institution in good manners, and of the meanes how all estates and conditions may liue well and happily. And although a thousand thoughts came then into my mind to hinder my purpose, as the small authoritie which youth may or ought to haue in counsell amongst ancient men: the greatnes of the matter subiect, propounded to be handled by yeares of so small experience: the forgetfulness of the best foundations of their discourses, which for want of a rich and happy memorie might be in me: my iudgement not sound enough, and my profession vnfit to set them downe in good order: Briefly, the consideration of your naturall disposition and rare vertue, and of the learning which you receiue both by reading good Authors, and by your familiar communication with learned and great personages that are neere about your Maiestie, (whereby I seemed to oppose the light of an obscure day, full of cloudes and darkenesse, to the beames of a very cleere shining Sunne, and to take in hand, as we say, to teach Minerva) I say, all these reasons being but of two great weight to make me change my opinion, yet calling to minde many goodly and graue sentences taken out of sundrie Greeke and Latine Philosophers, as also the worthy examples of the liues of ancient Sages and famous men, wherewith these discourses were enriched, which might in delighting your noble minde renew your memorie with those notable sayings in the praise of vertue, and dispraise of vice, which you alwaies loued to heare: and considering also that the bountie of Artaxerxes that great Monarch of the Persians was reuiued in you, who receiued with a cheerefull countenance a present of water of a poore labourer when he had no neede of it, thinking it to be as great an act of magnanimity to take in good part, and to receiue cheerefully small presents offered with a heartie and good affection, as to giue great things liberally, I ouercame whatsoever would haue stayed mee in mine enterprise. For I assured my selfe thus much of your bountifull and royall greatnesse, (which I craue in most humble manner) that you would measure the gift and offer of this my small labour, not according to the desert thereof, or by the person of one of your basest seruants and subiects, who presenteth it vnto you, but according to the excellency of those things, which you shall see handled in this Academie, and according to the seruiceable and most effectionate desire, wherewith I dedicate and consecrate both goods and life to your seruice. I beseech God, Sir, to preferue your Maiestie in great prosperity, increase of honour and continuance of a long and happy life. At Barree in the moneth of February. 1577.

Your most humble and most obedient Servant and Subiect,

PETER dela PRIMAVDAYE.

The

The Author to the Reader.

THe Philosophers teach us by their writings, and experience doth better shew it unto us, that to conet and desire is proper to the soule, and that from thence all the affections and desires of men proceed, which drawe them hither and thither diuersly, that they may attaine to that thing, which they thinke is able to leade them to the enioying of some good, whereby they may liue a contented and happie life. Which felicitie, the most part of men, through a false opinion, or ignorance rather of that which is good, and by following the inclination of their corrupt nature, doe seeke and labour to find in humane and earthly things, as in riches, glory, honour, and pleasure. But for as much as the enioying of these things doth not bring with it sufficient cause of contentation, they perceine themselves alwaies deapined of the ende of their desires, and are constrained to wander all their life time beyond all bounds and measure according to their rasonesse, and inconstancie of their lusts. And although they reioice for a little while at euery new change, yet presently they loathe the selfe same thing which not long before they earnestly desired. Their owne estate seemeth unto them to bee worst, and euery present condition of life, to bee burdensome. For one estate they seeke after another, so that now they withdraw themselves from the seruice of Princes, and mislike publike charges, and by they blame the private life, laboring that they may be employed. They forsake one countrey to go & dwell in another, and suddenly they desire to returne againe into their former waies. They that haue neither wiues nor children, seeke and wish for them, and when they haue them, they desire oftentimes nothing more then to bee rid of them: and soone after yee shall see them to bee married againe. Haue they heaped up great store of wealth, and encreased their reuenues by halfe so much more? They desire notwithstanding to make it altogether as much. The Souldier seeketh to be Captaine: from a Captaine to be master of the Camp: from the master of the Camp to be Lieutenant to the King: then he would gladly make himselfe King. The sillie Priest would be a Curate: from a Curate, Bishop: from a Bishop, Cardinal: from a Cardinal, Pope: and then would command Kings and Soueraigne Princes. Kings are not contented to reigne ouer their owne Subjects, but bend themselves alwayes to enlarge their limits to make themselves (if they can) the onely Monarchs. Briefly, all men whose hearts are set vpon worldly goods, when they are come to this estate of life, they would attaine to that: and beeing come therunto, some other newe desire carrieth them farther, so that this mischiefe of continuall, vncertaine, and vsatiable lustes and desires doeth more and more kinde in them, untill in the end death cut off the threed of their inconstant, and neuer contented life. This cometh to passe, because the alteration of an Estate and condusion of life plucketh not out of the minde that which presseth and troubleth it: namely, the ignorance of things, and imperflection of reason. But they, who through the studie of wysedome are furnished with skill and vnderstanding, and know that all humane and earthly things are vncertaine, deceitfull, slipperie, and so many allurements vnto men to draw them into a down-fall and destruction, they I say, doe lay a farre better and more certaine foundation of their chiefe Good, contentation, and felicitie. For they are so farre off from beeing carried away, as worldlings are, with the desire of greatnesse, riches, and pleasure, that they rather desire lesse then they haue, contenting them, and so vse them as though they had them not. And delivering their soules by the grace of God, from all these perturbations which besiege them in the prison of their bodies, they lift vp their wishes and desires, yea, they referre all the endes of their intents and actions to this onely marke, to be vnitied and ioyned to their last ende of their soueraigne Good, which is the full and whole fruition of the essence of God, that their holy affections might bee at once fulfilled and satisfied, by enioying that diuine light, through a most happie and immortall life, when they shall bee vnclotched of this body of death, and of all concupiscences and passions, and reioyce in such a felicitie, as neither eye hath seene, nor eare heard, nor euer entre into the heart of man.

Moreouer

The Authour to the Reader.

Moreover, wee ought to knowe, if wee haue neuer so little iudgement and reason, that in all worldly things how great and goodly soeuer they seeme to our carnall eyes and senses, there is such a mixture of bitterness and dislike ioyned with the fruition of them, that if wee could diuide the euill from that which of the ignorant sort is called Good, and weigh them one against another, there is no doubt but the bad part would easily weigh downe what goodnesse soeuer could bee found amongst them. But how shall wee call that good, which is so mingled with euill, which oftentimes hurteth more then it profiteth, and which being possessed abundantly, cannot keepe the possessor thereof from being wretched and miserable? What contentation can a man finde therein, seeing that such a Good commonly slippeth away as soone as it is receiued, and alwayes worketh an insatiable desire thereof? What felicitie shall wee expect and looke for in the fruition of that thing which waxeth olde and perisbeth, and which men are alwayes afraid to lose? Now I pray you, who can doubt iustly, but that the qualitie and nature of riches, of glorie, of honour, and pleasure is such? Whereupon wee must conclude, that man can finde no goodnesse, contentation, or happinesse, in any thing that is earthly and mortall. Besides, who knoweth not sufficiently the poore estate of mans life, which in the fairest of his race commeth to nothing in the twinkling of an eye; so that all his bodily shew and brightnesse turneth suddenly into putrefaction? Who doeth not trie more then hee would, how full his life is of sharpe griefes, and pricking miseries, and how it is assaulted with continuall troubles? With how many pearcing cares doeth it abound, and what gripping griefes doe pursue it? Briefly, as a wise Grecian said, hauing but the bare name of life, it is in effect and truth a continuall paine. And truly that thing hath no being indeed, which changeth without ceasing, as the nature of man doeth which neuer continueth in the same estate, no not the least moment that is. I would gladly aske of thee who readeest this, or doest meane to reade it, what day, or what houre thou hast passed, or now passest ouer, since thou hadst any iudgement or knowledge, wherein thy bodie hath not felt some griefe, or thy heart some passion? As there is no sea without tempest, warre without danger, or iourney without trauell: so there is no life without griefe, nor calling without enuie or care: neither did I euer see or know that man, who hath had no cause to bee grieved, or to, complaine.

Doth not experience daily teach vs, that no man liuing can make choise of any estate void of all trouble, or flee one inconuenience, but that hee is in danger to fall into another? Is it not also most certaine that a sudden ioy or prosperitie, is but a fore warning or signe of some griefe and heavy calamitie at hand? But what? Shall wee for all this thinke man so miserable, that fasting all his life time in stormes and tempests, hee cannot possibly attaine to any safe haven against the rage of them? Shall wee in such sort deprive him (during the time of his being in this world) of all Good, contentation and happinesse, as if there were no meanes to auoide, or at leastwise to mollifie the mishaps and miseries of mankind, that hee faint not vnder the heavy burthen of them? Wherefore then doe wise men by so many learned writings inuite vs diligently to seeke after, and with a burning zeale to embrace holy vertue, saying, that by her alone a man may liue happely and contentedly in euery calling, and may enioy therein the soueraign Good, through the tranquillitie and rest of his soule, purged of perturbation by Philosophie? was it in vaine and fruitlesse, that an infinite number of famous personages, whose Histories the mother of Antiquitie set before our eyes, imploied so great trauel, passed infinit watchings forsooke and contemned riches, pleasures, honors, and worldly commodities, to get and treasure up vertue only? And why do we, after their example, despise all these things and spend that which we account most precious, I meane time, that wee may be adorned and cloathed with vertue, if it cannot make vs hit that marke, which euery one so much desireth and seeketh after with such great paine and labor; namely, that they may enioy some chiefe Good in this world, and leade thereby a contented and happy life? Be not ouertaken (friendly Reader) with this smal difficultie which perhaps might cause a grosse and feeble head not well instructed in wisdom, to stagger and depart out of the right way. Now, although the heauenly word onely hath the perfect and sound knowledge of wisdom, because he is that eternall wisdom is selfe, yet man being his workmanship, and aided with his grace, must not leane off to seeke for, and to require earnestly of him that giueth of the knowledge and participation of the secrets of that incomprehensible truth, (so farre fourth as hee may and shall bee necessarie for him) that his soule thereby may obtaine her permanent and lasting happinesse. Moreover, albeit our soueraigne and chiefe Good, our perfect contentation and absolute felicitie be onely in beauen in the enioying of that diuine light, yet wee must not in the meane while, (albeit wee cannot fully possess that) leane off to seeke without ceasing, or giue ouer in any sort to keepe and follow that good and infallible way of vertue, which causing vs to passe ouer quietly, and to sustaine with ioy of spirit, the miseries of mankind, and appeasing the perturbations of our soules, from whence proceed all the euils that torment vs, and making them void of all damnable effects, will teach vs to leade a pleasant, peaceable, and quiet life, and to effect all things worthy

The Authour to the Reader.

worthy and becomming this certaine hope, that we shall one day (by the grace of God) bee framed anew in that eternall, most happy, and contented life. Let vs therefore account this world, and all the riches thereof, as a thing belonging to another, as a stranger and nothing appertaining to those men, who being regenerated by the Spirit of grace, haue profited well in the schoole of wisdom. Let vs not seeke for friendship vpon earth: let vs not conet after riches, glory, honour, and pleasure: which none but fooles doe extoll, desire and wonder at. Wee are not of this world, but strangers onely therein, and therefore let vs set all worldly things behind vs, and account them unworthy of the care of our immortall soules, if wee meane not to perish with the world by ioyning our selues therewith. Let vs forsake it, I say forsake it boldly, how precious soeuer it bee, that wee may abundantly treasure vpt that great, sweet and durable wealth, I meane vertue which is honoured, loved, and desired for it selfe onely, which is the true and wholesome medicine for diseased soules, the rest of the mind oppressed with care, the cause (by the will of GOD) of that chiefe Good wherein the principall ende of the soule consisteth, and the onely assured guide which leadeth to the Hauens so much desired of euery one, namely, the contentation of minde. Which thing this present Academy doth not onely set before our eyes, but also doth saue and keepe vs being already entred into this Hauens of safety, against all tempests, if wee will our selues, and not spare our labour to reape profite of those learned and wise instructions, that are heere giuen vnto vs by the precepts of doctrine, and examples of the liues of auncient, vertuous, and famous men. For first of all wee shall learne hereby to know our selues, and the ende of our being.

This commendation of vertue is chiefly to be vnderstood of all good vertues.

Secondly, we shall be instructed in good manners, and taught how we may liue well and happily in euery estate and condition of life whatsoever. Yea we shall finde in the basest and lowest estate, which of the ignorant and common sort of people is oftentimes called miserable, as much ioy and happines, as a monarch can be partaker of in the fruition of his greatness, yea much more than he, if he bee wicked: because vice in all estates maketh thee possessor thereof wretched, and contrariwise Vertue maketh euery condition of life happy. Moreover we shall see in this Academy, that euery one loving and fearing GOD, may obtaine this inestimable good of vertue, and thereby remaine a Conqueror ouer the perturbations of his soules, which breeds all his misery, remembring this point alwayes, so farre forth as the fraile nature of man, aided by the authour of all goodnes can attaine to this perfection. Wee shall learne heere how we ought to gouerne our selues wisely and dutifully in all humane actions and affaires, and in all charges and places whatsoever, either publike or priuate, wherunto wee shall bee called. We may note heere the cause of the subuersion and ruine of many Empires, Estates and Commonwealths, and of the glistering show and glory of infinite others: as also the cause of the wretchednes, and destruction of a great number of men, and what hath liue vnto other, and crowned them with honour and immortall praise. Wee shall be taught heere the gouernment of a house and family, the manner of the education & instruction of children, the mutuall duties of married couples, of brethren, of masters and seruants, how to command, and how to obey.

Wee shall see heere the order and establishment of Policies and Superiorities: what is the duty of the Heads of them, of Princes and Gouernors of nations: as also what the duty of their subiects is. Briefly, both great and small may draw out from hence the doctrine & knowledge of those things which are most necessary for the gouernment of a house, and of a Commonwealth, with sufficient instruction how to frame their life and manners in the mould and patterne of true and holy vertue, and how by means thereof (the grace of GOD working in them) they may runne the race of their duties in ioy, happinesse, rest and tranquillity of Spirit, and that in the midst of greatest aduersities, which the vncertainty and continuall change of humane things may bring vpon them. Now because the sequels compounded of the sundry treatises and discourses of this Academy, will sufficiently instruct thee in all things aboue mentioned, as it promiseth in the fore front and title thereof, I will not dilate this matter any farther, but onely desire of thee (Reader) patiently to heare these Academicall students, from the first of their discourses vnto the last.

Their intent was onely (as thou maist vnderstand more at large in the entrance of their assembly) to teach themselves, and next euery one according to their ability, the institution of good manners, and rule of good liuing, for all ordinary and common estates and conditions of life in our French Monarchy, to the end that euery member of this politike body (brought thus low with euils, and beaten with tempestuous storms) might somewhat help & profit it by their counsels & instructions. And this thou maist do (friendly Reader) if thou takest pains to reade wel, to vnderstand better (& which is best of all) to follow the precepts, instruction & examples which thou shalt find here: as also, if thou bringest hither a good will, & cheereful dispositio, void of all malicious enuy, which at this day is commonly practised by most men of this our age (who like to malicious Cēsurers) busie themselves rather in seeking out what to bite at, & to reprehended in other mens works, than to draw out, & to commend that which is good, or to assay to make the better.

The Authour to the Reader.

Besides, thou shalt haue somewhat to commend in the order of these discourses, and in the manner of teaching which is in them. For after the handling of that knowledge which is especially necessary for man, all these vertues follow which bee ought to embrace, and those vices which bee is to shunne. Next, bee is instructed in that which concerneth house-keeping: then in that which hath respect to Estates and Policies, and last of all how he may die wel, after he hath liued well. As for the manner of teaching, which is diligently obserued by these Academickes, thou shalt see that first they praise that vertue, or dispraise that vice which they proponnd to themselves to discourse vpon, that they may moue and frame mens minds, as well to hate the one, as to desire the other. Then they define that whereof they discourse, that the ende of the present subiect may bee better knowne. Afterward, they giue precepts to finde out the meanes whereby to attaine to that which is Good, and to eschew the euill. Lastly, they adde examples, which are lively reasons, and of great weight to moue men with delight to embrace vertue, and to flee vice. Now if thou thinkest that too little is spoken, considering the goodly and large matter beere proponnded, it is not because they knew not that the excellencie of euery thing put forth here is so great, and the reasons so abundant, that a man might well make a Booke thereof by it selfe, as many learned men haue done: but the chiefe scope and drift of these Interspeakers, was to discourse briefly of such things as are necessarily required in the institution of manners, and of a happie life. Neuerthelesse, it may well be, that that which thou findest not sufficiently followed in one place, may be learned in another, if thou lookest vnto the end. Moreouer, they who are here named, and who mind to retaine alwayes the name of disciples, neuer purposed or presumed to set downe resolutions, or to appoint Lawes which are necessarily to be kept, and may not bee changed in any wise by those that are cleare sighted, according to the occurrence and benefite of the estate of this Monarchie, but grounding their counsels and instructions vpon the soundest and most approoued opinion of the writing of learned men, both of ancient and late times, and vpon such as drew nearest to the infallible rule of the holy Scriptures, according to the small measure of grace giuen them from aboue, they haue left to euery one (following therein the ancient Schoole of the Academickes) libertie to compare the motives of the one side, with the reasons on the other, that the truth of all things might bee diligently searched out and inquired after, that none through an headstrong conceit should bee wedded to priuate opinions: and that afterward choise might bee made of the best, and of such as are most certaine thereby to order and rule all intents and actions, and to referre them to the perpetuall glory of that great Lord of Hierarchies, who is the onely cause and chiefe fountains of all Good, contentation, and happinesse.

Spe certa quid melius,

The

The Contents of the feuerall Chapters of this first Booke.

Chap.		Page 4.
1	O F Man.	4	43	of Enuy Hatred, and Backbiting.	188
2	Of the Bodie and Soule.	8	44	of Fortune.	192
3	Of the diseases and passions of the Bodie and Soule, and of the tranquillity thereof.	11	45	of Marriage.	196
4	Of Philosophie.	16	46	of a Houle and Family, and of the kinds of Marriage: of certaine auncient customes obserued in Marriage.	201
5	Of Vertue.	21	47	of the particular dutie of a Husband towards his Wife.	206
6	Vice.	26	48	of the dutie of a Wife towards her Husband.	210
7	Of Sciences, of the studie of Letters, and of Histories.	29	49	of the dutie of the head of a Family in other parts of the house, namely in the Parentall, masterly, & possessory part.	215
8	Of the Spirit, and of memory.	34	50	of the dutie of children towards their parents: of the mutuall loue that ought to bee amongst brethren: of the duction of Seruants towards their masters.	220
9	Of Durie and Honesty.	38	51	of the education and instruction of children.	226
10	Of Prudence.	42	52	of the diuision of the ages of man, and of the offices & duties that are to be obserued in them.	230
11	Of want of Prudence and of Ignorance, of Malice and Subtiltie.	47	53	of Policy, and of sundrie sorts of gouernements.	235
12	Of Speech and Speaking.	52	54	of the soueraige Magistrate, and of his authoritie and office.	240
13	Of Friendship, and of a Friend.	56	55	of the Law.	244
14	Of Reprehension and Admonition.	61	56	of the people, and of their obedience to the Magistrate, and to the Law.	248
15	Of Curiositie and Noueltie.	65	57	of a Monarchie, or a Regall power.	253
16	Of Nature and Education.	70	58	of diuers kindes of Monarchies, and of a Tyrannie.	258
17	Of Temperance.	74	59	of the education of a Prince in good maners and conditions.	263
18	Of Intemperance, and of Stupiditie or Blockishnesse.	78	60	of the office and dutie of a King.	268
19	Of Sobrietie and Frugalitie.	81	61	of a Councell, and of Counsellors of Estate.	273
20	Of Superfluitie, Sumptuousnesse, Gluttony, and wallowing in delights.	86	62	of Iudgements, and of Iudges.	279
21	Of Ambition.	92	63	of Seditions.	284
22	Of Voluptuousnesse and loosenesse of life.	96	64	of the causes that breed the change, corruption, &c. of Monarchies, and Policies.	290
23	Of Glory, Praise, Honour, and of Pride.	101	65	of the preseruacion of Estates, and Monarchies, and of remedies to keep them from sedition.	296
24	Of Shame, Shamefastnes, and of dishonour.	105	66	of the Harmonie and agreement that ought to bee in the dissimilitude or vnlike callings of subjects, by reason of the dutie and office of euery Estate.	301
25	Of Fortitude.	109	67	of Peace and Warre.	305
26	Of Timorousnesse, Feare, Cowardlinesse, and of Rashnesse.	114	68	of the order and discipline of Warre.	309
27	Of Magnanimitie and Generositie.	118	69	of the office and dutie of a Generall.	313
28	Of Hope.	123	70	of the choyce of Souldiers, of the manner how to exhorte them to fight, and how victorie is to bee vied.	318
29	Of Patience and Impatiencie: of Choller and Wrath.	126	71	of a happie life.	322
30	Of Meeknesse, Clemency, Mildnesse, Gentlenes, and Humanitie.	131	72	of Death.	327
31	Of good and ill hap.	135
32	Of Prosperitie and Aduersitie.	139
33	Of Riches.	144
34	Of Pouertie.	147
35	Of Idlenesse, Sloth, and Gaming.	151
36	Of an Enemie, of Iniurie and Reuenge.	156
37	Of Iustice.	160
38	Of Iniustice, and Seueritie.	165
39	Of Fidelitie, Forswearing, and of treason.	170
40	Of Ingratitude.	174
41	Of Liberalitie, and of the vse of Riches.	178
42	Of Couetousnesse, and Prodigalitie.	182

The speciall and principall matters handled in this second Tome of the French Academy, as it is diuided into seuerall daies workes, and distinguished by Chapters.

The first daies worke.

OF the creation of the first man, and of the matter whereof the body of man is made. cap. 1. fo. 339.

Of the creation of woman. chap. 2. fol. 342.

Of the simple or similiary parts of the body, namely, the bones, ligaments, gristles, sinowes, pannicles, cords or filaments, veines arteries and flesh. chap. 3. fol. 346.

Of the compound parts of the body, and first of the feete and legges, and of the armes and hands. chap. 4. 349.

Of the backebone and of the marrow thereof: of the ribs, and of other bones of mans body. chap. 5. 353.

Of the Sharebone and marrow of the bones: of the bones in the head, and of the flesh: of the muscles and of their office. chap. 6. 356.

Of the kernels in the body, and of their sundry vses: especially of the breasts of women, of their beauty and profit in the nourishing of children, and of the generation of milke. chap. 7. 359.

Of the fat and skins of mans body, and of their vse: of the haire thereof. chap. 8. 362.

The second daies worke.

OF the bodily and externall senses, especially of touchings: of their members, instruments and offices. chap. 9. fol. 364.

Of the eies, and of their excellency, profite and vse: of the matter and humours whereof they are made, chap. 10. 367.

Of the tunicles end skins of the eies: of their forme & motions: of their sundry colours: of the sinewes whereby they receiue light, and of other parts about the eies. chap. 11. 370.

Of the eares, and of their composition, office, and vse. chap. 12. 377.

Of the diuers vses of the tongue: of the instruments necessary both for voice and speech, how there is a double speech: of the forme thereof how the spirit of man is represented thereby, chap. 13. 377.

Of the agreement which the instruments of the voice and speech haue with a paire of Organs, what things are to bee considered in placing of the lungs next the heart, of the pipes and instruments of the voice. chap. 14. 380.

Of the tongue, and of the nature and office thereof: of the excellency and profit of speech which is the art of the tongue: what is to be considered touching the situation thereof in the head, and neere the braine. chap. 15. 383.

Of the office of the tongue in tasting, and in preparing meate for the nourishment of the body: of the teeth, and of their nature and office, of the conduite or pipe that receiue and swalloweth downe meats. chap. 16. 386.

The third daies worke

OF the sence of taste given to the palat: what taits are good to nourish the body: of the diuersitie of them: of hunger and thirst, of their causes. chap. 17. fol. 389.

Of heips and creatures meete for the preservation and nourishment of the body: how God prepareth them to serue for that purpose: of their vse. chap. 18. 392.

Of the nose and of the sence of smelling, and of their profit and vse: of the composition, matter and forme of the nose. chap. 19. 395.

Of the vse briefly of all the outward senses of mans body, namely in purging the superfluities and ordures.

of his nose: of the diuerfity that is in mens faces, and of the image of the munde and heart in them. chap. 20. 398.

Of the nature, faculties and powers of mans soule: of the knowledge which we may haue in this life, & how excellent & necessarie it is: into what kindes the life and soule are diuided. chap. 21. 401.

Of the two natures of which man is compounded: how the body is the lodge and instrument of the soule: how the soule may be letted from doing her proper actions by the body, and be separated from it, and yet remaine in her perfection. cap. 22. 404.

Of the braine and of the nature thereof: of the sundry kinds of knowledge that are in man: of the similitude that is betweene the actions and workes of the naturall vertues of the soule, and of the internall senses. cap. 23. 407.

Of the composition of the braine, with the members and parts thereof: of their offices, & that knowledge which ought to content vs touching the principal cause of the vertues and wonderfull powers of the soule. cap. 24. 410.

The fourth daies worke.

OF the seate of voluntary motion and sence of the office and nature of the common sence: of imagination, and of fantasie: and how light and dangerous fantasie is: of the power which both good and bad spirits haue to moue it. cap. 25. fol. 413.

Of reason and memory, and of their seate, nature and office: of the agreement which all the senses both externall and internall haue one with another and of their vertues. cap. 26. 416.

That the internall senses are so distinguished, that some of them may be troubled and hindered, and the rest be safe and whole, according as their places & instruments assigned vnto them in the body are found or perished: and of those that are possessed with diuels. cap. 27. 419.

Of the reasonable soule and life, and of vertue: of the vnderstanding and will that are in the soule, & of their dignity and excellency. cap. 28. 422.

Of the variety and contrariety that is found in the opinions, deliberations, counsailes, discourses, & iudgements of men, with the cause thereof: and of the good order and end of all discourses. cap. 29. 426.

Of iudgement, and of his office after the discourse of reason: and how beleefe, opinion, or doubting follow it: of the difference that is between the. cap. 30. 429.

Of the meanes whereby a man may haue certain knowledge of those things which he ought to beleefe & to take for true: of the naturall & supernatural light that is in man, and how they beare witnes of the image of God in him. cap. 31. 432.

How the vertues and powers of the soule shew themselves by litle and litle. And by degrees: of contemplation, and of the good that is in it: of that true & diuine contemplation which wee looke for after this life. cap. 32. 434.

The fift daies worke.

OF the appetites that are in all liuing creatures, & namely in man, and of their kindes: and particularly of the naturall & sensitiue appetite. cap. 33. 437.

Of wil and of the diuers significations & vies of these words (Reason and Will) of the actions, freedome, and nature thereof: of the power which reason may haue ouer her. cap. 34. 440.

The Table of the Contents.

Of those good things which both men only guided by the light of nature, are able to propound to themselves, and to follow, and they also that are guided by the spirit of God: of the power and liberty of the will in her actions both externall and internall. cap. 35. 443.

Of the distinction that ought to be betweene the vnderstanding and knowledge, and the wil and affections in the soule, and betweene the seates and instruments which they haue in the body: of the agreement that is betweene the heart and the braine, cap. 36. 446.

Of the nature and composition of the heart, & of the midriffe: of the tunicles or skinny coverings of the breast, and of the Pericardion, or cawle about the heart: of the motion, office and vse of the lungs: of the heart, and of the arteries. cap. 37. 471.

Of the substance situation and counterpoize of the heart: of the nature and vse of the vitall spirit, and of the forge, vessels and instruments thereof: of the sundry doores and pipes of the heart, and of their vses. cap. 38. 451.

Of the second motion of the heart, which belongeth to the affections of the soule, and of those that goe before or follow after iudgement of the agreement that is betweene the temperature of the body, and the affections of the soule. cap. 39. 454.

Of the health and diseases of the soule: of the agreement betweene corporall and spirituall physicke: how necessary the knowledge of the nature of the body and of the soule is for every one. cap. 40. 416.

The sixt daies worke.

Of foure things to be considered in the will, and in the power of desiring in the soule: and first of naturall inclinations: of selfe loue, and the vnruines thereof. cap. 41. fol. 458.

Of the habite of the soule in the matter of the affections of what force it is of the causes why the affections are given to the soule, with the vse of them: of the fountaine of vertues and vices. cap. 42. 461.

That according to the disposition of the iudgement the affections are more or lesse moderate or immoderate of the cause of al the motions of the soule and heart: of the variety of affections, of the regeneration, nature and kinds of them. cap. 43. 464.

That ioy or griefe, are alwaies ioyned to the affections: and what ioy & griefe are properly. cap. 44. 465.

Of the causes why God hath placed these affections of ioy and sorrow in the heart: of true and false ioy, & of good and bad hope. cap. 45. 468.

Of feare, and of the nature and effects thereof toward the body, the minde and the soule, and how it troubleth them: of the true harnesse and armour against feare. cap. 46. fol. 471.

Of the delight and pleasure that followeth euery ioy, and of the moderation that is required therein: of diuers degrees of pleasures and how men abuse the especially those pleasures, which are receiued by the corporall senses. cap. 47. 473.

Of the comparison of pleasures receiued by the internal senses: and how men descend by degrees from the best to the basest pleasures: of the difference between the vse of spirituall delights and corporall: & how the one chase the other. cap. 48. 476.

The seventh daies worke.

Of the affections of loue, of the nature kinds and object of it: of the beginning of friendship: of the vertue and force of alluring that is in likenes & in beauty: of the agreement that is betweene beauty and goodnes. cap. 49. fol. 479.

Of other causes why beauty procureth loue and, of diuers degrees and kinds of beauty: how it is the nature of loue alwaies to vnite, and what other effect it hath: how loue descendeth, and ascendeth: now what power it hath to allure and breede loue. cap. 50. fol. 482.

Of desire and coueting, and of the kinds of it: of the infinitenes of mens desires, and what Good is able to satisfie and content it: of the difference between desire and loue, and of the vtmost limit and ende of loue. cap. 51. 485.

Of the good things that are in true loue, of the diuers valuations of loue and of the benefits which it procureth: what knowledge is requisite to allure loue, & how one loue groweth by another: of the friendship that may be both betweene the good and the bad. cap. 52. 487.

Of fauour, reuerence, and of honour: of their nature and effects: of those outward signes where by they shew themselves: of pitty and compassion, and how agreeable it is to the nature of man. chapter 53. 490.

Of offence in the heart and soule: of the degrees of offence, and of the good and euill that may bee in this affection: of contempt that is bred of it, and of mockery, which followeth contempt. c. 54. 493.

Of anger: and of the vehemency and violence thereof: of the difference that is betweene anger and rancour: of the affection of reuenge that accompanieth them: of the motions of the heart in anger, with the effects thereof, wherefore this affection is given to man, and to what vse it may serue him. c. 55. 496.

Of hatred and of the nature and effects thereof: of a good kinde of hatred, and the remedy to cure the euill hatred of enuy, and of the kinds and effects thereof: of the difference betweene good and euill enuy. cap. 56. 499.

The eight daies worke.

Of Ielousie and the kinds thereof: how it may bee either a vice or a vertue: how true zeale, true iolousie & indignatio proceed of loue: of their natures & why these affections are given to man. cha. 57. 502.

Of reuenge, cruelty and rage, & what agreement there is among them: what shame and blushing is, and why God hath placed these affections in man: and of the good and euill that is in them. c. 58. fol. 505.

Of pride, with the consideration thereof as well in nature intire as corrupted: of the originall thereof, and of such as are most inclined therunto: what vices accompany it: how great a poison it is, and what remedie there is for it. c. 59. 508.

Of the naturall powers of the soule, and what sundrie vertues they haue in the nourishment of the body: of their order & offices: of their agreement & necessary vse: where their vegetatiue soule is placed in the body, and what vertue it hath to augment the same, chap. 60. fol. 511.

What instruments the soule vseth in the body, about the naturall workes of nourishing and augmenting: of the ventricle or stomacke, and of the hegre, orifices and filaments it hath: of the stomacke, and of what substance and nature it is: of the causes of hunger & of appetite: of the inferiour orifice. c. 61. 514.

Of the intrals and bowels, & of their names & offices: of the nature of the three smaller guts: & of the other three that are greater: of the instructions which we may learne by these things. c. 62. 517.

Of the mesentery & Mesareon: of the Meseraical veins of the Papreas or sweet bread, and of their nature and office, of the liuer, and of his nature & office of the roots, bodies and branches of the veines: of their names and vses, & of the similitude betweene them and the arteries. c. 63. 520.

The Table of the Contents.

Of the blood, and of other humours in the body : of their diuersity and nature , and of the agreement they haue with the elements: of the similitude that is betwixt the great garden of this great world, and that of the litle world, touching the nourishment of things contained & preserved in them. c.64.f.523

The ninth dayes worke.

Of the vapors that ascend vp to the braine, and of the waters and clouds contained therein : and in what perils men are thereby: why the soule and blood are put one for another : of the temperature of the humours necessary for the health and life of the body : of the causes of health, and of diseases, and of life and death. chap.65.fol.526

Of the vses and commodities of the humours ioyned with the blood, and what vessels are assigned vnto them in the body, & of their nature and offices, and first of the cholericke humour, and of the spleene : then of the flegmatike humor, & of the kidneys and other vessels, which it hath to purge by. c.66.f.529

Of the names whereby the humours of the body are commonly called, with the causes wherefore: of the comparison between the corruption & temperature of the humors of the body, and betwene the manners and the affections of the soule : of the meanes whereby the humors corrupt, and of the feuers and diseases engendred thereby : of the sundry naturall temperatures in euery one. chap.67.f.532

Of the diuers temperatures and complexions of men, according to the nature of humors that beare most sway in them: of the disposition whereunto they are naturally moued by them either to vertues or vices: of the meanes to correct the vices and defects that may be in our natural inclinations. c.68.f.534

Of the restauration and reparation of all natures created by the generatiue power and vertue that is in them, and namely in man : what generation is, and what the generative power of the soule is : what the seed is, and how generation proceedeth of strength, and of infirmity. c.69.f.537

Of the powers of the generatiue vertue, and of their offices: of the principal cause why God gaue to man the power of generatiō: in what sence the raines are take for the seat of generation: how we ought rightly to consider of the generation of man. c.70.f.539

Of the fashion of a childe in the wombe, and how the members are framed one after another in the mothers belly : of the time and dayes within which a child is perfectly fashioned. cap.71.f.542

Of childbirth, and the naturall causes thereof: of the great prouidence of God appearing therein : of the image of our eternall natiuitie, represented vnto vs in our mortall birth. cap.72.f.545

The tenth dayes worke.

Why God created man naked, and with lesse natural defence then he did al other liuing creatures : how many waies hee recompenceth this nakednes: of the general beauty of the whole body of man, ioyned with profit & commoditie. ca.73.f.548

Whether the life of the body can proceed either of the matter or of the composition, forme, and figure, or of the qualities therof, or else of the harmony, coniunction & agreement of all these : whether any of these, or all of them together can be the soule: of the length and shortnes, of the diuers degrees and ages, and of the end of mans life: of death, and of the causes both of life and death : of the difference that is betwene naturall and supernaturall Philosophie in the consideration of things. cap.74.f.551

Of the causes generally of the length and shortnesse of bodily life: of naturall and of violent death : in what maner the life of man consisteth in his breath:

of the principal things required to life, and without which it cannot bee: of the difference betwixt the life of men, and the life of beasts : of the image of the spirituall death in the corporal: of the true comfort which we ought to haue therein. cap.75.f.554

Of the chiefe consolations, which the wisest among the Pagans and Infidels could draw from their humane reason, & naturall Philosophie against death: of the blasphemies vsed by Atheists and Epicures against God and nature : what nature is, and who they be that attribute vnto it that which they ought to attribute to God. cap.76.f.557

That there is but one soule in euery seuerall body: that one and the same soule hath in it all those vertues and powers, whose effects are daily seene : of the seat of the soule in the body, and of the principall instrument thereof, of the vnion of the bodie and soule : of the diuers degrees of nature, and of the excellencie that is in it : of the fountaines and boundes of all the powers and vertues of the soule, cap.77.f.560.

Of the nature and varietie of the animall spirits, and how they are onely instruments of the soule, and not the soule it selfe : of the nature of those bodies wherein the soule may dwell and work: of the difference that is, not onely betwene the soule and the instrument by which it worketh, but also betwene the instruments themselues, and their natures and offices, and which of them are nearest or farthest off : of the degrees that are in the vnion and coniunction of the soule with the body. cap.78.f.563

Of the diuisions of man made in the holy Scriptures, as wel in respect of the soule as of the body: in what significations the names of the soule, spirit & heart are vsed therein, and the causes why : of the intire sanctification of man: how the soule is taken for the life, and for the members and instruments of nourishment, and for nourishment it selfe. cap.79.f.567

What is meant by a liuing soule, what by a sensuall and naturall body, and what by a spirituall body : how the name of Soule is taken for all the desires of the flesh, and for all things belonging to this life : and not only for the whole person aliue, but also for the person being dead, and for a dead corps : and lastly, for the spirit separate from the body. c.80.f.570

The eleventh daies worke.

Whether the soule of man is ingendred with the body, and of the same substance that the body is of : or whether it bee created by it selfe and of another substance, whether it bee needfull for vs to know what the soule is, and what is the essence thereof, or onely to know of what qualitie it is, with the works and effects thereof. cap.81.f.573

Whether there bee any thing mortall in the soule of man : of the distinction betwene the soule and the powers of it : of the opinion of the Philosophers, and what agreement is betwene them touching the soule of brute beastes, and the nature and substance of it : of their opinion that deniue the soule of man and the soule of beasts from one fountaine : of them that ascend higher, and of their reasons. cap.82.f.576

Of the opinion of Galen, of Plato, and of Aristotle, touching the substance and nature of mans soule : of the opinion of Occam touching the vegetatiue and sensitive power thereof, and of the distinction of soules he maketh in man of the sentence of the Platonistes, and of Origen touching the creation, birth, and nature of the soule : of the coniunction of the soule with the bodie, and the estate thereof in the same. c.83.f.578

Of the opinion of the Platonists and some others, touching

The Table of the Contents.

- ching the substance of mens soules: what sense not only the Poets and heathen Philosophers, but also S Paul, have said that men were the generation and linage of God: of their error that say, that soules are of the very substance of God: of the transmigration of soules according to the opinion of the same Philosophers. cap. 84 fol 580
- The chiefe causes, as learned men think; that moued Pithagoras and Plato to broch the transmigration of soules, & transformation of bodies: the ancient opinion of the Iewes touching the same thing. ca. 85. 583
- Of the Pithagorians of these daies amongst the Christians, and of their foolish opinions: of the opinions of many Doctors and Diuines touching the creation and ordinarie generation of mens soules: of the moderation that ought to bee kept in that matter: of the cause of the filthinesse and corruption of mans soule. ca. 86. 586
- Of those powers & properties, which the soule of man hath comō with soule of beasts of those powers & vertues which are proper and peculiar to it selfe, according to the Philosophers: of the difference and agreement that is betweene humane Philosophie & Christian doctrine touching these things. ca. 87. 589
- How men can haue no certaine resolution of the immortalitye of the soule, but by the word of God, of the puerlesse of Epicures and Atheists in this matter: of the chiefe causes that hinder men from beleeuing the immortalitye of the soule, and of their blockishnes and euill iudgement therein: how wee must seeke for the image of God after which man was created in his soule. ca. 88. 592
- The twelfth daies worke.*
- Of those who desire the returne of soules departed to restifie their immortalitye: what witness hath beene sent vs of God out of another world to resolute vs therein. ca. 89. 596
- Of natural reasons whereby the immortalitye of soules may be proued against Epicures and Atheists: and first of the argument taken from the facultie of knowledge which the soule hath, and from that knowledge of eternitie which is in it: how it appeareth that it is not begotten of this corruptible nature, because it ascendeth vp vnto God: and how by a speciall benefit of God, it is dailie created, and not by the vertue of nature. ca. 90. 598
- Of the argument for the immortalitye of the soule, that may be taken from that naturall desire thereof and of perpetuities which is in it: of another argument to the same purpose, of the desire which men haue to continue their name and memory for euer: an argument to the same end taken from the apprehension and terror which men may haue both of death of the body: and also of the soule and spirit, ca. 91. 601.
- Of the agreement that may be taken from the delights and pleasures of the soule to prouue the immortalitye thereof: an argument to the same end taken from the intallible desires and pleasures of men euen from such as are most carnall: of the testimony which they may find euen in their vices to prouue the immortalitye of their soule. ca. 92. 604
- Of the testimony that men haue of the immortal nature of the soule in their verie body, by the composition and frame thereof: of that which is in the motion and rest of their soule: how the creation of the whole world should bee vaine, and how there should bee no providence of God, no religion, no diuine iustice, if the soule were mortall: of the multitude and qualities of the witnesses that stand for the immortalitye thereof. ca. 93. 607
- Of another argument for the immortalitye of the soule taken from that naturall desire which men haue of knowledge, of Aristotles opinion touching the nature and immortalitye of the soule: of other reasons of Philosophers to prouue that the spirit cannot be a corruptible and mortall nature: and how iust men should be more miserable, and should haue more occasion to feare and to eschew death, then the vniust and wicked, if the soule were mortall. cap. 94. 610.
- Of that praise and reward which wisdom and vertue may receiue of men in this world: how miserable it is, if there be no better prepared for them elsewhere: how death would bee more grievous and lamentable to the best learned and wisest men, then to the ignorant and foolish, if the soule were mortall: how the best and most certaine iudgement of men is for the immortalitye of the soule: of them who not beleeuing the same, say that it is good for men to be in such an error. cap. 95. 613.
- Of those internal testimonies, which all men carry within themselves, to conuince them that doubt of the immortalitye of the soule, and of the iudgement to come, which shall bee in eternall happinesse for the good, and perpetuall torment for the euill: how the very heathen acknowledged as much by reasons taken from the testimonies of nature. cap. 96. 616.
- The thirteenth daies worke.*
- Of the testimonies which euery one may take from his conscience of that feare vnto which all men are naturally subiect to prouue the immortalitye of the soule and a iudgement of God vpon the iust & vniust: how that which the Atheists say, that feare causeth gods amongst men serueth, to ouerthrow their damnable opinion. cap. 97. 620.
- Whether Epicures and Atheists be reasonable beasts; yea or no, & what reasons they bring to ouerthrow the immortalitye of the soule: of the false opinion of Pliny touching the same, and of his frivulous and brutish reasons to this purpose: of the brutish conclusion vnbecoming the whole race of mankind which he maketh of this matter, and of the iudgement of God vpon him. ca. 98. 623.
- Of them who say that we cannot know by the light of nature but that the soule is mortall: of them that alledge a place of Salomon against the immortalitye of the soule: how we ought to consider of the iudgements of God vpon Epicures, Atheists: how the absurdities which follow their doctrine declare plainely the grossenesse of it: of the force of those arguments that were produced before the immortalitye of the soule. ca. 99. 627.
- Of the image of God in the soule of man, and of the image of the world in mans body: of the coniunction that is betweene God, the Angels, and men: of the sundry degrees of Good that are therein: of those lessons and instructions which we ought to receiue from the wonderful composition and coniunction of the soule and body. cap. 100. 631.

The speciall and principall matters handled in this third Tome of the French Academie, as it is diuided into seuerall dayes workes, and distinguished by Chapters.

The first dayes worke.

OF the creation of heauen & earth, Cha. 1. fol. 637
OF Time, which tooke beginning with the world. cha. 2. f. 640
OF the insufficiencie or nullitie of reasons, framed concerning the nature of the world against the creation thereof. c. 4. f. 642
OF the reasons taken from motion, and the meoing
 intelligences against the creation of the world, & of the insufficiencie of them, c. 4. f. 646
OF many other deuices which they inuent, who pretend to overthrow the doctrine of the creation of the world, performed by the creator thereof. c. 5. f. 648
Concerning those causes which haue made the Philosophers to erre from the knowledge of truth, and of their ignorance concerning God and his workes,
c. 6. 650.
OF the authority of such witneses as make the creation and newnes of the world vndoubted. c. 7. 655
OF the reasons making for the creation and newnesse
 of the world. c. 8. f. 665

The second dayes worke.

Concerning the errors of those Philosophers,
 which say that God doth his outward worke of necessitie. Chap. 9. fol. 658
OF the reasons, which conclude that God proceeded of franke and free deliberation to the worke of the world. c. 10. f. 666
OF one onely principal and first cause of the Vniuers.
c. 11. f. 663.
OF the space of the fixe dayes mentioned in the history of the creation of the world. c. 12. f. 665
OF the misteries hidden vnder the number of fixe in the creation of the Vniuers: and of the seuenth day
 of rest. c. 13. f. 667
OF the diuisions of the vniuersall world. c. 14. f. 670
OF the Angelicall and intellectuall world. c. 15. f. 672
OF deuils and euill spirits. c. 16. f. 675

The third dayes worke.

OF the celestiaall or sphericall world. Cha. 17. f. 678
OF the forme and figure of heauen, & of the motion thereof, as well generall as particular. c. 18. 681
OF the circles in general, and particularly of the Equinoctiall and Zodiacke, and of their signes. c. 19. 683
OF the two great circles named Colures, and of the foure lesse circles and paralels, and of the fise Zones of the world, and immoveable circles. c. 20. f. 686
OF the hower-circles, & what is done by them in Sundials: and of the circles which diuide the 12. houres of heauen. c. 21. f. 688
OF the ascensions and descensions of the stars, and of the signes, and other arkes of the Zodiack, and of the orientall and occidentall latitude of the Sunne, or degrees of the Zodiack, c. 22. f. 691
OF the naturall and artificiall daies, and of the nights,
 of their diuersitie and cause. c. 23. 692
OF equal and vnequal, temporall & artificiall houres:
 of the heights of the Sunne above the Horizon, and of his right and reuerse shadowes. c. 24. f. 694

The fourth dayes worke.

OF the substance and nature of heauen, and of the celestiaall bodies: and of their continuance and change. cap. 25. fol. 696
OF motions in general, of their first cause, and of their vnion in all nature. cap. 26. fo. 698
OF the life, reason, and vnderstanding of the celestiaall bodies: and of the excellent, politicall and militarie order which is amongst them. cap. 27. fo. 700
OF the influence and effects of the planets and stars in things here below either to good or euil. c. 28. f. 703
OF the truth which is found in prognostications of Astrologers: and how the stars are appointed by God
 for signes, and that from their influences no euill proceedeth. ca. 29. fo. 705
OF the planet Saturne, and how it is not euill, nor any other starre. cap. 30. fo. 708
OF the planets in general, and how they worke in man,
 not in constraining, but disposing. cap. 31. fo. 710
OF the true Astronomy which the heauens doe teach vs, and specially the Sunne in his admirable effects. c. 32. fo. 712

The fift dayes worke.

OF the rising and setting of the Sunne: and of the prouidence of God which shineth in the commodities of day and night. cap. 33. 714
OF the second course and motion of the Sunne and Moone, for the distinction of yeeres, moneths, and seasons: and the prouidence of God in these things.
cap. 34. fo. 716
OF the image of God, and of his light which is proposed vnto vs in the Sunne, with the felicitie of mans life, in changing of light and darkenes. c. 35. f. 719
OF the eclipses of the Sunne and Moone; and of the image which wee haue therein of the constancie
 which is in God, and of the inconstancy of men,
 and of humane things. cap. 36. 721
OF the beginning of naturall and corruptible things.
cap. 37. fo. 724
OF the elements, and of things to bee considered in them, in that they are distinguished by the number of foure. cap. 38. fo. 726
OF the opinion of those, who admit but three elements
 not acknowledging the elementarie fire. c. 39. f. 728
OF the perfect compositions which are in the nature of all things, by which the foure elements may be considered. cap. 40. fol. 731

The sixt dayes worke.

OF the agreement betwixt the elements and planets. Cap. 41. fol. 733
OF the fire, and of the aire, and of the things engendered in the: & of their motions, & of the winds. c. 42. 736
OF thunder, and lightning. ca. 43. f. 738
OF the true Meteors of Christians: and of the supernaturall causes of thunder & lightning. ca. 44. fo. 740
OF Snowes, Mistis, Frosts, Yce, and Haile. c. 45. f. 742
OF Comets. cap. 46. f. 744
OF Cloudes and vapours. cap. 47. fo. 746
OF the waters sustained and hanged in the aire, and of the Raine bow. cap. 48. f. 748
 The

The Table of the Contents.

The seventh daies worke.

- OF dewes and raine. Chap. 49. Page 751
 Of the Fertilitie caused by dewes and raine, and of the providence of God therein. chap. 50. f. 753
 Of the winds, and of their kindes and names: and the testimonies which wee haue in them of the power and maiestie of God. chap. 51. f. 755
 Of the fowles of the aire, and namely of the Manucodiata, of the Eagle, the Phenix, and of other wilde Fowle. chap. 52. f. 760
 Of singing birds, and chiefly the Nightingale, and of fundry others, & of their wit and industry. c. 53. f. 760
 Of the Estridge, of the Peacocke, of the Cocke, and of other Fowles. chap. 54. fol. 762
 Of the earth, and of the situation, immobilitie, figure,
 and qualitie thereof. c. 55. f. 764
 Of earthquakes. c. 56. f. 766

The eight dayes worke.

- OF the sea, and of the waters, and the diuision and distribution of them throughout the earth. cap. 57. fol. 768.
 Of the flowing & ebbing of the sea; and of the power
 that the Moone hath ouer it, and ouer all other inferior bodies. chap. 58. fol. 771
 Of Salt, fresh and warme waters; and other diuersities in them. cha. 59. f. 773
 Of the commodities which men reape of the waters
 by nauigation, and of the directions which sea-men doe receiue from heauen, and from the starres vpon
 the Sea. c. 60. f. 775
 Of the diuision of lands and countreys amongst men
 by the waters: and of the limits which are appointed them for the bounds of their habitation. c. 61. f. 777
 Of the commodities which are incident to men, and to all creatures, by the courie of the waters through the earth. c. 62. f. 779
 Of diuers kinds of fishes; namely, of the whale, of the Dolphin, of the Sea-calf, and others. c. 63. f. 782
 Of the image that wee haue of the state of this world, and of men in the sea, & in the fishes thereof. c. 64. 784

The ninth dayes worke.

- OF Fruits, and of the fertilitie of the earth, and the causes thereof: and of hearbes, trees and plants, Chap. 65. folio 786.
 Of the vertue that hearbes and other fruites of the earth haue in phisicke and in food: and of the true
 vse of them. c. 66. f. 788
 Of the diuersitie of plants, and of their difference and naturall growth; and of their parts, and of the most excellent amongst them. c. 67. f. 790
 Of Trees, and specially of the Pine, the Firre tree, the Cypress, and the Cedar. c. 68. f. 792
 Of Trees bearing Cinnamon, Cassia, Frankincense, Mirth, and Cloues. c. 69. f. 795
 Of trees and plants that beare Nutmegs, Ginger, and Pepper. c. 70. f. 797
 Of the Date tree, of the Baratha or tree of India, of the Gehuph, and of Brasil. c. 71. f. 799
 Of the Citron tree, Limon tree, orange tree, oliue tree and Pomegranate tree. c. 72. f. 801

The tenth dayes worke.

- OF mallowes, wilde mallowes, purple-violets, be-tony, ceterarch, and Saint Johns-wort. Cha. 73.

Page 803.

- Ofcelandine, cammocke, wormewood, hyssope, sage and mints. cap. 74. f. 806.
 Of thyme, sauorie, marierom, rue, parsley, and fennell,
cap. 75. f. 808.
 Of rosemary, cammomill, the lillie baulme, of grasse
 or dogs tooth, and of pimperl. cap. 76. f. 810
 Of night-shade, alkakeng, pelitory of the wall, fumito-ry, angelica, and of maidens haire. cap. 77. f. 812
 Of rheubarb, licorice, aloes, senae, saffron and century.
cap. 78. f. 814.
 Of wheat, rie, barley and oates; and of rice and miller.
cap. 79. f. 816.
 Of the vine, of grapes, of wine, and of Aqua vitæ. cap.
87. f. 819.

The eleventh daies worke.

- OF terrestriall beasts, and especially of serpents;
 namely of the aspis or adder, and of the viper. cap.
81. f. 821.
 Of Bees, and of their hony & waxe; and of silkwormes.
cap. 82. f. 823.
 Of the dog, and of the horse. cap. 83. f. 825
 Of the elephant and of the camell, and of the rhinocce-
 ros. cap. 84. f. 827.
 Of the lyon, of the tygre, and of the panther. cap. 85.
f. 829.
 Of the wolfe, of the beare, and of the ape. cap. 86. f. 831.
 Of the hart, of the wilde bore, and of the vnicoorne. cap.
87. f. 833.
 Of the ciuit and muskat, of the castoreum, and of the ortar. cap. 88. f. 835.
 Of the right vse of venemous creatures & wild beastes
 and of the iustice and bounty of God which shineth
 in them. cap. 89. f. 837
 Of the nourishment of many creatures, by that which is poison to others, and of the naturall amity & enmity which is betweene them. cap. 90. f. 838
 Of the profit which redoundeth to men by beasts, and chiefly of tame and priuate beasts; and of the wondrous providence of God which shineth in them.
cap. 91. fo. 840.
 Of the blessing and providence of God in the multiplication and conseruation of those beasts that are most profitable for men, and with which they are most serued. cap. 92. fo. 842

The twelfth daies Worke.

- OF mettals, and chiefly of Gold. cap. 39. fol. 844.
 Of Siluer, Amber, Iron, Lead, Brasse and copper.
cap. 94. fo. 846.
 Of precious stones, & namely of the diamod. c. 95. 847
 Of the Emerald, of the Carbuncle or rubie, of the Sa-phir, of the Iacinth, and of the Amethyst. c. 96. 849
 Of the Chrysolite, of the Topaze, of the Opal, of the Turkeffe, and of the Agath. cap. 97. fo. 851
 Of Pearle, Corall, and Christall. cap. 98. fo. 852
 Of the instructions that men may take in that gold and siluer are hidden vnder ground, and of the vse and abuse of them, and of precious stones. cap. 99. f. 854
 Of the doctrine and profit that every one must, and may receiue of the whole worke of God in heauen
 and in earth, thereby to acknowledge and glorifie
 him. cap. 100. fo. 856.

Par la priere Dieu m'ayde.

The

The Table of the Chapters contained in the first part of the fourth Booke.

WHat it is to be a Christian Philosopher, and how such a man ought specially to purge and cleanse his soule & conscience of 7. principall follies, thereby to enjoy a happy, peaceable, & contented life, Chapter 1. Folio 865.

That a man must and ought to correct his first and most extreme folly in himselfe, which is, not to beleue that there is a God. Cap. 2. fol. 869.

That men ought to renounce the second folly, which is to esteeme man more then God. c. 3. f. 878

That we must amend our liues, & shun the third folly, which is, to thinke to liue euer. c. 4. f. 885.

That it is requisite and necessary for man to free himselfe of the fourth folly, which is, not to knowe wherefore we liue. cap. 5. fol. 888.

That man ought to deliuer himselfe from the fift folly, which is, to iudge of the happy and unhappy state of man by exterior signes. cap. 6. fol. 891.

That it is necessarie for vs to leaue the sixt folly which is to giue more credit to our enemies, then to our friends. ca. 7. fol. 897.

That man must shun the seuenth follie which is to thinke himselfe wise. cap. 8. fol. 901.

That man being a Christian, should with all his heart, affect seuen principall things, requisite and necessary to attaine eternall life, whereof the foure first are, the Church, the word of God, the sacraments and praier. cap. 9. fol. 904.

That it is the dutie of a Christian not to neglect the use of particular praiers, nor the reading of holy Scriptures, that hee may know how to practise the doctrine thereof. cap. 10. fol. 908.

That a Christian ought with an ardent zeale to embrace charitie, to be careful to giue almes, and to helpe the poore. cap. 11. fol. 912.

To leade a happy life, a Christian Philosopher must purge himselfe of 7. pernicious vices, that is, Couetousnes, ambition, excesse of apparel & meates, voluptuousnesse, unlawfull pleasures, enuy and slander. cap. 12. fol. 917.

That there are seuen principall vocations, wherein euery man is bound to shew the fruits of Christian Philosophie, whereof marriage is the first, & to know what common duties belong to a married man and a woman, as also the particular offices of a woman towards her husband, and of a man towards his wife, cap. 12. fol. 943.

wards his wife, cap. 12. fol. 943.

The duties of fathers & mothers towards their children, and of children towards their parents, cap. 14. fol. 949.

The duties of Magistrates toward their Subjects, & of subjects towards their Magistrates, of Pastors or ministers towards their flocks, and of their flockes towards them. cap. 15. fol. 954.

That by seuen causes and diuine reasons, a true Christian Philosopher should bee induced to embrace all the means of a happy life, set down in this Philosophie, specially by that which hath been said by our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, that the kingdome of heauen is at hand. cap. 16. fol. 960.

The second part.

That man being a true Christian Philosopher, ought to exercise and comfort himselfe in 7. principall things, whereof the first is, Meditation of the life to come, and to be well assured of eternal and celestiaall felicitie promised to the children of God. cap. 1 fol. 968.

The true and only meanes whereby a Christian (by a second consolation) may know that hee is the child of God, thereby to be happy foreuer. c. 2. f. 974

What means Christians haue for a third consolation, to apply the markes of their adoption in Iesus Christ, to assure themselves thereof, & consequently of their saluation. cap. 3 fo. 976.

That Christians for their 4. consolation ought and may be assured and certaine to be the children of God, although the markes of their adoption be weake and feeble in them, cap. 4. 980.

The fift consolation is, that a Christian Philosopher, ought to make use of the afflictions and miseries of humane life, thereby to perswade himselfe to be the child of God, by the excellent fruit, which they produce. cap. 5. 985.

The sixt consolation for a Christian philosopher is, constantly to perseuer in his vocation to the Lord, not to feare death, to walke in the waies of God, & continually to pray vnto him. cap. 6. 995.

Meditations & praiers, which a Christian philosopher, for a seuenth & a compleate consolation, ought to haue in heart and mouth: and euery day to exercise the same, to liue and die happily. cap. 7. fo. 1000.

An Index of the contents of the principall points spoken of by Sections in euery Chapter of this Philosophie.

- | | |
|--|---|
| Chap. 1. 1. Two kinds of men that are altogether careles, or litle respect the difference that should bee betweene them. Folio 861. 2 The summary effect of true wisdom which maketh man a Christian philosopher. 866. | 3 The ground of Christian philosophie, to amend our liues. 866. 4 Seuen principall follies, which a Christian philosopher must shun and auoide. 868. Chap. 2. 1 The feeling of a Deitie printed and ingrauen |
|--|---|

The Table.

- ingrauen in euery mans heart, denied and reiected by many, rather monsters then men. fol. 869. 2 Three waies and meanes to know God, and one only to conceine what he is. fol. 870. 3 A generall consideration of the world in seuen demonstratiue reasons of the Deitie. fol. 872. 4 Speciall consideration of the world in seuen principall things which make a certaine prooffe of the Deitie. fol. 873. 5 Other considerations of the former seuen reasons, foure interior and morall; and three supernaturall and theologicall. fol. 876.
- Chap. 3. 1 Of those that denie the Deitie by their workes, because they know not the providence of God. fol. 878. 2 Seuen reasons and certaine prooffes of the diuine providence of God, as well generally as particularly. fol. 879. 3 How wee loue man more then God. fol. 881. 4 How wee feare man more then God. fol. 882. 5 How wee trust more in men then in God. fol. 883.
- Chap. 4. 1 Man naturally inclined to incredulitie and to doubt of true things, which hee desireth should not come to passe. fol. 885. 2 Testimonies to proue, that man thinketh to liue alwaies. fol. 885. 3 The breuitie and vanity of our liues, most necessarily to bee considered by man. fol. 886.
- Chap. 5. 1 All things created for two principall ends, the one neere at hand, or first, the other further of and last. fol. 888. 2 It is a most necessarie thing for man to know himselfe, and the end for which hee was borne. fol. 889. 3 Three principall ends of the life of man. fol. 890.
- Chap. 6. 1 The children of God are inclined to stumble at his providence, & wise and iust conduction to their ends. fol. 892. 2 Mans false iudgement of good and euill things. fol. 893. 3 No exterior thing can make man happy or unhappie. fol. 894.
- Chap. 7. 1 Man is naturally inclined to credit and beleue three great enemies. fol. 897. 2 The flesh and the concupiscences thereof, the first and a great enemy to man. fol. 897. 3 The world an other great enemy to man. fol. 898. 4 The diuell an other great and principall enemy to man. fol. 899.
- Chap. 8. 1 It is an easie matter for a man to deceiue himselfe, in thinking to bee wise. fol. 901. 2 How men thinke themselves to bee wise and are not. fol. 901. 3 Two points necessarie for men to make them wise. fol. 902.
- Chap. 9. 1 Two families or cities of all men, the one terrestriall, the other celestiaall. fol. 904. 2 Seuen principall things necessarie to attaine to eternall life, the first is the holy Church, whereof all the children of God ought to bee members. fol. 905. 3 The word of God is the first and sure meanes to unite man to the Church. fol. 906. 4 The sacraments and publike prayer, are other true and sure meanes to unite vs to the Church. fol. 907.
- Chap. 10. 1 The assistance of God is necessarie for all men and consequently prayer. fol. 908. 2 Exam- ples and considerable aduertisements touching Praier, fol. 909. 3 The reading of the word of God, recommended by authoritie, and which way a man may profit thereby, fol. 910.
- Chap. 11. 1 Man by nature hath a sinfull body, and in many good things is inferior vnto beasts. fol. 912. 2 The loue of God and of righteousness, conioyned by the band of charitie, are the fountaine of all good things. fol. 913. 3 The duties of charity proued by two naturall reasons. fol. 915. 4 Almes are the proper fruits and effects of charity. fol. 916.
- Chap. 12. 1 Reasons ought of the holy Scriptures to make vs inclined to holinesse and righteousness. fol. 917. 2 Generall rules out of the holy Scriptures, whereby to frame the life of a Christian to all righteousness and holinesse. fol. 919. 3 Seuen pernicious vices, whereof we must purge our selues, the first couetousnesse. fol. 920. 4 Of ambition, pryde, and boasting or bragging. fol. 922. 5 Of excessse of apparell, and meates, and of drunkennesse. fol. 925. 6 Of pleasure, adulterie and lecherie. fol. 930. 7 Of unlawfull pastimes, dauncing, dice, playes and commedies. fol. 933. 8 Of enuie & slander. fol. 938.
- Chap. 13. 1 Men are called to diuers vocations, and euery man is to follow the same vprightly. 2 Seuen principall vocations, whereof marriage is the first, and the common dutie requisite and required to bee obserued by them that are married. fol. 943. 3 Particular duties of the wife. fol. 946. 4 The particular duties of husbands. fol. 947.
- Chap. 14. 1 It is a good familie when all the parts and members thereof, are well and wisely governed. fol. 949. 2 Discipline and instruction which fathers and mothers ought to giue vnto their children. fol. 950. 3 Duties of children towards their fathers and mothers. fol. 952.
- Chap. 15. 1 The duties of Kings, Princes and Magistrates. fol. 954. 2 The duties of subiects towards their magistrates. fol. 956. 3 Duties of pastors, and ministers towards their flockes. fol. 957. 4 Duties of Christian people towards their pastors. fol. 959.
- Chap. 16. 1 Seuen principall causes and reasons more then sufficient, to make a man forsake and amend all his follies and corruptions. fol. 960. 2 The first cause of amendment of life, is the authority of Iesus Christ, ibid. 3 The second reason of amendment of life, is the name of holy attributed to Christ, fol. 961. 4 The third cause to moue vs to amendment of life, is the title of Emmanuel giuen to Iesus Christ, fol. 962. 5 The fourth cause or reason to moue vs to amendment of life, is meditating vpon the five other names and titles attributed to Christ, ibid. 6 The fifth reason to moue vs to amendment of life, is two other names of our Saniour (Iesus and Christ) ibid. 7 The sixth reason to moue vs to amend our liues, is that wee are strangers and pilgrims in this life. fol. 963. 8 The seventh reason to perswade vs to amendment of life is, because the kingdome of heauen, or of God is at hand, fol. 964.

The

The Table.

The second part.

- Chap. 1. Humane life is to be esteemed of by the faithfull, although it be full of miseries, and that a man may comfort himselfe therein, by seuen singular and speciall things. fol. 968. 2. Mediation of life eternall, is the first comfort of a Christian, the felicitie whereof is incomprehensible, fol. 969. 3. The greatnes and perpetuities of the goodnes which is to be expected in life eternall. fol. 969. 4. Three principall degrees of blessed and eternall life. fol. 970. 5. Singular and speciall consideration of beatitude and life eternall. fol. 971. 6. Diuers degrees of blessednes, which are without ende, and most assured to the faithfull. fol. 972.
- Chap. 2. 1. The good and benefits that a Christian hath, to know and feele in his conscience that he is the child of God. fol. 974. 2. An exterior meane given vnto vs by God, to know his children. fol. ib. 3. Interior meanes, to assure vs to be the children of God. fol. 975.
- Chap. 3. 1. Two kinds of temptations, which shake and weaken the constancie of man to assure himselfe to be the childe of God. fol. 976. 2. True and assured meanes to comfort the faithfull against the distrust of their indignitie, merite, and ignorance in the secrets of election and saluation. fol. 977.
- Chap. 4. 1. Not to feele in vs the peace and ioy of true faith, is a testimony of humane infirmitie, but not that wee are without faith. fol. 980. 2. The feares and distrusts of the elect, deprive them not of true faith. fol. 981. 3. A considerable distinction betwene the two principall effects of faith, alwaies powerfull to assure vs of our adoption. fol. 982. 4. Inclination to sinne, ought not to make the faithfull fall from, or to doubt of the certaintie of the promises of God, touching saluation. fol. ibid.
- Chap. 5. 1. Common and ordinary complaints by men touching the miserie of their liues. fol. 985. 2. God is the author of tribulations, which are foreshewed, and promised by the Scriptures to his children. fol. 985. 3. The examples of Iesus Christs passions, is a means to strengthen vs in our tribulations, and to perswade vs, that we are children of God, and that wee must constantly endure persecution. fol. 986. 4. The fruits of afflictions are of power to confirme the faithfull in the assurance of their adoption. fol. 988. 5. To suffer for righteousness, is honourable, hauing a promise of of present and future reward. fol. 991. 6. Afflictions which pass lightly ouer, are recompensed with diuers celestiall blessings, and at the last with eternall life. fol. 993.
- Chap. 6. 1. In Christian hope which is not visible, it is requisite to haue singular patience and perseuerance. fol. 995. 2. Of death, and how pleasing and welcome it is to the faithfull. fol. 996. 3. Exercises proper to a Christian specially prayer. fol. 998.
- Chap. 7. 1. Meditation vpon the Lords prayer, fol. 1000. 2. Consideration of the excellency and efficacy of Prayer, made in faith with a good and a Christian resolution, fol. 1002. 3. Meditation vpon the Creed, fol. 1004. 4. Meditation and Prayers touching faith, and to obtaine increase thereof. fol. 1006. 5. Meditation and Prayers touching God the Father most puissant Creator of heauen and earth. fol. 1007. 6. Meditation and Prayers that Iesus Christ is the Sonne of God, and our Lord and Saviour, fol. 1009. 7. Meditation and prayer vpon this Article, the holy Ghost is our Instructor, Sanctificator, and Comforter, fol. 1011. 8. A prayer full of comfort to the Trinitie, one onely God, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost. fol. 1013. 9. Meditation and prayer touching the Catholike Church, fol. 1014. 10. Meditation vpon the Ten Commandments, fol. 1016. 11. A prayer to aske grace of God to liue according to his word, fol. 1018. 12. Meditations and prayers touching the holy Sacraments of the Lords Supper, to present our selues worthily at the receiuing thereof, fol. 1019. 13. Thanks giuing after the receiuing of the holy Sacrament, fol. 1020. 14. Meditation and prayer touching the blessed life which God hath prepared for his children, fol. 1021. 15. A prayer to be said by householders in the morning, fol. 1022. 16. Grace or prayer before meat, fol. 1024. 17. Grace or prayer after meat, ibid. 18. Prayer to be said by a household at night, ibid. 19. A short prayer for euery particular person to say in the morning, fol. 1025. 20. A Prayer for a particular man at night, ibid. 21. A prayer to be said by a sicke person, ibid. 22. Meditations and prayers fit to be said by him, that feeleth much paine by sicknesse, fol. 1026. 23. Meditation and prayer against the feare of death, fol. 1027. 24. A prayer to be said by him which feeleth himselfe at the point of death, and may also be daily said by euery one that is well and in health, fol. 1029. Verses briefly shewing the summe of Christian Philosophie, fol. 1030.

THE FIRST DAIES VVORKE OF THIS ACADEMIE, WITH the cause of their assembly.

WHEN GOD by his infinite and unspeakable goodnesse, beholding with a fatherly, bountifull, and pittifull eye our poore FRANCE (which most cruell against it selfe, seemed to runne amaine most furiously to throw it selfe headlong into the center of some bottomlesse gulfe, had sent from heaven the wished-for newes of peace in the midt of civill and domesticall armies, (which a man might say were of purpose prepared for the finall overthrow of this French Monarchie, that hath flourished so long time) sparing by his heavenly grace and favour, and that in despite of them, the blood of those men, who held forth their right hand to cut off the left; among many, who touched with the love of their country, and with true zeale to piety, rejoiced at this so well liking and healthfull newes, foure yong gentlemen of Anjou, who came together to serve their prince, and to sacrifice their lives, if need required, for the welfare and safety of the Common-wealth, were none of the last that sought out one another, and met together to testifie each to other (as their mutuall kindred & sworne friendship did invite them) the joy which filled their soules, arising of so happie and unlooked-for successe & alteration of affaires: to the end also that they might give glorie & praise to him, who for the benefit of his, knoweth well how to take order even in those things, which according to the judgement of men are desperate and past recovery. And that which gave them greater occasion to rejoyce for this peace, and so diligently to seeke out one another was this, because contrary to hope, they saw the meanes offered them to returne home, and to continue and exercise, that greatly pleased them, which not long before the last fall of France into troubles they had happily begun. Now to let you (Readers) understand what this exercise was, these foure gentlemen being of kin, and neare neighbours, and in a manner of one age, were by the care and prudence of their fathers brought up and nourished together from their yong years in the studie of good letters, in the house of an ancient wise gentleman of great calling, who was the principall stocke and roote of these fruitfull buds. This man by reason of his manifold experience, and long abode in strange countries, knew that by the common corruption of French youth, of it selfe inclined to pleasure, proceeded chiefly from the over-great licence, and excessive libertie granted unto them in the Vniversities of this Realme, as well through the fault and negligence of the governours and tutors in them, as also because of the evill government of the townes at this day. He knew also that they were no lesse abused, who thinking to avoide this dangerous downe-fall at home, did send their children to studie abroad amongst strangers, where the trafficke and merchandise of mischiefs is more common and easie to be made, because they feare not that newes will presently, or so speedily be carried to their parents, as if they were neare vnto them. Oh how well worthy of eternall praise is the prudence of this gentleman! bringing to my remembrance Eteocles one of the most noble Ephories of Lacedæmonia, who freely answered Antipater asking fiftie pledges, that he would not give him children, least if they were brought up far from their fathers, they should change the ancient custome of living used in their owne countrey, and become vicious: but of old men and women, he would give him double the number, if he would have them. Whereupon

A

being

beeing threatned by this king, if he speedily sent him not of the youth: We care not (quoth he) for threatnings. For if thou command us to do things that are more grievous than death, we will rather choose death: so carefull were the men of old time, that the dressing and trimming of these yong plants should not be out of their presence. But let vs go on with our matter. This good and notable old man having spent the greater part of his yeares in the service of two kings, & of his countrie, and for many good causes withdrawn himselfe to his house, thought, that to content his minde which alwaies delighted in honest and vertuous things, he could not bring greater profite to the Monarchie of France, than to lay open a way and meane to preserve & keepe youth from such a pernicious and cancred corruption, by offering himselfe for example to all fathers, and shewing them the way to have a more carefull eye in the instruction of their children, and not so lightly to commit them to the discipline of vices, by the hands of mercenarie and hired strangers. And this was begun vpon these foure yong gentlemen, whom he tooke to his owne house, by the consent of their parents, offering himselfe to the uttermost of his power to helpe their gentle nature, which appeared in them worthie their ancestors, by training it vp, first in the feare of God, as being the beginning of all wisdom: secondly, in humane learning and knowledge, which are necessarie helpes to live well and happily, to the benefit of the societie of men. To this end, after that he himselfe had shewed them the first grounds of true wisdom, & of all things necessarie for their salvation, according to the measure of grace given him from above, & as their age could conceive them, he laboured earnestly to haue in his house some man of great learning, and well reported of for his good life & conversation, unto whom he committed the instructiō of this yong Nobilitie. Who behaved himselfe so well in his charge, that not greatly staying himselfe in the long degrees of learning, which be ordinary, & usuall in our French Colledges, are often more tedious (besides losse of time) than profitable to youth; after he had indifferently taught his schollers the Latine tongue, & some smacking of the Greeke, he propounded for the chiefe part and portion of their studies the Morall philosophie of ancient Sages and wisemen, together with the vnderstanding, and searching out of histories, which are the light of life: therein following the intent and will both of him that set him on worke, and also of the parents of this Nobilitie, who desired to see their children not great Orators, subtle Logicians, learned Lawyers, or curious Mathematicians, but onely sufficiently taught in the doctrine of good living, following the traces and steps of vertue, by the knowledge of things past from the first ages vntill this present: that they might refer all to the glorie of the diuine Maiesty, and to the profit and vtilitie as well of themselves as of their country. And yet in the meane while these noble and toward youths were not deprived of other exercises meete for them, which (as the diuine Plato saith) are very profitable for this age, & helpe much to quicken the spirits of yong men, and to make their bodies which are weake by nature, more strong and apt to sustain travail: as namely, to ride horse, to run at the ring, to fight at barriers, to apply themselves to all kinde of weapons, and to follow the chace of beasts. All which exercises this wise and ancient Knight did intermingle with their earnest studies by way of recreation, himselfe standing them in stead of a matter. For in such exercises hee was as fully furnished as is to be wished in a man of valure and actiuitie, in somuch that he was more expert than many of our time who make no other profession. Now this schoole having bene continued for the space of sixe or seven yeares, to the great profit of this nobility of Anjou, the foure fathers on a day tooke their iournie to visite this good old man, and to see their children. And after the vsuall welcome, which is betweene kinsfolkes and friends, they discoursed together of the corruption which then was in all estates of France; whereupon they fore-saw (as they said) some great storme at hand, if euery one did not put to his helping hand for the correction and reformation of them, but chiefly the secular power authorized of God for this purpose. They alledged for witnes of their saying many examples of ancient estates, Common-wealths and kingdomes, which were fallen from the height of glory & excellencie into a generall subuersion and overthrow, by reason of vices reigning in them vnpunished. And thus continuing their speech from one thing to another, they fell in talke of the corrupt manners that might particularly be noted in all, and those maintained by authoritie and with commendation, in somuch that both great and small endeouored to disguise vice with the name of vertue. In fine, they were of opinion to heare their children discourse hereupon, that they might know & iudge, whether they had profited so well in the institution of good manners (the rule of good life) by following of vertue, and by the knowledge of histories, (the patterne of the time past for the better ordering of the time present) as their master, who was present at the discourses of these ancient

Gentle-

Academicall Assemblie.

3

Gentlemen, did assure them, by intermingling the praises of his schollers in the midst of their graue talke, and vaunting that they were well armed to resist the corruption of this age. For truly vertue purchased and gotten by practise, is of no lesse power against all contagion of wickednesse, than preseruatiues well compounded are of force in a plague time to preserue in good health the inhabitants of a countrie. And as heretofore that famous physition Hippocrates preserued his citie of Coos from a mortality that was generall throughout all Grecia, by counselling his countymen to kindle many fires in all publike places, to the end thereby to purifie the aire: euen so whosoever hath his soule possessed, and his heart well armed with the brightnesse and power of vertue; he shall escape the dangers of corruption, and eschew all contagion of euill manners. But returning to the intent and desire of our good old men, because they had small skill in the Latine tongue, they determined to haue their children discourse in their owne naturall tongue, of all matters that might serue for the instruction and reformation of euery estate and calling, in such order and method, as themselves with their foresaid master should think best. For this purpose they had two houres in the morning granted vnto them, wherein they should be heard; and as much after dinner, which was to each of them one houre in a day to speake in. You may ghesse (gentle readers) whether this liuely youth did not bestow the rest of the day, yea oftentimes the whole night vpon the well studying of that which they purposed to handle, and with what cheerefulnesse of heart, & willingness of minde they presented themselves before the honourable presence of their fathers, who were so greatly delighted in hearing the, that for the most part in stead of foure houres a day before mentioned, they bestowed sixe or eight. For after they had heard the two first discourse one morning, they had not the patience to referre the rest of that matter vnto the afternoone, when the other twaine of their children should be heard, but comonly commanded them presently to enter the lists, and to proceed, as beeing iealous ouer their glory in regard of their companions. In this commendable manner of passing their time they continued certaine daies. But the sudden and sorrowfull newes of the last franticke returne of France into ciuill warre, brake vp their happy assembly, to the end that these noble youths betaking themselves to the seruice due to their Prince, and to the welfare and safetie of their countrie, might make triall of their first feates of armes, wherein they wanted neither readines, nor valure of heart, which being naturally in them, was also increased by the knowledge of philosophie. The studie whereof resembled (as Plato saith) to a separation of the soule from the body, standeth wise men in stead of an exercise to die without feare, when dutie requireth it, & causeth them to esteeme of death, as of the cause of the true and perfect good of the soule. For which reason. Socrates, Xenophon, Architas, Thucydides, Thales, Epaminondas, & a million of other famous men, learned philosophers, & historiographers hauing charge of armies, neuer doubted, or feared in any sort to offer themselves cheerefully vnto all perils and dangers, when the question and contention was for publike benefite and safetie, and in a iust war without which a wise man neuer ought to fight. Yea I dare boldly say, that the greatest, and most famous exploits of warfare, were atchieued for the most part by them and their like. Which serued well for a spurre to our yong Angevins to cause them to vndertake this iourney with ioy and cheerefulnesse of spirit, being resolved to follow with all their might the examples of such great and notable personages, as histories, the treasure of time, did call to their remembrance. When they were in the campe, each of them according to his particular affection ranged himselfe vnder sundry corners of great Lords and good captaines. But, as we said in the beginning, after newes of the peace proclaimed, which was so greatly looked for, and desired of all good men, they laboured foorthwith to meete together, knowing that their ioint-returne would be acceptable to their friends, especially to that good old man by whom they were brought vp. Moreouer they deliberated with themselves as soone as they were arriued at the old mans house, to giue their fathers to vnderstand thereof, to the end they might be certified from them, whether it were their pleasures to haue them reiterate and continue in their presence the morall discourses begun by them, as we haue learned before; that they might be refreshed with the remembrance of their studies, and thereby also keepe fast for euer those good instructions, which by the daily trauell of so many yeares they had drawne out of the fountaine of learning and knowledge. As it was deuised by them, the execution thereof followed, so that all these good old-men being assembled together, taking vp their first order, and conferring anew of the same matters, daily met in a walking place couered ouer in the midst with a goodly greene Arbour, allotting for this exercise from eight to ten in the morning, and from two to foure in the afternoone. Thus they continued this exercise for the space of three whole weekes, which make eightene daies workes, besides the three Sabbath daies, set apart by them, that they might rest and ceasse from their studies, and attend the better to the chiefe point of that holy daies institution, which is to the contemplation, and consideration of the workes of God, of his law, and of his praises. During which time it was my good hap to bee one of the companie when they began their discourses, at which I so greatly wondered, that I thought them worthy to be published abroad, as well to enrich our French tongue with an infinite number of graue sentences and speeches, worthy to be remembered, being drawne out of the fountaine of Greeke and Latine arts and disciplines, through the incredible labour of these youths, louers of vertue; as also to awake and stir vp by their example all the Nobilitie with a iealousie and emulation of glorie, gotten by the same vertue. For onely vertue is able to guide & conduct gentlemen to honor, for the obtaining whereof (as they say) they contend and fight so often, and can also restore them to the fruition of their first rights of authoritie, and goodly priuiledges, whereby (as we reade of the ancient Romans) such as were most worthy amongst the Nobilitie were chosen to attend vnto these three things: namely, to the seruice of God, which is to gouerne, as the Scripture speaketh: secondly, to the administration of lawes and iustice, which is the pillar of kingdomes: and lastly, to the tuition and defence of the Common-wealth by armes, which is the assurance thereof against all practises & assaults of the enemy. Of which three excellent administrations, necessarie for the establishing and maintenance of all estates and Common-wealths, the most part of our Nobility retaineth the last onely, which likewise they seeme to despise in a manner, submitting, to their great shame, by reason of their ignorance and weltring in delights and pleasure, their conscience, honour, goods, and life to the opinion and iudgement of those whom nature and right had subiected to them. But marke how wee deuised to proceede in our discourses: to wit, that three of vs one after another should vtter some sentence or memorable saying, in the praise of that vertue, or dispraise of that vice, whereof wee were resolved to speake, and that the fourth should make a whole discourse of that matter. Which beeing ended, he should beginne the first proposition of the second Treatise, and two others should follow him therein: then the last should make the second whole discourse for that morning. Likewise in the afternoone, that same party was to lay open that matter which was to bee intreated of, and two others continuing it, one of those, who in the morning did onely propound, should discourse in his turne: and then giuing to his companions new matter subiect, he which as yet had not discoursed at all, was to handle it, and so to make an end for that day. And thus all foure of vs followed the same order daily, vntill euery one in his course had intreated according to appointment, both by the precepts of doctrine, as also by the examples of the liues of ancient Sages and famous men, of all things necessarie for the institution of manners, and happy life of all estates and callings in this French Monarchie. But because I know not whether, in naming my companions by their proper names, supposing thereby to honour them, as indeede they deserue it, I should displease them, (which thing I would not so much as thinke) I haue determined to do as they that play on a Theater, who vnder borrowed masks and disguised apparell, do represent the true personages of those whom they haue vndertaken to bring on the stage. I will therefore call them by names very agreeable to their skill and nature: the first, A S E R, which signifieth Felicitie: the second, A M A N A, which is as much to say as Truth: the third, A R A M, which noteth vnto vs Highnesse: and to agree with them as well in name, as in education & behauiour, I will name my selfe A C H I T O B, which is all one with Brother of goodnesse. Furthermore, I will call and honour the proceeding and finishing of our sundry Treatises & discourses with this goodly & excellent title of Academie, which was the ancient & renowned schoole amongst the Greek Philosophers, who were the first that were esteemed; and that place where Plato, Xenophon, Polemon, Xenocrates, and many other excellent personages, afterward called Academikes, did propound and discourse of all things meete for the instruction & teaching of wisdom: wherein we purposed to follow them to our power, as the sequelle of our discourses shall make good prooffe. Begin then (gentle readers) to heare that which we speake concerning man in the first daies worke, vsing these or the like speeches.

Aser, Felicitie: Amana, Truth: Aram, Highnesse: Achitob, Brother of Goodnesse.

Of Man. Chap. I.

Vhen I direct my flight now and then (my companions) even vnto the heavens, and with the wings of contemplation behold their wonderfull greatnesse, their terrible motions,

Of Man.

5

motions, being contrary and without ceasing, the lively brightnesse, rare beauty, and incomparable force of the Sunne and Moone, their vntchangeable course, one while cause of light, and by and by after of darkenesse, the infinite number of goodly stars, and of so many other celestially signes: and from this excellent and constant order of all these things, as one rai- shed and amazed, when I withdraw my spirit lower into the elementary region, to admire and wonder at the situation and spreading of the earth amidst the waters, both of them making one round masse or lumpe, which in the midst of this great firmament occupieth the roome but of a pricke or rittle in respect thereof: besides, when I acknowledge in this earth and water as many sundry and most beautifull plants, and kindes of earthie and waterie creatures, as there are graines of sand on the sea bankes: and when I delight my selfe in the varietie of minerals and pretious stones, considering the forme, qualitie, and vertue of each of these things: briefly, when I admire the diversity of times and seasons, the continuall spring of fountaines, the certaine course of riuers, and generally, so many wonderfull workes vnder the cope of heauen, I cannot mauell y- nough at the excellencie of Man, for whom all these things were created, and are main- tained and preserued in their beeing and moouing, by one and the same diuine prouidence alwaies like vnto it selfe.

AMANA. There is nothing more certaine than this, that all things whatsoever either the eye can behold, or the eare heare, were created for the benefite, profit and vse of man, and that hee was made excellent aboue all things to rule ouer them: yea the Heb. r. very Angels are sent to minister for their sakes, which shall receiue the inheritance of saluation.

ARAM. Oh vnspeakeable and heavenly goodnesse, which hast created man little lower Psal. 8. than thy selfe, and crowned him with glorie and worship. But tell vs I pray thee (ACHITOB) more particularly, what this great and principall worke of nature, Man is, to what end his All things being was giuen him and how he hath shewed forth the fruits thereof. For it must needs be, were created for man. that there is something in him greatly to bee wondred at, seeing all things were created to serue and obey him.

ACHITOB. Truly ye haue reason (companions) to begin our happy assembly with that knowledge, which we ought to haue of our selues, as being the store-house of all wisdome, To know our selues is true wisdome, and beginning of saluation: whereof wee may haue an assured testimonie from that father of Philosophie Socrates, who beholding the first precept written at Delphos in the temple of Apollo, which was so renowned throughout Gracia, namely Know thy selfe, was forthwith driue into a very deepe cogitation, and being rapt with contemplation of spirit, he began from that time forward to doubt and to inquire of himselfe. Whereupon contemning that way which all the Philosophers of his time went, who busied themselves about nothing, but onely in finding out the causes of naturall things, and in disputing curiously of them, he gaue himselfe wholly to the knowledge of himselfe, I meane of his soule, which hee maintained to be in- indeed Man, and by disputation to intreat of the soueraigne good thereof, and of vertue. By The soule is truly man which meanes the gate of wisdome was opened vnto him, wherein he profited in such sort, that according to the Oracle at Delphos, he was called of all men the wise, the iust, the prince of Philosophers, and father of Philosophie. And surely out of his sayings, which being more Socrates was called the fa- ther of Philo- diuine than humane, were written by his disciples, all other Philosophers haue drawne their knowledge. Heracitus another excellent man, minding to giue out in speech that hee had done some notable act, worthy of himselfe, said: I haue sought my selfe. Which beginning truly is very necessarie for man, as being a guide to leade him to the true knowledge of God, which is a heavenly gift of God, and peculiar to his. And this is learnedly taught vs by the same Socrates, where he saith, That the duty of a wise man is to seeke out the reasons of things, that in the ende he may finde that diuine reason whereby they were made: and hauing found it, may worship and serue it, that afterward he may enioy it, and reape profit thereby. Moreover he addeth, That the perfect knowledge of ones selfe, which consisteth in the soule, is in such sort ioyned with the knowledge of God, that the one without the other cannot be sincere and perfect. And for the same reason, Plato his disciple, who for the excellencie of his writings was surnamed the Diuine, saith, That the perfect durie of man is, first to know his owne nature: then to contemplate the diuine nature: and last of all to bestow his labor in these things, which may be most beneficiall to all men. Ignorance of a mans selfe (saith Lactan- tius) and the want of knowledge wherefore and to what end he is borne, is the cause of error, of euill, of leauing the right way to follow the crooked, of wandring out of the plaine way to walke in the ragged and vneuen way, or vpon a dangerous and slippery mountaine: and lastly euill,

What man is.
Gen. 1.
Col 3.

The end of
mans being.

There is a double reason
in man.

Heraclitus wept continually.

The iudge-ment of Philosophers
concerning the nature
of man.
Pindarus Homer.

lastly, of forsaking the light to walke in darkenesse. Now if we account it a shamefull thing to be ignorant of those things which belong to the life of man, surely the not knowing of our selues is much more dishonest. Let vs then consider what man is, according to that meane knowledge, which by the grace of God we are endued withall, not staying in those curious definitions which the Philosophers haue made. Man is a creature made of God after his owne image, iust, holy, good and right by nature, and compounded of soule and body. I say of soule, which was inspired of God with spirit and life, and of a perfect naturall body, framed of the earth by the same power of God. In this sort man had his being of the eternall work-master of the whole world, of whom he was created by his incomprehensible goodnesse, to bee made partaker of his immortalitie and permanent felicity, for this onely end to set forth the glory of his Creator, and to speake and do those things that are agreeable vnto him, through the acknowledgement of his benefits. From which end man being fallen of his owne freewill through ingratitude and disobedience, was bereaued of all those ornaments, which he had receiued before of God, and in steade of righteousness and holinesse, all iniquity, filthines and vncleanenes entred into him: whereby he was made the slaue of sinne and of death, from whence all those miseries had their beginning, wherewith the life of man is ouerwhelmed. His soule also was wrapped with infinite hurtfull passions and perturbations, which worke in it a continuall disquietnes, and his body became subiect to innumerable trauels, and violent vntowardnes. Of which corruption the ancient Philosophers had great and assured knowledge, but the first and true cause thereof, which was sinne, and the voluntary fall of man, with his restoring vnto grace by the vnspeakeable goodnes and mercy of his Creator, from whence he was fallen, were alwaies hidden from them, (as we shall see anon) as also from an infinite number of men, who living holily according to the world, neuer had the perfect knowledge of God in his eternall Sonne. As for any good thing whatsoever they vttered, or found out, it came through earnestnesse of study, by discoursing and considering in the reasonable part of their soule, of those things which offered themselves to their minde. But forasmuch as they were not wholly ouerwhelmed in every part of reason, and yet had no knowledge of the heauenly word Iesus Christ, they vttered many things contrary one to another: and in the midst of their great and wonderful skill (according to that saying of the Scripture, Who hideth his secrets from the prudent, and reuealeth them to babes) they had a continuall troubled spirit, wandering here and there afwell in the seeking out of themselves and of the causes of naturall things, as of those things which are aboue nature. And trulie, the reason of man, naturally ingrafted in his heart, which so far forth as he is man, and according to his abilitie and manner of life he imitateth and followeth, is diuers from that which by special grace from aboue cometh to the elect, accompanieth them, and helpeth them in all their actions. This is full of faith, and of vndeceivable assurance of eternall promises: the other, weake, troubled and wonderfully hindred, wherein a man can neuer haue any certaine resolution. This is that which caused Aristotle, who was Platoes Disciple, and Prince of the Peripaterike Schoole, to say, that the more knowledge a man hath, the greater occasion of doubting was offered. Neither can we iudge otherwise, but that the same reason of trouble and doubting mooued the aboue named Heraclitus that great Philosopher, to spend his life in continuall weeping, howsoever he alleadgeth wisely, that it was for the compassion hee had of mans nature, both for that the life of men consisteth in nothing but in miseries, as also because all the labors wherein they exercised themselves, seemed vnto him to be worthe of great commiseration and pittie: namely, seeing that they being far wide of iustice, did yet through too greedie desire make themselves slaues vnto all couetousnes and vaine glory. This also was an argument of inconstancie and wauering in Democritus, who neuer came abroad amongst men, but he laughed vnto measure at all their works and deeds. Howbeit herein he said truly, that the life of man was vanitie and folly, and that all their lusts and desires were fond, and worthy to be laughed at. But such extremities of laughter and weeping are not seemely in him, who is well instructed in the studie of Philosophie, & in the certaine knowledge of himselfe: which thing these Philosophers so earnestly laboured to attaine vnto, as we shall see anon, after wee haue learned what other ancient men haue thought of the nature and state of man. What other thing (saith Pindarus) is man, than the shadow of a dreame in ones sleepe? Whereby he sheweth the vanity of man by an excellent manner of speaking, very significantlie vttering his meaning. For what thing is lesse than a dreame yea than the shadow of a dreame? Homer hauing compared mortall creatures together, both in respect of their continuance, as of the maintenance of their life, crieth out, that of all those which walke on the earth and drawe breath, breath, there is not one more miserable than man. Timon the Athenian detesting much more than all these the imbecillitie of mans nature, vsed and employed all his skill to perswade his countymen to abridge & shorten the course of their so miserable life, and to hasten their end, by hanging themselves vpon gibbets, which he had caused to set vp in great number, in a field that he bought for the same purpose, vnto whose perswasions many gaue place. Plinie rehearsing the great miseries wherewith man cometh into this world, & the manifold labors wherin he liveth, said, that it were good for a man not to be borne at all, or else so soone as he is borne, to die. It was a custome amongst the Scythians, to weepe at the birth of their Children, & to reioyce, and make a solemne feast at the death of their parents. Now as the opinions of these philosophers here named by us (who being destitute of the light of God, & of true religiō had no other foundation but their own humane & weake discourses,) are to be reiected for inclosing all mankind in such vile & abiect estate, so on the other side we must take heede, that we enter not into that presumptuous opinion of many others, who endeuer to leade man to the consideration of his dignitie and excellencie, as beeing endued with infinite graces. For they perswade him, that through the quicknes of his vnderstanding, he may mount vp to the perfect knowledge of the greatest secrets of God and nature, and that by the onely study of philosophy, he may of himselfe, following his own nature become maister of all euill passions and perturbations, & attaine to a rare & supreme kind of vertue, which is void of those affections: that being thus exempted and freed from all vice: hee may leade a most happy and perfect life. This did the Stoick philosophers with one consent maintaine and teach, laying: Whosoever receiued their doctrine, if in the morning he were very wicked, in the euening he should become a very good man: and if he laide himselfe downe to sleepe being ignorant, vicious, and poore, the next morning he should arise wise, vertuous, rich, happy and iust, Zeno, Seneca, Diogenes, Chrysippus, and infinite moe, otherwise indued with most fruitfull doctrine, as we shal understand hereafter, were of this opinion. In so much that Chrysippus said, that Dion the chiefest man for knowledge in Syracusa, was no lesse vertuous than his god Iupiter, to whom they attributed perfect diuinitie. Seneca also boasted that he had receiued life by the benefit of God, but to liue well, from himselfe. Thus whilest they granted to mans power such an excellent and diuine disposition, they list him vp in a vaine presumption, in pride and trust in himselfe, and in his owne vertue, which in the end cannot but be the cause of his vtter vndoing. We therefore holding the meane between these two contrary opinions (as the perfection and goodnes of all things consisteth in mediocritie) and continuing to speake of man as we haue already begun, doe saie, that the knowledge of himselfe is very necessary for him, and that hauing perfectly attained thereunto, he hath cause both to be humbled greatly, as also to glory and reioyce. First to humble himselfe through the sence and feeling of his vanitie, peruersenes and corruption, in which respect he ought to hate and be displeased with himselfe, because he beholdeth his destruction and condemnation ingrauen in his conscience. Secondly: he is to glory in the knowledge of God, which inseparably followeth the other, after he hath learned this, that in the mercy of God he may recover that which is wanting in himselfe, hauing once bene made and fashioned of God, who is altogether pure, wise, true, good, and almightie, to the end he might be partaker of his glorie. For the obtaining hereof, he had giuen vnto him from the beginning (as trustie guides) godlinesse, holinesse, and religion: godlinesse, to the end he might know thereby, that he had God for his father: holinesse, to yeeld vnto him continuall glory and praise: and religion, to keepe him in continuall meditation of his grace and benefits, and to serue him for an indissoluble bond to knit him to his Creator, who threatned him with death, if hee did the contrarie. But our first father through ingratitude and disobedience, forsaking those heauenly guides to follow his owne free-will, deprived himselfe and all his posteritie of that promise of eternall life, that was made vnto him. Whereupon being dead to his first life, which was most happy & innocent, through his offence and peruersenes of his sinne, he began from that time forward to liue a mortall life, so that his body and soule became subiect to infinite miseries and damnable infirmities, which drawe vpon them the condemnation of eternall death. Notwithstanding God, whose goodnesse and mercy are endlessse, reestablished and assured the succession of his immortal inheritance vnto those, whom it pleased him by grace to make dead to sin, and alieue to himselfe, through the satisfaction of his wrath made by the innocencie of his eternall Sonne, purging them in his blood, and opening vnto them by him the gates of heauen, after hee hath renewed them in righteousnesse, holinesse and innocencie, that they may follow after godlinesse and religion. And knowing that man so fraile and weake, Timon.

Plinie.

The custome of the Scythians.

The presumptuous opinion of the Stoicks.

The end of the knowledg of our selues.

The wilfull fall of man.

There restoring of man.

Al men naturally have some loue & liking of the truth.

Effects of Christian regeneration.

The perfection of a wise mans life.

The wonderful coniunction of the body and soule.

Al things are preserved by agreeing discords.

might easily fall downe vnder the heauie burden of those miseries and calamities, whereunto the corruption of his nature made him subiect, and wherein by reason of hereditarie sinne he should remaine during this mortall life, as also that those furious and continuall passions, which are mingled together in his soule, being ioyned to the common infirmities of his bodie, would be of too great force to throwe him againe headlong into destruction; this infinite mercie of God appointed, that from the beginning there should remaine in the spirit of man a little sparke of light, which driueth him to naturall loue of the truth, and to a desire to enquire after it, yea which pricketh & prouoketh him not to sleepe altogether in his vices. This weake instinct being awaked, stirred vp, holpen, and disposed by the pure grace, vertue and power of the author of al goodnes, draweth and mooueth a Christian, regenerated by the holy Ghost (after knowledge of himselfe, and hatred of that which is in him) to seeke after and to couet with a speciall heartie desire, that goodnesse and righteousnes whereof he is void, & that glorious libertie of which he depriveth himselfe. Furthermore, the same heauenly grace blessing this holy desire of the man regenerate, causeth him to draw out of the doctrine of holy Scriptures that wherewithall he may, if not heale perfectly his wicked inclinations, yet at the least containe and repress them in such sort, that they breake not out into anie damnable execution. Hee teacheth him also to receiue the infirmities of his flesh, as fatherly chastisements for his sinne, and as necessary meanes to exercise him, and to keepe him in awe. And lastly, for the upshot and perfection of all happinesse and felicitie in this world, he instructeth him how he may leade a quiet and peaceable life in beholding the wonderfull workes of the diuinitie, which he is to adore and honour, and in the amendment and correction of his maners naturally corrupted, by squaring them after the patterne of vertue, that so he may be made worthie and fit to gouerne humane affaires, for the profite of many: and at length attaine to the perfection of a wise man, by ioyning together the actiue life with the contemplatiue in the certaine hope and expectation of a second, immortal and most blessed life. Whereunto also the precepts and discourses of learned and ancient Philosophers, may serue for our instruction and pricking forward: as also the examples (which are liuelie reasons) of the lives of so many notable men, as histories, the mother of antiquitie, doe as it were represent alive before our eies. And this in my iudgement is sufficient generally to understand of Man, seeing we are hereafter to discourse more particularly of both his principall parts, the body and soule.

Of the Body and Soule. Chap. 2.

ACH. THe body and soule are so knit and conioyned together, that nothing can separate them but death the destroyer of al, which through sinne, and for the iust punishment thereof entred into the world. And this is no sooner done, but that whatso, ever we see of man, vanissheth from before our eies: the earthie part returning into the masse of of earth from whence it came, according to the saying of Aristotle, that all things are resolved into those things whereof they are compounded: likewise, that which is spirituall and invisible goeth into an eternall immortalitie, from whence the beeing thereof proceeded.

ASER. Truly this knitting together, and conijunction of the body and soule is a most wonderfull thing in nature, yea, as many of the Philosophers say, against nature: seeing the soule which is light, is contained within the body being heauie: that which is of celestiall fire, within that which is cold and earthy, that which is invisible, within that which is palpable: that which is immortal, within that which is mortall. But what? Where is the fence of man, which is able to comprehend the reason of the doings of that great Maister-builder of the vniuersal frame? Yea there is more. For during this conijunction, as all things that mooue within this generall globe are maintained by agreeing discords: even so of necessitie there must be such a harmonie betweene the bodie and the soule, that by the helpe of the one, the other subsisteth and abideth, and that through their continuall striving sometimes the one, and the other be in the end obied.

AMANA. Thou tellest us here of a wonderfull strange thing, that, that which is spirituall & immortal sometime obeyeth that which is mortall, and made of a corruptible lump. But I vnderstand thee well. This proceeds of the imperfection and imbecility of our nature. For (as Socrates said) if we were perfect Philosophers, we would neuer agree with our selves, but resist continually. Now, following this matter, make us to understand more particularly (ARAM) what the body and soule are, what properties they have, and what is the excellencie both of the one and the other

ARAM

Of the Body and Soule.

9

AR. AM. With a good will, my companions, and first I will begin at the definition of a bodie. A bodie (as the Philosophers say, speaking generally of all things that haue bodies) is that which may bee diuided and measured after three sorts, in length, in breadth, and in depth. Or according to others, a bodie is a masse or lump, which, as much as lieth in it, resisteth touching, and occupyeth a place. A body (saith Plato) is that which being in his proper place is neither heauie nor light, but being in a strange place first inclineth somewhat, then is driven and carried forward, either with heauinesse or lightnesse. Hereupon, both hee and other Philosophers discourse learnedly and profoundly of the particular nature of all bodies, of the earth, of the fire, of the aire, of the water, and of all other both simple and compound bodies, and of their contrarie motions. But seeing all those discourses are at this present without the compasse of our Academie, let vs simply with more profit, and that according to the Scripture, define the bodie, which wee haue vnderaken to handle. Wee say then, that the bodie is flesh, that every affection of the flesh is deadly, and that the workes thereof are vncleannesse, pride, fornication, enmitie, debate, wrath, contention, enuie, murder, gluttony and such like: and therefore that the bodie is made of mortall matter, of as small continuance as a vessell of earth, sinning without ceasing, and endeavouring that that which is shut vp within it, should please it. Notwithstanding we ought not to neglect and contemne the wonderfull frame of this heavenly plant, as Plato calleth it, saying, that the roote thereof is in the head drawing towards heauen, seeing, as in a little world, we may behold therein the excellencie of the wonderfull workes of God, and that in so great measure, that the wisest and most eloquent men could neuer set them forth sufficiently. And if we cal to mind how by his Almighty power he framed him at the first of a piece of earth, we shall not need to stand long here to enquire & search out, how he could be ingendred & fashioned in his mothers wombe, how he receiued nourishment & life, & lastly, how he came into the light. As for example, how the 6. first daies after his conception, he is nothing but milke: the 9. following, blood: 12. daies after, flesh: and how in the 18. next ensuing, he is fashioned, at what time the fruite beginneth to liue, and to haue sense, which is the 45. day after he was conceived. These are secrets of nature, which may seeme as incomprehensible, and beyond the capacitie of man, as his first creation. For what greater maruell can there be, than that of a little drop of mans seede there should be ingendred bones, sinewes, veines, arteries, similar and instrumentall parts, skin and flesh, and that all these should be framed in that kinde, figure and similitude, which we daily see in men, who are all created after that manner? What neede we then to make an anatomy of all the chiefeest parts of the bodie of man, when as the consideration of the least of them, which peradventure may bee found too bee most necessarie, will suffice to raiuish vs with admiration? What superfluous thing can be noted in the bodie? What small parcell is there, which the noblest part may want conueniently, and which is not partaker of every euill disposition thereof? What thing is there in the whole nature thereof, which doth not satisfie that dutie verie profitably, whereunto it is borne and appointed, which mooueth not of it selfe, which either doth, suffereth or disposeth of it selfe otherwise than is most expedient and meete for it owne benefit, and for the rest of the frame of man? The progresse and growth thereof from day to day, from houre to houre, and that of all the parts together of this principall worke at one instant, euen from the first houre of his being, vntill his whole perfection, are they not more heavenly than humane things? What is more wonderfull vnder the cope of heauen, than the coniunction and subiection of the natural senses vnto the body, I meane, of the sight, smelling, hearing, taste, and touching, whereby (saith Plato) the common sense which is as it were a generall receptacle, conceiue all outward things? What an excellent property in man is it, to void from him a profitable superfluitie of his nourishment, from whence the cause of the preservation of mankind proceedeth? The articulate and distinct voice, proper to him onely, is it not worthy of great maruell? What greater secret of nature could raiuish the minde of man more with admiration than amongst the infinite multitude of men in the world, to consider the varietie of their gestures, and diuersitie of their countenances, that hauing all but one & the same forme, yet not one almost resembleth another? And when in so great varietie, two are found resembling in all points one another, as we reade of some, euen of sundry nations, who haue beene taken indifferently one for the other, is it not a stranger matter? How marvellous is it, that all men hauing a tongue wherewith they speake and sing, yet wee seldome see that the speaking and singing of one resembleth the speech and tune of another? whereupon it commeth to passe, that friends and familiars oftentimes acknowledge and vnderstand one another by their speech and voice before

The definition of a bodie.

Gen. 6.

Rom. 8.

Gal. 5.

The workes of the flesh.

Man is a little world.

Gen. 2.

Of the conception and fashioning of man.

Of the excellencie of the bodie, and of all the parts thereof.

Great secrets of nature.

The diuerſity
of mens voices and writings.

The ſoule is infused not traduced,

The defini-
on of the ſoule Pythagoras
was the firſt
that was called a Philoſopher.

The diuiſion
of the ſoule.

Plato maketh
fixe parts of the ſoule.

Ariſtotele di-uideth it into two parts.

Four parts
of the ſoule.

The beſt diuiſion of the ſoule.

The ſoule
cannot be diuided, but is made ſubieſt
to two parts.

before they ſee each other. Who will not admire this great ſecret in the hand of man, that a hundred thouſand writers may write the ſame thing, with the ſame inke & like pen, and that with three and twenty letters, which have each his owne figure and ſhape, and yet the writings ſhall not reſemble one another ſo, but every writing may be knowne by his hand that wrote it? Briefely, what is therein the whole body of man, that is not full of rare beauty? This is ſufficient for the matter in hand; now let us come to the ſoule which is much more noble, and infused into the body by God the Creator, without any vertue of the generative ſeede, when as the parts of the body are already framed and faſhioned. This alone can leade us to the knowledge of God and of our ſelves, or rather as Socrates ſaid, wee ſhall never underſtand perfectly what the ſoule is, except we firſt know God, and behold it in him, as in a true glaſſe, who onely can repreſent it unto us. Let us then ſee what the ſoule is, according to the ſayings of the ancient Philoſophers. Thales Mileſius, one of the ſages of Græcia, who flouriſhed in Athens in the time of Achab king of Iuda, was the firſt that defined the ſoule, affirming it to be a nature alwaies mooving it ſelfe. Pythagoras (the light of his time, and the firſt that tooke unto himſelfe the name of a Philoſopher, becauſe all thoſe, who before him were addicted to the contemplation of the diuinity, and of the ſecrets of nature, cauſed themſelves to be called by the name of Magicians and wiſemen, which he would not haue ſpoken of himſelfe, ſaying that this diuine and lofty title of Wiſe, was proper to God onely, and that it far paſſed all humane abilitie) I ſay this excellent man Pythagoras affirmed, that the ſoule was a number mooving it ſelfe. Plato ſaith, that it is a ſpirituall ſubſtance mooving it ſelfe by harmonicall number. Ariſtotele ſaith, that the ſoule is the continuall act or mooving of a naturall and instrumentall bodie, and may have life. Or elſe, according to others, it is the light of the ſubſtance, and in perpetuall motion. They diuide it likewise diuerſly, and make many parts thereof. The ſoule (as Pythagoras ſaid) is compounded of underſtanding, knowledge, opinion and ſenſe, from which things all knowledge and Arts proceede, and of which man is called reaſonable, that is, apt to diſcouſe by reaſon. Plato ſaith, that there are three vertues in the ſoule belonging to knowledge & underſtanding, which for this cauſe are called cogaitive or knowing vertues: namely, reaſon, underſtanding and phantaſie. Vnto which three others are anſwerable appertaining to appetite: namely Will, whoſe office is to deſire that which underſtanding and reaſon propound unto it: Choler or Anger, which followeth that, which reaſon and phantaſie offer vnto it: and Concupiſcence, which apprehendeth whatſoeuer phantaſie and ſenſe obieſt vnto it. Ariſtotele maketh another diſtinction of the ſoule, ſaying that one part of it is void of reaſon in it ſelfe, and yet may bee guided by reaſon that the other part is of it ſelfe partaker of reaſon. And in another place this Philoſopher ſaith, that there are three things from whence humane actions proceede, namely ſenſe, vnderſtanding and appetite. Many others both ancient and late writers make foure parts of the ſoule: Vnderſtanding, reaſon, anger, and deſire. The vnderſtanding liſteth the ſoule vp to heauen to the contemplation of diuine and intellectuall things. Reaſon guideth the ſoule by prudence in all her functions. Anger is ruled and moderated by the vertue of magnanimitie: and deſire is governed by temperance. Of theſe a very harmonicall iuſtice is framed, which giueth to euery part of the ſoule that which belongeth vnto it. But the moſt ſenſible, common and true opinion, which the wiſeſt amongſt the Philoſophers had of the ſoule, is that which diuideth it into two parts onely, vnder which all the reſt are comprized: the one being ſpirituall and intelligible, where the diſcouſe of reaſon is: the other brutiſh, which is the ſenſuall will, of it ſelfe wandring and diſordered, where all motions contrary to reaſon, and all euill deſires haue their dwelling. Amongſt all the philoſophicall diſcouſies of the ſoule, written by theſe great perſonages, this error is very great, when they attribute ſuch a ſtrength & power to reaſon (which they ſay is reſident in the ſoule as a lampe to guide the vnderſtanding, and as a queene to moderate the will) as that by it alone a man may well and iuſtly gouerne himſelfe. Now although we know that this reaſon of man is of it ſelfe, wholly depraued & corrupted, yet we may ſay well ynough, that the ſoule, which ſpirit & life, cannot be diuided, being immortal: becauſe whatſoeuer is diuided, diſſolueth & parteth aſunder, & what ſoeuer is diſſolued, periſheth. Neuertheles it may be ſaid to be compounded & made ſubieſt (during the coniunction therof with the body) to theſe two principall parts, of Vnderſtanding and Will. The vnderſtanding ſerueth to conceiue & comprehend all things propounded vnto vs, and to diſcerne & iudge what we ought either to approue & allow or what reſuſe & reiect. The will is that which executeth & bringeth to effect, whatſoeuer the vnderſtanding iudgeth to be good, & contrarywiſe ſieth fro that which it reprobeth & condemneth.

And

Of the Body and Soule.

II

And herein we agree with the Philosophers, that the understanding, under which we comprehend the sence, is as the governor and captaine of the soule, and that the will dependeth of it. But withall we saie, that both the one and the other are so corrupted and altered from their nature, (the understanding being obscured and dimmed with the clouds of darknes, by reason of the first mans sin descended upon al his posteritie through hereditarie and naturall filthinesse, and the will in such sort corrupted by this disobedience, and so weakened and made feeble to all goodnes) that if there be none other guide comming from above to teach the understanding, and to direct and leade the will, I meane regeneration by the spirit of God, both of them cannot but do evill, drawing the soule with them to vtter ruine and perdition, by causing her to consent to the law of hir members, which are the bodie and flesh, full of ignorance, of obscure darknesse, of frowardnesse, miserie, calamitie, ignominie, shame, death, and condemnation. Notwithstanding, if in the corruptible, heavie, and grosse lump of the body, within which the soule is contained, we found matter of praise and of the contemplation of heavenly things, what shall we say of that which is immortall, which in a moment in hir discourses and cogitations, goeth through the whole heaven, compasseth the earth about, faileth all over the sea, without which the body mooveth not at all, and all the beautie thereof turneth suddenly into putrefaction? This onely can make a man happy both in this and in the other life, by reason of the treasures of wisdom, the understanding whereof is proper unto it: yea this is the onely instrument whereby a man may behold the diuine nature. This is invisible, and cannot be perceived by any naturall sence: this is contemplative and active at one and the same time: this beholdeth uniuersall things, and practiseth particulars, understanding the one, and feeling the other. This hath for the actions and operations of hir essence and nature, Will, Iudgement, Sense, Conceiving, Thought, Spirit, Imagination, Memorie, Vnderstanding and Reason: and for hir incomparable beauty, shee hath Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude and iustice, without which the excellent order of all humane things would be changed into disorder and confusion. This is that moreover, which being illuminated with wisdom, bringeth forth the fruits of love, ioy, peace, long-suffering, gentlenes, goodnes, faith, meeknes, temperancy. Briefly, to conclude our present speech, wee may well say that the soule is so great and diuine a thing, that it is a very hard matter to comprehend it by reason, but altogether incomprehensible by the outward sence: and that all mans felicitie, as well present as to come, dependeth of the soule, when, being regenerated (as hath beene said) and made free and void of all wicked perturbations (as neere as the nature of man can approach to perfection) her humane contentation and delight is onely in vertue, and in the hope and certaine expectation of a more sound and perfect vertue, by the renning and changing of this mortall life into that which is immortall and most blessed: as S. Paul exhorteth vs herunto, saying: Let vs reioyce in the Lord: both because our names are written in heaven (as Christ saith) and that our modesty, meeknes and goodnes may be knowne to all men. Moreover let vs learne that in the wonderfull composition, coniunction and disposition of the soule & body, there is matter wherby to draw man greatly to the consideration of the chiefe end, for which he was first placed in the world, namely, to glorifie his Creator in godlines, holinesse and religion. He ought therefore both to serue him with all the parts of his body, not abusing them in any sort, but keeping them pure and cleane, to be made members of the glorious body of his eternall Sonne in the resurrection, and also to praise and glorifie him with all the gifts and graces of his soule, not defiling it with vncleanenesse and vice, that she may, by the same diuine grace, returne vnto the full fruition of that most happy essence and nature from whence she had her being. In the meane while let vs learne, that as the body vseth many instruments wherof it is compounded, and which are proper vnto it, so the soule, being much more noble, excellent and diuine, ought to vse the body and all the parts thereof: and that the soule is the organ and instrument of God whereby hee worketh in vs and lifteth vs vp to the contemplation of his diuine nature.

Both parts of the soule are corrupted,

Rom. 7. 23.

The properties of the soule.

The actions of the soule.

The beautie of the soule.

Gal. 5. 22. 23.

The true delight of the sence.

Phil. 4. 4.

Luk. 10. 26.

How a man ought to vse both body and soule.

Of the diseases and passions of the body and soule, and of the tranquillitie thereof. Chap. 3.

ARAM. One of the ancient Philosophers vsed to say, that no liuing creature was worse to man than man himselfe, because, albeit he hath dominion ouer all things, yet he cannot rule himselfe, nor his desires. Experience causeth vs both too much to know the truth of this saying. For who can doubt in any sort hereof, seeing blessed S. Paul himselfe confesseth, that he did not the good things which he would, but the euill which he would

Nothing worse to man than man himselfe.

Rom. 7. 18. 19

There is no
good thing in the flesh of man.

would not, and that in his flesh theredwelt no goodnes? So undoubtedly we have both bodie and soule compassed about with so many pernicious passions, that it is very hard, yea altogether impossible, that what good thing soever is in us should not faint and sinke under their heaue weight without a speciall and diuine grace.

Man is a mu-
table creature.

A C H I T O B. Truly this is no vaine speculation, nor unprofitable to man: as also for a man to know, that he is as it were tied in this world to all uncertaine things, which he, being mortall by nature, cannot any way shun and auide, without the helpe of God. He which is in health expecteth sicknesse: he that is sicke, health. Doth any one desire in his minde any thing? Before he enjoyeth it, his desire is often changed into another. In a word, no man abideth still in one and the same estate. And therefore Plato calleth man a mutable creature, as if he meant to say, that he is easily altered and changed.

Pleasure and griefe the cause of passions.

A S E R. The change which this diuine Philosopher meant (if I be not deceived) hath relation principally to the conditions of the soule, which, being filled with infinite perturbations, fastened in the midst of it with the naile of pleasure and griefe, is carried away with inconstancie and uncertaintie into a streame of troublesome passions, which if they be not cut off and mastered by reason, draw a man into utter destruction. But give us to understand (A M A N A) more at large of these passions of the soule, and of the way to remedie them: and if you thinke good, you may speake somewhat of those of the bodie.

Man is more carefull of his body than of his soule.

A M A N A. Amongst the innumerable evils, which the desire of pleasure and feare of griefe, ingraven in the most secret parts of our soule by our first corruption, bring to man, this is the greatest and most pernicious, that they make sensible things more euidēt and plaine unto him than things intelligible, and constrain the understanding to iudge more by passion than by reason. For using, through the sense of pleasure or travell, to attend the erroneous uncertaintie, and mutable nature of the bodie, as to that which is subsisting and subject to sight, he remaineth blinde, and loseth all knowledge of that which truly is and subsisteth, namely, of the light of the soule, which is diuine and immortall. Moreover, applying himselfe wholly to the sensuall and unreasonable will, which is that part of the soule that proceedeth of the corruption thereof, he laboureth with all his might to quench and choke that weake instinct of the soule, which aspireth unto the true Good, from whence she perceiveth hir selfe to have fallen. And this he doth with such force and power, that if God strengthen not the soule, and reason the diuine guide, accompanie hir not, without doubt she yeeldeth to such mightie enemies: and then (as we haue said) staying himselfe wholly in things subject to sight, he appeareth too carefull and curious in seeking to decke that, which belongeth to the bodie: but as for the soule (whereof all humane felicitie dependeth) because she is invisible, and not seene of him, it is the least of his cares to furnish hir with that which she seeketh & desireth, and which is necessary for hir. Whereupon in the end it commeth to passe that the least overthwarts and discommodities of his flesh seeme very grievous and burdensome to a man, but as for the incurable diseases, which overwhelme his soule, he doth not so much as feele them. Now to the end we may understand more particularly that which is here propounded unto us, wee will handle in order, and as briefly as we may (this matter being very large) the diseases and passions of the bodie and soule, with the remedie which we are to desire and seeke after. And first we will speake a word of the diseases of the bodie, next of the naturall and necessary passions thereof, albeit we will intreate of the passions of the soule, as of our chiefe matter subiect. Concerning the maladies and evill dispositions of the bodie, one Hippocrates, one Galenus, nay infinite others skilfull in Physicke, are not able to describe them exactly, much lesse prescribe certaine and sure remedies. But seeing it is not my purpose or profession to stay long heere, neither yet necessarily belong to the cause of our assembly, I will content my selfe to speake these few words by the way, that we ought to take everie bodily infirmitie as a fatherly chastisement of our sins, and as a necessary meane to awaken us, to warne us of our dutie, and to keepe us in awe. Besides, one principall cause of all bodily diseases, proceedeth ordinarily from vices, which are the proper inheritance of man, and with which wee defile our selves continually. Therefore if we heale our soules, we may cure our selves of the most of them: and as for others, which come by defect of nature, or by some other hidden cause, we have the counsell and helpe of Physicians, whom willingly and diligently we seeke after. There are besides these, certaine naturall and necessary passions in the body, properly belonging unto it, even from the first creation thereof, which are not to bee condemned, neither can be taken away, but with the abolishing of mans nature: as the desire of drinking, eating, sleeping, and such like, which onely by the direction of reason are to be freed from all superfluity.

The end,
cause, and remedy of bodily diseases.

Naturall
passions.

But

Of the Body and Soule.

13

But it standeth otherwise with the diseases and passions of the soule, deriued from our first corruption, and driuen forward by sin, being plentifull and rich, which without comparison are farre more dangerous than those of the bodie, more hard to be perceiued and knowne, more headstrong and vneasie to cure, and which is worse, man is very slothfull in seeking out a remedy for them. And for the most part thinking that he hath found some remedy, through want of skill and and ignorance, he falleth into a worse estate than he was in before, and as we commonly say, from a gentle ague into a pestilent and burning feuer. But first wee will generally define this word, Passion, according to the opinion of those philosophers, who were endued with greatest light. Passion is euery naturall and actuall motion in the soule. This motion is of two sorts: the one weake, good and holy, aspiring and reioicing in that which is truly good: the other very strong, euill and pernicious, couering with a disordered desire, and delighting with an immoderate ioy in a good falsly so imagined. The matter of these motions are opinions, affections, and inclinations, which being considered in their owne nature, are through sinne wicked and corrupt throughout the soule, yea the blossome and roote of them proceede from our owne substance, to the end (as Plato saith) that no man should thinke God to be the cause of euill. Now albeit these passions thus defined by the Philosophers are many in number, yet drawing neerer to the truth, we may comprehend and diuide them all into two principall kinds. The first kinde shall be that which we beleue by faith: the other according to our opinions and affections. Vnder the first wee comprehend that which euery one beleueth, thinketh, and desireth, concerning diuine and heavenly things, as of true righteousness, of the immortalitie of the second life, and of the iudgement to come. Vnder opinions and affections is comprehended whatsoever respecteth and concerneth earthly things, this life, manners, gouernment of a household, of a common-wealth, and generally all humane inclinations and actions. As touching that which we beleue by faith, we are led thereunto, and stirred by the weake instinct and feeling of the diuine nature imprinted in euery soule, which after a sort mooueth man to aspire vnto, and to desire the true and soueraigne good, and which, being more powerfull, and of greater efficacie in some than in others, causeth the better sort to delight also in the same good. Neuertheless it is proper to euery mans vnderstanding, not to hold a steadfast and sure way in seeking out the truth, but to wander aside into diuers errors (as a blinde man that walketh in darkenesse) and to fill it selfe rather with lies, and with a continuall desire and curiositie of new, vnprofitable and superfluous things, than to content it selfe simply with the truth, insomuch that finally it misseth of all. But to the end we be not of this number, we ought to hold fast to the infallible rule of the holy Scriptures: which gift we are to aske, hope, waite, and seeke for in the onely grace and mercie of that Spirit which indighteth them, and to looke for the full opening of these treasures in the second and eternall life. As for the second kinde of our passions, properly called perturbations according to the philosophers, from whence all the evils and miseries of mankind proceede, and whereof wee minde chiefly to speake, they are but affections and inclinations, which come from our will, corrupted by the prouocations and allurements of the flesh, and which wholly resist the diuine nature of the reasonable part of the soule, fastening it to the bodie (as Plato saith) with the naile of pleasure. Which passions the minde of man commonly beholdeth cleerely enough, when it applieth it selfe thereunto, if it bee not altogether perverted and depraued: yea by the grace and helpe of God, the minde is able to confirme it selfe against any passion through the discourse of reason, before it be in force, and during the vehemencie thereof, to fortifie it selfe against it. And although the passion bee contrarie to reason, and haue (for her onely scope) pleasure, and the feare of grieve, which can preuaile greatly with man, yet reason by the meanes of Gods grace, can both easily constrain, master and compell all passions in such sort, that they shall take no effect, and also bring to passe, that whatsoever is rashly desired, shall bee overcome by the discourse of prudent counsell. And for this cause we say, that the first motions are not in our power, but that the event and issue of them is in some sort. Likewise reason doth not wholly quench and extinguish all passions, which cannot possibly be performed in the nature of man, but repelleth and hath the vpper hand of them, as the precepts of doctrine, and infinite examples of the liues of ancient heathen and pagan philosophers doe learnedly teach vs. Which thing as it ought to cause many at this day to bee ashamed, who vaunt themselves of the name of Christians, so it condemneth them in a fault not to bee excused before the iust iudgement of God, because those men, being destitute of the perfect knowledge of God, which they say they haue, farre excelled and surpassed them in the brideling, ouercomming and

The definition of passion.

The diuision of passions.

All men haue naturally a desire of happiness. No man by nature can find out the right way that leadeth to happiness. The word of God sheweth vs the right way to happiness. Of the perturbations of the soule.

The scope of our passions.

The ancients heathen may arise vp in iudgement against many Christians in these daies.

The originall
nature, and effects of perturbations.

All perturbations are contained vnder
these foure heads, Desire Ioy, Feare, Griefe.
An excellent
comparison.

The cause of the diseases of the soule.

Reason is the medicine of
the soule.

A sound soule
correcteth
the naughti-nes of the body.

The passions
of the soule
are headstrong, and hard to be cured.

killing of so many pestiferous passions as compass the soule about, as we may handle else where, and see examples thereof worthy of eternall remembrance, when wee shall discourse particularly of vertues and vices. In the meane while we may learne of Cicero (the father of Latine eloquence, whose skill in ioyning philosophy with the art of Rhetorike, was excellent, and who in my iudgement handleth this our present matter more profitably than any other of the ancient) that all the aboue named euill passions are perturbations, which if they be not mastered by reason, deprive man of the soueraigne good of the soule, which consisteth in the tranquillity thereof. Moreover he saith, that through ignorance and basenes of minde, they proceed onely of the opinion of good or euill, either present or to come, which we imagine to be in the vnperfect and transitorie things of the world, and which are accompanied vnseparably either with good or euill. In respect of good things, we are carried away with a vehement desire or coueting of them, besides an immoderate ioy in them: in regard of euil things, we are oppressed with feare and sorrow. And these are the foure springs of all vices and sinnes wherein men plunge themselves during this life, and vnder which all perturbations are comprehended, which fill the soule with endlesse trouble and disquietnes, causing man to live alwaies vncontented, and to finde every present kinde of life burdensome, and so to seeke after and to desire another. But as fearefull men, (saith Plutarke that excellent Philosopher, and schoolemaster to that good Traian) and they that are at sea, subiect to casting, thinking they shall be better in one place than in another, goe from the sterne to the stem, then to the bottome of the shippe, after ward to the highest part, from thence goe into the skip, and in the end returne into the shippe, without any amendment of their euill, because they carry alwaies about with them both feare and griefe: so the alteration of life, and of worldly conditions and estates into others, doth not purge, but rather increase the perturbations and diseases of the soule, if first the cause of them, I meane ignorance of things, and the imperfection of reason, be not taken out of it. These are the mischiefs, which trouble both rich and poore: these are the miseries, which waite vpon great and small, bond and free, yong and old. Thus is the spirit of sicke persons vexed, and that continually. One while the wife is troublesome, the Phisition vnskillfull, the bed vneasie, the friend that visreth importunate, he which visreth not proud: but being once healed, they finde that whatsoeuer was yrksome vnto them before, now pleaseth them. But that which health doth to the diseased body, the same thing reason worketh in the soule of a prudent man, by curing the passions and perturbations thereof, and by causing him to rest ioyfull and contented, in what estate and condition soeuer he be. Let vs note moreover (which we touched in the beginning of this present discourse) that all these passions of the soule are much more dangerous than those of the body, because the most hurtfull passions of the body, are first ingendred of those in the soule. For the body yeeldeth it selfe ready to serue the desires, appetites, and pleasures of the soule, which being overcome and in the power of fleshly prouocations, procureth in the end destruction to them both. But contrariwise, the soule being ruled by reason, resisteth mightily all corporall passions and is nothing at all, or very little made partaker of their euill dispositions: whereas on the other side the body is constrained to all alter and change with euery infirmitie of the soule. If the minde be troubled, what cheerefulness can be seene in the face? The diseases of the body hinder not the soule from effecting all good and vertuous actions: yea many haue brought forth the fruits of wise Philosophers and great Captaines, when they were vexed with diseases, which they could neuer do, at least very few of them, that were corrupted and defiled in soule. And therefore Democritus said very well, that it was much more conuenient and meete for a man to haue care of his soule, than of his body: For if the soule be perfect, she correcteth the naughtines of the body, whereas the strength and disposition of the body without the vse of reason, hurteth both the soule and it selfe. Moreover, that the passions of the soule are harder to be perceived and knowne, and consequently more vneasie to be cured, who doth not easily feele it, being grieved but in the least part of his body? yea what griefe doth not of it selfe sufficiently appeare, either by some inflammation, or by the colour of the visage, or by some other outward shew? But how many do we see, whose soules are extremely sicke, spoiled and corrupted with vice, and yet being deprived of all feeling, they think themselves to be the soundest men in the world? And that they are headstrong and vneasie to be cured, we may know by this, that the body is in the end so far forth obedient, that if reason be vrged vpon it, she forceth euen the naturall passions of hunger, thirst and sleepe, and findeth out besides a thousand remedies to helpe your selfe. But whē the passions of the soule haue once bin grounded and rooted within it, without resistance they haue such pearcing pricks, that oftentimes they they presse and overwhelme all reason, which is their onely medicine and preservative. And yet to fill vp the measure of all miserie, such is the froward nature of man, that he is much more slothfull to seeke out this remedy of the soule, than that of the body, as wee touched in the beginning of this present discourse. Moreover, the iudgement of reason being oftentimes diseased within him, is the cause, that when he thinketh to finde health, hee encrease his euill, and falleth into those inconueniences, which he desired most of all to eschew. Example hereof we haue in those, who being led onely with a desire of glory and honour, obtaine nothing by their doings, if we consider them well, but shame and dishonour. The like may bee said of all the other diseases of the soule, which commonly are accompanied and followed with effects contrarie to their ends and desires. What remaineth then, seeing we perceiue the dangers to be great, which follow all the perturbations of the soule, but that knowing it to be more easie not to receiue them, than to driue them out being receiued, we prevent them, and hinder them from taking liuely roote within our soules, by making reason (which as Hesiodus saith is a diuine guide, and wisdom inspired from aboue) so strong and powerfull, that it may, be able by the grace of God, to resist all the assaults of vnbridled desires, and the froward affections of this flesh? But behold yet a better and more certainer remedie: namely, that being assured, that all perturbations are but opinions drawne from our will, through a iudgement corrupted with the affections of this flesh, we labour by good and sound reasons to ouerthrow and confound these false and erronious opinions, perswading our selues that whatsoeuer wee imagine to be good or euill in the world (which is the cause that our minds are deprived of their rest and quietnesse) is indeed neither good nor euill, and so consequently, that it ought not in any sort to breede passions within vs. Hereof the sequelle of our discourses shall (by the helpe of God) giue vs to vnderstand more at large, and furnish vs with examples of pernicious effects, which proceede from all the passions of the soule. Wee will here by the way note their force, hauing learned out of Histories, that they haue oftentimes set vpon the hearts of men in such violent manner, that some through desire, some for ioy: these by feare, others by grieve haue ended their liues. Diagoras the Rhodian, and Chilon, hearing that their children had wonne the prize at the games of Olympus, felt such a motion in them of the spleene, that they were stifled with laughter. Herennus the Sicilian, as he was led prisoner, for being a copartner in the conspiracy of Caius Gracchus, was so astonished, and oppressed with the feare of his iudgement to come, that hee fell downe starke dead at the entry of the prison. Plautius the Numidian looking vpon his dead wife tooke it so to heart, that calling himselfe vpon the dead body, he arose no more, but was there stifled with sorrow. As for extreme desire or coueting, there is nothing that so greatly moueth or carrieth away the minds of men, or that commeth neerer to their destruction, than this foolish passion in dangereth their life. Galeace of Mantua saying oftentimes to a damsell of Pauiā whom hee courted and made loue to, that he would suffer a thousand deaths for her seruice, if it were possible, was in iest commaunded by her to cast himselfe into the riuer: which hee presently performed, and was drowned. But we shall alleadge more fitly such testimonies of the fond effects of desire, and of all the perturbations of the soule, when we discourse more particularly of euery vice that proceedeth from them. In the meane time I would gladly aske this question of him, that is most ignorant, vicious, and carnall, whether hee will not graunt vertue to bee a good of the soule. There is none so impudent whose conscience would not compell him to confesse the same. And yet no man is carried away with too great a desire of vertue, neither doth any reioyce therein too excessiue, after hee hath obtained it. Likewise there is none that feareth so vehemently, least he cannot obtaine her, as that the feare thereof driueth the soule out of his place and rest. For no man can fall into this feare, least he should not become vertuous, except he be very desirous to be so indeed: & none can haue this desire, except reason, guided with heavenly light, & doing her duty in him, had wrought the same: but reason thus qualified must needs be an enemy to al perturbations. Thus we see that no man, through feare of not being vertuous, is ouertaken with perturbations. The like may bee said of sorrow. For albeit a man be grieved because he is not vertuous, yet his minde is not excessiue disquieted, seeing this desire is neuer in him, but when reason comandeth according to her diuine nature, by causing vs to know our selues. Whereby we clearly perceiue that perturbations neuer arise in vs for that which is the true good of the soule, but onely for that which fooles do falsly call good, & that which the Philosophers call the goods of the body & of fortune. But these being naturally subiect to corruption, & as we haue already said, inseparably accompanied with vehement desire, vnbridled ioy, feare and grieve, (as we shall see more at large when we handle

The Passions
of men commonly bring fourth effects contrarie to their purposes

Reason, is wisdom inspired from heauen.

A remedy against passions.

Examples of death by ouer
great ioy.
Herennus died for feare.

Plautius through griefe.
The effects
of desire.

Vertue is alwaies without excessiue passion.

The nature
of worldly goods.

them hereafter) are vnworthy to be cared for by the immortall soule, neither may or ought they to be called goods because they are possessed, much lesse euills, when they are wanting. If we bee thus perswaded, wee shall bee masters ouer all perturbations, not esteeming that which is mortall and fraile, worthy to bee either wished for, or delighted in. Hereof it will come to passe, that our soule and spirit shall be quiet, and reason, which knoweth how to discern good from euill, will deal with vs as a good husbandman, and vine-dresser dealeth with his tree and vine, when he cutteth off the dead branches and vnprofitable twigs, to the end that all noisome sap and moisture may be taken away. And thus shall we be taught to desire and do that, which wee ought, and every contrary inclination shall be weakened, not taking effects, and the soule shall fulfill her duty, in commanding absolutely, ouer all the provocations of the flesh, and in quenching them so soone as they do appeare. For as they that haue healthfull bodies (saith Epictetus) easily endure both cold and heate: so they that haue a staied and settled soule, haue the dominion ouer anger, griefe, ioy, and all their other affections. Then shall we liue happily, not being terrified with any feare, nor vexing our spirits with any longing or tedious desires, nor being tormented with any lusts & disordered affections, and lastly, not suffering our selues (being drunken with sugred poison) to bee overcome and bound vnder the yoke of pleasure. This shall we learne by the study of Philosophie, which is a certaine remedy, and a sound medicine for every vice and passion, and is able to enrich and cloath vs with reason, which is such a beautifull, perfect and profitable ornament.

A wise soule
gouerneth
the affections
What it is to
liue happily.

Of Philosophie. Chap. 4.

AMANA. THe life of man (saith Pythagoras) is like to that generall assemblie of Gracia at the Olympian games, where many carried with glory and ambition presented themselues at those exercises, that they might beare away the crowne and prize: others led with couetousnesse, came thither to trafficke, selling and buying merchandise: and a third sort of men, more praise worthy and noble, came thither also, who sought not after vaine glory, or couetousnesse, but carefully marked whatsoeuer was done in that assembly, that they might reape profit and commodity thereby. So men comming into the world, as into a faire or mart, some giue themselues to ambition and vaine glory, others to couetousnesse, and to heape vp treasure: But they that are of a more diuine nature, sequestering themselues from worldly affaires, meditate vpon heavenly things, and thereupon fasten the scope of their intents, desires and wils. Diuine Plato, ioyning action with contemplation in a happy and perfect life, saith, that next to the glory of God we must haue regard to do that which is profitable for the Common-wealth. Which excellent opinions of these two Philosophers, are comprehended vnder this onely word of practising philosophy, and that arte which giueth vs the precepts thereof, is called Philosophie, whose worke and effect (as Seneca Neroes schoole-master said very well) is to finde out, and to know the truth both of diuine and humane things. Iustice, piety, religion, yea the whole company of vertues neuer depart from her. She teacheth vs to adore and serue God, and to loue man.

The comon drift of men.

What men ought chiefe
to leuell at.
The worke of Philosophy.

ARAM. Surely Philosophie is the mother and continuall spring of all good knowledge. For she teacheth vs to know good and euill: she prouoketh vs by the vprightnes of reason to flye this thing, and to do that, causing vs to liue as wise and prudent men, ioyfull and contented in every estate, wherupon ariseth the sound rest of the spirit. Moreover, the excellency of this knowledge (as Plato saith) is so great, that it is but one and the same thing to be a king, a gouernour of a Common-wealth and a Philosopher: because the royall, ciuill, and Philosophicall arts are compounded of the same matter, namely, of iustice and prudence.

The proper
end and scope of Philosophie.

why the Philosophers
could neuer attaine to the soueraigne
good in this life.

ACHITOB. Philosophie cannot sufficiently be praised, seeing that whosoever obeith her may passe his daies without tediousnesse. For the true scope thereof is to seeke to glorifie God in his wonderfull workes, and to teach a man how to liue well, and to helpe his neighbour. Which perfection cannot be attained vnto without a speciall and heavenly grace, and that after the knowledge of the fountaine from whence all goodnesse commeth. And this hath beene the cause, as I thinke, why so many great Philosophers, knowing certainly wherein the true and perfect felicity of man liuing in this world consisteth, namely, in the tranquillitie of the soule, and labouring continually to roote out, or at least to weaken all the perturbations thereof, by the vprightnes of reason, and to engraft vertue therein, yet could neuer perfectly enioy this soueraigne good, which they so much desired, because they were ignorant of the fountaine from whence it proceeded, which is, the grace and mercie of our God
in

in his beloved Sonne. And albeit their life was marvellously quiet, and void of many vices, yet it standeth vs in hand (if we be Christians indeed) to leade, without comparison, a more happy, contented, and excellent life, and to exercise philosophy according to that true wisdom, which our Lord Iesus Christ teacheth vs. But I thinke A S E R is prepared to speake of this matter, and to discourse thereof more at large vnto vs. Let vs hearken then what hee will say.

A S E R. That which presently offereth it selfe to be handled, requireth truly a farre better spirit than mine. Notwithstanding, that I seeme not to shun those lists, into which we entred willingly, I purpose according to my weake iudgement, to tell you first what Philosophy is, what good commeth vnto vs by it, the meanes to learne it, and to profite thereby, how a man may know he hath it, and how he must shew forth the fruits thereof: and lastly, how we ought to contemne all things that we may obtaine it, after the example of some ancient Sages, whom we will alleadge. Philosophy is a loue or desire of wisdom. Or otherwise, it is a profession, study, and exercise of that wisdom, which is the knowledge of diuine and humane things, and which properly belongeth to him, who onely is sufficient of himselfe, and is wisdom it selfe, namely, to God. Pythagoras was the first that gaue the name to Philosophy, which beeing diuided as well by him, as by other ancient Philosophers into diuers and sundry arts and sciences, we may distinguish into two generall parts onely: into the Contemplative part, and into the Morall, which some call Active. We will make two kinds of the Contemplative, Diuine, and Naturall. As touching the diuine part, it is that highest and most vnchangeable knowledge, whereunto we must wholly refer the end of our beeing, and the scope of all our purposes, studies, and actions, namely, to be able to know and to glorifie the Creator and preseruer of the whole world. Of this eternall knowledge, which Socrates called Wisdom, we say with Iustin, who was both a Philosopher and a martyr, that all louers of Christian faith ought to endeavour not to be ignorant, no not of any point belonging to the knowledge and perfect keeping of God his commandements, but especially they must haue in singular recommendation his seruice and true worship. As touching the absolute and perfect knowledge of heavenly mysteries, they ought to desire the vnderstanding of them so farre forth as they are able, and according to the gift and measure of graces, which shall be given them from aboue. But if the eie of their soule dazell in the consideration of them, it shall be sufficient to honour and admire them with due reuerence, and to beleue them stedfastly, knowing that mans vnderstanding is not able to attaine to the exquisite knowledge of so high mysteries. Naturall Philosophy consisteth chiefly in the Mathematicks, which are diuided into many parts and particular sciences, of which the most of them seeme to many not greatly necessarie, as that which intreateth of the nature of the heauens, of the sunne, of the moone, of their motions, measures, and of the naturall causes of all things. Which oftentimes serueth rather to content the curiositie of hawtie spirits, than to make them better, insomuch that sometimes, by speculations, and by vaine and friuolous questions, they seeke out the naturall causes of things so curiously, that in the end they strue to finde out another beginning of all things than GOD: whereby at length they remaine deceiued and confounded in their knowledge, as both the writings of so many ancient Philosophers, and also the life of many in our time doe prooue vnto vs. Neuerthelesse, there are some parts of the Mathematicks necessarie to be knowne, for the great profit that may come vnto vs by them, as Physicke, Arithmetike, Geometrie, and others. But the subiect of our Academie will not suffer vs to handle all these sciences at this present. I will say thus much onely by the way, that wee ought so to rule and direct the profession of naturall philosophie, that we vse it not before we haue bene well and sufficiently instructed in the feare and knowledge of God, and of all things that concerne a good and happie life, and that vaine glorie should not bee the end of that studie, but that it should rauish vs more and more in the contemplation of the workes of that great maister-builder of the whole frame, to the end to glorifie him in greater measure. And yet wee must aboue all things beware, that wee fall not into that curse of the Prophet, which hee denounceth against those, who being destitute of Gods grace by reason of their sinnes, giue themselves to sooth-saying, and to seeke after forcerers, magicians, and calculators of natiuities, which things wee see are too common amongst vs: insomuch that hee is iudged as it were miserable, that knoweth not his Horoscope, from whence so many abuses, inuocations, and cursed charmes haue proceeded by little and little. Let vs shun such vaine knowledge, proper to infidels and Atheists, and referre our euents and issues (which albeit wee knew before, yet could wee not assure our selues

The definition of Philosophie.

The diuision of Philosophie. Of diuine Philosophie.

How we must behaue our selues in searching out the secrets of God.

Of naturall Philosophie.

A rule to be kept in naturall Philosophie.

Against forcerers, magicians, and birthgazers.

The issue of all things is to be referred to the prou-idence of God.
Of morall
philosophie.

God is the Idea of all good.

The benefite
that commeth by philosophie.

Philosophie
is the art of life.

What it is to play the philosopher.

Where and how Philoso-
phie is learned.

True Philo-sophie is to be found in the word of God.

that we should auoide them) to the onely providence and direction of God. It remaineth now to inreate of the other part of Philosophie, called Morall. Of this I thinke Socrates the wise man meant to speake, when he said, that Philosophie consisteth not in learning many things, or in medling with many arts, but in the perfect knowledge of iustice, prudence, and all other morall vertues. He addeth further, that this philosophie worketh two things in our minde, the one in purging it as well of perturbations, as of false opinions, and the other, in causing it to returne into the right way by reasons and exhortations drawne from earthly and sensible formes to such as are spirituall, which are inclosed within our soules; that by them wee may be led to God, the Idea and patterne of all good. This is that morall Philosophie, which we have vndertaken to handle in all our discourses, & which is so necessarie for the life of man. For as the vntamed horse by reason of his ouergreat wildnes is not profitable for any thing: so he that is drawne away by his affections (which philosophy onely can moderate) is vnprofitable and vnworthy of all company, and of all government either publike or priuate. It is philosophy that teacheth vs the doctrine of good life, and causeth vs to know our miseries, and the meanes whereby we may be deliuered from them. Shee it is that frameth in our vnderstanding the iudgement of reason, and learneth vs to leade a life agreeable to doctrine: shewing vnto vs what true honesty is, what perfect beautie, and what in truth and in deede is profitable. Shee repreffeth all euill passions and perturbations of the soule, appeaseth the vnstatiable desires thereof, deliuereth it from all feare, and from all earthly carefullnesse, filling it with tranquillitie, constancie, assurance, magnanimitie, and sufficiencie. Shee purgeth pride, presumption, ambition, choler, reuenge, couetousnesse, iniustice, and in a word, shee it is, that (by the meanes of reason guided by the heavenly Spirit, which teacheth vs reason, and giueth it vnto vs for a law) frameth all the manners and behauiour of a man according to the patterne of vertue, by ingraffing it in his setled soule, as his onely permanent good, and by causing him to do that willingly, which others (as Xenocrates said) do by compulsion, and for feare of lawes. We are by philosophie instructed at large in that dutie and obedience, which we owe to our parents, superiours, and lawes: and taught how much we ought to loue & honor one another, our wiues, our children, our brethren, yea all those that are not of our blood. Shee it is (saith Cicero) that containeth the discipline of vertue, of durie, and of good life: shee is also the art and mistresse of life. Briefly, by philosophie we are taught that perfection, which concerneth al the actions and dealings of men, euen from those who are placed in the government of monarchies, kingdomes, common-wealths, cities, and nations, vnto the least that liueth vnder them. For shee teacheth the one sort how to command well, and the other to obey well, & to maintaine themselves vpright in every estate and condition of life, in the alteration either of prosperitie or of aduersitie, yea euen to shew themselves constant in contrarie things, by shunning pleasure and sustaining griefe, by despising glorie and enduring contempt. And to this effect, one of the wise Hebrew interpreters, being demanded by Ptolemie Philadelphus king of Egypt, what it was to exercise philosophie, answered, that it was to reason well and directly, to reape great profit by all things that happen, not to be carried away by lust, to contemne all vanities proceeding of worldly pleasures, and to be guided in euery action by a certaine mediocritie. Now seeing it is out of question that the fruit and commoditie of morall philosophie is such and so great, let vs in the next place consider where and how we may learne it, that wee may put it in practise. There is nothing more true than this, that it dependeth in such sort of the former, which we called contemplatiue and diuine, or rather is so ioyned vnto it, that without this, it can neuer but be vnperfect in man, seeing the feare and knowledge of God is the beginning and perfection of all wisdom. Moreouer, it is so well and perfectly taught vs in the word of God, that nothing more may be added or desired. Neuerthelesse the doctrine ioyned with examples, which we may draw out of histories, and from the liues of wise men, by things that haue beene done in deede, is of great force and efficacie in the soule to draw and moue it with delight to seeke to resemble them. For when a man, naturally desirous of glorie and immortalitie, shall see, that philosophers and vertuous men, who were so much commended and renowned, are as it were reuiued againe in these daies, after so many ages past, he will be thereby awakened and pricked forward by this ielousie of glorie, which by nature is in him, to desire and bring to passe all great matters worthie to be remembered, to the end hee may deserue the like praise and commendation. Therefore wee shall reape no small profite hereby, yea it will be vnto vs as an entrie to a happie and holy life, and as a guide to sacred contemplations, if we earnestly imbrace and exercise our selues in the reading and studie of good authors, who teach vs the precepts of good life: to whome (as Alexander the

the Great said, speaking of his master Aristotle) we find our selues no lesse bound and behold- ing, if we thoroughly taste their doctrine, than to our owne fathers (without offence vnto the be it spoken) of whom we haue onely our life and being, But because the excellencie and highnes of this part of Philosophie, called Morall (which is for the correction of life and man- ners) is such and so great, that the sound and perfect knowledge thereof is very hard, and see- ing that good beginnings in al great matters are alwaies the difficultest part of them, we must lay a good ground of our enterprise, if we meane to attaine therunto, and then ascend vpward from one degree to another. The chiefest and most necessary foundation must be a perpetual and feruent loue of the truth, and of eternall things, ioynd with the separation of lies, and of the desire of temporall things far from vs. Secondly, these particulars are (as Plato saith) verie necessary for vs: a liuely and sharpe wit, a nature apt to contemplation, likewise graue, prompt hardie to execute, and prouident of publike commoditie. But aboue al things the knowledge of the true God is infinitely necessary for him that will be a Philosopher, because that, as all things without the inioying of their vse and goodnes, are possessed without profit: so to haue knowledge of arts and sciences without the vnderstanding of the true God is friuolous and vnprofitable. Yea no man can do any thing that good is, whether it be in priuate or publike affaires, if by reason he knoweth not what that is, which ought to be called good. But in this thing we shall be well instructed (God willing) by the sequele of our discourses. Thirdly, we must continue without ceasing the studie of this morall knowledge, as Cicero the father of eloquence doth familiarly teach vs, saying, that in our studies we are to vse some intermission onely for the recreation both of body and minde in all honest sort, but we must neuer leave and forsake them altogether, Neither ought these intermissions to be of any long continu- ance, because vice alwaies watcheth to ouerrun vs so soone as we let our selues loose vnto idlenes, to the end to stir vs vp through the inticements of the flesh, to follow our naturall imperfections. Much lesse ought we, through presumption of our selues, and confidence in our owne vertue and sufficiencie, altogether to forsake the profession of this studie, as they doe, who thinke themselves such great doctors, that nothing may be added to their know- ledge. Of these men we may truly saie, that they neuer had the true knowledge of this mo- rall philosophie, wherein the more we profit, the more we shall desire to learne: and whether we be yong or olde (as Socrates said) we shal alwaies finde what to learne, and be occasioned to diminish all vaine opinion of our selues, seeing this is one of the most notable effects ther- of, to purge all pride and presumption. For as those vessels (saith Plutarke) wherein we put li- quor, do let out the voide aire according to the measure of that which goeth in: so when the foule filleth it selfe with certaine and true goods, vanity voideth and giueth place. This is that which Plato saith in these words: The more reason a man getteth by philosophie, the more pride and arrogancie he loseth. Wee haue a notable testimonie hereof in Antisthenes, who after he had heard Socrates dispute, tooke so great pleasure, and found such deepe skill therein, that al- beit he was verie learned, and had a great number of schollers, yet he willed them to seeke a- nother master, because he purposed to learne himselfe. And by reason of the distance of place where he dwelt, he came twise a day aboute three miles on foot to heare Socrates. Likewise Plato shewed well how smally he presumed of his exceeding great knowledge, when not contenting himselfe therewith, after the death of his master Socrates he made a voyage through Egypt, and after into Italie, to heare and conferre with the best best learned of those countries, and to learne that which he knew not before. Which zeale of his and burning de- sire vnto wisdom being so laudable, God so recompenced, that none of the Ethnikes (ex- cept Socrates) euer came neere vnto his diuine knowledge of eternall things. We see then how we must be the disciples of Philosophie all our lifetime. Now as there is nothing, wherein a master builder reioiceth so much, after he hath laide a good foundation of some great worke, as to see the progresse and proceeding thereof: so after we haue laide our first happy resoluti- on (as is said) of attaining to the knowledge of Philosophie, and haue tasted of the first prin- ciples of hir wholesome fruites, it will turne to our great contentation, and occasion of procee- ding, when we see and perceiue that we profit and amend by this study. This will appeare vnto vs by the consideration of our present workes and actions, being compared with the former, and by the diminishing and quallifying of our wicked passions and naturall inclina- tions, which the profession of this science will vndoubtedly worke in vs. For as we take it for a good signe when a disease remooueth into some parts of least account: so when our vices are changed into more meeke and soft passions, it putteth vs in hope that wee shall whol- ly deface them afterward. The right and perfect way hereunto is to enter deeply into our selues,

How much wee owe to good authors

foundation of al Philosophy
The chiefe

Necessary points for a Philosopher.

We must learne al-
waies.

Against presumption and selfe liking.

A fit comparison.

Antisthenes
an example of great loue
to knowledge

Plato

How we may know whether we profit in Philosophie.

A good way
to overcome
great faults.

Whē we may be called Philosophers.

The perfection of philosophy.

The cōtempt
of worldly goods necessary in a Philosopher.

Crates.

Notable examples of loue
to philosophy

Anaxagoras

Democritus

Euclide.

Philosophy
only teacheth
vs to know
our chiefe
good

selues, and to make a perfect and sound knowledge of our naturall, hurtfull, and most vehement inclinations by comparing one with another. Next, as a good and expert Phisition before he dealeth with dangerous diseases, beginneth with gentle preparatiues, we are first to correct lesser faults, that after we may the easier overcome the greatest. For it is certaine, that by such an exercise and custome of keeping our selues from things that are after a sort excusable, yea that are permitted and lawfull, it will be farre more easie for vs afterward to amend and abstaine from vnlawfull things. After we haue thus reformed our selues, we shall wholly forsake small imperfections (which will be easie for vs to doe) and make no more reckoning of little offences, as those which we shall auoid altogether. From thence we shal come to consider and to discover better the nature and cause of our greater and more hurtfull passions, together with their vgliness and deformitie. Then labouring to diminish their force by eschewing prudently the causes of them, and by cutting off one branch now, and then another, we shal in the end wonder to see how reason perfecteth in vs hir office of commanding absolutely ouer all the perturbations of our soule, I meane so farre forth as humane frailtie aided by God, can (as I said before) attaine to perfection. Then may we truly call our selues Philosophers, when by our owne example we may make it knowne, that the life of man at all times, in all places, in all passions, and generally in all affaires receiue the vse of Philosophie. Now after we haue well profited through so great diligence and watchfulness, through such industrie of minde and continuall study, I meane after we are become better than we were before, by reason of the tranquillitie of our soules purged from perturbations, we must be carefull that this our commoditie redound also to others, as the commandement of God and naturall dutie binde vs thereunto. Then (I say) we shall haue attained to the perfection of this goodly knowledge, when we are seruiceable to our neighbors, brethren and cōtriment, not of vaine glory, or for terrestriall riches, but for the loue of vertue onely, which of it selfe is a goodly recompence for it selfe, being ioyned with a happie expectation of heauen. But let vs note further for the last point of our discourse, (whereof I haue already briefly spoken) that one of the surest means, which we can take to come to a true knowledge of Philosophie, is, not to esteeme at all, but rather to contemne whatsoever is subiect to corruption, and is in the power of variable fortune, as the Philosophers vse to speake: namely, vaine glory, worldly wealth, and other earthly goods, forasmuch as the desire of getting, keeping and increasing them is that which carrieth vs away most, & which hindereth euery other good and vertuous inclination. Therefore let vs freely forsake all such things; let vs withdraw our mindes from all by thoughts, and despise all earthly discommodities: yea let vs patiently sustaine all grieffe, that we may yeeld our selues wholly to the study of philosophie, which is the cause of so many good things. Crates the Theban forsooke his patrimonie of eight talents (which according to the common computation amounteth to foure thousand, eight hundred crownes) that beeing deliuered from the care of house keeping, and of guiding his goods, he might follow the studie of Philosophy with great libertie. Anaxagoras for the same cause suffered his lands to lie wast, and after long study returning to his house, and finding it altogether fallen into ruine and desolation, he said, If these things had not perished, I had perished: as if he had said, that he should neuer haue gotten the treasure of knowledge, which was the ornament of his minde, if he had giuen himselfe to gaine and to gather goods. Democritus Abderita, being very rich (as may be gathered by the feast which his father made to that innumerable armie of Xerxes who came into Græcia, which consisted, as Herodotus writeth, of more than two millions of fighting men gaue all his patrimonie to his country, reseruing to himselfe but a little summe of mony to liue withall, that he might haue the more leasure to study Philosophie, for which cause he went to dwell at Athens, Euclide, of the towne of Megara, being very desirous to heare Socrates dwelling at Athens, betweene which two cities the warre was so cruell, that no Citizen of the one cittie durst be seene in the other, without ineuitable danger of death if he were knowne, had notwithstanding so great loue to wisdom, that although he were an Ethnike, and doubted of a second life, yet hee preferred the desire of knowledge before the care of his life, and being apparelled like a woman, went once in two daies to Athens, and abode there all night to heare Socrates, who commonly spent the most part thereof in discoursing of wisdom, and then returned againe about the breake of the day. Now to conclude our present treatise, wee will hold this, that onely philosophie can giue vs certaine knowledge, and teach vs how we may enioy in this life our onely and soueraigne good, which is the rest and tranquility of our soules. Yea there is vnto vs in steade of a guide to lead vs to the eternall fruition of our supreme and euer-abiding good good, which is promised, and purchased by the blood of the immaculate Lambe in that second and most happy life. And, as Plato said, speaking by the mouth of Socrates, that they onely shall attaine to the kingdome of heauen with God, who end their daies in this life purged by Philosophy, so shall it be by the vnspeakable loue of this eternall wisedome, that wee shall bee purged, cleansed, and saued. Yea through the expectation of this blessed felicitie wee may a great deale more perfectly than did all those great and ancient Philosophers, leade a contented, ioyfull and quiet life, voide of all perturbations and feare, forasmuch as they knew the iustice of God onely, and not his mercy, which is assured vnto vs in his beloued Sonne. Moreouer they were ignorant (notwithstanding their Philosophy) of the chiefe point of his iustice, namely of the beginning of all things and of their end, which the word of God teacheth vs together with the truth of that permanent happinesse of the soule, whereof they had but a shadow in their life. Hereof our Lord Iesus Christ himselfe hath left good and sure pledges in the depth of our hearts, saying that he gaue and left his peace with vs, his peace (I say) in our soules, and not with the world. Therefore it appeareth sufficiently, that nothing is so much to be desired, whether we regard profite to our selues, or service to the whole body and societie of our brethren and countremen, as the study of Philosophy, which is the knowledge of life, and the true medicine and tillage of the soule whereby all vertue is taught vs.

The true cause of ioy
and tranquil-litie in a Christian soule.

The end of the first daies worke.

The second daies Worke.

Of Vertue. Chap. 5.

A S E R.

Mongst the infinite number of them that were honoured with this faire name and excellent title of Philosopher, which is as much to say, as a loue of wisedome, there were three principall sects that contented together by generall rules, but especially about the soueraigne good and felicity of man: namely, the Academikes, the Peripatetiks, and the Stoiks. The best of them all, and they which came nearest to the knowledge of the truth were the Academiks,

What this word Philosopher mea-neth.
There were three chiefe sects of Philosophers.

whose first authors were Socrates and Plato, who, as we heard yesterday, alwaies taught, that our true good consisteth in the tranquillitie of the soule, voide of all perturbations, and in stead of them adorned and enriched with all vertue, which is the proper substance and matter of Philosophie, and therefore called the onely permanent good of the soule.

AMANA. I cannot but greatly commend this paradox of the Stoiks, that There is no good but vertue, nor euill but vice, which is the contrary vnto it. And to go a little further, following their opinion and the opinion of many ancient wise men, I say, that The vertuous man onely is free and happy, yea although he were in Phalaris bull: and that The vicious man onely is a bond-man and unhappy, albeit he had the riches of Crasus, the empire of Cyrus, and the glory of Alexander. For great callings are nothing where the minde is not content, and where the heart pricked with desire troubleth the tranquillitie of the soule.

Who are happy, and who vnhappy.

ARAM. Riches (saith Pythagoras) are no sure pillars, and glory is lesse certaine. Likewise beauty, and the disposition of the body, magistracies and honors are all of no force: but Prudence, Magnanimitie and Iustice, are anchors of greatest stay, which cannot bee plucked vp by any tempest. For it is the will and law of God, that vertue onely should be mightie and firme, all other things being but toies and fooleries. But we must now learne of thee ACHITO, that which is necessarie for vs to know concerning this excellent disposition of the soule.

Worldly
goods are of no force.

ACHITO. The disputation concerning the good of man hath indeed alwaies beene great amongst the learned, so that as well their diuers opinions, as their arguments, would stay vs here with too long a discourse, especially seeing they are vnecessary for vs, who seeke only to be instructed in the truth. Now that we may attaine hereunto, and to the perfect vnderstanding of that matter, which is here propounded vnto vs, we will here set downe this Maxime, or principle, confessed of all the greatest and most ancient Philosophers, and agreeable to that truth, which is taught vs in the holy Scriptures, that, There are two sorts of goods, the one which is the last end, the other is the meanes to attaine thereunto. The first is the soveraigne, supreme, most perfect, and eternall good, which we respect and hope for in the immortalitie of the second life, when we shall enioy that true and absolute felicitie, which neither eye hath

Two sorts of goods.

euer

Vertue is the effect of regeneration.

The definition of vertue.

Socrates called religion,
the greatest vertue.

The dutie of prudence.

The foundation & spring
of all vertue.

Wherein humane happi-
nes consisteth

The gifts and graces of god
are diuers in
men.

euere seene, nor eare heard, neither hath entred at any time into the heart of man. That which we call the meanes whereby we come to the first, is vertue onely, wherof we are now to speak and which is the proper effect of our regeneration by the Spirit of God dwelling in vs. First then let vs consider what vertue is, also the diuision, fountaine, incomparable excellencie, and inuincible force thereof, with those wonderfull effects which it worketh in him that possesseth her: Wherein also we will see some notable examples of ancient men. Vertue (as the Philosophers say) is a disposition and power of the reasonable part of the soule, which bringeth into order and decencie the vnreasonable part, by causing it to propound a conuenient end to it owne affections and passions, wherby the soule abideth in a comely and decent habite, executing that which ought to be done, according to reason. But to speake more briefly Vertue is a proportion and vprightnesse of life in al points agreeable to reason. The diuision thereof is altogether like to that of Philosophie. For they are so linked together, that it is all one to be vertuous, and to be a Philosopher, the one beeing the matter and substance of the other. Vertue therefore is diuided into Contemplative and into Morall. The eternall Wisdome by the operation of his spirit guideth and listerh vp the contemplatiue vertue to her proper end, which is that happy and immutable knowledge, that concerneth the maiestie of God. This did Socrates call Religion, and the greatest vertue: saying further: that the contempt thereof brought vpon men a cursed ignorance, and that no man ought to perswade himselfe, that he could finde among the race of men any greater vertue than religion and piety towards God: whose honour is the foundation of euery good work, which if it be ouerthrown, the other parts are as soone disperfed as the pieces of a ruinous building. Yea religiō is not only the head of iustice and vertue, but also as it were the soule to giue vigor and strength vnto it. From this supreme science floweth prudence, which is a worke thereof, appointed to gouerne, rule, and moderate by the meanes of morall vertue, the passions and affections of the vnreasonable part of the soule in all mediocritie, by cutting of all exceffe and defect of those passions, and by moderating them betweene too little and too much, thereby to keepe men from erring. As for example, she holdeth a man within the limits of prowes and valure, lest he should cast away himselfe through rashnes of cowardlinesse: she causeth him wisely to vse liberalitie, because he should not be spoiled by couetousnes, or fall into prodigality. And that he should not be cast downe too much in aduersitie, nor lift vp beyond measure in prosperitie, she keepeth him vpright and constant both in the one, and in the other. Thus doth vertue generally teach a man, by following the reason of true prudence, to rule all his inclinations and actions as well for his owne priuate good, as for the profit and vtilitie of humane societie. Whereby it appeareth sufficiently vnto vs, that the foundation of all vertue is that diuine reason, which floweth into our soules from the free goodnes of our God, and which taketh lively roote by care, study, and diligence, when the selfe-same grace blesteth our labour. For without this we can do nothing, so that all our meditations and purposes to liue vprightly, continently and temperately, become vaine and friuolous before his maiestie. In this manner, of that excellent reason and wisdome, wherewith the eternall wisdome enricheth vs, that wee might know good and euill, prudence is ingendred, which is most necessary for the government of earthly things (whereof we will intreate hereafter) and whereby man is enriched with morall vertue, as with an infallible rule of all his workes and actions, to the end that fullie enioying humane felicity, which consisteth in good manners, qualities and conditions of the soule, he may bring forth the fruites and effects thereof to the profit of many. We say then, that all vertue consisteth in mediocrity, as vice doth in exceffe, or in defect: in regard whereof he is in the midst, albeit in respect of her selfe. I meane of her perfect and absolute excellencie, she is extreme, and standeth not in neede of any increase or diminution. Now as all the imperfections of the soule are called vices and passions, so all their contraries, which serue for remedies vnto them, are named vertues. And although vertue be alwaies one, so that hee which heartily embraceth one part of it, is desirous of them al, yet may she be called by diuers names, euen by so many, as there is alwaies in euery good action some particular vertue, that maketh it eminent, and to be seene aboue others. Moreover, according to the diuers subiects wherin she is, she bringeth forth diuers effects, conforming her selfe in some sort to the manners, conditions, and naturall inclinations of those which possesse her. Hereof it commeth, that some are more apt & constant in some one vertue than others are, (for all cannot do al things) and that one practiseth it after one fashion, and an other otherwise. Now it followeth, that I handle hereafter distinctly and in order, the plurality of vertues, with their severall properties. But in the meane while, to speake generally of this pretious and inestimable riches, I meane

meane of vertue, and of the great, worthy, and wonderfull effects, which she bringeth forth in men, first, she is the only, proper and true good of the soule, that cannot by any accident be violently taken and carried away. She alone maketh her possessor happie, causing him to finde every kinde of life that is sweet, pleasant, and acceptable, contained in her. Vertue alone is the onely matter of rest and tranquillitie in the mind, being by reason purged of feare, of trouble, of worldly desire and ioy. Of this lively fountaine spake Democritus, when he saide that ioy was ingendred in mens hearts, of the mediocrity of pleasure, and of a moderate and temperate harmonie of life. Vertue (saide Tholes) is the profitablest thing in the world, because it maketh all other things profitable, by causing men to vse them well. Ye we may say further, that all other gifts and riches, remaine vnpromisable and hurtfull, without the ornament of vertue, Cicero prooueth by many goodly reasons, that onely vertue is of it selfe sufficient to cause men to liue well and happily. And surely every good and vertuous man of what calling soeuer he be, is so happy, if he haue grace to know it, that he neede not to wish for any thing with passion or trauell in this life, but rather is content of himselfe in regard of men, and contemneth the care of worldly things, not iudging any thing euill, which necessity of nature, or rather the ordinance of God bringeth vpon him. And where miseries are doubled, there vertue sheweth her effects most wonderfully, giving vs thereby to vnderstand, that she consisteth in such things as are most rare and difficult. For which cause her strength is compared to the date tree, which the more it is pulled downe, the more it returneth vponward: so when vertue is most oppressed of her enemies she shineth most gloriously. Only vertue appeareth wonderfull to the minde, that is cloathed therewith, and keepeth it from co-uetting that which others commonly worship, namely, great callings, riches, pleasures and glory. She despiseth the praise & flatterie of men, whereunto so many others make themselves, and remaineth alwaies free in her selfe, and free to euery one, without any other hope of reward, than to be accepted of God, and to effect things meete to be rewarded eternally in the next life by the liberalitie of God. If we compare worldly goods with vertue (calling that good which vsurpeth that name, and is subiect to corruption) first, as touching those which the Philosophers call the goods of fortune, and namely nobility, whereon at this day men stay so much, what is it but a good of our ancestors? Riches are easily lost: and as for the glory of the greatest, yea of all principallitie, it is no lesse vncertaine. Concerning the goods of the body, beauty, and comelines is but a flower of small continuance: health which is so precious, soone changeth: strength is lost by infinite inconueniences. All bodily pleasure is vnperfect, and followed of perturbations. But vertue is that onely diuine and immortall quality in vs, which (as Hesiodus saith) is a stable and sure possession both to the liuing and to the dead: ouer which, neither fortune, slander, sicknes, old age nor aduersity haue any power: and as for length of time, which diminisheth all things, it alwaies addeth somewhat to vertue, and encreaseth it. Al the other goods aboue rehearsed, are from without a man, working oftentimes destruction to their possessors, and commonly comming to those that are least worthy of them. Onely vertue is the proper inheritance of the soule, worketh the happines thereof, and maketh a man alwaies worthie of true glory and praise, causing him to be honoured, and esteemed euen of his enemies. In a word, it cannot (as Cicero saith) be vttered how much vertue surmounteth al other things in glory and excellencie. And if all other goods of men (saith Socrates) were laid by themselves, they would amount in value but to one mote in respect of the price of vertue. Plato his disciple saith, that the difference of vertue compared with other goods, is so great, that if they were put into one skale of the balance, and vertue into the other, this would ascend vp to heauen, and the other would touch the earth. Moreover, he wrote foure and fiftie bookes or dialogues, which did all intreate of vertue, out of which men may reape infinite profite, especially out of those that intreate of a common wealth, or of lawes. In these bookes that he might not seeme vngratefull toward his master Socrates, who would neuer write any thing, he bringeth him in rehearsing that, which at other times hee had heard him speake. Stilpo the Philosopher, being in his citie of Megara when it was taken and spoiled by Demetrius king of Macedonia, who fauouring him, asked if he had lost any thing that was his, made this answere: No sir, (quoth he) for warre cannot spoile vertue. And indeed this is the riches wherewith we ought to furnish our selues, which can swim with vs in a shipwrack, and which caused Socrates to answer thus to one, who asked him what his opinion was of the great king, whether he did not thinke him very happie. I cannot tell (quoth he) how he is prouided of knowledge and vertue. Who may iustly doubt whether vertue alone is able to make a man happy, seeing it doth not onely make him wise, prudent, iust and good, both in

The excellency & property of vertue.

Every thing
is made profitable through vertue.

Vertue compared to a tree.

The reward of vertue in the life to come is of the free mercy of God.

Comparison
of worldly goods with vertue.

Nothing
hath power
ouer vertue.

Vertue cannot be valued

Why Plato in his workes bringeth in Socrates
speaking.

Wherin the happines and greatnes of a king consisteth.

What it was that procured to Alexander the surname
of Great.

his doings and sayings, but also commonly procureth vnto him honour, glory and authority? It was through her meanes that Alexander deserued the surname of Great, by that experience which she gaue him in warre, by his liberalitie in riches, by his temperance in all his sumptuous magnificence, by his hardinesse and constancie in fight, by his continency in affections, by his bounty and clemency in victorie, and by all other vertues, wherein he surpassed all that liued in his time. Yea the fame and renowne of his vertues procured a greater number of cities, countries and men to submit themselves willingly vnto him without any blowe striking than did the power of his army. Wherein this sentence of Socrates is found true, that whole troupes of souldiers, and heapes of riches, are constrained oftentimes to obey vertue. What said Darius, Monarch of the Persians, when he vnderstood both what continency Alexander his enemy had vsed towards his wife, who being exceeding beautifull was taken prisoner by him, and what humanity hee shewed afterward in her funerals when she was dead? The Persians (quoth he) neede not to be discouraged, neither thinke themselves cowards and effeminate because they were vanquished of such an aduersarie. Neither do I demand any victory of the gods, but to surmount Alexander in bountifulnesse. And it it be so that I must fall, I beseech them to suffer none but him to sit in the royall throne and seate of Cyrus. Will wee haue testimonies of the inuincible force of vertue, and of her powerfull and praise-worthy effects in most sinister and vntoward matters? Histories declare vnto vs, that amongst all the vertuous acts, which procured praise and renowne to the men of old time, those were the notablest and most commended, which they shewed forth at such time as fortune seemed to haue wholly beaten them downe. Pelopidas, generall Captaine of the Thebans, who deliuered them from the bondage of the Lacedemonians, is more praised and esteemed for the great and notable vertue, which he shewed being prisoner in the hands of Alexander the tyrannous king of the Phereans, than for all his victories gotten before. For at that time his vertue was so farre from yeelding any iot to his calamitie, that contrariwise with an vnspokeable constancy he recomforted the inhabitants of the towne, that came to visite him, exhorting them to bee of good courage, seeing the houre was come, wherein the tyrant should bee at once punished, for his wickednesse. And one day hee sent him word, that hee was destitute of all iudgement and reason, in that hee vexed his poore citizens, and caused them to dye in torments who neuer offended him, and in the meane time suffered him to liue in rest, of whom hee could not bee ignorant, that escaping his hands hee would be reuenged of him. The tyrant maruelling at his great courage, asked why he made such great haste to dye. To this end (quoth hee) that thou beeing yet more hated of God and men than thou art, mightest the sooner bee destroyed. Philocles, one of the most famous Athenian captaines of his time (who caused this law to be made, that the right thumbe of all prisoners taken in war from that time forward should bee cut off, that they might not handle a pike any more, but yet might serue to row with an oare) being taken prisoner with three thousand Athenians in one battell, which Lyfander admirall of the Lacedemonians obtained against him, and all of them being condemned to dye, was demanded of Lyfander what paine hee iudged himselfe worthy of for counselling his countrey men to so wicked and cruell a thing. To whom he made this onely answer with an vnmoveable vertue, Accuse not those who haue no iudge to heare and know their cause. But seeing the gods haue shewed thee this fauour to be a conqueror, dealethou with vs as we would haue done with thee, if we had overcome thee. Which being said, he went to wash and bathe himselfe, and then putting on a rich cloke as if he should haue gone to some feast, he offered himselfe first to the slaughter, shewing the way of true constancy to his fellow citizens. Anaxarchus the Philosopher, being taken prisoner by the commandement of Nero, that he might know of him, who were the authors of a conspiracy that was made against his estate, and being led towards him for the same cause, he bit his tongue in sunder with his teeth, and did spit in his face, knowing well that otherwise the tyrant would haue compelled him by all sorts of tortures and torments to reueale and disclose them. Zeno missing his purpose, which was to haue killed the tyrant Demylus, did as much to him. But what is more terrible then death? Notwithstanding when did vertue better shew her greatnes and power, then when death laboured most to overthrow her, as being resolu'd of that saying of Cicero, that all wise men dye willingly, and without care, but that the vnwise & ignorant are at their wits end for feare of death? If many who haue not knowne the true and perfect immortality of the soule, & some onely led with a desire of praise and worldly glory, others touched with duty and kindled with a loue towards their countrey, haue shewed the increase of their vertue in the horrors and pangs of death, what ought they to do, who expect certainly

Examples of the force and effects of vertue
in aduersitie.
Pelopidas.

Philocles.

A most constant death, Anaxarchus.

A wonderfull magnanimity

A wife man dieth willingly.

certainly an everlasting life? Phocion, after he had beene chosen generall Captaine of the Athenians foure and forty times, and done infinite seruices to the common-wealth, being at length through certaine partakings and diuisions ouercome with the weakest side which he had maintained, & being condemned to drinke poison, was demanded before he dranke, whether he had no more to say. Whereupon speaking to his sonne, he said, I commaund thee to beare the Athenians no rancour and malice for my death. And a little before this speeche, beholding one of those that were condemned to dye with him, to vex himselfe through impatiencie; What meanest thou poore man (quoth hee to him) doest thou not thinke thy selfe happy that thou mayst die with Phocion? The feare & apprehension of death doth astonish, as we commonly say, the stoutest, but not the most vertuous. For they know (as Plautus saith) that he dyeth not, who for vertues sake is put to death. Callicratides, General of the Lacedemonians, being ready to giue battell to his enemies, the soothsayer, after sacrifice done to the gods, said vnto him, that the intrals of the sacrifices promised victorie to the army, but death to the captaine. Wherevnto he answered as one without all feare; although he beleued it as an oracle from heaven, Sparta consisteth not in one man. For when I shall be dead my country shall be nothing lessened, but if I recule and draw backe, the reputation thereof will be diminished. Whereupon substituting in his place Cleander, as succellor in his office, he gaue battell, wherein it hapned him as the soothsayer had told him. If we desire infinit such examples, histories are full of them, even of those who loued rather to kill themselves (which a Christian neuer ought to doe, but onely to suffer death patiently, if it bee offered vnto him) than to commit any thing vnworthy their vertue. Themistocles being vniustly banished from Athens, retired to the king of Persia, whose great fauour and benefits receiued, caused him to say to his children, We had been undone, if we had not been undone: as also to promise, that hee would imploy himselfe in his seruice. Notwithstanding when he saw the warre begun againe betweene this King and the Athenians, wherein he was offered a great charge, hee chose rather to hasten his death by a poyson which hee tooke, than to seeme to be pricked or prouoked with malice against his vngratefull countrymen, lest thereby he should obscure and blot the glory of so many goodly exploits, triumphes and victories which hee had obtained. Now if death cannot stop the course of vertue, how much lesse can any other weaker accidents doe it? Old age, which diminisheth and consumeth all the strength of the body, could not weaken the great vertue of Agefilans king of Lacedemonia, who being fourescore yeares of age, and seeing the glory of his country brought to nothing by that victory, which the Thebanes had obtained against him, withdrew himselfe into the seruice of a king of Egypt, and tooke the charge of a captaine vnder him, that through the good seruice he should do him, hee might deserue (whereof he assured himselfe) to haue succour of him for his owne country affayres. Enuy (saith Thucydides) is hard to be overcome, and followeth great estates and potentates. Honor, glory and riches, are but firebrandsto kindle it. Notwithstanding the excellency of vertue oftentimes triumpheth ouer it, so that the enuious are constrained to speake well of vertuous men. We see then clearely, and haue better experience thereof in our selues, if we be decked with vertue, that shee is of an inuincible force, and that all things are tamed by her. For who can doubt that through her, great Empires, Monarchies, common-wealths, estates and Cities haue much more flourished, than through force and might of armes? The sequelle of our discourses shall furnish vs with examples hereof. Now to conclude our present matter, knowing that vertue deserueth so great prayse in regard of her fruits, and of her wonderfull great effects, we say, that shee is the onely good both for honesty, profit and pleasure, between which there is such a conjunction, that they cannot be separated one from another, (as hereafter we may intreat more at large) so that the seuering of these three thingsto attribute them to other earthly and perishing goods, is the fountaine of all vice, deceit and mischief. If then, trouble, losse, hazard or danger are to bee found in the practise and exercise of this holy and sacred vertue (as even the greatest worldly happines is counterpoyfed with euill and difficulty) ought we not to despise all such things, yea death it selfe for that happy recompence, which is assured vnto vs, not onely of immortal glory and prayse (which the men of old time promised to themselves) but also of life everlasting, whereof the most of them were ignorant? Let vs not bee like to a little childe (for hee that is a childe in mind differeth nothing from a child in age) who seeing a trifle wherewith hee playeth, taken out of his hand, casteth away for anger that which hee holdeth in his other hand, although it bee some dainty thing, and good to eate. But let vs with seruent zeale, and burning affection, alwayes embrace this so precious and chaste beauty, I meane vertue, which alone filleth the life of man with true, sound, and perfect contentation. Let all thinges

The feare of death doth not astonish the vertuous Callicratides.

Themistocles loue to his Country.

Age hath no power ouer vertue. Agefilans.

Vertue causeth King- domes to flourish.

Verity is the onely honest, profitable and pleasant good

Anacharsis
forsooke a kingdome
that he might
the better ob-
taine vertue.
Three things
necessarie for the obtaining
of vertue.

come behind vertue, after the example of so many excellent and auncient personages, who ought to make vs blush for shame, when we consider, that the care of earthly goods hath the first place amongst vs. Anacharsis a Barbarian, being led with the onely loue of vertue, left the kingdome of Sythia to his yonger brother, and went into Græcia, where he profited so well with Solon, that he deserued to be placed in the number of the seauen Sages. Now if three things (after we haue asked them of him who onely can, and will giue them vnto vs) meeete together in vs, namely, Nature, Reason, and Vse, we may by them, being directed, illuminated, and guided by the Spirit of God, attaine to the top of humane perfection in this rich vertue, which being thus grounded (like to a strong and liuely plant) will take sure footing and roote within vs. If she meeete with a good and well disposed nature, that is able to endure labour, and that is tilled by reason with the precepts of Philosophy, whereby it is made firme, mighty, and fruitfull, then vse and exercise will bring forth the fruits thereof, as well for our owne, as for the common profit of men.

of Vice. Chap. 6.

The knowledge of goodnes must go before the loue of it.

ACHITOB. AS he that is ignorant of goodnes cannot loue it, or boast (except it be fallly, that he seeketh after it, and if he should finde it, yet he could not acknowledge it, or reape any profit thereby; so he that knoweth not euill, can neuer hate it sufficiently, much lesse shun it, or keepe himselfe from falling into the snares and ambushes thereof, where it lieth in continuall watch to surprise and ouertake men. Yee shall haue very few, but will say, that they are enemies to euill, and that they labour to driue it as farre from them as they can. But what? As they neuer knew what goodnesse meant, so they know as little of the contrary. Now hauing by our last speech declared sufficiently, that vertue is the onely true good of the soule, it is out of question, that vice, which is altogether contrary vnto it, is the onely euill thereof, and the fountaine of all the miseries of man, as well earthly as eternall. Which, that we may more surely auoid, and marke better the excellency and beauty of vertue, by the loathsomnes and deformity of vice (because contraries set one by another, as blacke neere to white, shew themselves a great deale better) I thinke it will not be to wander besides the matter, if we bestow the rest of our mornings worke in the handling thereof.

Vice is the onely euill of the soule.

What we ought to call
euill.

A SER. There is no euill in man (as the philosophers say) but vice, if we take that for euill which is offensive. Neither doth any thing offend and make a man worse, but that which endamageth his soule. And in this manner vice onely and sin is hurtfull vnto him, yea (as Plutarke saith) is sufficient of it selfe to make a man miserable.

Vertue is the
health, and vice the sick-nes of the
soule.

A MANA. As vertue (saith Plato) is the health and forceable vigor of the soule, so vice is the sicknesse and imbecillity thereof, which hauing gotten a habite, maketh a man vicious and corrupt. For it is certaine that if men had sufficient force and constancy to resist vice (which we haue by inheritance) they would follow after vertue. But being overcome by the loosenesse of their sensuality they are led captiues, as it were in a triumph, vnder the yoke of sin. Let vs then barken to ARAM, who I thinke, will not forget to paint out vnto vs this pernicious Hydra with all her colours, that she may be so much the more odious vnto vs.

Vice like a dropfie.

ARAM. I haue alwaies learned of wise men, that this saying of an auncient man is most true. That there is an hundred times more paine in doing euill, than in well doing: and that vice hath the same effect in the soule, which the dropfie hath in the bodie. For both of them do plant in man a continuall desire of that which breedeth his greatest bane. Whereupon most miserably he seeketh after his owne perdition and ruine with paine and trauell, whereas he might passe through felicitie in this life, into that life which is eternall and most happie. One chiefe occasion hereof, as I thinke, may be attributed to the ignorance of euill. For what wicked man is so dull of vnderstanding, that if he knew certainly what vice were, would not with all his might separate himselfe as far from it, as for the time he drew neere vnto it? By a stronger reason it followeth, that he which truly knoweth it, before it be growne to a habite within him, will shun it more diligently: because we begin then to hate vices (as Plutarke saith) when by reason we vnderstand what shame and harme commeth of them. Therefore it must needs bee very profitable for vs to vtter herein that which we haue learned by the study of Philosophie, and that briefly for this present, hoping hereafter to intreate more particularly of the principall parts of vice. First wee will define it; then consider the pernicious effects thereof in the soule, and the fruits which it bringeth with it: thirdly, declare how it neuer escapeth unpunished: and lastly shew how we must fortifie our selues against the priuie watchings

When we begin to hate
vice.

watchings and snares of such a dangerous and mighty enemy. Vice is an inequality and iarring of manners, proceeding from mans naturall inclination to pleasures and naughty desires. This inclination not being reined with the bit of reason, guided by the Spirit of grace, nor ruled by the wise declarations thereof, causeth a man by little and little to give over himselfe to all wicked passions (the end of one being the beginning of another) whereby he becometh most vnhappy, yea more wilde and sauage than any brute beast. Chrysippus a Stoicke Philosopher, called vice the proper essence of vnhappinesse. And surely it is a very perfect workemaster of wretchednes, disposing and framing men to all kind of mischief and misery. For after it hath once taken holde of the soule, it will neuer forsake it vntill it hath wholly bruised, ouerwhelmed, and destroyed it, filling it daily with perturbations and new passions, with voluptuousnesse, rancor, enimities, reuenge, murders, anguish, feare, fruitlesse repentance, ambition, couetousnesse, and with all other lusts, which are incurable diseases of the soule, after they haue once taken roote therein. For the more they waxe, the more they will grow, vice being (as Plato saith) of an infinite and endlesse race. And therefore the aboue named Chrysippus said not without reason, that to auoide so dangerous an enemy, and one that ought to be so odious vnto vs, it were better for vs to cast our selues headlong into the sea, than to suffer it to reigne ouer vs. Plato also writeth, that it is farre better for a man not to liue at all, than to liue wickedly, or in ignorance. For such a life can haue no fitter name, than to be called a true shadow of death, I meane of eternall death, which followeth the wicked euen at the heeles. Bias one of the Sages said, That no man might iustly be termed a captiue, although he were loden with irons, except also he were compassed about with vices. Moreover, we see that neither sword nor fire doth carry away a man so violently as vice doth. Many haue suffered a thousand outrages and punishments with such constancie, that tyrants were sooner wearie of persecuting them, than they of suffering. Besides, they had so great power ouer themselves, that in the midst of torments they were able to stay their voice altogether: in so much that one would haue either iudged them to be senselesse, or else thinke that in seeing them he did not see them. But vice alwaies discouereth it selfe, and euery where appeareth shamefull, infamous, and hurtfull. Thales called vice the hurtfullest thing in the world, because that where it is, it marreth and destroyeth all. Moreover, it maketh those things, which otherwise seeme honourable and magnificall, loathsome and vnpleasant, when it is mingled with them: yea it appeareth so much the more infamous, as the nobilitie and authoritie whereunto it is ioyned is greater, because then it discouereth better what pernicious and damnable effects it hath. For taking a swift course by the high way of power, and driving forward euery wicked affection to execution, it causeth choler to be turned presently into murder, loue into adulterie, couetousnesse into confiscation, and so in other passions. But as the vices of the greater sort are more dangerous, so no doubt, shame and dishonour are likewise doubled vpon them, because they are better seene and noted, whereby they become more odious and contemptible to euery one. Besides, they reward lyeth at their gate in great measure, which will not belong from them. For to whom more is giuen, of him more shall bee required. And I pray you what greater cause of shame and blushing can man haue, who being borne to commaund men of all estates and conditions, doth himselfe obey such vile and abiect things, as are sensuality, ignorance, concupiscence, and other like passions wrought by vice, which being without reason, are made to obey, and to be ruled by reason? Neyther are we more to be excused than the greater sort, when wee follow after such things, because we are but of meane and small calling. For euery one is borne to commaund himselfe, whereunto our chiefe study and labour ought to tend. We haue further to note diligently, that vice is not onely hurtfull to him that is infected therewith, but also that it vseth him as a minister and instrument to corrupt and spoyle others. For you shall neuer see any wicked man, that laboureth not to make others like himselfe: which if he cannot doe, yet he will so thinke of them, and seeke to perswade all others, that they are such, or rather worse than himselfe. Whereby it is easie ynough to iudge, that this is that, which vadoeth and destroyeth Communalities & Commonwealths, Townes and Cities, when the Gouvernours and Magistrates of them are ministers of vices. The change of Monarches, Estates and Kingdomes proceeded alwaies of vice. Reboam through want of prudence, Sardanapalus through intemperancy & luxurioufnes, the last French king of the race of Clouis through retchlesnes, Perses of Macedonia through rashnes, with infinit others, whose exâples we shal see hereafter, lost their kingdoms through vices. But that we may yet haue greater occasion to hate this horrible monster of nature, let vs

The definition of vice.

The effects of vice.

Vice is of an endlesse stocke.

Although we are to hate vice with a perfect hatred, yet wee must not kill our selues to be rid of it.

The vicious man onely is a captiue.

Nothing more hurtfull than vice.

Vice ioyned with authoritie is more hurtfull.

A good lesson for great men

The property of the wicked.

The alteration of kingdoms cometh of vice.

Offences are neuer without paine.

How a man
may haue continually quietnesse.

The force of conscience in the wicked.
Leuit. 26. 36.

Esay 66. 24.

Examples of tormented consciences in the wicked.

A wise man is ashamed to offend before himselfe.

Why God
deferreth his vengeance
vpon the wicked.

Custome in finning is dangerous.

that vice chastiseth it selfe, Which is not done onely by mans law, out of which the mightier sort (as Anacharsis sayd) escape as great flies that breake through the Spiders web, the punishment also of which may oftentimes be auoyded for a time, but euen the paine followeth the offence so neare, that it is equall vnto it both for age and time. For from that very instant, wherein wickednesse is committed; she frameth for, and of herselfe her owne torment, and beginneth to suffer the paine of her mischieuous deed, through the remorsse thereof. This is that worme that continually gnaweth the conscience of a malefactor, and accompanieth his miserable life with shame and confusion, with frights, perturbations, anguish, and continuall disquietnesse, euen to his very dreames, so that all his life time hee is destitute of all tranquillity, and rest of spirit, wherein onely humane felicity consisteth. And therefore one of the Hebrew Interpreters well and truly answered King Ptoleme, who asked him how he might be in rest when hee dreamed: Let piety (quoth this Wiseman vnto him) be the scope of all thy sayings and doings. For by applying all thy discourses and workes to excellent things, whether thou sleepest or wakest, thou shalt haue quiet rest in regard of thy selfe. Truly that man feareth nothing, whose soule being free from all notorious crimes, followeth the will of God, who directeth all counsell to good. But (as Plato sayth) there is nothing that maketh a man so fearefull, as the remembrance of his life passed in shame. Yea presently after the offence (sayth Iustin Martyr) the conscience of a wicked man is vnto him in stead of an accuser, a witnesse, a iudge, and a hangman. This is that, which the Scripture teacheth vs in Leuiticus, saying, That the wicked shall tremble at the fall of the leafe of a tree, and that they shall be as if their life hung by a thread. We ought to be perswaded that this violence of mans conscience commeth from God, who causeth his enemies to feele his iudgement and fury in such sort, that they cannot abide it, but are constrained to condemne themselves. And if our heart condemne vs, God is greater than our heart. Now although the Word should wholly fayle in this, yet we haue the testimony of nature imprinted with such characters in our hearts, that it did euen compell the ancient Poets to finde out and faigne Furies, as reuengers of our sinnes, which are nothing else but the torments of euill consciences. This is that worme whereof Esay speaketh, which dyeth not, but gnaweth and deuoureth them without ceasing. Caligula, a most cruell Emperour, neuer had secure and quiet rest, but being terrified and in feare, awoke often, as one that was vexed and carried headlong with wonderfull passions. Nero, after he had killed his mother, confessed that whilest he slept, he was troubled by her, and tormented with Furies, that burned him with flaming torches. Let vs not then suppose that, although a wicked act may be hidden, and kept close from men, therefore the torment is the lesse, (which a Wise man neuer thinketh of, knowing that hee ought to bee in more reuerence of himselfe than of others) but rather more grievous within vs, not for the onely feare of worldly shame or punishment, but for the apprehension of the iust iudgement of God, from whom nothing is hid. He pursueth the wicked hard at the heeles for the most part, and knoweth how to take vengeance of their iniquity in due time. And if he defer the punishment, it serueth but to aggrauate their condemnation so much the more vpon their heads, and to make the punishment more horrible, whereof wee ought to stand in greater feare than of any bodily paine, because the dolor thereof abideth for ever. He that would goe about to repeate here severally all those vices wherewith men may bee infected, and wherein wee see them commonly wallow, should finde their number very great, yea infinite. But (as Democritus sayde) let vs onely lay open that which is within vs, and we shall finde there a heape and conserue of many, diuers, and different euils, which haue their originall beginning from thence. For as shadowes follow bodies, so passions and vices follow soules. Hereafter we may discourse more particularly of the greater part of them, and of their proper and peculiar effects, with that iust punishment, which commonly followed them. In the meane time we may learn this, that if custome be of so great force, that (as we say) it ouercommeth nature, it is chiefly to be seene in vice and dissolutenes which is a gulfe wherein a man may very easily cast himselfe headlong; but it is a very difficult matter, yea vnpowable to withdraw himselfe againe. And (as a wise Romane said) most horrible & execrable offences through vse and custome are made small faults, & are commonly practised. For it is the property of vice to be headstrong and contentious, seeking to defend it selfe by reasons, which although they be altogether vaine and iriuolous, yet of great weight in regard of the weak flesh of man, which easily suffereth it selfe to bee bound vnder the yoke of sinne. Therefore we are to take good heed, that we suffer not our selues to bee surprised by so dangerous an enemy, nor giue him any accessse or entrance into vs: I meane that he should not dwell dwell in vs (for otherwise we know that perfect righteousness is in God onely) but rather let vs exercise all those things that are contrary to vice, accustoming our selues in such sort to maister our common and small imperfections (which are but too abundant in the iustest men) that they take no effect, howsoever of themselves they may seeme excusable. By this meanes we shall labour euermore to make choise of the best in all indifferent things: which will stand vs in stead of a sure rampire against the tyrannicall reigne of this enemy to vertue.

 We reade of Pythagoras, that he accustomed himselfe to abstaine from crueltie and iniustice
 euen towards brute beasts, by requesting fowlers, after they had taken birds to let them flie againe. And when hee came amongst fisher-men hee bought their draughts, and after caused all the fish to be cast againe into the sea. Moreouer, he forbade all his disciples to kill a tame beast at any time. After his example let vs abstaine from all things that may procure vice, an neuer suffer such speeches, as these to passe from vs: What good will this doe if that bee wanting? Now I will deale in this manner, another time I will doe better. O how slippery are such waies, how easily doth vice glide away like a streame vnder such pretences? For as a wedge maketh but a small clift in the beginning, yet afterward the rift being greater, sundreth all in peeces: so the sufferance of vnlawfull things how small soeuer it be, leadeth men by little and little to an vnmeasurable licentiousnes. Moreouer, who can assure himselfe of to morrow, yea of a quarter of an houre? The oracle of Apollo answered those of Cyrrha, that if they would liue in peace among themselves, they should make continual warre with their neighbours strangers. So, that we may passe the course of our short daies in peace, rest and tran-quillicie of spirit, and that we fall not into the cruell pawe of this aduersary to all goodnes, we must daily fight against him, and neuer giue eare to his heralds and ambassadors of peace which are pleasures, neglect of duty, and such other baits, which he presenteth to vs, to deceive and beguile vs withall. It is most certaine, that vice putteth on a vizard, and goeth disguised and couered with goodly shewes that belong onely to vertue, and chalengech falsely vnto it selfe those goods, which indeede and in truth man ought to desire: And being thus cloathed with the helpe of corruptible pleasures that lightly passe away, it yoketh bale-minded men, whose care is onely set vpon the desire of earthly things which it setteth before their eies as their felicity, impudently imputing to vertue all those evils that are in it selfe. But they haue sufficiently profited in Philosophy through the knowledge of that which is good, and of such things as are truly faire and beautifull, neuer hearken to such hurtfull allurements, but rather do as the serpent doth, that stoppeth her eares with her taile, to the end she may not heare the charmes and forceries of the inchanter. But if through the neglect of all good admonition, wee giue place amongst vs neuer so little to the baits of vice, they may easily in the end (as thornes and thistles growing neare to good feede, doe oftentimes choke it) darken al that good instinct of nature that shal be in vs, Diogenes the Cynique, walking one day through that streer in Athens, wherein there were many images of such ancient men, as had best deserved of the Common-wealth, asked his almes of them all one after another. Whereat some maruelling and demanding of him the cause why: I learne (quoth he to them) to take deniall patiently: euen so when we can so farre command our selues, as to shunne all vaine and vnprofitable businesse, wherein this age delighteth, and which serue but for allurements and baits to nicenesse and pleasure, let vs not bee ashamed not to follow them; but rather let vs say, that we learne to contemne that which is contemptible, and to make choise (according to that ancient precept of Pythagoras) of the best kinde of life that is, to the end, that custome may by little and little make it easie and pleasant vnto vs. To conclude therefore our present matter, we say that vice, being inseparably accompanied with a thousand miseries, and with vnspeakable and exceeding mischiefes, which draw man into vt-ter ruine and eternall perdition, may bee truly called the onely euill of the soule, as that which of it selfe is able and sufficient to make him vnhappy, who receiuech it for a ghest. And as such a hurtfull thing, we ought to hate and flie from it, by the meanes of vertue that is contrary vnto it, labouring by all meanes to haue our soules pure and cleane from all wicked deeds, wils, and counsels, and our manners vndefiled, not being troubled or infected with any euill perturbation, wherewith vice alwaies aboundeth and is rich.

How we should fortifie our selues against vice.

The humanity of Pythagoras euen towards brute
beasts.

An excellent
comparison
teaching vs
not to suffer
any vnlawful
thing.

We must neuer harken to the heralds of vice.

How vice deceiuech men.

The prudēce
of the serpēte

Why Diogenes asked his almes of images.

Of Sciences, of the study of Letters, and of Histories. Chap. 7.

A R A M. IT is a vsuall speech in the mouthes of men altogether ignorant of the beautie and profite of Sciences, That the studie of Letters is a bottomlesse gulfe, and so long
 and

The speeches of ignorant
men touching the study of sciences.

Why many fathers set not their children
to schoole.

Man is created to understand & to do

The benefits which come by knowledge

The proper
worke of the spirit of man

and unease a iourney, that they which thinke to finish it, ofrentimes stay in the midway, and many beeing come to the end thereof finde their minds so confused with their profound and curious skill, that in stead of tranquillie of soule, which they thought to finde, they haue increased the trouble of their spirit. Vnder this goodly pretence, the most part say, that it is better not to know much, yea nothing at all: attributing the cause of mans imperfection vnto science. Being thus perswaded, if they haue alreadie any beginning and entring in learning, they draw backe, and seeke to hinder and to turne others aside from following them. For this cause many fathers set not their children to learning, or else because they finde this way of preferment too long and costly, and haue other more short and profitable meanes now a daies whereby to enrich them. But both the one and the other are greatly to be condemned, because wee are to spare no labour and travell, that we may get the treasures of the soule indued with reason, which are sciences, wherein all humane felicitie consisteth, and which neuer breed vexation of spirit. But all wits are not fit and apt to comprehend and conceive them. Neither doth the corruption of our nature better appeare, than in this, that wee loue rather to enrich our selues and our children with wicked and perishing goods, than with true, certaine and immortall goods, the happie knowledge whereof sciences and arts doe bring vnto vs. Now hauing through the grace of God receiued this benefite by your liberalitie (most honourable fathers) as to haue beene instructed in the best and most necessary points of knowledge, we thought it would not be tedious vnto you to heare vs discourse, that we might stirre vp the memories of our studies, and that the beauty and commoditie of sciences might worke in our affections a liking and desire to continue and to finish them.

A CHITOB. Man (saith Aristotle) was created to vnderstand and to do. For it is necessary that instruction goe before working. Knowledge begetteth iudgement, and by iudgement men execute all good and vertuous actions. Whereupon it followeth, that the studie of letters is rich, and vndoubtedly giueth vs the knowledge of things. Moreouer, nothing may bee compared to sciences, which comfort vs in our life time, and cause vs to liue after death.

A SER. O science (saith Plato) how would men loue thee if thou wert knowne? Fire and aire are not more necessary for life, than is the art and rule of good liuing, which is shewed vnto vs by learning. And as health is the conseruation of the body, so is doctrine the safegard of the soule. But we are to vnderstand more amply of thee (A M A N A) what is the greatnesse & beauty of sciences.

A M A N A. Whatsoeuer is profitable, not only for a house and familie, for a city and nation, but generally for all mankind, may well be accounted deare, pretious and wonderfull, and as so excellent a thing, ought to be bought with all that a man hath: especially if it be the true substance of all happinesse and felicitie, and the efficient cause of prudence; which is an excellent guide for mens actions to make them worthy of an immortalitie. What can one desire more than profite, pleasure and honour, which are those things wherewith all men are commonly led? The treasure of Arabia and India may well bring some pleasure to man, but yet alwaies vnperfect: seeing all riches is of it selfe blinde, and bringeth no light to the soule, but receiueh her brightnesse from the soule when it is framed according to vertue. Great and proud armies may by notable victories procure to themselves renowne and glory, but blame worthy: a title of honour, but forced and vniust, if their enterprises are not grounded vpon equitie and iustice. The merchant sailing on large and terrible seas, may reape profit by his trafficke, but bought with the perill of his life, and hazard of his certaine patrimony. Neither can this be done, except he haue first laide a good ground of his voyage vpon a sure discourse of reason, and vpon the direction of a good and wise pilot. Now of all these things, thus poore of themselves, and begging all their ornaments elsewhere, what certaine ioy, true honour or great profite may a man challenge to himselfe, and not rather looke for a sudden change of them into a worse estate than they were in before, through the inconstancie and vncertaintie of mans nature? Where then shall wee seeke for these great and rare properties, to finde that which of it selfe will be vnto vs profitable, pleasant, and honourable altogether, and that not for an instant, but for ever? Truly in science or knowledge, which first is able to mollifie mans nature, beeing before sauage and wilde, and to make it capable of reason: secondly, frameth and fetleth his iudgement, that hee may passe the course of his daies in all tranquillie of minde to the perfit of many: lastly, causeth him to die in honour, with certaine assurance of eternall life and happinesse. It is knowledge that maketh man prudent, (for doctrine bringeth forth prudence) and worketh vnspeakable pleasure in his soule. For the searching out of the truth is the proper worke and perfection of the spirit, neither doth

doth any delight come neare to that which a man taketh in learning. It is science which guideth mens iudgements, whereby their chiefest deliberations and counsels are executed, as well in feates of warre, as in the establishment and preservation of lawes, kingdomes, monarchies, commonwealths, cities and peoples: likewise in the regiment and government of all worldly affaires, either generall or particular, which are wel or ill guided, according as he that manageth or governeth them is instructed. To this purpose Seneca said, that they, who being destitute of knowledge, did learne onely by experience to governe publike affaires, although they were borne with a diuine and happy spirit, yet both late, and to the detriment of their common-wealth, they would in the end become good gouernours of the people: As contrariwise, they that should come thereunto being guarded with the precepts of knowledge, (so they carried a good mind) would quickly and without paine become worthy of their charge. O wisdom (saith Cicero) the guide of our life, the onely cause of vertue, and enemy to vice, what should, not we onely, but even all the life of men be without thee? Thou hast builded townes: thou hast gathered together dispersed and wandring men, that they might liue in a society of life, and in common friendship. Thou compelledst them to come together, first by keeping all in a house and by marriage: then by the common vse of words & speech. Thou hast bene the inventresse of lawes, and the mistres of manners and discipline. We haue no recourse but to thee in our afflictions: we craue aide and succour of thee: we put our selues wholly into thine armes. Truly one day well and iustly spent according to thy holy precepts, is to be preferred before an immortality of time consumed in wickednesse and vice. With what riches shal we furnish our selues rather than with thine, which hast liberally giuen vs the meanes to obtaine tranquility in this life, and hast taken from vs all feare and terror of death? Briefely, we may be assured, that science is the onely diuine and immortall quality in vs, and that infallible rule, which bringeth both peace and warre to their perfect proportion: without which whosoever goeth about to frame any glorious or happy building, doth as much as if he should vndertake to saile in the middelt of the sea without a rudder, or walke through vnknowne places without a guide. Now the ancients knowing the greatness and difficultie of knowledge, and that it cannot be obtained (as it falleth out in al great matters) without great paine and trauell, that their labour might become profitable vnto vs, they, I say, who had spent their life with sweating, in seeking out the secrets of nature, and were desirous to ease mans study, who otherwise is inclined from his youth to pleasure and rest, haue diuided science for vs into diuers parts. Which they did to this ende, that step by steppe, according to the nicenesse of our spirits (even as our bodies are first nourished with milke, and then with stronger meates) we might finde therein apt and conceiueable foode, and in the end be made partakers of the secrets of perfect wisdom, euery one according to his capacity and neede expecting the full vnderstanding thereof in the immortalitie of that second and most happy life. First then all arts and sciences handled by reason, were diuided into three principal kindes: into Philosophie, Rhetorike and Mathematike. Afterwards, each of these sciences was diuided into three other parts and kindes, Philosophie into Morall, Logicall, and Physicall or Naturall. Rhetorike, into Demonstratiue, Deliberatiue and Iudiciall. Mathematike, into Arithmetike, Musike, and Geometrie. Since that, for greater facilitie, and that it might be more easie to learne, all humane philosophie hath bene reduced into art, as we haue it at this day, from whence the name of liberall arts came, because they are worthy and befitting a freeman. Their names are these, Grammer which is the entrance and beginning of all knowledge; Rhetorike, which is the art of fine speaking, and of perswading: Dialectike or Logike, which is to learne the truth of all things by disputation; Phisicke, which is the study of naturall things: Metaphysike, which is of supernaturall things: Mathematike, which hath many members, whereof Arithmetike is the first, which is the science of numbers, and the foundation of all the other parts of Mathematike, without which science of Arithmetike, Plato denied that any man could bee either a Philosopher or a capitaine generall. Next to that is Geometrie that is to say, the art of measuring the ground, very necessary likewise for a capitaine, and for many other martiall affaires. Then followeth Cosmographie and Geographie, to know the situation of the whole world, even from the tower of the highest heaven, called the first Moouer, vnto the center of the earth, and likewise of the diuers regions thereof, with their particular temperatures. After that is Astronomie, the science that teacheth vs to know the course of the stars and planets, which thing practise onely might teach vs, I meane so much as is necessarie for vs, as our first fathers were a long time content therewith, vntill the curiositie of men inuented these names,

It is long ere men without knowledge
become good magistrates.

The praise of Wisdom

The diuision
of sciences.

Grammer Rhetoricke.

Logike Phyicke.

Metaphysike Mathematik
and the parts thereof as Arithmetike.

Geometrie.

Cosmogra-
phy.
Geography.

Astronomie
of Mathematiks.

Poetrie.

Those sciences are first to be learned that are most necessarie.

What kind of knowledge is especially required in a Philosopher.

Anacharsis letter to Cræsus touching the studies of Græcia.

The praise and profit of historie.

of Saturne Mars, and others, attributing natures vnto them according to their imaginations and also ouer our bodies: yea those things that shall perish and are without life, are said to haue power ouer our immortall soules. And from thence proceeded iudiciall Astronomie, wherewith so many good wits are deceived, and of which so many abuses haue their beginning. Next, Musicke is set downe also for a member of the Mathematiks, as beeing a science drawne from numbers, because that by them harmonicall proportion was found. Lastly, followeth Poetry, which is attributed to Musicke. In this short discourse the wonderfull greatness of science appeareth sufficiently, as also how hard, yea vnpossible it is, to attaine to the perfection thereof through the sound knowledge of all the parts thereof. Wherefore we are first to seeke after those that are most necessary, and then to desire a meane vnderstanding of them all according to the gifts and graces of God bestowed on our soules. But aboue all things we must shunn that idlenes rechelesnes which is in many, who by reason of the difficulty, which they heare say is in sciences, and distrusting themselves for euer comming neere the skill of so many good wits, as haue gone before them, remaine as buried in ignorance, and vnprofitable amongst men. The greatnes of Alexander staied not his successors from trying the issue and euent of all sorts of noble enterprises. And the wonderfull knowledge of Plato could not keepe Aristotle from handling Philosophy as he thought good. He that distrusteth his wit and the inuention thereof, sheweth himselfe too vngratefull. For it seemeth he will condemne nature the mother of all things, as though shee had put her all gifts and graces in some men, and euer after purposed to be idle and barren, hauing no more strength to bring forth any thing worthy commendatio. We must not therefore in this sort be discouraged in the searching out of euery good discipline, knowing that those things also, which draw neere to perfection are great. But yet for the chiefe part of all our studies, let vs take Morall Philosophie, whereof wee haue already discoursed: that wee may frame our manners according to vertue, and leade and direct our soules to the ende, which we desire, even to liue well and happily. So let vs practise that diuine saying of Plato speaking by the mouth of Socrates, that More vertue & and pietie is required of a Philosopher than knowledge: and that all science, which is to be required in him, is, that aboue all things he worship and reuerence God the onely true master of wisdom, and author of whatsoever may bee knowne: and that hee endeauour to separate his soule from his body, as much as may bee, by contemning pleasures, ambition, vaine-glory, and riches, that so he may lay hold of the treasures of immortall life. This wee may learne by reading bookes and writings, which are the instruments of wisdom, and are left vnto vs by learned men for a rule and for instruction. By the study hereof wee shall attaine to that knowledge of the true and perfect good of man, which consisteth in vertue and verity, the onely nourishment, rest and tranquillitie of the minde. But will we know further what profit we may receiue by the doctrine of auncient men? Let vs onely reade that which Anacharsis wrote to Cræsus king of Lidia. Know (quoth he to him) that in the studies of Græcia we learne, not to commaund, but first to obey: not to speake, but to keepe silence: not to resist, but to humble our selues: not to get much, but to content our selues with a little: not to reuenge our harmes, but to pardon iniuries: not to take from others, but to giue our owne: not to take care to be honoured, but to labour to be vertuous. Lastly, wee learne to dispise that which others loue, and to loue that which others dispise, that is pouerty. Behold the faire fruits of science, and of the study of these auncient Sages, to which no treasures of worldly riches are in any sort comparable, and which we ought to desire aboue all things. Moreover, by this study of letters, we shall be taught to searce out diligently the vnderstanding of histories, which are the treasure of things past, the patterne of those that are to come, the picture of mans life, the touch-stone of our doing, the worke-master of our honour, and as Cicero calleth them, the witnesse of times, the light of truth, the life of memory, the mistresse of life, and the messenger of antiquity. Histories canse vs to behold that without danger, which so many millions of men haue tryed with the losse of their liues, honour and goods, that we may be made wise by their perill, and stirred vp to follow the vertue of others, which hath brought them to the toppe of all felicity and glory. Now if we thinkero learne by our owne experience these excellent instructions which wee may draw out of histories, in steade of so rare treasures we shall know but fewe things, and those with losse and perill amongst a thousand aduersities, from which the vnderstanding of that which is past, saueeth and deliue- reth vs. Prudenee gotten by experience is too perillous, and so long a comming, that very often a man dieth before he haue obtained it, so that he had neede of a second life to imploy about it. But we must hasten it forward by the searching out of things, which haue come to passe passe both before and since our time, in the study both of Philosophy, which is rich and plentiful in worthy examples, and also of histories, which are a singular gift of God, whereby he would haue his wonderfull workes continued in the memory of men. For this cause Zeno, being demanded how a man might become happy, answered, if he drew neere vnto and haunted the dead: meaning thereby, if he read histories, and endeauoured to learne their good instructions that haue gone before vs. Ptolomie also asking one of the wise interpreters, wherein a king ought to exercise himselfe: In the knowledge (quoth hee) of things which haue beene done, and in reading bookes of things which daily offer themselves, or which are fit for present affaires, and lastly, in searching out whatsoeuer is written for the preservation of kingdomes and correction of manners. And truely they that are exercised in the vnderstanding of histories, although they bee but yong, yet in knowledge of worldly matters they become like to the aged and gray-headed: as contrariwise they that are ignorant of things done and past before their being, remaine alwaies children, & even within their owne country where they were borne, they are in the same estate in respect of knowledge that forerunners are. If we yet desire more testimonies from amongst the ancients, of the honour, loue, zeale, and ardent affection, which they bare towards the study of good letters, and how the chiefe glory of all their heroicall and noble acts doth of duty belong to science, wee reade of Philip king of Macedonia, that when Alexander was borne to him, hee gaue thanks to God, not so much because he had this sonne, as because he was borne in the time of so wise a Philosopher as Aristotle was, whom he made his schoolemaster. Of him Alexander learned many goodly sciences, as well in Philosophie as in Physikes, and namely, those Acroamaticall sciences, that is, speculative, and such as could not bee learned but by hearing a teacher. Of which Sciences this great Monarch was iealous, and taken with so greedy a desire, that hearing how Aristotle had published certaine bookes, he wrote a letter vnto him in this manner: Alexander sendeth greeting to Aristotle. Thou hast not done well to publish these bookes of speculative sciences: forasmuch as wee shall haue nothing about others, if that which thou hast taught vs priuately come to be published and communicated to all. For I would thou shouldst know, that I loue rather to excell others in the vnderstanding of high and notable things, than in power. How greatly this excellent Prince alwaies loued knowledge, appeareth sufficiently by the exceeding liberality and gifts, wherewith hee honoured the masters and teachers thereof, (as wee may somewhat touch it hereafter) as also in that he alwaies carried Homer's Iliads about him, which vsually he laid vnder his pillow, naming it the nourishment and preseruer of warlike vertue. Cæsar in the midst of his campe had his Commentaries in his bosome, and that time which he spared from fighting, hee bestowed in reading and writing, holding a launce in his left hand, and a pen in the right. We see in these two mighty and sacred Princes, and in infinite other great personages both Greekes and Romanes, the wonderfull effects of knowledge, which conducted them to the toppe of all honour, felicitie, and prosperity. Xenophon, the disciple of Socrates serueth for another witnesse, who being guided by an vnspokeable prudence & providence gotten in the study of Philosophy, brought an armie of a thousand footemen out of Persia into Greece, going over the foords of fiftie riuers, and through the midst of an hundred thousand enemies pursuing him, and yet his array was neuer broken, albeit he fought with them sundry times. Besides, if we are desirous of testimonies of the incredible delight, which the studie of any science worketh in mens soules touched with the zeale of knowledge, we reade of Nicias the painter, how hee tooke such great delight in his workes, that oftentimes he inquired of his seruants whether he had dined or no. Archimedes drawing his Geometricall figures vpon a table, was as it were by force drawne away of his seruants, that he might annoint himselfe with oyle (according to their custome) before he did eate: and during the time of his annointing, he would trace new figures vpon his body. Socrates was seene standing a whole Summers day for the space of foure and twenty houres continually in contemplation and discoursing in his minde: which was when he drew this conclusion out of his thoughts, that There was but one onely God, and that the soule was immortall. The Emperor Charles the fourth going on a day to a Colledge in Praga, to heare the disputations of vertue that were there, remained about foure houres on foote in hearing them. And when his courtiers, to whom he was wearisome, told him that it was time to sup, he answered, that It was no more time for him, and that he had supped. Robert king of Ierusalem and Sicilia, a very learned Prince, was so affectionated to letters, that he oftentimes said, that if he were to lose either his kingdomes or his learning, he would chuse rather to be deprived of them than of knowledge. What greater testimony of loue towards Science can one desire

How a man
may become happy.
Wherein
kings ought
most to exercise themselves.

The saying of Philip at the birth of Alexander.

Alexanders
letter to Aristotle.

His loue to learning.

Iulius Cæsar.

Xenophon.

Nicias.

Archimedes.

Socrates conclusion drawn out of 24.
houres contemplation.
Charles 4.
Robert king
of Sicilia.

desire than that of Ptolomie Philadelphus, that vertuous king of Egypt, who with incredible charges gathered together into his librarie five hundred thousand bookes, and purposely caused seventy and two of the most learned and religious men of Iudea to come and translate the holy Bible out of Hebrw into Greeke? And surely we should bee too vngratefull towards our Princes, if amongst so many famous men we should leaue no place for that great Emperour and king Charlemaine, who was skilfull in the Greeke and Latine tongues, and who in fauour of those toungs, and of the louers of knowledge, erected the vniuersity at Paris, and that at Pavia, according to the patterne of those places of learning which were at Athens. Francis the first, a Prince of most famous memorie, so loued and fauoured letters, and the professors of them, that he deserued the name of the restorer of sciences and good arts, sparing neither care nor meanes to assemble together bookes and volumes of sundry sortes, and of all languages for the beautifying of his so renowned a librarie, which was a worthe monument of such a magnificall Monarke: whose praise-worthy qualities we see reuiued in our king, treading in the selfe same steps. Now to conclude our present discourse, wee learne hereby to despise all earthly goods for the obtayning of knowledge, which of it selfe is truly profitable, delectable, and honorable altogether and whereby we are taught how to liue and die well and happily. And because that arts and sciences consist of many parts, let vs apply our mindes to the study and contemplation of those which together with delight doe also draw vs to that which is our proper and peculiar good, namely, to the knowledge of truth and vertue, which worke in vs alwaies an affection and zeale to follow them, and cause al arts and sciences teaching other things to be esteemed base, mechanicall, and vnseeming good wits. This did Antisthenes giue one to vnderstande, who greatly commended Ismenius for an excellent player on the flute: It is true (quoth he to him) but otherwise he is good for nothing, For else had he not bene so good a minstrell, So, every one applying himselfe to some base and vaine art, produceth for witnesse against himselfe that labour, which he hath bestowed about vnprofitable matters, to prooue that he had bene idle and slothfull in learning honest and profitable things. And for the last fruite and vse of our speech, wee see here what great occasion we haue all our life time to become the disciples of knowledge, which is to high and profound; and to diminish all pride and presumption of our skill, after the example of that wise man Socrates, who although he were the learnedest of his time, and so iudged to be by the Oracle at Delphos, yet alwaies said, that he knew nothing. And when he was demanded any thing, he would neuer answer resolutely, as if he would haue bene beleued, but doubtingly vsed to say, I thinke so, or It may be so. Being therefore desirous to learne with all modellie, let vs endeavor to seeke out more and more by trauell and study, the assurance and knowledge of verity and vertue.

Charlemaine

Francis. i.

Antisthenes
saying touching a flute-plaier.Themodesty of Socrates touching his owne skill.

Of the Spirit, and of Memorie. Chap. 8.

AMA. HAuing now discoursed of the greatnes, beautie, and profit of knowledge. I think that if we were to wish for two helps very necessary for the attaining vnto it, those ought to bee a spirite or minde ready to conceiue, and memorie: firme to retaine: without which two things we shal profit our selues little, and much lesse a great many.

Quicke wits commonly want memory.

ARAM. Those two things, which thou propoundest vnto vs would seeme wonderfull if they were togither. For we commonly see, that they who haue a ready and quickewit, for the most part want memorie; and they that learne with greatest difficultie and paine, do best retaine and keepe that which they haue once learned.

Psal. 102. 26.

ACHITOB. This talke of the spirit, whereunto you attribute the property of comprehending (and yet speake not of the soule) is vndoubtfully worthy of great consideration. For euen when we speake of a young infant we say by and by, that his spirit or wit will grow with his body, and of a crooked old sire, we say that his spirit waxe old with him, which in many we see oftentimes becometh altogether dull and unfit for the ordering and gouernement of affaires. Now that which waxeth old draweth to an end, as the Scripture it selfe teacheth vs, concerning times and seasons, which waxe old like to mens garments, and are to take end. And yet we know that the soule is immortall, and therefore waxeth not old, So that one would thinke, that the soule and spirit are two distinct things, although we see euery where the one taken for the other. But let vs heare ASER discourse of this matter, and so wee shall learne what the spirit is in the soule,

ASER.

Of the spirit, and of Memorie.

35

ASER. As the workes of the diuine power are altogether incomprehensible to the outward sence of man, and very hard to be comprehended by reason guided and conducted by grace from aboue, so we are not to thinke much if the knowledge of a mans selfe, which is most necessary, be so hardly found out by him, seeing his composition farre passeth all the workes of nature, that are visible and subiect to sight. Now if a man cannot know himselfe, how should he hope to comprehend greater matters, which are supernaturall and hidden in the heavens? And who can rightly boast, that he hath the true and perfect vnderstanding of the chiefest part and most powerfull beginning of himselfe, namely of his spirit? Who am I, saide Socrates? Am I a subiect, compounded of soule and body? Or rather a soule, that vseth the body, as a horseman doth a horse? Or, is every one of vs that principall part of the soule, whereby we vnderstand, discourse, and doe, and all the other parts of the body but instruments of this power? Or if there be no proper substance at all of the soule by it selfe, but that it is only a temperature and complexion of the body so framed, that it hath power to vnderstand and to liue; am I not a sauage beast, more crafty, bold and furious then euer was the serpent Typhon? Or else, am I a meeker and simpler creature, partaker of a better estate, and voide of pride? Al the excellentest Philosophers that euer were, handled this selfe same matter as well as Socrates, with incredible trauell and paine, that they may attaine to this knowledge of the noblest part in them, which is the soule and spirit, taking indifferently the one for the other. But first of all this wise Socrates spake excellently of the dignity and immortality of the soule, saying, that in truth the soule is man, and not this mortall masse and linpe of the body, which of it selfe is no more than a simple and base instrument in regard of the most cunning work-man of any art or science. And for this cause gining vp the ghost amongst his disciples, and being asked by Clito where hee would be buried: As for Socrates (quoth he to him) takethou no thought or care. For thou canst not stay him, whose tombe hath bene from all time ready for him. But concerning that which he leaueth here below, it is not worthy to be cared for by him, The greatest thing (saide Periander) that may be said to be contained in a little place, is the soule in a mans body. Empedocles speaking of the generation of the soule saith, that neither blood, nor the vitall spirit congealed haue giuen vnto vs the substance of the soule, and the beginning of life. The body onely is compounded earthly and mortal, But the generation of the soule is heavenly. being sent here below as a passenger, and stranger, or as one that is banished and sent out of his country. Whereupon she continually sigheth, groneth, and as it were drieth away, (like to a good plant translated out of a good plot of ground into a bad) vntill in the end shee returne, and be receiued into her immortall habitation, after she hath changed her present life, which is vnto her but as a vaine illusion of some dreame; in respect of a true, certaine and permanent life. Surely, these philosophicall speculations are not vaine and friuolous, but very necessary to leade vs to that happy end of our being, which we seeke for. For if we be well instructed concerning the great and honourable place and condition, which the soule enioyeth aboue the body, as well in her immortall generation, as in her contemplation and action, as also that of her happines dependeth (as before wee handled it) the felicitie of the whole frame of man, wil we not apply all our principall care, study, and diligence in providing such things for her as she desireth, and which are meete and healthful for her? But we haue further (thanks be giuen to the authour of all good) a second and more perfect vnderstanding of the soule, than had all these notable heathen men, both in respect of the blessed immortality and also of the cause thereof. We know also that so long as she is detained in this mortall prison of the body, and that we are become new creatures by the grace of God, she is diuided into these two parts, the spirit and the flesh, betweene which there is a perpetuall combat. Yea the flesh continually offereth to the spirit a thousand temptations, to delight it withall. For the body and flesh consisting of mortall and corruptible matter, are but a lumpe of sinne, and full of wicked desires, whereas the spirit of it selfe vertuous and good, and of an immortall essence, is of it owne nature enemy to vice and iniquitie: so that being ruled and guided by the Spirit of God, it loueth and desireth eternall happines, and reioyceth in iustice, purity, and holines. And yet the soule is not so freed from the slavery of sinne, but that there remaineth in her many steps of the earthly man, so that she alwaies carrieth about with her the relikes of the flesh, whereby her libertie is so much diminished. This is that fight whereof the true children of God haue daily experience, when they are lifted vpward by the spirit, and by the flesh turned downward: by the spirit they bend with an ardent desire towards immortality, by the flesh they are carried astray into the way of death: by the spirit they think to liue iustly, by

It is very hard for a man to know himselfe.

Socrates opinion concerning man.

The soule is truly man.

Socrates answer touching his buriall.

Periander.

Empedocles. Of the generation of the soule.

The soule is diuided into the spirit and the flesh.

The spirit of the godly both by creation & regeneration is enemy to vice.

The fight betwene the spirit and the flesh.

Rom. 8. 7.
What we are being left to our selues.

The difference
betweene the
soule and the spirit.

The three parts of the spirit.

Of Memorie.

Mithridates.

Frederike.

Genusby.

P Crassus.

flesh they are stirred forward to iniquitie: by the spirit they contemne the world, by the flesh they desire worldly things. But in the end the grace of God causeth the spirit to remaine superior; so that his children walke not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. Whereas if we be left of God to our owne corrupt and peruerse nature, we haue not sufficient strength to resist the temptations of this wicked flesh, but in stead of commanding it, we obey it with shame and confusion. And then accustoming our selues to sin, and to consent to the desires of the flesh, the diuine part of the soule is so weakned, that she hath no more strength or feeling of her essence, which is enemy to vice, but hauing forsaken God, he forsaketh her, and giueth her ouer into the power of carnall desires. So that by this long dwelling in sinne, being as it were altogether dead, she taketh no more counsell of reason, but followeth after detestable vices, and such as are against nature. But on the contrarie side beeing guided by the grace of God, after we haue laboured by fasting, watching and prayer, to resist the vnpure desires of the flesh, all the concupiscences thereof, will at length be so tamed and forced, that the soule shal execute her office in commanding ouer them absolutely, and in choaking them so soone as they shall spring vp. Therefore it commeth from the spirit, that we aspire continually to our last and soueraigne good: that with a singular desire of heart, and with all our affection we study to seeke and finde it out, even with teares and sighes, by reason of those continually impediments, which the flesh laieth before vs in following our course. Moreover, the spirit causeth vs to imploy all our might in the separation of the soule from the body, and in despising pleasure, ambition, vaie-glory, and riches, that we may offer an acceptable present, by yeelding vnto him the soule, which he hath giuen vs. Which thing cannot be done (saith Plato) but by keeping it, as much as may be, purged and cleansed from earthly spots, that shee may be knowne and acknowledged aboue amongst her companions, considering that no defiled thing shall enter into the kingdome of heauen. In this discourse of the soule and of the spirit thus intermingled, I thinke we may here set downe some speciall difference betwixt them, although vndoubtedly the one is taken indifferently for the other, without any absurdity, yea they are one and the same thing. The difference may be made in this sort, if wee say, that the soule is common to all things that haue life, as we vse to say, that all beasts are animated, and haue sensible soules: but that the spirit which is immortall, and capable of reason & knowledge, is proper and peculiar to man onely. And it seemeth that Sophocles would teach vs this distinction, when he saith, that The spirit is the same thing to the soule, which the eye is to the body. Socrates also putting a difference betweene the soule and the spirit, said, that as every seditious man is to be banished out of a well gouerned citie, so a spirit inclined to all mischief is to be remooued from that soule, which we would saue. Or else we may say otherwise (not diuiding any thing) that the spirit is the first and principall part of the soule, wherein the Mind, the Vnderstanding, and the Memory are contained, which are most necessarie for the direction of all good and vertuous actions, and which stand in neede of preseruatiue, nourishing, and exercise, & therefore they are said (not without reason) to increase and decrease in the mind of man. The mind is as a white paper, wherein as a man groweth in age and iudgement, hee writeth his cogitations & thoughts, which the studie of letters and learning do afford him. Vnderstanding is framed by the knowledge of reason, and lastly memorie followeth and preserueth it, being the mother of the Muses, and the treasure of knowledge. Plutarke calleth it the hearing of deafethings, and the sight of the blinde. There is nothing, that serueth so much to beget and preserue learning and knowledge, as memorie doth, wherof we haue many examples among the ancient. We reade of Mithridates king of Pontus, who was a great enemy to the Romans, that he had vnder his dominion two and twenty nations, speaking diuers languages, all which he learned, and answered their ambassadors in their owne tongues. Which thing he could neuer haue comprehended without an excellent and happy memorie, which also was the cause, that Themistocles knew personally and could name all his countrey-men by their proper names. The Emperor Frederike the 11, spake the Greeke, Latine, Hebrew, Arabian, Morisko, Almage, Italian and French tongue. In our time there was an interpreter of Sultan Solymannus, named Genusby, borne in Corfou, endued with the richest memory that euer was. For he spake perfectly, the Greeke tongue, both vulgar and learned, the Turkish, Arabian, Moorish, Tartarian, Persian, Armenian, Hebrew, Russe, Hungarian, Slaucionian, Italian, Spanish, Almage, Latine and French. It is recorded of Publius Crassus, that at one instant hee heard five sundry languages spoken, and answered each of them in the same tongue. Wherby we see that he was endued with an excellent and quicke spirit, apt to conceiue, and with a firme memory, able to retaine them altogether: and this may be seene in many. But the perfection

Of the spirit, and of Memorie.

37

tion of these two great gifts of nature, is a good & sound iudgement, proceeding from pondering, and from a firme discourse of reason lightened by the Spirit of God, and by the same Spirit purged from error, illusion, and all vaine opinions, which are vsuall in man, and hinder him from iudging aright of the truth. But to continue our speech of the wonderfull effects of memorie so much esteemed of Plato, that he writeth, that wee should leaue off to bee men, and become like to the gods, if our memory could retaine and keepe so much as the eyes can reade and see. We must not here forget to make mention of Iulius Caesar, that great Monarch, of whom Historiographers report, that at one time hee caused his Secretaries to write vnto foure seuerall persons of sundrie matters, and that oftentimes he would indight a letter to one of his Secretaries, reade in a booke, and heare another speake all at one time. Seneca rehearsed two thousand sundry names, hauing onely heard them pronounced before, beginning at the last and continuing to the first. By these examples, we see the greatnes of memory, wherby we may easily iudge how profitable it is for the enriching of the minde with all things necessary to the government of mansestate. Yea it is vnto vs a helpe requisite vnto saluation, as that whereby we keepe in remembrance the gifts & graces which we daily receiue from the goodness and fauour of God, to this end that we should not be vngratefull, but yeeld vnto him glory and praise without ceasing. Now because one of you (my companions) touched this, that they which haue a ready and quicke wit, commonly want memory, and that they which hardly learne, retaine and keepe better that which they haue learned, I will giue you this reason with Plutarke, that hardnesse of beleefe seemeth to bee the cause why men comprehend slowly. For it is very eident, that to learne, is to receiue some impression: whereupon it followeth, that they which resist least, are such as soonest beleue. And therefore youth is easier to be perswaded than old folkes, sicke than sound, women than men: and generally the weaker that thing is, which discourseth and doubteth, the easier may a man put and adde vnto it, what he will, as likewise the selfe-same thing is sooner lost and let slippe away. Some others (as Iustine Martyr saith) haue rendred this reason of the quicknesse or slownesse of mans wit, saying, that it commeth of the good or immoderate mixture and temperature of the elements, of which our bodies are compounded and framed, and of the symmetry and proportion of the organically or instrumentally parts ioyned together in him. And surely these seeme to giue vs the true reason thereof. For we see many, who in their beginning and first age shew that they haue prompt and sharpe wit, but when they come to old age are changed, and become slow and dull to conceiue. Which is a great token and argument, that a good or bad complexion and constitution of the body, is the cause of such a disposition, either in quicknesse or slownesse of spirit, as the difference of yeares doth affoord them. Besides, do we not perceiue, that they which haue the head ouer great and ill fauoured, whom wee commonly call great blockheads (because there is not an equall symmetry and moderate proportion betweene that and the other parts of the body) are naturally vnapt to conceiue, and to bring forth any sensible and witty thing? But the resolution of all this speech shall bee, that all gifts of the Spirit are from aboue, and that amongst all sorts of men, there are some found, that are prompt and witty to comprehend great and diuine things, by a specially grace and fauour, which God hath bestowed vpon them. Some by the gift of the holy Ghost haue wisdom, others knowledge and vnderstanding of things, and all giuen to euery one for the profiting both of himselfe and of his neighbour. Knowing therefore by this present discourse, according to the weakenesse of our iudgement, the creation and nature of the spirit, which is the principall and most noble part of vs, and that whereof dependeth and proceedeth all our happinesse, rest and felicity, let vs be carefull and diligent to search it out, and to provide such things as it desireth of vs, as helps to that effect, bestowing all our care, labour and study, to adorne and decke it with righteousnesse and holinesse, according to the holy desire thereof, wherein consisteth life and peace. And let vs beware that we seeke not to feede it with strange meates, which may make it sorrowfull, & with which our flesh aboundeth to her death and destruction. But mortifying all the deadly desires and affections thereof, let vs labour not to walke any more according to the flesh, but according to the spirit; and let vs know that all wearisomnes and tediousnes which troubleth the tranquillity and rest thereof, proceedeth from the want of experience in affaires, from the want of good discoursing, grounded vpon a resolute and settled iudgement, and from the want of skill fitly to apply our selues to present occasions. And this is that which troubleth all sorts and conditions of life, as well rich as poore. But the way to preserue the spirit in rest and quietnesse, is to nourish and exercise it in the study of wisdom, where it learneth reason, which of it selfe can cure it of all sorrow,

From whence iudgement proceedeth.

Iulius Caesar.

Seneca.

A good vse of memorie.

Reasons why quicke wits haue worst memories, & contrariwise

1. Cor. 12.

Rom. 8. 1.

anguish and griefe, through wise discoursing, and worke in it a like inclination and constant behaiour in every alteration of life, causing man to liue happily throughout the whole course of his life, not without the hope and certaine expectation of a blessed immortality.

The end of the second daies worke.

The third daies worke.

Of Dutie and Honesty. Chap. 9.

A SER.

The end of the creation of all things.

What homage we owe to God.

Which is the
chiefe end of our being.

Although all things were created of diuers natures and properties, and many of cleane contraries, yet by an incomprehensible wise- dome the were appointed to refer themselves to one onely certaine and common end, namely, to shew forth the infinite power and greatnes of their work-master, sufficient in the least of his workes with admiration to raiſh man, to whom he hath made all things subiect. But as in him alone the treasures of his heavenly graces haue been without comparison more liberally vnfolded, and that in all fulnesse and bounty, as well in regard of the goods and commodities of this life, which he draweth from heauē, from the earth, from the aire, from the water, from beasts and plants, and generally from all things contained vnder the cope of the firmament, as also in respect of that vnſpeakeable happines and eternall felicity, which by the ſpeciall grace of God is purchaſed & aſſured to him onely in the immortality of the ſecond life, ſo alſo hath God from the beginning vntill this preſent and for euer, reſerued to himſelfe a particular homage, and that not for a time or for certaine yeares of his life, but to continue without intermiſſion from time to time, namely loue teſtified by obedience, which we may comprehend vnder this onely word of Duty, call- ed by the Philoſophers, the wellſpring of all vertuous & laudable actions, and the foundatiō of honeſty. Therefore I propound this matter to you (companions) to be diſcourſed vpon.

AMANA. The duty of a good man conſiſteth in his good behaiour towards the chiefe & onely end of his being compounded of theſe two things, the glory of his creator, and the loue of his neighbour. But the laſt vndoubtedly dependeth of the firſt. For without the feare of God, men will neuer preſerue equity and loue amongſt themſelues: as contrariwiſe the hono- ring of his maiesty teacheth them to liue vprightly one with another.

ARAM. We ought not to aſſure or fortifie our ſelues with any other bulwarke, than to do, to counſell, & to viter all good and honeſt things, according to duty, wherunto we are, called by nature, not onely for our ſelues, but alſo for the beneft and profit of many. Therefore of thee (ACHITOB) we ſhall vnderſtande more at large, what Duty and Honeſty is,

ACHITOB. No treatiſe in Philoſophy (ſaith Cicero) is ſo neceſſarie as that of Office and Du- ty: for aſmuch as no part of mans life, whether it be in publike or priuate affaires, or in what action ſoeuer it be, either ought or may be deſtitute thereof. For therein conſiſteth all hone- ty of life, and, if it be neglected, all infamie. And albeit moſt part of the ancient Philoſophers comprehended Duty and Honeſty vnder vertue, affirming them to be one and the ſame thing, yet following the opinion of that great orator and Philoſopher, who hath handled morall Philoſophy in very good order, we may diſtinguiſh them after this ſort, ſaying, that Dutie is the end whereunto vertue tendeth, namely, when in all our actions we ob- ſerue honeſty and comelineſſe. In which diſtinction we ſee neuertheleſſe ſuch a coniuncti- on of theſe three things, Vertue, Duty, and Honeſty, that the one is the end of the other, the perfection thereof conſiſting in all three together. Dutie then is that, which bindeth the ſoule, cheerefully and willingly without force or conſtraint to giue to every one that which belongeth vnto him: honour, to whom honour: reuerence, to whom reuerence, tribute: to whom tribute, and ſuccour, to whom ſuccour belongeth. This duty is diuided into two ge- nerall kindes: the one is that which appertaineth to the perfect and ſoueraigne good: the other concerneth the preſeruation and ſafety of the common ſocietie of men, and conſiſt- eth in morall precepts according to which the behaiour of all ſorts of life may be ſquared. As touching the firſt, no doubt but all men are beholding and bound vnto God, both for their being and preſeruation thereof, as alſo for that abundance of goods neceſſarie for this life, which he powreth forth moſt liberally, both on the good and on the bad. More- over, Chriſtians are further tied and bound vnto him for the certaine hope of their ſaluation

What duty is

The diuiſion
of duty.

What dutie
we owe to God, and wherefore.

in

in his eternall Sonne. For all which things he asketh nothing of vs but loue and good-will, testified by honour, reuerence, and seruice, according to his holy ordinance, every one after the measure of giftes and graces, which bee hath from aboue: knowing that more is to bee required of him to whom more is giuen. This obedience being grounded vpon that rule of perfect righteoulnesse, which is giuen vnto vs in the law of God, is the mother and preseruer of all vertues, yea the beginning and roote of all goodnesse. The other part of duty, which respecteth our neighbour, and whereof wee are chiefly to intreat in this our Academy, is nothing but charitie and loue of our like, as of our selues, which is greatly recommended vnto vs in the Scripture, as being very requisite vnto saluation. This is that duty, whereby we are bound not to do any things against publike laws, equity, and profit, but to be alwaies constant in the perfect exercise and vse of vertue, by doing honest and seemely things for their owne sakes, and not of necessity and constraint. Wee are not onely borne (saith Cicero) for our selues, but our countrey, parents, and friends both will and ought to reape some commodity by our birth. For whatsoever is vpon earth was created for men, and they for themselves, that one might aide and helpe another. So that if wee will follow nature, wee must imploy our goods, trauell, and industrie, and whatsoever else is in our power, in the behalfe of common commodity, and in the preseruatiō of humane society: yea, that man liueth most happily, who as little as may bee, liueth to himselfe. And on the other side, no man liueth more disorderly, than he that liueth to himselfe, and thinketh on nothing but his owne profit. This is that duty, which requireth that for the safety of our parents, friends and countrey, wee should offer our selues to all perils, not respecting our owne profit or commodity. Neither ought we to esteeme any thing iust and profitable, except honestie: which are so linked together, (as the philosophers say) that they can no more bee separated than whitenesse and cold from snow, and heate and light from fire. So that if any man bee perswaded, that the rule of honesty and profite is not one and the same, hee will neuer be without fraud or wickednesse. For thinking thus with himselfe, this indeed is honest, but that is profitable for me, he will not feare to breake and rent asunder all equity ordained and appointed either by diuine or humane lawes. And this diuision is the fountaine of all vice, falshood, and mischief. A good man (saith Plato) may not slander, steale, or lye for his owne commodity. Is there any thing then in this world of so great value, any treasure so pretious, that ought to cause vs to loose the name of vertuous and iust? We ought rather to turne profit towards honestie, and that in such sort, that howsoever the words seeme to differ one from another, yet we should make them but one thing. Moreover, the same diuine philosopher saith, that the true beautie of the soule, which is honesty, is nothing else but the brightness of that perfect and chiefe good that appeareth in those things, which may bee knowne by the eyes, eares, and minde, whereby it is caused to returne towards the Idea and patterne of goodnesse. Whereby this excellent man meaneth no other thing, than to giue vs to vnderstand, that whatsoever goodnesse and honestie is in vs, commeth from God, as from the fountaine thereof, vnto which by the same vertue it returneth, leading the soule with it to liue eternally. Besides, from him and by him commeth the beginning and proceeding of our good workes: yea it is he that maketh vs to goe forward according to our dutie, which consisteth in these two points: first, that the intention and end of our actions be rightly framed: secondly, that the like meanes to attaine to that end bee found out. For these two things may agree or disagree one from another, as wee see sometimes the end well propounded, and yet men erre in the meanes to attaine vnto it: and contrariwise, it falleth out oftentimes, that the meanes are good, and the ende oftentimes propounded bad. So that it is from this liuely and euershowing fountaine, which is the cause of all good, from whence we are to looke for the perfect knowledge of our duty, and the ends and meanes whereby to execute it, to the glory of God, and to the good and profite of our like. And from this generall vertue, and fountaine of honesty and duty, foure riuers issue and spring, called morall vertues: namely, Prudence, which is as a guide to the rest, and knoweth what is profitable for it selfe, for others, and for the common-wealth: Temperance, the mistress of modesty, chastity, sobriety and vigilancy, and of all order and mediocrity in all things: Fortitude, which maketh a man constant patient, couragious, hardy, and readie to enterprise high, great, profitable, and holy things: and Iustice, which is the bond and preseruatiō of humane society by giuing to every one that which belongeth vnto him, by keeping faith in things promised, by succouring gladly the afflicted, and by helping every one according as ability serueth. Which vertues are the true and certain goods Obedience to Gods law is the mother of all vertues. What our duty towards our neighbor is.

Man created for man.

Profit must not be separated from honestie.

Two things requisite in every good worke.

Foure riuers issue out of the fountaine of dutie.

Examples of the zeale of the ancients
in the seruice
of their gods.

Calanus.

The zeale of
the Iewes to their law.

Of the loue
which a man
oweth to his countrie.

Cato of Utica

In what case
a good man
may sue for an office.

of the soule, whereby all actions are directed according to duty, as we shall speake particularly thereof hereafter. In the meane while let vs enter into the examples of the ancients, and see how exactly and inuolably they obserued all points of duty, choosing rather to sacrifice their liues, than to infringe, and breake any of them, much more contemning all other weaker occasions, wherewith lewde and base minded people suffer themselves to be easily corrupted. And first, touching the first point of duty naturally imprinted in the soules of the greatest infidels, which is to acknowledge some diuinitie, with what zeale (although inconsiderate and rash) did the auncient heathens and pagans precisely obserue their paganisme, even to the sacrificing and cheerefull offering vp of their owne children to their gods, as we reade of the Carthagenians? What say I, their children? yea oftentimes themselves, whereof Calanus an Indian Gymnosophist serueth for a witnesse, who seeing himselfe old, after he had offered sacrifice to the gods, bad Alexander the Great farewell, with whom he came to Babylon and tooke his leaue also of all his other friends. Then lying along (according to the custome of his countrey) vpon a little pile of wood, which he had prepared for that purpose, hee caused fire to be put vnto it, and so burned himselfe for a burnt offering to his gods, not stirring at all, but continuing with such a wonderfull constancie, that Alexander, who was present, confessed himselfe to be vanquished of him in greatnesse of heart, and magnanimity of courage. Who will not admire the strict obseruation of the ancient religion of the Egyptians, Græcians, and Romanes moued with a desire of yeelding the duty of their being to the honour of a diuine nature? But for shortnesse sake, and not to wander farre from the subiect of our assemblie, I passe it ouer with silence. Here I will onely alleadge one notable example of the Iewes, who weremore zealous professors of their law, than ever were any people. Caius a Romane Emperor, sent Petronius into Syria with commandement to make warre with the Iewes, if they would not receiue his image into their temple. Which when they refused to doe, Petronius said vnto them, that then belike they would fight against Cesar, not weighing his wealth, or their owne weakenesse and vnability. We will not fight (quoth they) but had rather dye than turne from the lawes of our God. And forthwith casting themselves on the ground, and offering their throates, they said, that they were ready to receiue the blow. In this estate (as Iosephus reporteth it) they remained for the space of fortie daies, letting slip the time which then was, of sowing their groundes. Which caused Petronius to deferre the execution of his charge, and to send the declaration of these things vnto Cesar, whose death rid the Iewes out of danger. Now we are to consider with what burning affection the ancients imbraced common benefite and safety, seeking to profit all men, according to the true dutie of a good man, but especially their countrey, in whose seruice they thought it great happinesse to lose their liues. For truly besides the sweete affection, which nature hath imprinted in our hearts towards our countrey, and the conformity of humours, which commonly is found in our bodies with that heauen and aire where we haue our first breathing, which seemeth to be a mutuall and naturall obligation, the reason of all humane right, and the religion of diuine equity, besides the dutie of conscience, binde all persons to serue the publike wealth of their countrey, to the vttermost of their power: and that so much the rather, because that vnder it, the life, honour, and goods of euery particular man are comprehended. This reason caused Cato of Utica, a Consul and noble Romane, to answer one of his friends, who was come to giue him thanks for defending him in iudgement from a false accusation, that he wasto thanke the Common-wealth, for whose loue onely hee did speake, and counselled all things. This also made him to vndertake the sute for the office of Tribuneship of the people, that he might resist the faction of Pompey, by whom he saw Metellus set on worke to sue and seeke for the same office, for the assurance of his affaires and strengthening of his league. Now is the time (quoth Cato to his friends) wherein I must imploy and bestow the power of such an office, and of great authority, as a strong medicine, in time convenient, and vpon necessarie causes, and either ouercome, or dye honourably in the defence of common liberty. So likewise he opposed himselfe as much as he could, against all nouelties & alteration of affaires betweene Cesar and Pompey. And when the selfesame Pompey, beeing desirous to winne to himselfe, sought to bring it to passe by alliance, and thereupon demanded two of his neeces in marriage, one for himselfe, and the other for his sonne: Cato without any longer deliberation, answered him presently (as beeing netled) that carried backe the message, that he should returne to Pompey and tell him, that Cato was not to bee taken by the meanes of women. Which was not because hee would haue him esteeme greatly of his friendship, which hee should alwayes finde in him to be more sure and certainethan than any alliance by marriage, so that hee onely sought after and did things honest and iust, but at this time he would not giue hostages at Pompeies pleasure against the Common wealth. Afterward the affaires of Rome being brought to such necessity through corruption of money, and by vnlawfull and forceable meanes in procuring publike places of authority, many Senators being of opinion, that Pompey was to be chosen sole and onely Consul: Cato also was of the same mind saying, that men ought to choose a lesse euill to meete with, and to redresse greater mischietes: and that it were better willingly to bring in a kind of monarchie, than to defer it so long, vntill the issue of present seditions should by force & constraint establish one. And it may bee (quoth he) that Pompey will haue a longing desire to preserue the Common wealth, when he shall see, that it is so liberally and freely committed to his fidelitie. This election being approued and ratified, Pompey sent to seeke Cato, and hauing heartily thanked him for that honour, which he had done him, requested him to be a daily assistant and Counsellour vnto him in his office. To whom this graue man made answer, that he did neuer oppose himselfe heretofore against him for any ill will hee bore him, neyther gaue this last counsell for any good he meant towards him, but all for the good and profite of the Common wealth. And as touching his priuate and particular affaires, he sayd, he would giue him the best counsell he could, whensoever he asked his aduise: but for publike matters, he would alwayes speake what he thought were best, although hee neuer asked him any thing. Thus did Cato behaue himselfe all his life time as a good Citizen, and as an vpright and iust man, free in speaking for the truth, and altogether voide of corruption. Metellus a Senator of Rome left vs a notable testimonie, that he esteemed of Dutie, as of a sacred and inuiolable thing, when he would not sweare to the people to obserue and keepe that, which was to bee ordained and established concerning a law put vp by one of the Tribunes against all right and equity, notwithstanding that the Consul with the rest of the Senators through constraint and feare, which they had of the people, had sworne vnto it, and giuen their promise. Then Metellus departing from the assembly, said, that it was too easie a matter to doe ill, as also a common thing to doe well where no danger is, but to doe well when perill is certaine and sure, that was the proper duty of an honourable and vertuous man. For this cause being banished, and making light account of the matter, hee vsed these or the like speeches: When things shall bee amended, the people repenting them of their error, will call mee backe againe: but if the affaires continue still in the same state, wherein they now are, it will be best for a man to keepe himselfe afar off. Lycurgus after his lawes were giuen to the Lacedæmonians, fained that he had something elsie whereof to take counsell with Apollo concerning their estate, and therefore at his departure from Lacedæmon to goe to Delphos, he caused his citizens to sweare and promise, that they would keepe his lawes inuiolable vntill his returne, either dead or aliue. This done hee went to the Isle of Candie, die, where hee remained in perpetuall and voluntary banishment, and commanded that after his death, the ashes of his body being burnt, should be cast into the winde, that by this meanes the Lacedæmonians might neuer bee absolved of their oath, but that his countrie might alwayes receyue the fruit of his labors, for desire whereof hee had freely forsaken it altogether. Marcus Otho the Emperour hath left behind him a more wonderfull example of the great loue he bare towards his Country, for the benefite whereof he dyed willingly. For after hee had lost a battell against Vitellus and Cecinna, fighting for the Empire, he was solicited by the rest of his army, which was yet of great strength, to trie fortune one again, & to vse them and their persons as long as they had one drop of bloud, and life in their bodies. And at the same time a simple souldier having a sword in his hand, spake thus vnto him: Know, O Cesar, that all my companions are determined to die thus for thy sake, and therewithall hee slue himselfe before him. Then Otho casting his eyes all about, spake vnto them in this sort: I account this day more happy to me (Companions) than that other wherein yee did choose and pronounce me your Emperour, beholding you so well affected in my behalfe, and receyuing such honor from you with so great a demonstration of friendship. And if I haue been worthy to hold the Empire of Rome by your election, I must now shew it, in not sparing my life for the good and safety of my Countrey, I know very well that the Victorie is not yet wholly mine enemies: and I haue receyued newes of such and such Forces (which hee named particularly vnto them) that are readie to ioyne with vs. The Senate is on our side, and the Wiues and children of our enemies are in our hands. But what? This war is not against a Hannibal or a Pyrrhus, or against the Cymbrians, that wee should fight for the possession of Italie, but it is against Metellus.

Lycurgus.

Marcus Otho

The courageous mind of a Souldier.

A notable example against ciuill warre.

the Romans themselves: so that in this war both the conquerour and conquered shall offend and hurt their Country, because, whatsoever serueth for the benefit of him that overcommeth, turneth to the dammage of the Common wealth. Beleeue me, I know better how to die than to raigne, especially considering that I shall not so much profite the Romans, although in the end I should remaine the stronger, as now I can by sacrificing my life for the peace, vnion and concord of my Countrymen. This done, he tooke order for the Senators and others of his army to retire and saue themselves: and sayde to a Nephew of his whom hee had adopted, I commaund thee my sonne, as the last admonition which I can giue thee, not to forget altogether, nor yet to print it too much in thy memory, that thou hast had an vnckle, who was Emperour. Then laying him downe to rest, the next morning very earely he tooke his sword, & turning the point thereof with both his hands against his stomacke, he fell vpon the toppe of it, without shewing any other token or feeling of griefe, and so dyed, being onely seuen and thirty yeares of age. Codrus king of Athens did no lesse for his Country. For hauing vnderstood that the Oracle had promised and assured the victory to the Thracians, who were enemies to the Athenians, if they saued their King alieue, he went into their Campe disguised like a handycrafts man, and slue one of their men, whereupon he was preserly slaine of others, not being knowne what he was. And thus were the Thracians deprived of the hope of victory, which before they accounted certaine, and in a manner gotten of the Athenians. Marcus Curtius a knight of Rome, who being Consull was a notable battell against the Cymbrians, threw himselfe headlong into a deepe gulfe, which was made in the middest of Rome by an earth-quake, and which had greatly dammaged the City. The reason mouing him so to do, was, because the Soothsayers had giuen out, that the gods would not be pacified and appeased towards the City before the gulfe had swallowed a man alieue. Curtius being desirous to procure the benefite and ease of the Common wealth, would serue himselfe for this sacrifice. And so it came to passe, for presently this gulfe closed vp to the great astonishment of all the people. How shall we thinke that these, and so many others as histories set before our eyes, who haue freely offered their liues for the safety of many, and chose rather to vndertake any danger, than to turn aside in any thing from that which they knew to be the duty of a good man, how (I say) shall we think that they would haue fainted or yeelded through the inticements of honor, grace, fauor, and riches, whereby the greatness of their courage, limited onely with the bounds of right and iustice, might haue bene weakened? But hoping that the sequelle of our discourses will furnish vs with more ample testimonies both of this, and of all the other parts of duty, which respect euery particular action, and fearing lest I haue bene somewhat too long in the examples already alledged, wee will conclude our present matter with this generall instruction, that vnto what estate, quality or condition soeuer men are called, they ought to propound to themselves in all their actions, Duty & Honesty, searching for them in the holy Scriptures, and in the precepts of good life conformable thereunto, which are left vnto vs by the ancient Sages and wise Philosophers, to this end, that being well instructed in true piety, we may first of all giue honour and glory to God, and then be beneficiall, helpfull, and profitable to his creatures. These graces we may, by the direction and blessing of God, draw out of those foure riuers which proceede and flow from this generall vertue and fountaine of Honesty, of which we are to discourse particularly hereafter, namely, of Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and Iustice, which are those morall vertues whereby all good and vertuous actions are brought to passe.

Of Prudence. Chap. 10.

Eccles. 1. 18

ACHI-
TOB Here is one onely wise, soueraigne Creator of all things, the Almighty, strong and terrible, who sitteth vpon his throne, from whom commeth all wisdom, which alwaies hath bene, and is for euer with him, and which he hath powdered out vpon all his works, and vpon al flesh according to his liberality, and giueth her abundantly to them that loue him. Shee teacheth the doctrine of God, and causeth vs to chooseth his workes. Shee decketh vs with prudence, iustice, and courage, giuing vs the knowledge of the time past, and iudgement of that which is to come. The multitude of those which are endued with these gits and graces, are the guard of the world, and a prudent king is the assurance of his people. The sequelle therfore of our speech leadeth vs to the handling of Prudence the first riuier of the fountaine of Duty.

Eccles. 1. 23

ASER. Wisdome raineth downe knowledge, and wise vnderstanding, and bringeth to honour

Codrus.

M. Curtius.

Duty and honesty are to be propounded in al our actions.

honour those that possesse her. Of her therefore we are to seeke for true prudence, a necessary guide to all our actions; but we must hate the prudence of the flesh, which is folly before God, and maketh all the thoughts of the wise of this world to become vaine & foolish. Moreover, Cicero saith, that no man can be prudent but he must be good.

AMANA. O how learnedly bath Socrates taught vs to know and marke this true and heavenly prudence, proceeding from the loue and feare of the Highest, from that earthly Prudence, which is full of darkenes; when he saith, that Prudence is the generall vertue, the princeesse and guide of moral vertues, and that wherein the knowledge of our soueraigne good, and of the end of our being consisteth, as also the choise of those waies whereby we may come vnto it. But let vs heare ARAM discourse more largely of the great, worthy, and wonderfull effects of this rich vertue.

What prudence is.

ARAM. All the life of men expressing a worthy end of their beeing, consisteth in contemplation and action. For knowing that the thoughts of all mortall men are vnstable, and their inuentions vncertaine, because the body and the affections thereof oppresse the soule, and cast downe the spirit loden with care, they lift vp their hearts towards the brightness of the eternall Light, who of his meere grace prepareth their soules, lightneth their vnderstandings, and directeth their paths, to the knowledge of that true and perfect Idea of Good, from whence Prudence floweth, that she may gouerne their actions according to Gods will, and to the profit of humane society. Therefore it is from knowledge and reason gotten in the study of wisdom by the grace of God, from whence the vertue of Prudence proceedeth, which is that rule of all the actions of man, whereby through good and sage aduice he decerneth and chooseth good from bad, that which is profitable from the contrary, to the end he may shun the one and the practise the other. This is that which Aristotle saith, that the office of prudence consisteth in skil to consult and to choose, to the end to execute that which vertue commandeth, namely, Honesty and decency, and that for noe other respect than for the loue thereof. And therefore wise men haue put a difference betweene Science, and Prudence, saying, that Science is a dead knowledge of things, which of it selfe cannot change the will in such sort, that it may imbrace and follow the knowne good, or auoide the euill, which is euident in wicked men indued with knowledge. But Prudence is a beame proceeding from that true sunne, which doth not onely illuminate and lighten the vnderstanding, but also warmeth, and kindleth affection. This vertue (saith Bias one of the Sages of Græcia) is amongst the rest of the vertues, as the sight is amongst the five senses of mans body: thereby giuing vs to vnderstand, that as the eie, of all the other senses is most beautiful, subtil, and piercing, so the vertue of Prudence by her quicke and cleare light directeth and conducteth all vertues in their good and commendable operations. It is by her that man is alwaies cloathed with a mild and settled disposition, whereof he standeth no lesse in neede, than a ship floating on the sea doth of the presence of a pilot, that he may prudently vnder-take, and wisely execute whatsoeuer he knoweth to be good, after mature deliberation, and consideration of all the circumstances of the fact. Morall Philosophers attributed three eies to this vertue of Prudence, namely, Memory, Vnderstanding, and Providence: which three things Cicero calleth the parts of Prudence. With the first she beholdeth the time past: with the second, the time present: with the third, the time to come. Moreover, a prudent and wise man, by the consideration of things past, and of that which hath followed since, iudgeth of that, which in the like case may fall out in the time following. And after long deliberation, he expecteth the times, weigheth the dangers, and knoweth the occasions: & then, yeelding now and then to the times, but alwaies to necessity, so it be not against duty, he boldly setteth his hand to the worke. For this cause Isocrates said, that a prudent man ought to remember things past, to vse things present, and to foresee things to come. A prudent man (saith Demosthenes) accounteth it a point of folly to say when a thing is come to passe, Who would haue thought it could haue beene? Now Prudence is apparant in him that possesseth her, first by the rule and government of his person, whether it be in things within him, as in his manners and conditions, or in outward things concerning his body, as in sobriety or diet, comely entertainment: good house-keeping, commendable vse of his substance and riches. Of which perfections and other praise-worthy effects that flow from prudence vnder the name of sundry vertues, we are to intreate particularly hereafter, as also how a prudent man being adorned with them may first become a good Oeconomist, that is, a gouernour and father of a family, and after attaine to that great vertue of politicall knowledge, which is the art of skillfull governing and ruling a multitude of men. And then although he doubt not, but that it is an

The effects of the vertue of prudence.

The difference betweene science & prudence.

Prudence compared to the sight.

Prudence hath three eies.

The praise worthy effects of prudence.

act of Prudence to know what is good and profitable for the Common-wealth, yet that he may know how to execute that office with a perfect and absolute vertue, he seeketh for all occasions to profite the same, and vnto what place of authority soeuer he be called, he alwaies sheweth foorth dutiful effects of a good man. He neuer giueth or taketh but good counsel and alwaies vttereth the same freely. He is able (saith Plato) to discerne the good from the bad. He helpeth innocency, and correcteth malice. He is not astonished for any feare, nor altereth his mind for dispraise or commendation: he is not discouraged through violence or false accusations, neither is pressed downe with sorrow, or puffed vp with prosperity. And as one not ignorant of the vncertainty of wordly things, he abideth constant in all changes, and like to himselfe, knowing how to choose the lesse euill in all inconueniences, as the better. He sheweth himselfe valiant in all things. He is maister of his pleasures, and knoweth how to command himselfe. He can reape profit by most sinister accidents, yea by his greatest enemies, and yet hurt them not. The conuersation of the Prudent is alwaies healthfull and profitable. His quips, his laughers, his sports, are not without some fruite, having in them a certaine power to correct and mooue those that do amisse. He beleueth not (saith Heraclitus) any thing lightly, but is a seuerer examiner of the truth. To be short, Prudence can seth a man to referre all his actions, both private and publike, to the best end, which is, to serue God, and to profit his neighbour. This did Socrates teach very well, saying, that all the desires and inclinations of our soule guided by prudence, tend to happines. Wherein we may note the indissoluble coniunction of all the morall vertues, of which no one can be had perfectly, but with her companions, albeit each of them haue her particular and proper duty. But prudence is especially necessary in them all, as it will yet better appeare in the further handling thereof, albeit the effects hereunder mentioned of this first vertue being narrowly considered, may giue vs sufficient prooffe thereof. Now to incite and stirre vs vp to imbrace it with greater zeale and affection, and to seeke after all meanes of obtaining it, either by good instruction, or by long vse of things, let vs call to minde certaine examples of the ancients, thereby to marke what wonderfull fruits this vertue of Prudence hath brought foorth in them. If wee consider all the heroicall facts of the worthiest Captaines and Generals of armies that euer were, wee shall finde that they brought them to passe more by prudence, than by any other force and meane. Which thing Alexander the Great, and first Monarke of the Gracians knowing very well, whensoever any speech or comparison was made before him of Vertue or Science, he alwaies had this verse of Homer in his mouth: In counsell wise and valiant in the fight: as if he would haue said, that of al vertues, prudence was most prince like, and that prowesse was practised by meanes thereof. And indeed he being richly endued therewith vnderooke the conquest of the Persian Empire, yea of all the world, when he had but thirty thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, with money and victuals to furnish them onely for thirtie daies. But what? The means whereunto he trusted was Prudence, followed of patience Valure and Temperancie, wherewith the study of philosophy had furnished him for his voyage. In this iourney he did not onely in two battailes, ouerthrow Darius Monarch of the Persians, who had about twelue hundred thousand men, but also brought vnder subiection 15. sundry nations, and tooke fife thousand cities and townes, and laboured to put in reall execution and practise that forme of gouernment of estate, which was so greatly esteemed of Zeno the Stoicke Philosopher, and tended in effect to this end, that all men generally might liue together, not being diuided by townes, peoples and nations, nor separated by particular lawes, rights and customes, but that wee should take all men for our countrimen and fellow citizens: that as there is but one world, so there might be but one kinde of life. Thus did this prudent and vertuous Monarch giue out that he was sent from heauen to be a common reformer, gouernor, and reconciler of the whole world, so that he employed all his might to reduce and bring to ciuility barbarous kings, to plant Gracian cities, that they might liue ciuilly amongst the vntamed and sauage nations, and established euery where lawes and a peaceable kinde of life, euen amongst vnbrideled people, who neuer heard word spoken either of peace or lawes. Those whom he could not assemble together by perswasion of reason hee constrained by force of armes, so that he caused them all to drinke, as ye would say, in the same cup of loue and friendship, by intermingling their liues, manners, marriages, and fashions of liuing. Hee commanded that all men liuing should account the whole habitable earth for their countrey, and his campe, for their castle and tower of defence, and that all good men should be of kin one to another, and the wicked onely strangers. Moreover, he willed, that the Gracian and Barbarian should no more bee distinguished by their garments, but that the

The coniunction of all the vertues,

Of the prudence of Alexander

the Græcian should be knowne and discerned by vertue, and the Barbarian by vice, according to all vertuous men Græcians, and all vitious men Barbarians. Therefore Plutarke sayde very well, that they who were tamed and brought vnder his yoke were a great deale more happy than those that escaped his power, because these men had none to cause them to leaue off from liuing miserably, and the other were compelled by the Conquerour to liue happily. Whereby he deserued no lesse the name of a great Philosopher, than did Pythagoras, Socrates, and others, who although they wrote nothing, yet were so called, for their manner of life, and for that which they spake, did and taught. In all which things Alexander approaching next vnto them, went also beyond them in this, they taught men of good vnderstandings, namely such as were Græcians as well as themselves, & that without great paine and trauell: but this Monarch sustaining infinit labour, and cheerefully shedding his blood, did change into a better estate, and reformed the rude manners of innumerable sauage people, even of such as were brutish by nature. Now let vs speake of Cæsar the first Romane Emperor. Was it not prudence especially that prepared the way for him to so mighty an Empire, first, by reconciling together Crassus and Pompey, two of the greatest Romane Senators, by whose fauour he obtained afterwards the dignity of Consulship? When he was placed therein, being desirous to win the good wil of the people, & knowing that he was already well vnderdropped of the Senators, he preferred many lawes in their behalfe. Besides, he was very sumptuous and popular, if euer any Romane was, not sparing any cost vpon plaies, turneies, feasts, largesses, and other baits to curry fauor with the meane sort of the people, & to gaine the honour and credit of a man that is gracious and charitable towards the poore. And when he was sent to take vpon him the gouernment of the Gaules, he warred there ten yeares, being guided by an vspeakable prudence, that was accompanied with diligence and forecast: so that by vsing all occasions wisely and to purpose, he subdued there three hundred sundry nations, tooke eightene hundred townes, and in many battels discomfited three millions of men. The Commentaries which he wrote himselfe, declare sufficiently that his own vertue wrought more exploits than all his army. Of this also he gaue prooffe enough in the beginning of the ciuill war between him & Pompey, wherein he vsed such diligence, that coming out of France, he made himselfe master of all Italy in threescore daies, without any effusion of blood, & droue away his enemy. And Cicero, who (as some say) conspired his death, in an Epistle calleth him a monster of prudence, and of incredible diligence. Was it not prudence, whereby he noted two faults in Pompey, which after were cause of his ouerthrow? The first in an incounter of their armies, wherein Cæsar being at that time the weaker had the worst. And when hee perceived that his enemy pursued him not, but retired to his Campe, he sayde: The victorie this day was in the power of our enemies, but their captaine could not perceiue it. The other fault which hee noted was at the battell of Pharfalia, where Pompey was quite ouerthrowne, because he charged his souldiers being ranged in battle, to stand still in their places, and so to attend their enemies. Then Cæsar said, that in so doing, Pompey tooke from his souldiers the vehemency and violence of giuing the onset, which is as a spur vnto them in their race, besides the heate of courage which this speedy running forward worketh in them. We see then how necessary this vertue of prudence is in the feates of war, which caused Agésilæus king of Lacedomonia, after great losses sustained by the violence of Agésilæus, Epaminondas, the generall captaine of the Thebanes, to say to his men, that they should not greatly care for the multitude of their enemies, but bend all their force against Epaminondas onely, because none but wise and prudent men were valiant, and the onely cause of victory. And therefore if they could beate him downe, they should vndoubtedly haue the rest at their deuotion. As indeede it came to passe in that battell which they fought together, wherein the Lacedomonians halfe discomfited, one of those that fled being pursued by Epaminondas, turned backe and slue him: whereupon the rest tooke such courage, and the Thebanes were so dismayed, that the victory remained with Agésilæus. Now if in warfare prudence beareth such a stroke, who doubteth but that in ciuill and politike gouernment she is as necessary or rather more? Diuine Plato in his booke of a common wealth saith, that if a man would do notable acts worthy of perfect praise in the administration of the commonwealth, he must haue prudence and iustice, followed of power and fortune. But we may further say, that onely prudence hath set aloft and preserved many great estates from ruine and subuersion. The Athenians being diuided and banded into three contrary parts and factions, Solon being very prudent and wise, would not ioine himselfe to any of them, but kept himselfe indifferent to all, practising and speaking whatsoeuer he could deuise to ioine of Solon.

Of the prouidence of Iulius Cæsar.

Cæsar noted two faults in Pompey.

Agésilæus.

The losse of a captaine is commonly cause of the ruine of an Army.

The prudence of Solon.

The prudence of Lysurgus.

Phocian.

The prudence of Demosthenes in defending the innocency of a poor woman.

How a prudent man may reape benefite by his enemies, and by mishap.

Anaxagoras.

The prudent foresight of M. Cato.

The prudence of Scipio in answering to an yniust accusation.

Emilius Scaurus.

The sports of prudent men.

and reconcile them together againe, Wherein he behaued himselfe so well, that being chosen by them all for the onely pacifyer and reformer of theyr estate, hee placed it in greater glory than euer it was in before, by his prudent and wise lawes which were receyued as inuiolable, The prudence of Lysurgus, the reformer and law-maker of the Lacedemonians, was the cause of the maintenance of theyr estate aboue five hundred yeares, so that it was the chiefest in all Grecia, both for excellencie of gouernement, from whence they fell not vntill such time as they wholly neglected those goodly ordinances and lawes which hee left them. A prudent man alwayes giueth good counsell, and vttereth the same freely, being also a good and willing helpe to innocency. Phocion speaking his mind one day in the counsell chamber of the Athenians, against the enterprising of a certaine warre, and seeing that his aduise so greatly displeased them, that they would not giue him leaue to vtter his minde, he spake freely vnto them in this manner: Yee may peraduenture (O Athenians) force me to doe that which ought not to bee done, but yee cannot constrain me to speake any thing contrary to my opinion that ought not to be spoken or counselled. Demosthenes knowing the innocency of a poore woman drawne into iudgement with danger of being ouerthrowne, saued her by his great prudence. For two strangers hauing giuen her a good summe of money to keepe, with this condition, that shee should not restore it to the one except the other were also present, within a while after one of them came very sorrowfull, sayning that his companion was dead, and bringing some counterfeite token thereof with him. Whereupon he so perswaded this poore woman, who meant simply and plainely, that she restored the money to him. Afterwards the other came, and demaunding the money also, brought this woman before a iudge, who being without hope of escaping, Demosthenes answered for her, that she offered to giue him the money, so that he brought his fellow, because, as himselfe confessed, she ought not to giue it to the one without the other, The profite which a prudent man draweth from his enemies is in this, that he knoweth and taketh them for spies, for enuiers at his life, and ioynt-labourers with him for honour and glory: whereupon hee is the more carefull that his doings may be blamelesse. And to this purpose Diogenes answered wisely to one, who demaunded how he might be auenged on his enemy: By making thy selfe (quoth he) a vertuous and good man. Most sinister accidents likewise turn to the profite of a prudent man. For being long time before prepared for all euents, the worst that happen confirme him further in the knowledge of the vncertainty of humane things, and lift him vp so much the more to the contemplation of heauenly things, that he may desire nothing but the blessed immortality of the soule. Anaxagoras hearing newes of his sonnes death, said nothing but this, that he knew he had begotten him a mortall creature. The foresight of Prudence maketh it also to be greatly admired. Marcus Cato, when he saw that Pompey ioyned himselfe in league with Cesar, tolde him, that he did put Cesars yoake vpon his owne necke, which then he perceyued not, but that shortly it would weigh heavy vpon him, and then should hee finde himselfe taken and tyed. A prudent man is not amazed through feare either of blame or of false accusation, but alwayes goeth with his head vp-right, trusting to his innocency, and to his owne vertue. Scipio Africanus being accused of many things by the Tribunes of the people, answered nothing to the crimes layde against him, but onely sayd thus: In such a day as this is, sirs, I ouercame both Carthage and Hanniball, and therefore I am now going to the Capitoll to sacrifice to Iupiter the best and greatest God, and to giue him thanks for the victory. In the meane while if any man long to proceede against me in iudgement, let him doe it. After he had so sayd, he went towards the Capitoll, being followed of his friends, and of the greater part of the Senators. When the people saw this, they likewise accompanied him, so that in stead of condemning him, they caused him in a manner to triumph againe. Emilius Scaurus being also accused of a certaine crime by Varius, made this onely answere: O ye Romanes, Varius affirmeth this crime laide against me to be true, and Scaurus denyeth it: whom will ye rather beleue? By this wise and couragious answere he made the accusation of none effect, because his honesty was well knowne to every one. The conuersation, assemblies, laughters, quips and pastimes of prudent men, are neuer without some profite. Plato in his booke intituled Cominius, that is a feast, discourseth of the last end of mens actions, and of the soueraigne and chiefe good of man, but yet in very familiar speeches, by certain examples, and pleasant fictions, and deuises fit for the time and place, and not with serious and graue words, as he vttereth to doe in his other writings. Moreover, learned deuises are the sports & delights of wise men, who account all other pastimes vaine and vnbecoming them, and as hinderances and lets

lets rather of their pleasure, than occasions of any recreation. Notwithstanding, wisely applying themselves to places and persons, they can in their serious discourses intermingle some honest pastimes, but yet not altogether without profite. As Plato in his foresayd feall interlaceth certaine comicall speeches of ioue, howbeit all the rest of the supper there was nothing but wise discourses of Philosophy. A Lacedemonian being asked of a certaine matter by an other, answered cleane contrary to the truth. And when the other tolde him that he lyed. Behold (quoth he againe) what a foole thou art to aske me that which thou knowest well ynough. Diogenes in a great assembly of people purposely going backward, and seeing that euery one laughed at him, asked them aloud if they were not ashamed to mocke him for going backward when he walked, whereas they did so all their lifetime. And as Aristippus on a time beheld him washing of Coleworts for his supper, hee sayd vnto him; If thou diddest know (Diogenes) how to obey Kings, and to seekethem out, thou wouldest not wash Coleworts. And thou Aristippus (quoth he) if thou knewest how to wash Coleworts, thou wouldest not serue Kings, but liue at liberty. What profitable doctrine may a man draw out of these Philosophicall disports and iests? Further, a prudent man neuer beleueth any thing ouerlightly, but layeth aside all reputation and credite of him that speaketh, and examineth the speech by it selfe: so farre is hee from giuing credite to an ignorant or naughty fellow. Neyther will he be dazled with fine and eloquent speech, but (as Zeno sayd) considereth whether his speech bee tempered with sense and reason, that so hee may iudge soundly of the truth, and take order thereafter. O what number of examples to this purpose might be alledged of that great harme that hath followed the credulity and light beleefe of Magistrates, Gouvernours and heads of Monarchies and Nations? Alas, our poore France hath but too great experience thereof to her confusion and destruction. But this matter may offer it selfe hereafter to be more amply handled, as also other effects of Prudence, which I haue briefly touched. In the meane while wee will conclude, that Prudence is an excellent gift of God, that it is the guide and light of all the morall vertues, from whence all good and noble actions haue their being and beginning, and that without it a man can doe nothing that is excellent and prayse-worthy.

Pleasant sayings full of doctrine.

A prudent man doth euer lightly beleue any thing.

Of want of prudence and of ignorance, of malice and subtiltie. Chap. II.

A R A M. NO man (sayth diuine Plato) can be hurt or deceyued, but by himselfe. Which proposition at the first sight may seeme somewhat absurd. But if, being well instructed in Philosophy, wee will follow the opinion of the ancient Sages, that What soeuer wee see of the body subiect to sight, is not man, but that the soule onely, which is immortall, is that which truly ought to be called man, and that wheteby wee liue, and for which wee ought to liue. It is out of doubt, that none can hurt our soules but our selues. The kniues wherewith we hurt our soules are eyther want of prudence or malice, which are as pernicious things as can come to man, seeing by them he committeth all sinnes and offences whatsoeuer, and by them hurteth himselfe onely, when as oftentimes hee thinketh to offend another. As then in our former discourse we haue seen the laudable effects of Vertue and Prudence, so let vs now consider, my companions, the dangerous fruites of these two vices, which are altogether contrary vnto it.

How none can be hurt, but by himselfe.

A C H I T O B. If the blind lead the blinde both will fall into the pit: and he that knoweth his Masters will, and doth it not, shall be much more chastised than the ignorant. So that both want of prudence and malice are two plagues in the soule greatly to be feared: and therefore Bias sayth, Be neyther simple nor subtilt.

A S E R. Herillus the Chalcedonian affirmed, that science was the soueraigne good. But we see contrariwise many excellent men for skill and doctrine, who liue most wickedly. So that in my opinion if it be not accompanied with vertuous deedes, it ought rather to be called the chiefe euill: forasmuch as hee that sinneth through ignorance, is more excusable than the malicious, who sinneth wittingly. And for defence of my saying, besides the authority of the Scripture, I haue Plato, who sayth, that science without the knowledge and practise of that which is good, is very pernicious. But let vs hearken to A M A N A, who wil discourse vnto vs more at large of these two vices, want of discretion, and malice or subtilty.

Vertuous actions are to be ioyned with knowledge.

A M A N A, All vertue being in the midst of two vices, the one of them is cleane contrary 48 Of want of Prudence, and of Ignorance.

What want of prudence is.

The perniti-ous.
effects of ignorance.

All ignorant
men are euil.

The effects of ignorance
both in rich
and poore.

trary vnto it, and the other being more dangerous, seeketh to couer it selfe with her name and it is called of the philosopher a false follower of vertue. For this cause they placed want of prudence, which vice is in the defect, at the right hand of prudence: and at the left hand, malice or craft, which is the excesse, and causeth a man to sinne, not through ignorance, but by deceite and subtiltie, and that vnder the name of prudence. First then let vs consider of want of prudence or vnskilfulnesse, & of the effects thereof in the soule. Vnskilfulnes proceeding or rather being the same thing that ignorance is, causeth a man (as Aristotle saith) to iudge euill of things, to deliberate worse, not to know how to take the aduantage of present good things, but to conceiue ill of those things that are good and honest in mans life. And as prudence is the knowledge of that which ought to be done or est vndone, so vnskilfulnes is the ignorance of those selfe same things, and is alwaies followed of incontinency, of want of ciuility, and of forgetfulnes. Briefly want of prudence is so contagious and pestilent a thing in the minde of man that all other infirmities of the spirit, wherewithall it is commonly molested, and all euill actions seeme to proceed from the same. And truely wheresoeuer it is, there neither God can be truely honoured and serued, nor vice auoided, nor any action, either publike or private can be orderly, and according to duty executed. For as a weake and diseased sight cannot behold the light of the Sunne, so an vnskilfull soule cannot know the truth. Vnskilfulnesse causeth a man to fall into seuerity, when he thinkes to exercise iustice. If he would be liberall, he becommeth prodigall. If he thinketh to auoide superfluitie, he falleth into couetousnesse. If he haue any apprehension of the diuine nature, he consumeth his soule with a confused feare through superstition, If his mind cannot conceiue that there is a most happy and blessed nature, foorthwith he indgeth that there is none at all: and thus guided by ignorance, all his desires and inclinations tend to wretchednesse and miserie. Moreouer, Plato saith, that ignorance taketh away the sight of the minde from those that are tainted therewith, as blindness taketh away the sight of corporall eies from those that are tainted therewith, as blindness taketh away the sight of corporall eies from those that lacke their sight, And further he testifieth, that the ignorant minde is vile and wretched, and that it is more expedient not to liue at all, than to liue in ignorance. But if we giue credit to Cicero, he onely liueth indeed and possesseth a soule, who setting himselfe to some good matter, seeketh after renowne by some notable fact, or by some good art. It is good (saith Socrates) to leaue off altogether the vse of that thing wherof we haue no skill to vse it well. And so for those that know not how to vse their eies, eares, and whole body, it were more profitable neither to see, heare, or helpe themselues any way with their body. In like manner it were better for him that knoweth not how to vse his soule, to haue none at all, than to liue. And if he must needs liue, being borne, he should be happier in the estate of a slaue than of a freeman. The speech of this wise philosopher expoundeth it selfe sufficiently, as tending to none other end than to giue vs to vnderstand, that it is better not to be, yea neuer to haue bene borne, than through ignorance to follow vice: and further, that it is more dangerous when a man may freely do so without feare of any greater than himselfe, For as drunkennesse engendreth rage and madnesse, so (saith Aristotle) ignorance ioyned with power begetteth insolencie and fury. And it is all one (as Plato saith) to place an ignorant man in authority, as to lay a great burden vpon the shoulders of a man halfe dead through weakenes. All these things make me iudge an ignorant man to be, I will not onely say, like an image or blocke of wood, but in a manner nothing differing from the brute beasts. This caused the ancients to vse this saying: that Every ignorant man was euil. And Terence going yet further saith, that The earth beareth nothing worse than an ignorant man. And in truth what mischiefes doe wee not see to come of ignorance? If a man be of a meane or base estate, it maketh him good for nothing, fearefull, superstitious, vnprofitable, needy, vnciuill, slothfull, and vnfit to e- uery good thing. If hee bee mighty and rich, besides that he may fall into the said miseries through the same imperfection, hee will so much the sooner become arrogant, cruell, rash, talkatiue, couetous, vnconstant, giuen to voluptuousnesse, and vniust. In a word, the more meanes hee shall haue to exercise vices, the richer in them will he grow to be through ignorance: and so not being able to gouerne himselfe, he must needs be vnworthy to intermeddle at all either in politicall or oeconomicall gouernment. If an ignorant man possesse any great benefite or felicity, he can neuer know so much, before he hath lost it againe. Moreouer, this mischiefe followeth him, that he can neuer make his profite of any good counsell, because of the presumption of his owne opinion, which he alwayes thinketh better then any other: yea hee supposeth that nothing can bee well done, except he put to his helping hand.

hand. For (as Menauder saith) nothing is so rash as ignorance. And the more that an ignorant man is lift vp vnto some excellencie of dignity or riches, the more vnufferable hee is, as one that knoweth not how to vse them: so that he is puffed vp with pride aboue measure, and not content with his estate, but driuen with ambition, hee presumeth oftentimes to vndertake things against all reason and equitie. And contrariwise, if fortune change, hee abaseth himselfe out of measure, shewing nothing but abiection of mind, inconstancie and impatency, and that with so great trouble and disquietnesse of spirit, that oftentimes hee is wholly besides himselfe. Now these are but small fruites of ignorance, namely, to make a man importunate: to cause him to slay another that hath great affaires, saying that he hath many things to communicate vnto him, when in truth they will doe him but small pleasure: to desire one that hath lost his suite to bestow a dinner vpon him, promising to tell him a way how he may recouer it againe: to speake ill of women, when he is invited to weddings, or in their company: to request him to walke that hath already gone a great way: when he seeth a thing sould to bring a chapman to the seller, who would haue giuen a great deale more for it: to repeate one thing oftentimes: to shew himselfe ready to doe that which a man would not haue him to doe, and yet dare not well deny it him: to wonder at all things; and to speake all in a word, an vnskillfull man is alwaies in all places and in all affaires vacuill and impertinent. The examples of these foresaid effects are but too familiar amongst vs. And first concerning these of small and meane estate and condition, how many millions of men haue there bin in the ages past, and doe liue yet among vs, whose life being ignorant of euery good cause and reason, is not much vlike, and in many things worse than that of brute beasts? The originall of so many errors, foolish opinions, and impieties, hath it not had passage through the midst of their soules, because they had no true knowledge of the end of their being, nor of his will by whom they liue? From thence it cometh, that the best aduised among them exercise base handicrafts, not being desirous to learne further: that some leade a seruile & contemptible life, bringing their bodies and soules in subiection to the lusts and wicked desires of the greater sort: that others remaine idle and vnprofitable, seeking to maintain their liues by vnlawfull meanes: that all through a blockish ignorance deprive themselves of all present and eternall felicity. Now albeit these poore men, who haue no great meanes to execute their wicked desires, may after a sort seeme tollerable and excusable to mans iudgement, because their ignorance doth not greatly hurt any but themselves, yet it falleth out far worse with those that haue wealth at will, and authority to command others, who not knowing how to vse their goods well by vertuous deedes, abuse them to all vice, dissolutenes, and pleasure: whereby for the most part they cast themselves headlong into infidelity and Atheisme, because they neuer had true vnderstanding of the perfect diuinity, nor yet considered the perfection of his works both in heauen and earth. O pitifull calamity abounding in this our age more than euer it did. A thousand millions of Pagans and heathens considering that there was nothing to be misliked in the heauens, neither any negligence, disorder, or confusion in the moouing of the stars, nor in the seasons of the yeare, nor in their reuolutions, nor in the course of the sunne about the earth, which causeth the day and the night, no not in the nourishing and preservation of all sorts of liuing creatures, nor in the generation of yearely fruits, and for a thousand other good considerations, beleueued & worshipped one supreme eternall essence, which governeth all things: and shall they that carry the name of Christians, to whom the vnspokeable treasures of the heauens haue bin opened and offered with innumerable graces, shall they, I say, doubt, yea impudently deny that there is a God? But let vs returne to our matter. It is most certaine, that the higher that ignorant men are aduanced, so much without question are their faults greater than those of meane estate, because they are hurtfull to many. Yea oftentimes it hath come to passe, that one onely fault of such a man hath bin the losse and destruction of an infinite number of men. Nicias the general Captaine of the Athenians, through the feare which he had conceiued of the darknes of an Eclipse of the moone, and not knowing the cause thereof, staid so long vntill his enemies had inclosed him round about: whereupon hee was taken aliue of them, and put to death, besides the losse of 40000. Athenians that were taken and slaine. Who doubteth but that ignorance draue Caligula and Domitian into such pride and cruelty, that whilest they sought to be worshipped in stead of the true God, they were the cause of the death and destruction of more then a hundred thousand men? In the time of Otho the first, there fell a stone from heauen, which astonished all Germany, and turned them from prosecuting an enterprize of great weight and importance for the benefit of their country. If they had knowne it to bee a naturall thing, and such as had come to passe long before

Common effects of ignorance.

The spring of all errors.

The reasons which mooued the heathen to beleue that there was a diuinitie.

Nicias feared an eclipse of the moone.

Caligula and Domitian.

Otho the first.

50 Of want of prudence, and of Ignornace.

Anaxagoras,
saying against the superstitious feare of celestiall
signes.

Cleander a traitor to Commodus
his Lord.

The base
mind of perſes
being ouer-come of Emilius.

What malice & craft are.

before, as Aristotle affirmeth, they had not bin so fearefull, nor receiued that dammage to the detriment of the Common wealth, which came to them afterward. That speech of Anaxagoras a Greek Philosopher, agreeable hereunto, is worthy to be remembred, when hee saide, that a man ought to driue out of himselfe, and to treade vnder his feete all superstitious feare of the heavenly signes and impressions of the aire, which worke great terror in them that are ignorant of their causes, and that feare the Gods with a forlorne and amazed feare, because they want that certaine knowledge that Philosophy bringeth, which in stead of a trembling and alwaies terrifying superstition, engendreth true deuotion, accompanied with an assured hope of good. Let vs looke a little into our Chronicles, and consider what profit our kings receiued by their ignorance, when they were called Simple, when they stood but for images, and were seene of their subiects but once a yeare. They suffered their wise maisters of the pallace to take knowledge of, and to order and to rule all things, who depriving them as vnworthy, of al authority, took possession in the end of their crowne. And surely it is no lesse pernicious for the greater sort to aduance ignorant men to charges and places of honor, and to vse their counsell, than to be ignorant themselves. For (as we said) ignorance causeth him that is aduanced to forget himselfe, and listeth him vp into all pride. There are amongst vs too many examples of the ambition and presumption of many ignorant men: who, contrary to Torquatus that refused the Consulship because of his diseased eies, altogether blind as they are deafe, dumbe, and destitute of all naturall light, of prudence and experience to guide themselves, are not contented to manage the sailes & tacklings, but desire to haue the rudder of the Comowalth in their hands. And it is greatly to be feared, that such vnskilfull and ambitious men will in the end shew themselves both in wil & practise to be imitators of one Cleander an outlandish slaue, who being preferred by Commodus the Emperour to goodly offices and great places of honour, as to be great Master of his men of war, and his chiefe Chamberlaine, conspired not withstanding against his Lord, seeking to attaine to the imperiall dignity by seditious, which hee stirred vpe in Rome betweene the people and the soldiers. But through good order taken, his enterprise tooke no effect, except the losse of his own head, and destruction of his house. Although oftentimes it falleth out cleane contrary through the iust punishment of God, for the ignorance and impiety as well of the monarchs themselves, as of their people. Now if fortune turne her selfe about, and set her selfe neuer so little against an ignorant person, he is straight way overcome with a thousand perturbations, and vrged with despaire, as being onely grounded before vpon the vaine and weake hope and confidence in externall and vncertaine goods. Perſes, King of Macedonia, and one of the successors of Alexander the Great in his great conquests, but not in his vnspeakeable vertues, was overcome in battle by Paulus Emilius, chiefe captaine of the Romans, and was led towards him. Emilius as soone as he saw him, arose from his seate, and went forward to receiue and honor him, as being a great personage, and fallen into that mishap by the hazard of fortune. But Perſes being wholly beaten downe through faintnes and basenes of mind, cast himselfe at his feate vpon the ground with his face downward, vsing such abieft requests and supplications, and so vnbeseeing the vertue of a king that the conqueror could not abide them, but said thus vnto him: Alas poore ignorant man as thou art, how dost thou by discharging fortune accuse thy selfe in this sort to be the onely cause of this ill successe that is befallen thee, seeing thou neuer deseruedst that honor, which thou hast had heretofore, because of thy base minde within thee, which hath made thee an vnworthy aduersary of the Romans? And truly a man cannot iustly bee called through the benefite of fortune, but by knowing how to vse her wel & wisely both in prosperity and aduersity. As for an ignorant and base minded man, the higher that fortune listeth him vp in great estate where he shall be viewed of many, so much the more she discovereth, descrieth, & dishonoureth him. For great calling, & riches are no more able to lift vp the hart of a base minded fellow, than pouerty can abate and lesse the great courage of a noble heart. I could here alledge many moe examples of the pernicious effects that are (as wee haue said) wrought in the soule by ignorance, but hereafter they wil come in more fitly, when we shal discourse particularly of vices. Onely I say here with Plato, that arrogant ignorance hath now more than euer seized vpon the minds of men, and filled them with euills, as beeing the root and spring of them: that it peruerteth all things, and causeth him that possesseth her to taste in the end of a most bitter fruite. Now to come to malice and craft, which is the excellence of prudence, it is that which leadeth a man through wilfull ignorance, to oppose himselfe against that which he knoweth to be dutifull and honest, causing him vnder the counterfeit name of prudence to seeke to deceiue those that will beleue him. This vice is the

Of want of prudence and of ignorance. 51

the chiefe cause of ambition and couetousnes, which most meserue in these daies: but aboue all things it is an enemy to iustice, causing all their actions to tend to the ouerthrow therof. To this purpose Cicero saith, that the craftier and subtiler a man is, the more he is to be suspected and hated, as one that hath lost all credite of goodnesse. All knowledge seuered from iustice ought rather to be called craft and malice than science and prudence. Neither is the onely act of malice (as the same author saith) euill and wicked, but also the deliberation therof although it take no effect, yea the onely thought thereof is vile and detestable: so farre is it, that any couering or cloake can excuse a fault committed of malice. Also he saith, that in deliberating all hope of concealing and hiding the fact must be taken away, for as much as vertuous men ought to seeke after honest, not secret things. Moreouer it is the property of a malicious man to choose hypocrisie and dissimulation for his companions. Besides he hath for his first author and father Sathan, who by his subtiltie and craft abused the simplicity of our first mother to the ouerthrow of all mankind. Amongst many we may note here the example of Nero a most cruell Emperor, who being instructed from his youth by that wise man Seneca his schoole-master, in the beginning of his Empire counterfeited so great bountifullnes and clemencie, that when he was to set his hand to the condemnation of one adiudged to die, he cried out and said, Would to God I had no learning, then should I be excused from subscribing to any mans death. Notwithstanding within a while after he disclosed his detestable impiety & cruelty, by putting to death his mother, his tutor, and a great number of honest men against all right and iustice. Moreouer he purposely caused fire to be put into all quarters of Rome, forbidding vnder paine of death that any should quench it, insomuch that more then half the city was cleane consumed: Afterward, to the end he might haue some colour to persecute the Christians, he laid to their charge the kindling of the fire, and so put a great number of them to death. Tyberius also in the beginning of his reigne behaued himselfe so wisely, vertuously, and gently, that he seemed to be (saith Suetonius) a simple and plaine citizen. And yet soone after he became as detestable a tyrant as euer was, for cruelty and filthy pleasures. True it is that one may attribute the cause of such sodaine alteration of humors to the soueraigne authority and power of commanding, which commonly hath this property to make him that seemed good to become wicked: the humble to be arrogant: the pitiful, cruell, the valiant, a coward. But it is alwaies more likely that a Prince changing his nature so quickly vseth to counterfeit and to dissemble, and to put a goodly vizard vpon his face, as historiographers write, that Tyberius could behaued himselfe cunningly in that sort. Now that we may profit by this discourse, let vs learne to be prudent and simple as the Scripture speaketh, eschewing all shameles and damnable malice and deceite, all want of prudence and ignorance, which procure the losse of soule and bodie, whereof a man may accuse none but himselfe. For ignorance (saith Menander) is a voluntary mischiefe. And although the knowledge of good and euill is most necessary of all others, yet it is most easie. For the obtaining whereof, and auoiding (through the grace of God) of that condemnation, which is to fall vpon the blinde, and vpon the guides of the blinde, let vs neuer be ashamed to confesse our ignorance in those things whereof we want instruction: following therein that precept of Plato, That we must not be ashamed to learne, least happely we be hit in the teeth to our confusion with that saying of Diogenes to a young man whom he espied in a tauerne, who being ashamed to be seene there, speedily step further into the same. The more thou runnest in (quoth this wise man to him) the further thou art in the tauerne. Euen so we shall neuer cure our ignorance by denying or hiding it, but the wiser we seeke to be accounted, the more ignorant we shall remaine: not vnlike to poore men, who beeing desirous to seeme rich, in the end finde themselves poorer than before, by reason of their vaine & foolish expences. But the ignorant man that searcheth for wisdom and inquireth after her, shall be in some sort esteemed wise, and that iniquity ought to be taken for an argument of his wit and prudence: as contrariwise he that taketh himselfe for a wise man and presumeth too much of his skill, falleth often into shame and dishonour, being reprobued of many. Therefore let vs daily accuse our selues of too much ignorance, knowing that euen the sharpest sighted do see but through a cloud & mist, I meane the instrument of our body, from which we shall not be deliuered vntill we haue put off this mortall to be clothed with that which is immortall in the enioying of the blessed life. So that it will be alwaies necessary for vs during this life, to learne and to profit in the knowledge of the truth, which is an enemy to ignorance.

Vertuous men
seek after honest,
not secret things.

Satan the father
of malice & subtil-tie.

The malice
of Nero.

Tyberius.

Mat. 10. 16.

We must not deny or hide
our ignorance.

AMANA. HAving spent all this day in discoursing of prudence, and of those vices that are contrary vnto it, I thinke that to finish this daies worke, wee shall doe well to take in hand againe, and to follow that which was too briefly handled concerning the commendable effects of this vertue of prudence in the soule of a wise man. This appeareth no lesse in speech than in any other action thereof, forasmuch as of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. But it is a great vertue to speake little and well. The discourse of this matter I leaue to you my companions.

ASER. Surely the speech of man is a diuine worke, and of great admiration. And therefore wee ought to account it sacriledge to pollute and defile so holy a thing with filthy and vile talke. A good man alwaies draweth good things out of the treasure of his heart, and a wicked man euill things. Therefore I greatly commend that saying of Plutarke: That speech is as it were the nourishment of the soule, which is corrupted, and becommeth odious through the wickednesse of men.

ACHITOB. Hee that hath knowledge (saith the wise man) spareth his words: euen a foole, when hee holdeth his peace is counted wise, and hee that stoppeth his lippes prudent. If any man long after life, and to see good daies, let him refraine his tongue from euill, and his lips that they speake no guile. For euery one shall eate of the fruite of his mouth to saluation, or to condemnation. But wee will heare ASER discoursing more at large vpon this matter.

A double reason of speech. ASER. In the writings of the learned we finde mention made of a double speech or reason: the one internal, or of the minde, called the diuine guide: the other vttered in speech, which is the messenger of the conceites and thoughts of man. The end of the first is friendship towards a mans selfe. For respecting onely the marke of vertue, through the instructions of philosophie, it maketh a man to agree alwaies with himselfe, it causeth him to complaine neuer, to repent him of nothing, it maketh him full of peace, full of loue and of contentation in his owne vertue, it healeth him of euery rebellious passion that disobeieth reason, of all contention betweene will and will, and of the contrariety of discourses. O rare excellencie, which floweth from wisdom into the soules of blessed men! The end of the other reason, or vttered speech, is friendship towards others, which causeth vs to speake and teach whatsoeuer is fruitefull and profitable for euery one, and carrieth with it great force to perswade. Of this speech we purpose heere to intreate, as of that which occupieth no small place, but euen very great amongst the secrets of nature, and which ought to raiuish vs into an admiration of his workes who is author thereof. The Philosophers, diligent searchers out the reason of all things, say that speech is made by aire beaten and framed with articulate and distinct sound. But howsoeuer it is framed, the reason thereof is harde to bee comprehended of humane sence. And wee ought to bee so much the more desirous to know for what cause it was giuen vs, and to feare least wee make it vnprofitable or wickedly imploy so great, wonderfull, and diuine a thing. Democritus saide that words were the shadow of workes. Themistocles compared speech to a rich cloth of tapestrie, figured and set forth with stories, because that both in the one and the other those things that are fashioned and represented, are then seene when they are opened and displaied, and are not subiect to sight, neither bring any delight or contentation, when they are folded vp and hidden. When a wise man openeth his lips (saith Socrates) we behold as it were in a temple, the goodly similitudes and images of the soule. Vertue (saith Plutarke) hath no instrument so gracious or familiar as speech, which being followed of workes, is of great efficacie and force, and wonderfully pricketh forward those that heare vs, causing them to giue credite to our sayings, and working in them a desire to resemble vs. Aeschines said very well, that it is not so necessarie, that the Orator and the Law should agree in one and the same thing, as it is requisite, that the life of a Philosopher should be conformable and agreeable with his doctrine and speech. Moreouer, a wise man ought to take euery word he speaketh for a voluntary and particular law, laide vpon himselfe, seeing that Philosophie is a profession of serious, graue, and weighty matters, and not a play or prittle prattle, vnconstantly vttered to obtaine honor onely. Whereby we see that all talke ought to haue reason for a foundation, and the loue of our neighbour for a marke to aime at. This is that which Agabus would teach vs, when he saith, That the tongue is a slippery instrument, and bringeth great danger to those that neglect it: but if we direct it with a religious vnderstanding,

How speech is framed.

Words are the shadow of workes.

The foundation and trope of all speech.

Of speech and speaking.

53

standing, it will sing vs a song tuned with all the concords of a true harmonie of vertue. Plutarke saith, that speech ought to bee like gold, which is then of greatest price of value, when it hath least dross in it: so a few words ought to comprehend great store of substantiall matter and instruction. Such was the speech of the auncient Gracians, as the sentences vttered by them doe testifie: namely, Know thy selfe, Nothing too much, Nothing more than enough, and other short speeches full of great and profitable doctrine. Whereupon this prouerbe arose, Laconicall sayings, that is, short and sententious, which resemble streames running through a narrow straight, where the water is so pressed together, that one cannot see through it. And so truly it was very harde without skill and great labour to comprehend the depth of the sence and vnderstanding of their wordes, which were full of sententious grauity. And when they were to answer any thing propounded on a suddaine, auoiding all superfluous speech, their answers were very witty and well contriued, their wordes very significant and short, hauing in them both grace and grauity ioyned together. As when Philip king of Macedonia wrote vnto them, that if hee entred within Laconia, hee would ouerthrow them topsie turuie: they wrote backe vnto him onely this word, If. And another time, as Demetrius one of his successors, beeing angry with the ambassadour which they sent vnto him, asked if hee came alone from the Lacedæmonians to him, the ambassadour made this onely answer, One to one. Pittacus vsed to say, that a drye and thirstie eare must bee washed with a sentence that is good to drinke, and that speech grounded vpon reason onely, is able to content and satisfie the hearing. Notwithstanding that we may the rather and the more profite others, wee are not to neglect, if it may be, the ioyning of graue doctrine with sweete gracious and eloquent speech, mingled with some pleasure, grace, and delight, but voide of all dissolutenesse. For (as Euripides saith) that is the goodliest assemblie in the world, where the Graces and Muses meete together. Right and reason are inuincible, beeing well vttered, because the soule is thereby induced easily to beleue the good reasons shee heareth, through the delight that is ioyned with them. Examples also being vttered fitlie, and with a good grace, profite no lesse than the other, because with the force of perswading, which is in the nature of the example, there is ioyned the vertue of delighting. But we must carefullie auoyde all subtiltie of speech, all proude, superfluous, and vnprofitable talke, lest that bee iustly objected vnto vs, which Phocion replied to Leosthenes who laboured to perswade the Athenians to warre by an eloquent and verie loftie oration. Thy words, (quoth hee to him) young man and my friend, may fitly bee compared to Cypres trees. For they are great and tall, but beare no fruit worth any thing. Or else that may be objected vnto vs which Aristotle answered to a great pleader of causes, who at euery sentence he rehearsed, asked him, if that were not a strange thing. Not that, (replied he) but this is a greater maruaile, that any man hauing two legges can abide thy babling. And to another, who after a long discourse said vnto him, I haue troubled thy head Philosopher: Not a whit (answered he) for I thought not vpon it. Such bablers, whom Plato verie aptlie calleth the eues of time, are compared by Plutarke to emptie vessels, which giue a greater sound thā they that are full. So hee that is poore in respect of the goods of the soule, hath alwayes some fonde speech in his mouth. But wee must aboue all things shunne this vice of intemperancie of the tongue, which Bias calleth the best and worst thing that was. It serueth vs to profit & instruct others, and by the same also wee hurt and corrupt others. And as a little fire consumeth a great wood, so this little member, which is a fire, yea, a world of iniquitie, defileth all the bodie, and setteth on a flaming fire the whole world, if it bee not extinguished and repressed. It seemeth that nature would teach vs by fortifying the tongue better than any other part of the bodie, and by setting before it the bulwarke of the teeth, that if it will not obey reason, which being within ought to serue in stead of a bridle, to stay it from preuenting the thought, we might restraine and chastice the impudencie thereof with bloudie biting. And because we haue two eares and two eyes, it ought to serue vs for instruction, that wee must heare and see much more than wee speake. Doe we not also see, that sight & hearing goe before speaking, and that of necessitie, an infant must first vnderstand before hee can be able to speake? Isocrates appointed onely two times to speake in: the one, when the matter is necessarie: and the other, when a man speaketh that which he knoweth. And this we may put in practise without blame in this maner. As touching the first point, it is lawfull and seemelie for vs to speake, when we stand in need of any thing, secondly, when our speech shal profit any, also to delight & recreate one another with pleasant deuises, void of dissolutenesse, to mollifie and to ease the trauell of our affaires, or else to relish our rest the better,

Of Laconical speech.

A pretie saying of Pittacus.

Of graue and eloquent speech.

Against prating pleaders.

The tongue is the best and worst thing that is.

Isocrates appointed two times of speaking.

Appelles
speech to a perthan lord.

How great men ought to speak.

Appelles speech to a shoemaker.

Alexander
gaue money to a poet to hold his peace.

Nothing
ought to bee
written with out great deliberation.

Notable and pithy letters
of ancient
men.

A good precept for speaking.

and to induce vs thereby to giue glory to God. All speech not grounded vpon one of these three causes were better restrained than vttered, Moreouer wee ought to obserue inuolably the second point of not speaking that which we know not, except it be in seeking and asking after instruction: remembring that which Apelles once spake to Megabytes a great Persian Lord, who comming into his shoppe to see him, intermingled some talke of the art of painning, So long(quoth Apelles to him(as thou were silent, thou seemedst to be some man of great account: by reason of thy chaines, carquenets of gold and purple gowne: but now there is not the least of these boies that grinde oker, who doth not mocke thee, hearing thee speake that which thou knowest not. By which saying wee may note, that great men ought to weigh well, and to consider of that which they speake in publike places, and to vse graue and sententious words of another phraze than that of the vulgar sort, or else to holde their peace if they haue not this gift of speaking. Or at the least they are to speake but little, seeing the very words, gesture and countenance of a prince, are oftentimes taken for Lawes, Oracles, and decrees. Tiberius also brought vp this custome of speaking to the Prince by writing, and of his answer by the same, to the end that nothing should escape his mouth that was not well considered of before. But to continue our matter, as the aboue named painter had set foorth a table of his owne for all men to behold, & had hid himselfe behind it, that he might heare what could be reprehended, a shoemaker espied a fault in the fashion of the latchet, which Apelles afterward corrected. And hauing the next morning hung it out againe to be viewed, this shoemaker passing by, and seeing that his opinion was followed, entred further to speake against other lineaments. But the painter not able to beare his boldnes came from behinde his table, and stopped his mouth with this saying, That a shoemaker ought not to iudge of greater matters than of the shoe. This is the meaning of that common prouerbe, to goe about to teach Minerva: which is so intolerable a thing in men of honour, and so pernicious in the simpler sort that are light of beliefe, that for this cause Alexander the Great gaue money to Cherillus an ignorant poet, to hold his peace and to leaue writing. And seeing we are entred into this matter, we must know that wee ought to bee much more staied and aduised in writing any thing, than in bare speaking: because a rash and inconsiderate word may be corrected presently, and that which is once set downe in writing can no more be denied, or amended but with infamy. As therefore a man had neede of a ready and quicke wit to bee able to speake well: so great wisdom is very necessary to write well, yea the same rules and precepts that belong to speaking, agree also to writing. Besides, writing is called of many, a dumb speech, which ought to be short and full of instruction. Cesar in a letter which he sent to Rome from the Persian battaile, wrote but these three words, Veni, vidi, vici, that is to say, I came, sawe, and ouercame. Oetavian writing to his nephew Caius Drusus, said thus: For as much as thou art now in Illiria remember that thou descendest of Cesars, that the Senate hath sent thee, that thou art yong, my nephew, and a Citizen of Rome. Plato writing to Dionysius the younger, vsed these words onely. To kill thy brother, to double thy tributes, to force the people, to forget thy friends, to take good men for thine enemies, are the works of a tyrant. Pompey writing to the Senate from the east parts: saide thus: Fathers of the Senate, Damascus is taken. Pentapolis is subdued, Syria, Afcalonia and Arabia are confederates, and Palestina is vanquished. Wee see then the manner of writing vsed by the auncients, for which breuity they were as much esteemed, as the great discoursers of these times after iust occasion of correction. But to returne againe into the path way of speaking, we haue in Cicero a notable instruction for this matter. Let our speech (saith he) be sweete and pleasant, not headstrong: and when wee discourse, let vs not be so long that wee hinder others from speaking. For speech of all other things ought to be mutuall and equall. Moreouer we must haue respect to that thing whereof we speake. If a man discourse of graue matters, he must adde a certaine severity, but if he speake of delectable things, a pleasant and gracious behauiour. Aboue all things we must take heede, that our speech discouer not some vice to be in our maners, which commonly falleth out when wee speake euill of a man in his absence, either to moue laughter, or to his shame and reproach. We must also remember, if our speech vpon some occasion coming between intermit the first discourse, that it return again in coueniēt time. But that is as things fall out. For al take not pleasure in the same things, nor at all times, & as we haue begun vpon some occasiō, so we must end by some means. Now because in euery actiō of our life the perturbatiō of the soule are to be eschewed, we must be careful that our speech bee voided thereof: namely, that it bee without choler, without extreame affections, also without carelesnesse, and other such like imperfection. Especially we must strue to make it knowne, that we

we loue and reuerence those with whom we speake. Further, we must know that silence in due time and place, is profound wisdom, a sober and modest thing, and full of deepe secrets. This caused Archidamus, when hee saw that Hecatus the Orator was blamed for not speaking one word at a banquet, to answer for him, that they which know how to speake well, know also the time of silence. Hyperides likewise being at a feast amongst a great assembly, very full of noyse and pleasure, and being asked why hee spake nothing, answered thus: It is no time now to discourse of those things for which I am fitte: and as for those things, which the time now requireth, I am vnfitte. Bias being mocked of a babler, because hee spake nothing all a Supper while, answered him thus: How is it possible that a foole should hold his peace at the table? The Ambassadors of the King of Persia being at a feast with a citizen of Athens, and seeing Zeno the great Philosopher say nothing; they began to flatter him, and to drinke to him, saying; What shall wee tell the King our master concerning you, Master Zeno? Nothing else (quoth he) but that you saw an oldeman, who knew well how to hold his peace at the table. And truely no speech vttered did euer so much good, as many kept in, haue profited: and that which is restrained may be spoken at any time; but a word giuen out can no more bee called backe againe. For wordes (as the Poet sayth) haue wings, and are presently dispersed euery where: and many repent that they haue spoken, but neuer that they held their peace. How many examples do histories set before our eyes of men, who through the intemperancie of their tongues, haue throwne themselves headlong into infinit calamities, and of mightie Cities and great Estates destroyed & ouerthrown through the disclosing of some secret? The City of Athens was taken and destroyed by Sylla the Romane dictatour, who by his spies was admonished of the prating of certaine oldemen in a Barbers shop, where they talked of a certaine place of the towne that was weakest, and worst defended. The ouermuch talke of one only man was the cause that Rome was not deliuered from the tyranny of Nero. For seeing one of the prisoners that was taken by the tyrant to be dismayed because hee should be put to death, he willed him to pray to God that he might escape but vntill the morrow onely, and then he should haue cause of reioycing. Whereupon the Prisoner thinking with himselfe, that it were better for him to choose a certainty than to expect an vncertainetie, and to prefer a safe way to saue his life, before a iust, disclosed this speech to Nero, who knew well how to remedie the conspiracie. The Gentleman of Normandie who in his confession, told a Franciscan Fryer, that he was once minded to haue killed Francis the first, may well be placed amongst these ouermuch speakers. For the King being aduertised hereof by the Franciscan Frier, sent the poor penitentie to the court of Parliament, where he receiued sentence of death. Those that are noblie & royally brought vp (sayth Plutarke) learne first to hold their peace, and then to speake. Therefore Antigonus the Great being demanded by his sonne, at what houre the Campe should dislodge, Art thou afraid (quoth he to him) that thou alone shalt not heare the trumpet? He trusted not him with a secret matter, to whom the succession of the Empire was to come: teaching him thereby to bee more close and secret in such matters. Euery particular man likewise ought to be no lesse aduised in vsing great discretion, when the question is of vttering any thing which a man would haue concealed. For hee (saith Plato) to whom one discloseth a secret, getteth the others libertie. Now in this laudable silence which we commend here, we haue this to marke well, that when the question is of speaking a truth, or of profiting another, we ought not to doubt in anie case, what pretence soeuer there be, to speake, vtter, maintain, & free lie to giue counsell in that thing, which concerneth the duty of a good man, or the charge whereunto we are called. The Sages and vertuous men heretofore haue alwayes shewed themselves to be such in their free counsels and wise declarations, as hereafter we may handle more largely. In the meane time wee may haue here Demaratus for an example of this commendable liberty of speech, who coming from Corinth into Macedonia, when Philip was at variance with his wife and with his sonne, was demanded by the King, whether the Græcians did agree well among themselves: Truely sir, (quoth he to him) it becommeth you well to enquire after the concord of the Athenians and Peloponensians, and in the meane while to suffer your owne house to be full of diuision and domesticall discord. Diogenes also being gone to the Campe of the same Philip, at the same time that hee returned from making warre against the Græcians, and being led before him, the King asked him if he were not a Spie. Yestruely, answered the Philosopher, I am a Spie, and come hither to espie thy impudencie and folly, who not constrained by any, doest set downe as it were on a dycing boord in the hazard of one houre, both thy kingdom and life. Demosthenes being demanded

The prayse of silence.

Hyperides.

Examples of mischiefs caused by the intemperancie of the tongue.

Of concealing a secret.

Examples of the commendable freedom of speech.

of the tyrant Epemetes, why hee wept so bitterlie for the death of a Philosopher, a companion of his, seeing it was a strange matter to see wise men weepe, yea altogether vnbeseeming their profession. Know (said he to him) that I weepe not for the death of this Philosopher, but because thou art a liue. For I tell thee that in the Academies we are more sorrowfull for the life of the wicked, than for the death of good men. Let vs learne then by our present discourse, that talk being the messenger of thought discloseth our maners a great deale more than the lines and draughts of our face doe. And as that tree whose roote is drie can haue no greene leaves: so from a vitious and corrupted soule, nothing but vile and filthie speeches can proceede, which a wise man ought wholie to shunne, because to make small account of euill words, leadeth a man by little and little to dishonest deeds. Let all vain speech also bee banished from vs, and let vs take great heed, that we neuer speake, either in sport or earnest any one word that is not true, knowing that to be true in word, is the beginning & foundation of a notable vertue. Moreouer, let vs know, that truth is not onely betrayed of those that speake falsely, and maintaine a lye, but also of those that dare not confesse and defend it publikely. Let vs know that aboue all things we must dedicate our voice & speech to sing the prayes of God, remembring the saying of that holy man Gordius, who, as he was led to the place of punishment, was exhorted by some to leaue his opinion, and to saue his life. To whom he answered, That the tongue ought to vtter nothing that is iniurious to the Creator thereof. Lastly, let vs know that we must referre euery word to the glory of his name, and the profite of our neighbours.

The constancie of Gordius.

The end of the third daies worke.

The fourth daies worke.

Of Friendship, and of a Friend, Chap. 13.

A SER.

An being a reasonable Creature, born for ciuill societie to obserue lawes and iustice, and to exercise in the world all duties of gentleness and goodnesse, the sayrest and most fruitfull seedeth that God hath infused and sowne in his soule, and that draweth him to this end, is loue and charitie towards his like. But as euerie action of mans life standeth in need to be guided by the vertue of prudence, whereof we discoursed yesterday, so in truth she is verie necessarie in euerie good and vnfained friendship, For this cause I thinke (companions) that we shall obserue the order of our discourses, if wee beginne this dayes worke with the handling of friendship, and of the true and perfect dutie of a friend.

Prudence requisite in a friend.

No outward thing is to be preferred before friendship.

Nothing more rare or excellent than a friend.

A M A N A, Nothing that seemeth to be profitable, whether it be honour, riches, pleasure, or whatsoeuer else is of this kind, ought to be preferred in any respect before friendship. Yea, a man is to make more account of friendes (as Socrates said) then of any other mortal thing.

A R A M. Perfect friendship (sayth Aristotle) is to loue our friend more for his benefite than for our owne: and therefore a friend is alwayes profitable and necessarie. But hee is greatly deceyued (sayth Homer) that seeketh for a friend in the Court, and proueth him at a feast. But let vs heare A C H R I T O B discourse hereupon.

A C H R I T O B. Rare things are commonly most esteemed amongst men, and the more precious they are of their owne nature, so much the more are they had in request. This wee may verie aptly apply to a friend, seeing there is nothing so rare as one that is vnfained and stedfast, neyther any thing so excellent and perfect as he is, if he be a good and prudent man. And for this cause the Philosophers accounted friendship to be the chiefest and most excellent good of Fortune, as being least of all subiect to her, and most necessarie for man. But because the wickednesse of men is so great in these dayes, that nothing is so sacred and holy which is not violated, corrupted and brought to confusion: no maruell if men impudentlie abuse this name of a friend (so much reuerenced in olde time) that some take it to themselves being altogether vnworthie thereof, and others as freely, although to their losse and shame, grant them this excellent title, and esteeme them for such in truth towards them, as they falselie vaunt themselves to be. But that wee bee not deceyued with the great number which which is not alwaies the surest marke, let vs briefly consider what friendship is, what fruits spring from her, who may rightly challenge this title of a friend, what manner of one we ought to choose, how we must trie him before we take him for such a one, then the meanes whereby to keepe him, and lastly what mutuall dutie friends are to vse one towards another. First we say with Socrates, that true friendship cannot be framed but by the helpe and grace of God, who draweth like to the loue of his like: that euery perfect friendship is to be linked with the bond of charitie, and ought to be referred to God, as to our soueraine good and chiefest friend: and therefore that true friendship cannot be settled betwene the wicked, who being at discorde within themselves, can haue no concord and agreement one with another. Moreover, there is to be found in friendship whatsoeuer men thinke worthie to be desired, as honesty, glory, tranquillitie of minde, and pleasure: and consequently a happy life, which cannot be amongst the wicked. Friendship is a communion of a perpetuall will, the end whereof is fellowship of life, and it is framed by the perfect habite of a long continued loue, Whereby we may perceiue, that there is a difference betwixt loue and friendship: because loue is a desire of the thing loued, and a beginning of friendship, but friendship is an inveterate and ancient loue, wherein is more pleasure than desire. To loue (saith Cicero) is nothing else but to be desirous to profite and pleasure another without hope of recompence. For otherwise friendship would be a meere merchandise, whereas it ought to be as free as charitie. Socrates also said, that the end of friendship was, that of two soules one should be made in will and affection, and that none should loue himselfe better than his friend. For there is a meane to be kept in all things, except in conuersing with a friend, in regard of whom this ought to be resolved vpon, that he is either wholly to be forsaken, or wholly to be trusted. What shall I hide from my friend (saith Homer) or what letteth why I may not thinke my selfe alone when I am with him? Whereby it appeareth vnto vs, that a friend is a second selfe, and that whosoever would take vpon him this title in regard of another, he must transforme himselfe into his nature whom he purposeth to loue, and that with a steadfast and settled minde to continue so for euer. Hereupon one of the ancients speaking of him that loueth perfectly, saith, that he liueth in another mans body. Friends therefore ought of necessitie to haue a coniunction and conformitie of manners, of desires, of passions, of speech, of studies, of pleasures, of inclinations, of intermissions, if they minde to professe perfect friendship. Whereby we may easily ghesse, that he which entertaineth many friends, depriueth himselfe of the name of a true and stedfast friend, because it is altogether vnpossible for a man to fashion himselfe to all patterns, and to apply himselfe to all natures, so diuerse in euery one: especially considering that he shall very hardly finde himselfe like affected in all things to one alone. Now after we haue found such a disposition and conformitie in him that offereth himselfe to be our friend, we must enter further into the knowledge of him, by sounding out the depth of his heart, that we may be certaine and sure of his good disposition. For to see outwardly a resemblance of our manners and conditions in another, is not sufficient to prooue them such indeede without dissimulation, vnlesse they be grounded vpon a good and vertuous nature, which is simple, vpriight, and vnfaigned. For otherwise we see that many (like to Proteus taking diuers shapes) are so subtil, that when they would curry fauour with any man to deceiue him, they disguise themselves, and for a while apply themselves to all his humours. This is practised chiefly by flatterers towards great men, who will counterfeit rather than they will not immitate the naturall vice of the Prince: so that as soone as euer they see him laugh, they betake themselves to laughing, albeit they know not wherefore. And namely, we reade that Alexander the Great, and Alphonfus king of Arragon, hauing each of them somewhat a wrye necke, this by nature, the other through custome, the flatterers and courtiers held their necks on the one side, to counterfeit their imperfection. To the end therefore that the sugred poison of such fained friends deceiue vs not, wee must make choise of an honest, prudent and wise man for our friend, whose fidelity (as Cicero saith) integrity, constancy and liberality are approoued of euery one, and whom wee shall perceiue to be led and possessed with the same zeale to vertue that our selues are, to the end we may be aided and furthered by them in all good and laudable actions. For (as Plato saith) friendship is giuen by nature for a helpe to vertue, not for a companion of vices. To this effect Pythagoras saith, that it is not good to ioyne hands with euery one. Dicarchus also would giue vs to vnderstand the same when he saith, that we must make all men our well willers if it be possible, but onely good men our friends, who are not obtained but after a long time, and that by vertue. And as when we passe by a bramble or burre that taketh hold of vs, we cast it farre from vs, but contrariwise seeke for

The principal cause and end
of all true
friendship.

What friendship is.

The difference betwixt friendship and loue.

What things are requisite
in friendship.

The common practise of flatterers.

What manner
of man we must choose
for our friend.

How we must prooue a friend.

How we must shake off a false friend.

How Alcibiades
tried his friends.

The meanes to keepe a friend.

Friendship
must be free.

for the Oliue and the grape: so we ought to seeke after their friendship that deserue it, whose minds haue sufficient matter in them to cause them to be loued, but to forsake, yea to reiect such as are vnworthy, and vicious, sensuall and disordered, although they fawne vpon vs: because their conuersation marreth and corrupteth every good nature. Therefore Bias said very well, that a wise man receiue not every one vnto his friendship. Hauing thus chosen him whom we desire to intertaine for our friend, and laid the chiefe foundations of friendship vpon his agreement of manners with vs, and vpon his good disposition (which we may know by familiar conuersation with him, and by diligent inquirie) before we can assure our selues or boast that we haue a true friend, we must prooue his stedfastnesse and constancie, and not trust to offers and promises, whereof men are very prodigall now adades. But this is cleane contrarie to the dutie of a true friend, whose propertie is to be sparing in speech, and prodigall in deeds, because great proffers are meete to be vsed towards strangers, and good deedes towards true friends. Now to prooue a friend, wee must not stay vntill neede and necessitie vrge vs, least such triall be not onely vnprofitable and without fruite, but also very hurtfull and dangerous vnto vs, because at such a time as necessarily requireth friends, wee make triall of him, who in truth is no such man. But we rather to gouerne our selues with prudence and foresight, as we vse to doe in the receipt of gold and siluer. For before we haue need to imploy it we consider whether it be currant, that wee may bee sure it will serue the turne when necessitie requireth. To this purpose Theophrastes said, that we ought to prooue strangers to loue them, and not loue them to prooue them. Therefore albeit the true and and right triall of a friend is in aduersitie, as of fine gold in a furnace, yet that is to be vnderstood of him, who is such a one indeede. For if we should expect the first triall vpon our selues in time of certaine danger, thereby to be assured and out of doubt, if then he should faile vs it would bring vs in great perill: so that we were better to trie him when we stand not in need, requesting him notwithstanding, as if we were vrged, and stood in need of his helpe and assistance in a matter of importance. If then he goe forward with a sound zeale and ready affection, we are assured of him against another time. But if hee stagger, and doe it coldly, or turne away his face and refuse it, besides that we haue no hurt or hinderance, wee shall also gaine much by withdrawing such a friend gently, and by little and little from our table, and from our prosperitie: alwaies wisely obseruing that this friendship be simply forsaken, and no enmity vnderaken. For it is not good or seemely to quarrell with him, with whom wee haue liued familiarly. Moreouer, we must note here, that triall is to be made in an honest, not in a wicked matter. For we must not doe, as we read that Alcibiades did, who, being desirous to know whether he had so many friends as he thought he had, called them vpon a day one after another into a darke place and shewed vnto them an image of a dead body, saying, that it was a man whom he had killed, and requesting them to helpe to carrie it away. But amongst them all he found none except Callias that would harken thereunto. This kinde of proouing a friend maketh vs vnworthy of such a name, and occasioneth every good man to withdraw himselfe from our friendship. If we doe all things (saith Cicero) both good and bad for our friends, such friendship may more truly be called a conspiracie of euill men, then a confederacie of good men. But, as we haue said, we must gaine another mans friendship by vertue, and not by vice, as also trie a friend in iust and reasonable causes: as if we be oppressed vniustly, if affliction and aduersitie follow hard at our heeles, if need or any other humane accident betide vs, into which the best men commonly fall. After we are sure that we haue a friend, (which truly is very great riches) there is nothing that we ought to desire more than to preserue and keepe him. And first the mutuall opinion, which ought to be in every friend of the vertue of his companion serueth very much for this matter. For as Cicero saith, The opinion of vertue is the fountaine of friendship, and it is proper to vertue to win mens hearts, to draw them vnto it selfe, and to preserue their friendship. Next, the coniunction of manners and wils keepeth backe all riot and contentions, when as the will and minde of the one shall no sooner be declared, but the other presently putteth to his helping hand to bring it to passe. Thirdly, we are to obserue this first law of friendship inuolably, not to require our friend to doe any thing that is not iust, or not in his power to performe, but to content our selues with the vse and seruice of that which he hath, without further seeking his hinderance. After the example of the industrious and painfull Bee, which draweth hony out of flowers, and hurteth not the fruit. Aboue ail things we must hold this for a generall, which wee haue already touched, that true and perfect friendship ought to be free, as charity is, from whence she hath her beginning: I meane, that it ought to exercise it selfe not for hire or recompence, but onely for for his loue, who is beloued of vs. For the one is proper to a friend, the other fauoreth of a hireling. True it is that friends in these daies are like to crows, which flie not but towards those places where there is something to feede vpon: euen so they commonly visite not mens houses except it be for profite, neither reuerence a friend longer than they see him in prosperitie, or may reape some commoditie by him. But we must shunne such parasites, who are but saluting and table friends. Moreover, wee must reioyce and delight in the companie and conuersation of our friend, as in that wherein the sweetest and most pleasant fruite of friendship consisteth. And for want of this benefite, friends must often communicate together by letters, thereby to shew that they liue in remembrance one of another. For by the letter of a true friend the spirit is refreshed, the eies delighted, friendship confirmed, and the minde contented. Besides, we must haue our vertues, spirits, prosperitie, yea acquaintance, and all common together, and nothing secret or hidden. Lastly, we must yeeld to our friend all duties and seruice of sincere friendship, and that in all honest and profitable things according to right and iustice, which are the bounds and limits of an holy loue, desiring the like of him towards vs. Above all things his affliction or aduersitie, and all iniurie offered him, ought to be common to vs with him, wherein we are to assist and helpe him with all succour and sweete consolation, which is as soveraigne and fit a remedie as can be applied vnto him, especially when good doctrine is ioyned with our speech, Hereof Phalerens confessed very well that he had good experience when he was banished from his kingdome, saying, that his meeting with Crates the wise man had taken from him all care and thought of his miserie. And if friendship can greatly diminish the griefe that cometh by aduersitie, no doubt but it can adde as much grace and pleasure to prosperitie. We may effect all dutie whatsoeuer wee owe to our friend, by succouring him with foure things: namely, with our person, with our goods, with comfort, and with counsell. Which we may also comprehend vnder these two duties, of relieuing the necessitie of our friend, and of comforting him in his tribulation. Now because, what perfectio soeuer is in our friend, as like wise in our selues, it cannot be but there will be alwaies some imperfection mingled therewith, (mens doings being neuer without some euill) we must not presume to be able to build such a perfect friendship as shall bee voide and free of all vice. And therefore we must gently support and beare with all wants and discommodities of our friend, and oftentimes frame our selues to many passions, so they be not directly contrary to vertue, but such as proceede from the imbecillitie and frailtie of nature common with vs. Neuerthelesse against such imperfections we must in time conuenient and to purpose, vse free and gentle admonitions, which are so necessary in friendship, and worthy of such consideration, that in my opinion wee shall doe well to make a seuerall discourse thereof. Now if it come to passe, that some displeasure or iarre happen betweene vs, then is the time wherein we ought most of all to studie & labour how we may do some profitable or honorable thing to our friend: & not harken to slanderous tongues, which watch for some small & light occasion to powre out the poison of discord, thereby to rent and breake asunder our good & sure friendship. To such parasites, & scrap-gatherers at free-cost feasts, who seeke for nothing but their own gaine by the disagreement of others, we must neuer giue eare, but drive them as far from vs, as they thinke to come neere vs. And to the end we may bee the better affected and disposed hereunto, we must often call to remembrance, what benefite and happinesse cometh to such men as are linked together by true and vnfaigned friendship: as namely, in those affaires at which cannot be present our selues, the fidelity of a friend supplieth our place. From whence we will draw this conclusion, that he which violateth friendship, setteth himselfe against the common succour and aide of all men, and as much as in him lieth, overthroweth humane society. For we cannot doe all things our selues, and therefore friendships are ioyned together, that by mutuall duties one may profit another. Now considering that all the aboue named things are both necessary, and also very hard and difficult to be obserued & kept in true friendship, a man may easily iudge that this so excellent Sympathie and fellow feeling of two friends is very rare, and not easily found: and by a more forcible reason it followeth, that it is altogether impossible that many such friends should be linked together. So that whosoever goeth about any such matter can neuer attaine to a certaine and durable friendship. For it must needs follow, that he which beginneth new friendship cannot but diminish and waxe faint in affection in regard of his former friendship, wherein he was in a manner settled. Yea, how can he obserue all dutifull points of astedfast friend, as well in mutuall conuersation and communication of all things, as in helping his friend in all his affaires, if he haue many friends to looke vnto, who may all stand in neede of him at one

Phalerens.

How many waies we owe dutie to our friend.

How we must beare with the imperfections of our friend.

Against the pluralitie of friends.

He that hath never a foe
hath never a friend.

The best and most excellent friendship is betweene one couple.

Pisistratus let ter to his nephew.

Titus Flami-
nius.

one and the same time? It is certaine that in serving one hee would be wanting to the other, and peradventure to both, whilst he doubteth which to helpe first. But there is yet a further matter in it. Doe wee not take him for our enemy, who is enemy to our friend? It is most certainly so: as the wise man Chilon very fitly signified so much to one who boasted, that hee had never a foe. Then hast thou never a friend, quoth Chilon, seeing it is impossible, by reason of the wickednesse of men, that two persons should live in the world without enemies. Whereupon Plutarke saith, If thou seekest for a swarme of friends, thou considerest not that thou fallest into a waspes nest of enemies. Hereof it is that histories, when they set before vs examples of true and excellent friendship, make mention onely of two persons: as of Jonathan and David, whose friendship could not be hindred by the wrath of the father of the one, no not although he knew, that his friend should reigne over him, notwithstanding he were by inheritance to succeed next in the kingdome. So we read of one Achilles and Patroclus, of whom the one falsified his oath, which was that he would never fight, to the end he might revenge the death of the other. There was but one Orestes and Pylades, both of them calling themselves by the name of Orestes who was condemned to dy, thereby to save the life of his companion. Neither was there any more then one Ephesus and Eueritus, and one Damon and Pythias, two of which being condemned to die by Dionysius the tyrant of Syracusa, had their pardon granted them by reason of the constancy and stability of the friendship that was betweene them and their companions, whereof they shewed this prooffe. The two condemned persons besought Dionysius to licence them to go vnto their countie, that they might take some order for their household affaires before they died. The tyrant scorning at this asked them what pledges they would pawne for their returne. Whereupon the two other friends willingly offered themselves for pledges, and so sixe moneths space being granted, they were set at liberty. When the end of this time drew ny, many mocked these poore caitifes: but they nothing astonished made answer, that they were certaine and sure their friendes would not in any case faile of their promise. And indeede they arrived the last day that was granted vnto them. Whereat the tyrant wondering, forgave the condemned parties, and praied them to receive him for a third man vnto their friendship. So great force had vertue, that it could pacifie choler and cruelty in his heart, whose vertue consisted in nothing els but in vice. We reade of a letter written by Pisistratus, a Prince of the Athenians, serving for a notable example of the force of friendship, which oftentimes is greater than all consanguinity. For having intelligence, that Thrasillus his nephew was of a conspiracy against him, he wrote vnto him in these words: Nephew Thrasillus, thou shouldest haue called to remembrance, not that I brought thee vp in my house, that thou art come of my blood, that I haue communicated my secrets with thee that I haue given thee my daughter to wife with the halfe of my goods, but above all things, that I loved thee as a friend. Thou art become a traitor towards mee, which I would never haue suspected, considering that I never deserued any such thing at thy hands. And therefore I would gladly I had so much authority over my selfe, that as I can shake off this alliance, so I could also falsifie our friendship, which I can neither do, nor determine of my fidelity saved. For the consanguinitie that I haue with thee may bee separated, as being within the veines: but the love I beare thee cannot, seeing it is within my heart. A thousand other examples of couples ioyned in friendship are to be found in histories. In the mean while we haue to note, that although we measure friendship here by the number of two, yet our meaning is not to exclude others altogether. For we know, that true charity extendeth it selfe vnto every one, that wee are bound to love even our enemies, and to doe good to all, but yet amongst all wee may choose one onely friend to love, and to be loved againe of him in perfection. Neuertheless, we must labour by a thousand good duties to get the good will of all men, and in what place soeuer we be, to follow the wise counsel of Polybius giue to Scipio Africanus, that he should never depart from the publike place of authoritie before he had gotten vnto himselfe some new friend and well willer. This belongeth to them especially that haue wealth at will, and are in publike offices, and fauored of the mightier sort: and therefore are so much the more bound thereunto, as also to take delight in doing good to many, not sparing any of their substance. We haue famous examples hereof amongst the ancients. That great Romane captaine and Consul Titus Flaminius, who deliuered and freed all Græcia from bondage, and and wise in battle ranged discomfited Philip king of Macedonia, is exceedingly commended of historiographers, not onely because hee was ready to pleasure every one, but also because hee tooke such delight therein, that hee would alwaies remaine well affected even to more whom he had once pleased, as if himselfe had received the benefite: insomuch that he was alwaies ready to doe them more good. Whereby he shewed himselfe truly zealous of vertue which is neuer set on worke for the hope of any earthly recompence, seeing the price and reward of a vertuous deed ought onely to be the doing thereof. Therefore Cicero said very well, that no common-wealth can either with too little, or too late recompence her native countreman. Now to conclude our present discourse, we say, that friendship is so excellent a thing, that there is no comparison betwene it and any other worldly good: that it is vertue, which frameth and vniteth together perfect friendships, and that if it be once forsaken, they cannot longer continue. Therefore honesty (as Cicero saith) is to be placed aboue friendship and profite: and religion, iustice, and fidelitie are to be preferred before the vniuersall requests of our friends, howsoever they might be profitable for this life, either to them or to our selues. We say, that whilst we labour to make all men our well-willers by doing them good, according to the duty of a good nature, if we meete with one sure and certaine friend amongst them all, wee haue gotten a great and incomparable treasure: seeing there is nothing more fit for life, or more commodious for a good and happy life, than to liue with a vertuous man and our friend, whose fidelitie, integritie, and constancie are ruled by charitie. Lastly we say, that three things are very requisite and necessarie for the foundation and assurance of his friendship: namely, vertue, as that which is honest: Conuersation, as pleasant and agreeable: Profit, as helpfull. Which is as much to say, as that we must receiue a friend after we haue knowne and proued him, that we must reioyce in his company, and vse him in our need, as we desire him to doe the like by vs. So that he which can boast of such a friend is very happy.

Nothing better than to liue with a vertuous man. Three things necessarie in friendship.

Of Reprehension and Admonition. Chap. 14.

A CHI-TOB. Diuine Plato writing a letter to Dionysius the tyrant of Syracusa in the behalfe of Helicon the Mathematician, after many and great commendations spoken of him, addeth this, that he wrote these things of a man, that is, of a liuing creature, by nature mutable and soone changed. The like also he spake of those that were well brought vp and instructed in Athens. I feare yet (quoth he) that beeing men, and the offspring of other men, they will make knowne the great infirmity and frailtie of mans life, which truly, being compassed about, and as it were besieged with infinite miseries, is so easily troubled, that the wisest stand alwaies in need of instruction, and ought to be awakened and admonished of their dutie. Whereunto the free reprehension, and sweete admonition of a friend doth not a little profit. Wherefore my countell is, that we handle it presently, without departing from the matter of our former discourse.

Man is mutable.

A SER. True friends (saith Socrates) must not through flattery seeke to gaine the fauour of their friends, but reprove them rather, that for their benefite they may reduce them to a better way.

A MANA. To admonish and to bee admonished (saith Seneca) are proper to true friendship. And Cicero saith, that a man may despaire of his safetie whose cares are closed vp against the truth, and cannot abide reprehension. Let vs therefore heare A RAM handle this subiect.

A RAM. One of the greatest, most profitable and necessarie fruits, which spring out of every good and holy friendship, and are noted and reaped by the acceptacle and long conuersation of a prudent and wise friend, is that free reprehension and sweete admonition, which ought to be mutual between all true friends: seeing the fraile inconstancy of man is such, that euen the iustest man (as the Scripture saith) sinneth seuen times aday. But man hauing pride and presumption naturally rooted in his soule, howsoever hee seeth a mote in his brothers eye, yet he perceiueth not the great beame that closeth vp his owne eyes. This maketh him bold (as it is the propertie of vicio) to bee headstrong) to defend and maintaine, that, hee hath alwaies done well, and not easily to hearken to his reasons that reprove him were it not that the mightie and inviolable bond of friendship, as of a second-selfe did constrain him to lend his care to his friend through the opinion which hee hath conceived of him and his vertue. True it is, that if there were amongst vs such a reformation of life and manners, and that loue ioyned with obedience might take place now, as it did long since amongst the Lacedæmonians, (who obserued this custome inviolable, to punish him that did not reprove anothers fault committed in his presence, with the same punishment which was inflicted vpon the offender himfelfe, and sharply to chaſtiſe him that reſiſted, or was angry at the reprehension) we ſhould not ſee ſo great winking at vices and imperfections, nor ſuch impudent reſiſting and ſhameleſſe contempt of all good admonition, as reigneth now adaiſes amongſt vs, who vnſkilfully terme this friendſhip, not to correct one another, but rather to couer and winke at all faults. But ſeeing our age is ſo greatly corrupted, we may eaſily know what a pretious and neceſſary thing it is, to haue found a prudent and wiſe friend, who knoweth how to vſe wholeſome and ſharpe reprehension, as a preſervative medicine, that ſaueth the patients life, being miniſtered in conuenient time, and to purpoſe. Which thing if it be not wiſely obſerued herein, (as in all other things) it greatly hurteth, and depriueth the admonition of profite and efficacy. Therefore a friend being oppoſite to a flatterer, who ſtudieth for nothing but to pleaſe, to do and to ſpeake to his liking whom he flattereth, (which is ynough to overthrow friendſhip, whoſe ſtrength is onely in vertue) ought to deale as a ſkilfull muſitian, who in the tuneing of his inſtrument ſetteth vp ſome of his ſtrings, and letteth downe others. So a prudent friend yeeldeth vnto ſome things, but refuſeth and contrarieth others, changing his mind as honeſtie and profit require. He is not afraid ſometime to make his friend ſadde with intent and purpoſe to profite him, not to breake friendſhip. Likewiſe he is not greatly to care although he ſee his friend angred, ſo that he be bettered. conſidering that anger may better be tollerated than vice. Agſilaus king of Sparta ſaid, that he liked well to be praized of ſuch friends as would not ſpare him at all, but were ready to blame him alſo whenſoeuer he gaue them occaſion ſo to do. To this effect Epiſtetus ſaid, that as a wolfe in ſome ſort reſembled a dogge, ſo a flatterer was like a friend: and therefore that we ought to beware, leaſt in ſtead of good dogs for a ſafegard, wee receiue vnto vs moſt pernitiouſ and hurtfull wolues. For it is bettee (as Antiſthenes ſaid) to ſtand at the curteſie of crows then of flatterers, ſeeing the one deuoure dead carkalles, and the other liuing men. Now let vs conſider of the meanes how to vſe aptly and to purpoſe this ſo healthfull medicine in friendſhip, I meane reprehension and admonition. Sometimes it is neceſſary (ſaith Cicero) for vs to rebuke our friends, wherein wee are to vſe a more auſtere countenance and vehement ſpeech: but to great ſeuerity and ouermuch ſadnes ought to bee far from vs. For although grauity be a vertue, yet friendſhip is more familiar, free and pleaſant. We muſt alſo take heed that it appeare not we be in choler, but rather that we come againſt our wiſt to doe this dnty, as ſurgeons do to cut off and to burne, and that very rarely, when there is no way to finde or vſe any other receit. Moreover, if one behold his friend in ſome great affliction, knowing it to be the nature of aduerſity to make men of troubled and vexed ſpirits, ſoone cholericke and vnwilling to heare, and at ſuch a time to be offended a good and true ſpeeches (euen as hony although it be ſweete, yet breedeth griefe when it is applyed to vlcers) I ſay a friend well aduiſed ought then to beware that hee vſe no ſharpe or biting words, which are apt to prouoke him to anger, that is preſſed with aduerſity. And this did Pythagoras meane to teach vs learnedly by that enigmaticall precept or riddle, which forbiddeth vs to Stirre vp the fire with a ſword, A man ought rather in ſuch a caſe to miniſter ſome ſuch ſweete and gracious ſpeech of comfort, as yeeldeth and giueth place a little to the iuſt griefe of his friend, and from whence hee may draw ſome eaſe of his euill, whether it be in talking thereof together with him, or otherwiſe in lamenting the ſame. And this muſt be done before any mention be made of a remedy, or any other conuenient matter of talking with him be ſought after. In this ſort for a man to comfort himſelfe is no leſſe difficult a matter (as Thales ſaid) than it is for a Phiſition to cure himſelfe. Above all things wee muſt be very circumspect when wee ſee our friend lately angred by reaſon of ſome pregnant and notable iniurie or wrong receiued from another. For then in ſtead of being importunate with him preſently to forgiue the iniury, or of ſeeking to perſwade him to thinke it a ſmall fault, thereby endeauoring at the firſt daſh to bring him to reaſon, wee muſt intreate him gently to deferre the puniſhment, and after by little and little, and by degrees to pacifie and appeaſe him. For it is very certaine, that when wrath is much kindled, and the heart intraged, a man cannot eaſily receiue comfort, nor ſo ſuddenly conceiue and vnderſtand reaſon. And therefore Plutark amongſt other things gaue this counſell to the Emperour Traian, to be patient towards furious folkes, conſidering that time moderateth as many things as reaſon doth change. Notwithſtanding when the queſtion is of reſtraining a diſordinate pleaſure, of reſſing choler and peeuishneſſe that paſſeth the bounds of all reaſon, of bridling inſolency which is gone too farre out of ſquare, of hindering ſome notable couetouſneſſe, or of ſtaying ſome fooliſh motion or ſuperfluous paſſion, then is the time wherein a prudent

One of the greatest fruits reaped in friendship.

A notable custome of the Lacedæmonians.

A friend compared to a muſitian.

Agſilaus.

How we muſt vſe reprehension.

Time bringeth as many things to good order as reaſon doth.

and good friend ought to bee vehement and earnest, and to double the speech of his admonition: yea to frame himselfe so, as if the imperfection proceeded from himselfe, and as though his owne vtter vndoing lay thereupon. In such a case he is to follow that good Græcian captaine Phocion, who, when his friend would haue cast away himselfe, saide, that hee would not suffer him, because he was made his friend for that purpose. Therefore whensoever any such occasion is offered, a man is not to stay vntil the fault be committed, that he may then giue his friend some good instruction. For then it would come too late and no lesse vnfitly, than that Porters warning, who after he had hit Cato, bad him beware. What (answered Cato) wilt thou giue me yet another blow? Moreover, we must take good heede, that all reprehending of one friend by another be done (as we commonly say) between two priuate wals, that is, secretly when the dore is shut: because the discouery of any sinne or vice (euen as of some foule disease) is alwaies shamefull. The example of these two Sages, Socrates and Plato, wil fitly agree to this matter. Socrates being somewhat more earnest than his custome was with one of his familiar friends before a great company, Plato could not containe himselfe, but said vnto him: Had not this beene better spoken priuately apart? And had not your selfe (quoth Socrates) done better, if you had told me priuately of this which now you vtter? Whereupon we may further learne this lesson, that it is alwaies easie enough to reprove another, but that all our reprehensions are blame woorthy, if we reape not this instruction thereby, to correct, or to auoide the like errors in our selues. Thus doth the selfe-same Plato teach vs, saying, that we must descend into our inward parts, and say euery one with himselfe, Am not I such a one? Otherwise a man might truly reproch vs with that saying taken out of an old Tragedie, Ech wounded might doth seeke to salve the sores that others haue. But as we see our owne eies shine within the apples of our neighbours eies, so ought we in the life of other men to lay our owne before vs, and to purge them of those vices which wee reprehende. For as Lysander made this answer to Megarian, who thrust himselfe forward to speake aloud for the libertie of Græcia in a generall assemblie of counsell, That speech my friend had neede of a mightie citie, so may it be said to euery one that vseth freely to reprehende others, that his manners had need to be well reformed. Therefore Plato said that he corrected Speusippus by the example of his life. In like sort, Xenocrates calling his eie vpon Polemon, who in dissolute apparell was entred into his schoole, changed and reformed all by his onely lookes. This also will be a good and honest way to make our reprehension both profitable and well liked of, when we infold our selues in that fault, which we reprove in others: as that wise man Socrates vsed to do, when he checked and taught young men: saying, that himselfe was not deliuered from ignorance, but had neede to be instructed with them in vertue, and to seeke out the knowledge of the truth. For when one accuseth himselfe as a subiect to the same faults that his friend is, and protesteth that his meaning is to correct and reprove him, as if hee were himselfe, it causeth him that reprehendeth to be loued and reuerenced, and procureth greater credite to his sayings. Let vs further obserue this, that euery reprehension betweene friend and friend ought to be pure, and voide of all priuate passions. In so much that if we perceiue our selues contemned, and after a sort despised, yet must we testifie our sincere and louing affection in speaking freely in the behalfe of others that are likewise despised, but not framing our talke in any sort for our owne defence. Euery admonition thus grounded as I haue said, cannot but be profitable and well liked of our friends, as that which causeth the offender both to reuerence him that gaue it, and to blush for shame, not daring once to lift vp his eies against it. But forasmuch as naturally we hate to be reprooued and blamed, as we learned in the beginning of this discourse, wee must know that to cure such a pernicious inclination, nothing can profit vs so much as to beleue, that the beginning of good life is to be blamed & baited at. For man, by nature inclined more to vice than to vertue, can neuer hate euill before he vnderstand what misery it bringeth. So that when he sinneth, if his friend lay the infamie and shame of his offence before his eies: vnlesse he be altogether past shame, and fraught with impudency, he must needs giue place to the truth, which is inuincible, and so with shame not to be discommended, he is induced to reforme his life according to the patterne of comelineesse and honesty. Therefore Plato saide, that wee are greatly beholding to them that tell vs of our faults, and shew vs what way we must keepe: because it is better for vs to amende by being corrected of another, then to vndoe our selues by foolish perseuerance. Moreover as all true and perfect loue ought to be generall, and to extend it selfe indifferently vnto all without exception of person, so likewise euery one according to his seuerall place, ought to admonish and to correct those that doe amisse as

We must correct in our selues those faults which we reprehend in others.

Sundry instructions how to admonish wisely

Reprehension is the beginning of good life.

Solons good advice for counsellors to princes.

Philosophers
ought to be conuersant
with princes.

Solons coun-
sell giuen to Cresus.

Why Plato
went into Sicilia to Di-
onyfius.

Arrogancie
dwelleth in,
the end with solitarineffe.

Notable
counsell for princes.

Demetrius.

often as occasion is offered vnto them, and chiefly they that are neere to great men are bound to doe it, but with discretion and great deliberation. Thus much did Solon signifie to one, who by way of admonishment told him, that princes were either not to bee approached vnto, or else to be pleased: Nay contrariwise (said the wise man) either they are not to become neere vnto, or els the truth is to be told them. We may obserue infinite examples amongst the auncients woorthy to be remembered, of the great freedome, which they vsed in reprehending and shewing the faults not onely of their familiar friends, but generally of all others: and especially of their kings, princes and magistrates, who because they see and heare for the most part by other mens eies and eares, ought necessarily to haue such friendes, counsellors and seruants about them, as will freely tel them the truth, as hereafter we may discourse more at large. This caused Plutarke to say, that a Philosopher ought chiefly to keepe company with princes and great lords, and that it was the point of a wise man, and of one that is well affected to the common-wealth, to be endued with common loue, and to inquire after, or to accept & entertaine such a friendship, as might be commodious and beneficiall to many in particular and much more in generall to them all. And truly they that company with priuate men, and labor to instruct them, may wel make them contented, mild and gracious in themselves, & profitable to them onely: but he that taketh away an euill quality from a Lord and magistrate: or directeth his will and intention, as it ought to be, plaith the part of a Philosopher in the behalfe of common commodity, and correcteth that mould and patterne according to which all the subiects are framed and gouerned. This kind of free admonition Solon vsed towards Cresus, whom he perceiued to be blowen and puffed vp with pride, through an opinion of earthly and vncertaine felicity, admonishing him to expect what the end would be. The gods (quoth he to him) haue giuen to vs the residue of the Græcians all things after a meane sort, and namely a base and popular wisdom, not royall or magnificall: which as it giueth vs to vnderstand, that the life of man is, subiect to infinite changes, so it forbiddeth to trust or glory in the grounds of this world, or to make great account of any mans felicity that is yet in danger of alteration. For time daily bringeth many sundry accidents to many hereof hee neuer thought before. But when the gods continue the prosperous estate of man vnto the end of his daies, then will we account him happy. The desire which Plato had to profite many caused him to saile from Græcia into Sicilia, that by graue discourses and wise instructions he might stay and containe within the bounds of reason the young yeares of Dionysius, prince of that countrey, who through vnbridled liberty, and power not limited, waied hither and thither without restraint. Afterward when hee began to bee in loue with the beauty of learning, hee left off by little and little his drunkenness, maskings, and whoredomes, wherein before he gloried, insomuch that his court was wholly changed vpon a sudden, as if it had bene inspired from heauen. But within a while after, Dionysius giuing eare to flatterers, banished Plato, to whom when he tooke his leaue of him, the tyrant said, I doubt not, Plato, but thou wilt speake ill of me when thou art in the Vniuersitie amongst thy companions and friends. Whereupon the Philosopher smiling, and obseruing that freedome of speech, which hee had alwaies vsed towards him, made this answer, I pray God, Sir, there may neuer bee so great want of matter to speake of in the Vniuersitie, that we neede to speake of thee. He was no sooner shipped from Sicilia, but Dionysius returned to his former fashions, and called backe againe dancers, minstrels, bauds, and such like vermine, whereof commonly there is no want about great personages; so that presently you might haue seene his court, yea all the rest of his people, ouerwhelmed in all delights and pleasures. Such great force hath a prince to alter and change at his pleasure the hearts of his subiects, but yet rather alwaies to vice and folly than to vertue. And to goe on with our matters of the free and bold admonition of great men, the selfe same Plato vsed it very fitly towards Dion, who had driuen Dionysius out of his iurisdiction, and that at such time as the said Dion was in the greatest glory of all his prosperity. Amongst other things he willed him to beware of arrogancy, as of her that dwelt with solitarines: that is to say, which in the end was forsaken of all the world. The same kinde of admonition Spensippus followed, writing to the same Dion, willing him not to presume to waxe proud of himselfe, because he heard women and children utter his praises and commendation, but to haue regard onely to this, that Sicilia might be adorned with religion and piety towards God, with iustice and good lawes towards men, and that the Vniuersitie might alwaies be had in honor and estimation. O counsell full of Christian instruction, and woorthy to be daily set before the eies of Christian princes, who may also learne of Demetrius king of Macedonia to take in good part, to reape commodity, commoditie, and to reward those that reprehend and admonish them of their dutie. After he had taken the citie of the Athenians, who had rebelled against him, and stood in great neede of victuals, he caused a generall assembly of the people to be made, wherein he declared, that he gaue them freely a great quantitie of corne. In which oration it fell out so, that he committed an incongruitie of speech, whereat one of the inhabitants suddainely stood vp, and pronounced the word aright as he should haue vttered it. For this correction (quoth Demetrius) I giue thee besides five thousand measures of wheat. The example of good Traian writing to his master Plutarke, ought especially to be imitated of great men. I aduertise thee (quoth he) that hence forward I will not vse thy seruice to any other thing, than to counsell me what I ought to doe, and to tell me of those faults, whereunto I may fall. For if Rome take me for a defender of her Common-wealth, I make account of thee as of the beholder of my life. And therefore if at any time I seeme vnto thee not well pleased when thou reprehendest me, I pray thee master not to take it in ill part. For at such a time my griefe shall not be for the admonition thou vset towards me, but for the shame I shall haue because I offended. Philoxenus the poet may also serue for a witnesse of free correction, voide of all flatterie in regard of great men. For when Dionysius prince of Syracuse sent vnto him a tragedie of his owne making, that he should reade and correct it, he sent it backe againe vnto him all rased and blotted from the beginning to the end, because hee found it in no respect worthy to be published. Neither doth antiquity onely afford vs such examples of bold reprehension by word of mouth, vsed by wise men in old time, but there hath beene also in our ages worthy examples of base and contemptible men, yet full of good learning. For prooue hereof may serue that quip, which not long since a peasant gaue vnto an Archbishop of Cullen, who was well accompanied with armed men according to the custome of Almaine. This countrie fellow beginning to laugh, and being demanded by the prelate the cause thereof, I laugh (quoth he vnto him) as Saint Peter, prince of prelates, because he liued and died in pouertie to leaue his successors rich. The Archbishop being touched therewith, and desirous to cleare himselfe, replied that he went with such a companie, as he was a Duke. Whereat the peasant laughing more then before, said, I would gladly know (Sir) of you, where you thinke the Archbishop should be, if that Duke of whom you speake were in hell. Neither may we omit the answer which a poore Franciscan Frier made to Pope Sixtus the fourth, who from the same order being come to that great dignitie, shewed him his great wealth and riches, saying, Frier, I cannot say as Saint Peter did, I haue neither gold nor silver. No truly (answered the Franciscan) no more can you say as he said to the impotent and sicke of the palsie, Arise and walke. Now concluding our present discourse, we learne that free reprehension and gentle admonition grounded vpon reason and truth, and applied fitlie, are of such vertue and efficacie with men, but especially with a friend, that nothing is more necessarie or healthfull in true and perfect friendship: and therefore ought to be ioyned inseparably therewith, according to that saying of the wise man, that Open rebuke is better than secret loue, and that The wounds made by a lover are faithfull, but the kisses of him that hateth, dangerous. In the meane time we must (as Saint Paul saith) restore those that fall with the spirit of meekenesse, considering our selues, and neuer betray the truth for feare of the mightier sort.

Traians letter to Plutarke.

How Philox-
enus corrected Dionys-
ius tragedie.

The free gird
of a peasant
giuen to an Archbishop.

The like gi-uen to Pope Sixtus the 4.
by a Frier.

Prou. 27. 5.

Gal. 6. 1.

Of Curiositie and Noueltie. Chap. 15.

A R A M. MAN hauing by nature imprinted in his soule an affected and earnest inclination to his soueraign good, is drawne as it were by force to search it out in euery thing, which he esteemeth faire good in this world. And from hence proceede all those his affections which carrie him hither and thither, causing him to reioyce in and desire greatly all varietie and noueltie. But the ignorance of things, and imperfection of reason, which abound in him, because of his corruption, doe make him for the most part to labour and take delight in euill rather than in goodnesse, if he be not by other meanes called to the knowledge of the truth: which ought to be the principall and most worthy obiect of our mindes, esteeming all other knowledge vaine and vnprofitable, beeing compared to this which is so great and diuine. And in this respect curiositie tending to vnderstanding, (albeit in many things it be very hurtfull, especially beeing left vnto it selfe) is also very profitable and necessary, when it is directed and guided by the grace of God to best end. Wherefore I thinke my companions, that it will not bee vnprofitable, if in this matter wee discourse of these

these two things, Curiositie and Noueltie, which seeme to proceede from one and the same fountaine, and about which the vertue of prudence sheweth great and worthy effects.

A C H I T O B. Curiositie indeed desireth in part to know and learne much, which cannot be condemned. Neuerthelesse we must wisely beware that wee imploy it not vpon euill and vile things, but rather testifie alwaies, that we are of a graue and contented nature, which is enemy to all noueltie, and to superfluous things that are without profite.

A S E R. Noueltie causeth vs through error of iudgement to esteeme those things wherewith we are not acquainted, greater, and more to our liking, and so to buy them dearer, than better things that are common and familiar. It is the very guide of the curious, causing them to contemne their owne climate, and to hazard what good thing soeuer they haue, to possesse that which belongeth to others. But let vs heare A M A N A who will handle this matter more at large.

Mediocritie must be vsed
in all actions.

The difference of good and bad consisteth in mediocrity.

Against curiositie
in knowledge.

A notable saying of Socrates.

The death of Aristotle and Plinie thorough too much curiositie.

A M A N A. Amongst those learned precepts belonging to good life, which were written in the temple of Apollo in Græcia, this was in the second place: Nothing too much, Solon said, Nothing more than enough: Pythagoras, Doe all things by a mediocrity. These sayings are very short and of one matter, but yet comprehend all prudence necessary for the governing of mans life, as well for the preservation of the tranquillity of the soule, and of the spirituall gifts thereof, as of all humane goods, called by the Philosophers, the Goods of the body and of fortune. The Ancients being desirous to make vs vnderstand this the better, propounded vnto vs euery vertue betweene two vices, teaching vs thereby, that we cannot decline neuer so little either to the right hand or to the left, but we step aside from the right way of vertue, which is our onely and true good: and that all difference betweene good and bad consisteth in a certaine moderation and mediocrity, which Cicero calleth the best of all things. If men had from the beginning contained themselves within the limits of these diuine precepts, it is certaine they would not so lightly haue abandoned the simplicitie and first modestie of their nature, to feede their minds with a vaine curiositie and searching out of things supernaturall, and incomprehensible to the sence and vnderstanding of man. Which things the more they thought to know, the greater occasion of doubting they found in them, so that for all their labour and vnderstanding they could neuer carrie away any true knowledge, or certaine resolution. And euen as that man, who not contenting himselfe with the abundant light of the Sunne beames, but seeking with his eies to pearce through the brightnesse thereof euen vnto the midst of the circle of the body, must questionlesse become blinde: so falleth it out for the most part to those, who goe about too curiously to inquire after that which is not lawfull to be knowne. The ill successe of our age affoordeth vs too many miserable testimonies, wherein at this day we see nothing but contrarieties of opinions and vncertainties, through their subtilties and bold curiosities, who haue sought to plucke (as a man would say) out of heauen the secrets hid from the Angels: yea, which is worse, haue boasted that they haue attained vnto the knowledge of them, filling our times with trouble and confusion vnder that false pretence. There are others also no lesse hurtfull, who haue beene such curious Inquiritors of the causes of all naturall things, that through friuolous and vnprofitable questions they haue fallen into that impiety, as to seeke for another beginning of all things, than God. Whereupon this prouerbe, which is too true, arose, Of three Physitions one Atheist. This kinde of curiositie, is of all others most pernicious. But forasmuch as it is without the compasse of our Academy, we let it passe with this short mention thereof, and with this onely addition, that God commonly punisheth the pride of such men by those fruits, which we see them bring forth, and by taking from them their vnderstanding in principall and most necessarie matters, wherein notwithstanding they thinke themselves to bee wonderfull and iolly fellows aboue all others. As touching this point the example of Socrates is very memorable, and to bee imitated, who being demanded what the world was, answered, that since he had any iudgement he gaue himselfe to seeke out the true knowledge of himselfe, which yet he could neuer finde. But so soone as he had attained thereunto, then he would seeke for other things that would doe him no seruice or pleasure. Aristotle (as Iustin Martyr writeth) who for the excellencie of his skill in naturall Philosophie was called the god of the earth, burned with such a desire of curiosity in vnderstanding the causes of naturall things, that because hee could not know and conceiue the cause and nature of Enripus, which is in Chalcis a city of Eubœa, I meane of the flowing and ebbing of the sea, which turneth and compasseth about that place, nor giue a sufficient reason thereof, he died for very shame and griefe which he conceiued therupon, Plinie also who wrote the historie of naturall Philosophie, was choked

choked with the flames and vapors of the mountaine Mongibel in Sicilia; whilest he sought to finde out the cause of them, and from whence that great fire came, which spoiled the countrie round about in the time of Titus the Emperour: insomuch that seuen or eight townes were burned, and many persons traouelling by land, and sayling on the sea were stifled with the ashes thereof, carried about by the vehemencie of the winds. But let vs leaue these curious spirits, and speake of two other generall kinds of curiositie, which respect chiefly our morall Philosophie, and from whence all corruption of good manners proceeded. The first kinde concerneth our selues onely, and the other our brethren and countrimen. To speake therefore of the first, it bringeth forth pernicious effects after diuers sorts and manners, but amongst vs Frenchmen they appeare principally in that burning desire, which inflameth vs to trauell into strange nations, and in our carking and caring for the nourishment, clothing, and decking of our bodies, and for the setting forth and trimming vp of our houses with curious and vnprofitable mooueables, wherein we exceede all the superfluitie of other countries. When the ancients speake of the felicitie that accompanied the golden age, amongst the good conditions, and commendable manners, which they noted in that holy and first simplicitie, they neuer forgot this, that the men of that good time tilled and manured their grounds, and cared not what strangers did in farre countries. Moreouer, since the time that men made light account of their owne climate, thorough a curious and vnassatiable desire of appropriating vnto themselves the inheritance and labour of others, besides the crueltie, violence, and murders, which prepared a way to their miserable platformes, all corruption of good manners at home, and all bastard-like attire haue followed thereupon. We might here note infinite testimonies of antiquitie, and especially of our ancient progenitors the Gaules, who were very warlike and liued within their bounds in all simplicity of manners, and frugallitie of life. But our owne example, to our vnspeakable shame and miserie, is so euident before our eies, that I neede no better prooffe, of my saying than that experience which wee feeble by our owne perill. For the ruine and destruction of this French monarchie proceedeth of no other second cause (our iniquitie being the first) than of the mixture, which wee haue made of strangers with our selues. Wherein wee are not contented to seeke them out vnder their roofes, vlesse wee also draw them vnto vs, and lodge them vnder our roofes, yea preferre them before our owne countrimen and citizens in the offices and honorable places of this kingdome, against the law and right of euery good and well established policie. Besides we adore and reuerence all their nouelties and subtil inventions, and that so ignorantly, or rather blockishly, that suffering them to sucke vs euen to the very bowels, in stead of all our riches and spoyle, which they for their part haue drawne from vs, they haue left vs nothing but new manners and fashions of liuing in all dissolutenesse and pleasure, except this one thing also, that we haue learned of them to dissemble, and withall to frame and build a treason very subtilly. Such is the prouision wherewith our French youth is commonly furnished by their Italian voyages. To this purpose Guevara, Chronicler to the Emperour Charles the first, writeth, that from forren countries men commonly bring newes to prattle of, and strange customes to practise: and that few come out of Italy, that are not absolute and dissolute. Lycurgus by his lawes commanded the Lacedæmonians not to goe out of their kingdome, nor to conuerse with strangers, saying, that although by their trafficke with them they might be enriched, yet on the other side, they would grow poore in regard of their owne vertues. Titus Linius, Macrobius, Salustius and Tullie cursed and bewailed the conquests and victories, which Rome had in Asia, saying, that if the Romanes brought the Persians, and Medes vnder subiection by force, yet the selfe same Asians ouercame the Romanes with their vices and delights. This doth Cicerot testifie writing to Atticus, where hee saith that the five vices, namely, to make glorious sepulchers, to weare rings of gold, to vse spice in meates, to alay wine with snow, and to carrie about with them perfumes and sweete smells, were sent to the Romans for a present from the Asians, as a reuenge for the cities which they had taken from them, and for the blood which they had drawne of them. And which was woorst of all, he saith, that these vices would alwaies remaine with them, but the countrie conquered, for a little time. Experience telleth vs, that no countrie is so poore, which is not sufficient and able, all superfluitie cut off, to nourish and maintaine those men that are bred in it with things necessary for them. Wherenpon a man may easily ghesse, that want of prudence, and ambitious desires, first inuented the art of Nauigation and sailing into farre countries. Fabius the Consull in the seuentie yeares which he liued, departed not once from his village of Regio to goe Messana, which was but two miles off by water. And when

The burning of Aetna.

Two generall kinds of curiositie.

Against the curiositie of seeing strange nations.

One euident
cause of the ruine of France.

L. curgus for-bad trafficke
with strangers.

Five vices brought out of Asia by the Romanes.

Why Fabius
would neuer
goe on the water.

one asked of him the cause why, The barke (quoth he) is foolish, for it alwaies stirreth vp and downe: the mariner is foolish, for he neuer abideth in one opinion: the water is foolish, for it neuer standeth still: the winde is foolish, for it runneth continually. Now if we vse to go from a foole when we meete him vpon the land, what reason were it for me to hazard my life with foure fooles vpon the sea? But whatsoeuer my speech hath bene hitherto, my meaning is not to finde fault with the right vse of hospitality, which ought to be maintained, and kept inuiolable in euery well established common-wealth. In this respect France hath bene commended above all nations for intertaining and receiuing all sorts of people: provided alwaies that they be not preferred before our owne children, and that they be contented to obey and liue according to the common lawes of the countrey. Neither doe I reprehend that trafficke and trade with strangers, which serueth for a bond of humane society, and whereby the commodities of one to another are communicated together with common profit: provided alwaies that superfluous and vnnecessary things be left and forsaken. But ere wee enter too farre in with them, it were good for vs not to vndertake such voyages to gather wit and experience (as the most say) before we haue profited well in the knowledge of vertue, and are guarded with good and commendable manners, which are able to resist all newe and strange corruption: whereby otherwise the nature of man desirous of diuersity and nouelty, suffereth it selfe easily to be overcome, making merchandise amongst them of naughtines rather than of goodnes. As hitherto experience sheweth vs, that from this fountaine hath proceeded the curiosity of superfluous apparell, of golde, of silke, tapestry, pictures, vessels, perfumes, painting of faces, delicacie of meate, and all prouocations of voluptuousnesse, whoredome, gluttony, and of other filthy dissolutenesse, and infamous vices, too much knowne amongst vs, whereof we haue heretofore made mention, and will hereafter continue the particular discourse of them. Now after we are armed well at all points with good doctrine and vertue, we may according to the example of Plato, of Apollonius Thyaneus, and of many other notable men, seeke after those that are best learned in strange countries, that we may profit and be instructed by them. Plato after he was well instructed by Socrates sought out the Magges and wise men of Egypt, by whose meanes he saw the bookes of Moses. Then he went into Italy to heare Architas Tarentinus, the most renowned Philosopher of that countrey. Apollonius, who matched in learning all the Philosophers of his time, trauelled over three parts of the world to see and to conferre with all the skillfull men of his age: and being returned into his countrey, and enriched with wonderfull knowledge, he distributed all his goods, whereof he had great abundance, amongst his brethren, and to the poore: and withdrawing himselfe into the fields, he liued with bread and water onely, that hee might haue his minde free for the contemplation of heavenly things. Now let vs come to the other kinde of curiositie, which as we said, concerneth our brethren and countrimen. This is that which Plutarke calleth a desire to know the wants and imperfections of other men. It is commonly ioyned with enuie and euill speaking, and is by that excellent Philosopher compared to adulterie which may be called a curious inquirie after another bodies pleasure. Moreouer curious folks through an ouerweening in continencie, seek to violate and to discouer their neighbours great secrets, especially those which are blame-worthie, that by publishing and blabbing them out, they may nourish the intemperance of their tongues. For as venomous serpents seek after infected and stinking places: so curiositie delighteth in finding out euill things, but despiseth those that are good and commendable. If there bee any one imperfection in a stocke or kindred, if any infamy, fault, error, or euill gouernment in a house, any quarrelling, any thing to be misliked or loathed therein, it is the delight of curious folkes to learne that throughly, that they may sport themselues, and tell long stories of them, by that meanes vsing their memorie for a loathsome register of other mens vices, and yet neither see or know any fault of their owne. This causeth them all their life time to be the disciples of ignorance, and not of Philosophie, which teacheth vs, not other mens faults, but our owne, as also the meanes how we may be deliuered from them. Diogenes beholding one of his schollers in a publike place talking very earnestly with a young man that was thought to be subiect to his pleasure, demanded what talke they had. To whom the disciple answered, that the other rehearsed vnto him a notable trick of youth, which he had plaied the night before. Then Diogenes said to them both, My will and commandment is, that each of you haue forty stripes with a whip, within the Amphitheater, or playing place: Thou (quoth he to his scholler) for giuing eare vnto him, and he for the folly committed, because a Philosopher deserueth as much for hearkening to folly recited, as doth the vagabond that rehearseth it.

Plato and Apollonius were great trauellers.

Of curiositie in seeking to know other mens imperfections.

it. What punishment thinke you would this wise man haue iudged them worthy of, who hearken and inquire so curiously after other mens faults, and imperfections? And yet a man may truly say of the most of these men, that they will neuer looke vpon, or consider their owne liues, which is a very vnpleasant spectacle vnto them; nor yet returne and looke backe with reason, as with a light vpon themselves. But their soule beeing full of all sorts of euill, and fearing that which shee feeleth within her selfe, leapeth forth and wandereth heere and there in searching other mens doings, thereby feeding and fattening her owne ill nature, and vsing curiosity as an eye to looke vpon other men. Hereof it commeth, that a curious man is more profitable to his enemies than to himselfe, because he discovereth, manifesteth, and sheweth vnto them from what they are to beware, and what to correct: and yet in the meane while he seeth not the most part of that which is within himselfe, so greatly is he dazeled by beholding that which is without in other men. Hee openeth all euen to the very walles of strange houses, and pearceth like a winde into the midst of those things that are most secret. His minde is both vpon the pallaces of the rich, and cottages of the poore. He ferretteth out every thing, and inquireth many times after the affaires of the greatest, which is the cause of his ouerthrow, when he busieth himselfe too far in them. This was wisely noted by Philippides, when Lysimachus the king asked him what part of his goods he would haue imparted vnto him: What you please Sir, (quoth he,) so it be no part of your secrets. Now if we desire to diuert and to quench the heate of this vicious passion of curiosity, which is too familiar amongst vs, and vnseemly in a prudent and vertuous man, we must sometimes abstaine from inquiring after lawfull things, though otherwise not necessary. In the exercise and practise of iustice, it is expedient sometime to leaue vntaken that which a man may lawfully take, thereby to accustom himselfe to abstaine more easily from taking any thing vniustly. Likewise it is good for a man sometime to abstaine from his owne wife, that he may attaine to the vertue of temperancy, and so be neuer moued to desire another mans wife. In like manner, if in stead of shewing our selues to bee of the number of these diligent and curious inquirers after vnprofitable newes, wee signifie rather to him that commeth to tell vs of some newes, that hee should please vs better if hee had some good and profitable matter to speake, then should we thereby giue testimony of a staied and settled nature despising curiosity. This was noted in Alexander the Great, who seeing a messenger running apace towards him with a smiling countenance, said vnto him (not shewing himselfe to bee moued at all, or desirous to vnderstand what he would speake) what good newes canst thou bring me my friend, vnlesse thou didst come to tell me that Homer is risen againe? And truly hee had great reason to thinke that no more excellency could be added to his valiant acts and deeds, except it were to haue them consecrated to immortality, by the writings of some learned and notable wit. The example of Phocion deserueth well to be heere alleadged against curious folks, who are commonly light of beleefe. For as soone as the Athenians receiued newes of Alexanders death, they purposed presently to alter their estate, and to shake off the yoke of the Macedonian alliance. But Phocion being of a contrary opinion said vnto them, if this newes be true to day, it will be true also to morrow. And therefore (my Lords Athenians) make no haste, but deliberate leisurely, and looke safely to that which ye haue to doe. It is certaine, that if we vse in this sort to shew our selues staied in such things, and in all other things of small importance, wherein our naturall inclinations would prouoke vs to be curious, as namely, to breake off good communication begun, vpon the receipt of a letter; to forsake company to runne and meete a messenger, onely to know what newes he bringeth, and a thousand such like sudden motions proceeding of lightnes and curiositie, I say by auoiding such things we should prepare a way to the restraining of all curiosity in greater matters, which otherwise may procure blame. As for example, to open another bodys letter, to intrude our selues into the secret counsels of our neighbours, to seeke out their faults and imperfections, to inquire busily after that which may grieue our familiar friends, or to aske them of that, which they like not of, neither is grounded vpon any good cause or reason, least peraduenture the answer of some wise man should turne more to our shame, than be framed according to our desire. Thus dealt Demaratus with a curious and importunate fellow that had oftentimes asked of him, who was the honestest man in Sparta: He that resembleth thee least, quoth he vnto him. The answer also of an Egyptian was not vnfitly made to one that asked him what he carried there folded: It is wrapped vp (quoth he) because thou shouldest not know what it is. Now by that which hath hitherto bene discourted, it appeareth sufficiently, that all kind of curiosity is hurtfull, hatefull, and greatly to be blamed in every one, if it be not bounded and limited by

The curious are more profitable to their enemies than to themselves.

Curiosity in princes affaires is perilous. How we must cure curiosity.

Examples against curiosity.

Against lightnes of beleefe

Faults whereinto curious men commonly fall.

Witty answers made to curious questions

Rom. 12. 3.

by the reason of true prudence, which guideth and stirreth vs vp to seeke after good, honest, & profitable things, either in heauen, in earth, in the aire, or in the sea, according to the gift & capacity of our vnderstanding and iudgement, which may be necessary for vs to know, or may helpe vs to liue well and happily. For whatsoever is more, we ought to account it vnprofitable and superfluous. Let vs learne then not to know more then we ought, but vnto sobriety, containing our spirits within the limits of mediocrity, simplicitie, and modesty. Let vs forsake all sophisticall curiosity, and worldly wisdom, which is meere foolishnesse before God, that we may imbrace a simple, popular, and Accademicall kinde of knowledge, which will teach vs to know our selues and our dutie, whereby we shall be led to that happie end, which we seeke for and desire. Let vs not admire any more the merchandise and outward shewes wherewith strangers feede the eyes of curious folks, but let vs wonder at vertue onely: saying with the comickall poet, where he speaketh of those that couered their bed-steads with gold and silver, what great folly is it to make sleepe so deare, which God hath freely giuen vnto vs? So to seeke for that of strangers with such great expences, which wee may haue at our owne haue better and more commodiously, were all one, as if we should leaue the substance, and runne after the shadow, or that which is certaine for an vncertaintie. Wee may haue in France (if our blockishnes stay vs not) Vniuersities and Schooles of all honest exercises meete for our nobilitie, without strangers. And if we thinke that in some places amongst them, they haue better teachers than we haue, let vs first seeke amongst our selues for those instructions that are most necessary, namely, for the knowledge of good letters, and institution of vertue; and then if we thinke good, we may heare their teachers and masters, without infecting our behaviour with the corruption of their manners. Besides, by the same studie we shall learne to shun all curious inquirie into other mens imperfections, that we may diligently looke into our owne.

Of Nature and Education. Chap. 16.

AMANA. Seeing that in the entrance of our former treatise, we began with that naturall instinct which moueth and disposeth him to desire and to seeke after his good; we may in continuing the same matter finde more profitable instruction, by considering his nature more narrowly, as also what commeth vnto him by good education, which, that I may so say, standeth him in stead of a second nature. To you therefore (my Companions) I leaue this matter to be intreated of.

ARAM. The nature of man is like to a paire of ballance. For if it be not guided with knowledge and reason vnto the better part, of it selfe it is carried to the worse. And although a man be well borne, yet if he haue not his iudgement fined, and the discoursing part of his minde purged with the reasons of Philosophy, it will fall often into grosse faults, and such as besee me not a prudent man. For in those men that are not endued with vertue ruled by certaine knowledge, nature bringeth forth such fruits as naturally come from the ground without the manuring and helping-hand of man.

ACHITOBI. That which commonly causeth men to will euill rather than good, proceedeth chiefly of this, that they haue no knowledge or experience thereof. And therefore Socrates said, that as bringing vp maketh dogs fit for hunting, so good instruction causeth men to become profitable in the managing of a common-wealth. But it commeth to thy course, ASER, to discourse vpon this matter.

ASER. This hath beene alwaies a great question among the skilfull and diligent inquirers after the perfection of nature. Whether learning or nature teach vs to know our selues. Iustice (saith Cicero) is naturally planted in vs from our birth, as also religion, piety, grace, dutie, and truth. Whatsoever is according to nature (as the Philosophers say) is certainly ordained and appointed, because nature is nothing else but order, or rather the effect of order. But disorder, like to Pindarus sand, cannot be comprehended in any certaine number: neither can that which is against nature be defined, because it is infinite. When they speake generally of nature, they make two principall kindes: the one spirituall, intelligible, and vnto changeable beginning of motion and rest, or rather the vertue, efficient, and preserving cause of all things: the other, sensible, mutable, and subiect to generation and corruption, respecting all things that haue life, and shall haue end. Aristotle saith, that nature in one respect is said to be the first and chief matter and subiect of euery thing that hath being, namely, of those things which haue in them the beginning of their owne mouing and mutation: and in another another respect, it is called the forme of any thing. But leauing the infinite disputations and curious inquirie made by the philosophers concerning this excellent matter, whereof we haue not here vnderaken to intreat, we say with Iustin Martyr, that Nature (in which the steps of the diuinity shine and are liuely represented) is that Spirit or diuine reason, which is the efficient cause of naturall workes, and the preserving cause of those things that haue beene, through the onely power of the heauenly Word, which is the workemaster of nature, and of the whole world, and hath infused into every thing a liuely vertue and strength, whereby it increaseth and preserveth it selfe by a naturall facultie. Or to speake more briefly, Nature is the order and continuance of the workes of God, obeying the Deitie, & his words and commandements, and borrowing her force and strength from thence, as from her fountaine and originall. In this nature thus defined, which respecteth all things created, we haue here to consider of and to handle particularly, according to our meaning at the first, the nature of man onely, which naturall Philosophers call the instinct and inclination of euery ones spirit. There is nothing more true, than that nature of her selfe leadeth men in some sort to that which is decent and honest: neither is learning able to shew any thing, which is not to be found in nature, whether we goe about to teach the end of man, which the Philosophers call the action of vertue, or whether we seeke out the causes and beginnings of other sciences. For there is no man so barbarous or wicked in all the world, who is not touched with honesty, and who retaineth not somewhat of the light of nature. Which may be clearly perceived by this, that a vertuous action pleaseth him, so that he is euen constrained to commend it. And if he might tastethereof neuer so little, not being fore possessed with other disordinate desires, no doubt but he would become such a one, as might purchase and deserve praise and commendation. But here we must acknowledge the first corruption of our nature, whereby it is inclined to pleasure, and to eschew labour, which are the wel-springs of vices, and of infinite euils. And if our nature should be suffered to runne with the bridle at liberty, whither soeuer it is driven by carnall desires, hauing none of them cut off by wise admonitions and liuely perswasions, there is no beast so vntamed or sauage, that would not be milder than man. Whereupon it followeth that nature must of necessity be tamed, and as it were mollified by the studie of good letters, and by the instruction of good Philosophicall reasons, which as they serue for nourishment and food to our mindes, so by them our manners and actions are framed and guided according to vertue and prudence, & we made able to learne how, by the compasse of reason, to attaine to mediocrity, wherein perfection consisteth, and to reiect excelsse, which is alwaies dangerous. A good plaier on a lute or viall toucheth no other strings than those that are touched by him that is most vnskilfull. Notwithstanding being taught in the beginning, hee knoweth afterward through vse what strings make that sound, which the eare iudgeth by the harmonie and agreeuent of sounds to be delectable, whereupon he is taken for his crafts-master. Euen so a perfect vertuous man vseth onely naturall gifts, but reason and practise bringeth them to their perfection. Euery good beginning commeth vnto vs by nature, the progresse and growth by the precepts of reason, and the accomplishment by vse and exercise. Nature without learning and good bringing vp is a blind thing. Learning without nature wanteth much, and vse without the two former is vnperfect. It is true (as Plato saith) that some may be found, that are of a strong and forceable nature, and thereby indued with reasonable good sense and iudgement (which is in man as the rudder in a ship) so that they make shew of great vertues. But those men are not without many great vices also, if they want education and learning: not vnlike to a good fat ground, which bringeth forth many good and bad hearbs together, if it be not well dressed. Now if this good nature be ill brought vp, without doubt it will spoile it selfe and become very pernicious. Scipio and Catiline were both high minded and couragious by nature, but forasmuch as the one was alwaies obedient to the lawes of his Common-wealth, and vsed his vertue as reason required, hee was accounted vertuous, and the other wicked and wretched for doing the contrary. You aske of me (saith Socrates in Xenophon) whether courage or greatnesse of heart proceede of nature or of learning. For my part I thinke, that as we see some borne with stronger bodies than others are, so by nature wee haue minds more fit to sustaine perils and aduersities than others haue. And that this is so, wee see many brought vp with the same manners, and instructed vnder like lawes, and yet some of them more hardy and bold then the rest. Notwithstanding there is no doubt but the goodnesse of nature is holpen by learning and instruction. It is certaine (saith Plutarke) that there is in all men some light of good and right iudgement, but yet the difference betweene Philosophers and the people.

Naturall vertues according to the Philosophers, who had no knowledge of mans fall. The diuision of nature.

What nature is.

The property and light of nature.

The corruption of nature.

Three things necessarie for the perfection of man.

The difference betweene Philosophers and the common common sort of men is great: because Philosophers have their iudgement more stayed and assured in dangers, whereas the vulgar sort haue not their hearts fortified and defended with such anticipations and resolute impressions aforehand. Albeit therefore many notable men (as Cicero saith) haue atchieued many braue and vertuous exploits being guided by their naturall iudgement onely, and by daily experience in affaires, yet infinite faults may be noted in them, especially in their behauiour and manner of life, which might haue beene amended and corrected by the knowledge of letters. Moreover the iudgement of man wauereth too easily to settle and resolue it selfe vpon any thing: yea it is driuen by a thousand occasions from the ground of her former discourses, if it be not built and laid vpon certaine knowledge and reason, which the study of wisdom teacheth vs. And as for that prudence, which is gotten onely by vse, and by a mans owne experience, it is too long, dangerous, and difficult, because it is not able to make vs wise but after our owne perill: and oftentimes whilest we seeke it, death maketh hast to prevent it, or else followeth it so neere, that we had neede of a second life to bestow about it. Thus we see that if there be any want in any one of these three, Nature, Reason and Vse, vertue also must needs faile and be vnperfect in that point. True it is, that a good naturall inclination deserueth more praise being without learning, than learning doth without it: because euen knowledge serueth many times for an occasion to the wicked, who abuse it maliciously, to further their vnpure purposes. Neuertheles, we can accuse nothing but there peruersenesse, which by reason of their ignorance, would not haue staied it selfe from vttering such pernicious effect in them, and peradventure worse. For in what measure soeuer it beyet (as Socrates said) they that haue beene well brought vp and instructed, are in some sort forced to moderate themselves. Besides, they that are not altogether well borne, yet beeing holpen by good training vp and exercise of vertue, they after a sort repaire and recouer the defect of nature. Idlenesse (saith Plutarke) annihilateth and corrupteth the goodnesse of nature, but diligence in good education, correcteth the naughtines thereof. And as we see, that drops of water falling vpon a hard stone maketh it hollow, and that iron and copper consume and weare onely with handling, and ground that is more vneuen and stonie than it ought, yet being manured and dressed, beareth faire and goodly fruit, and contrariwise, good ground becommeth vnfruitful, and woorse and woorse, the more it is left vnlaboured: euen so good manners and conditions are qualities, which in long proceesse of time are imprinted in the soule, and morall vertues are attained vnto through care, diligence, labour, and long exercise. Therefore although nature hath this property in all men, that it is in perpetuall motion through a weake instinct, and that in some stronger, in others weaker, which causeth her to aspire vnto and to desire the excellency of her first perfection, whereof she knoweth her selfe void, yet if she bee not alwaies holpen and driuen towards the better part, she will sooner suffer her selfe to be carried to the woorse. They are but little sparks (saith Cicero) which through vice and corrupt manners are so easily quenched, that the light of the appeareth not. And as the heat buried in the veines of a flint, seemeth rather dead then alieue, if the sparkles be not drawne forth by the Steele: so this immortall portion of celestiall fire, being the fountaine and first motiue of all knowledge, remaineth without any profit or commendable action, if it be not sharpened and set on worke. We are noe sooner borne, and taken in hand to be brought vp, as Plato saith, but we follow after wickednesse as if wee had sucked iniquity together with our nurses milke. Afterwards being committed by our fathers to the hands of teachers, we so inwrap our mindes with errors, that those weake seedes of vertue, which are in vs by nature, must needs give place to vanity, and to opinion. But if good wits finde good bringing vp, then they grow alwaies vp from better to better. Whereupon in my opinion that old prouerbe was not spoken without reason, that Education goeth beyond nature. Which thing when Lycurgus was desirous to let the Lacædomonians vnderstand, hee nourished two dogs of one and the same liter, vsing the one to hunt, & bringing vp the other in the kitchen. And when the people were gathered together, he spake vnto them in this manner: It is a matter of great importance (O ye Lacædomonians) to engender vertue in mens hearts by education, custome, and discipline, as I will let you see, and sensibly perceiue out of hand. Then he caused both the dogs to be brought, and casting off a hare on the one side, and setting a platter of broth on the other, and he let loose his dogs, of which the one followed after the hare, and the other ran to the broth. Thus fareth it (quoth he) with men, who may be made more vertuous by good education, than by nature. Neither will it profit them at all to descend of Hercules race, if they practise not those workes whereby in his life time hee grew to be most famous in the world, and if they exercise not themselves all the daies of their life

Three things
obscure in perfect vertue.

The defect of naturr is hol-
pen by good education.

The weaknes
of our naturall
inclination to goodnes.

A similitude

Lycurgus
example of two dogs.

the world, and if they exercise not themselves all the daies of their life in honest and vertuous actions. Furthermore, if we desire examples of this, that learning, institution and education availe greatly to conforme and frame our hearts and wils to vertue, yea to alter and make them better. Socrates confesseth in Plato, that by nature he was inclined to vices, and yet Philosophie made him as perfect and excellent aman as any was in the world. Themistocles in his youth (as himselfe confessed) for want of discipline was carried away by his desires like to a young vnbridled colt, vntill that by Miltiades example, who was then famous amongst the Gracians, he caused the viuacie and quicknesse of his spirite, and the ambition which naturally was in him, to attend vpon vertue. Besides, education and custome haue power to change not onely the naturall inclination of some particular men, but also of whole countries; as the histories of most nations in the world declare vnto vs: and namely of the Germanes, who in the time of Tacitus had neither law, nor religion, nor knowledge, nor forme of common wealth, whereas now they giue place to no nation for good institution in all things. Let vs not then bee discouraged or faint by knowing our naturall imperfections, seeing that through labour and diligence wee may recouer that which is wanting: but happy is that man, and singularly beloued of God, to whom good birth and like bringing vp are granted together. It followeth now to discourse particularly of the manner of good education and instruction of youth: but this will come in more fitly, when we shall intreat of Oeconomie. And yet seeing we are in the discourse of mans nature, I thinke it will not be from the purpose, nor without profit, (if to make vs more seuerer censurers of our owne faults) we note, that although our behauiour be chiefly knowne by the effects, as a tree by the fruit, yet many times a mans naturall inclination is better perceived in a light matter, as in a word, in a pastime, or in some other free and priuate busines, wherein vertue or vice ingrauen in the soule may bee sooner espied, than in greater actions and workes done publicly: because in these matters shame or constraint commonly cause men to vse dissimulation. Howbeit this also is true, that the more power and authority a man hath, when he may alleadge his owne will for all reason, the inward affection of his heart is then best discovered. For such an vnbrideled licence mooueth all, euen to the very depth and bottome of his passions, and causeth all those secret vices, that are hidden in his soule to be fully and evidently seene. Whereupon it followeth that great and noble men ought aboue all others to learne vertue, and to study to liue well, especially seeing they haue all those requisite helpes and commodities, through want of which most men are hindered from attaining thereunto. Let vs therefore learne by our present discourse to know, that the nature of al men by reason of the corruption of sinne, is so depraued, corrupted, and vnperfect, that euen the best men, amongst many imperfections carry about them some enuy, iealousie, emulation and contention, against some or other, and rather against their very friends. This did Demas a noble man and greatly conuersant in matters of estate, declare vnto the councell in the city of Chio, after a ciuill dissention wherein hee had followed that part which ouercame. For he perswaded those of his side not to banish all their aduersaries out of the city, but to leaue some of them after they had taken from them all meanes of dooing more harme: least (quoth he vnto them) we begin to quarrell with our friends, hauing no more enemies to contend withall. For this cause we must fortifie our selues with vnderstanding and knowledge through labor and study of good letters, that we may restraine and repress so many motions mingled together in our soules. Let vs know moreouer, that seeing our nature is assaulted & prouoked by a vehement inclination to do any thing whatsoever, it is a very hard matter to withdraw and keepe it backe by any force, no not by the strength or feare of any lawes, if in due conuenient time we frame not within it a habit of vertue, hauing first wished to be wel borne. But howsoeuer it be, let vs indeauor to be well borne through custome and exercise in vertue (which will bee vnto vs as it were another nature) vsing the meanes of good education and instruction in wisdom, whereby our soules shall be made conquerors ouer all hurtfull passions, and our mindes moderate and staied, that in all our doings, sayings and thoughts wee passe not the bounds of the duty of a vertuous man.

Socrates and Themistocles were by nature vicious, but by education vertuous.

The Germanes much changed by institution.

A mans naturall inclination may be espied in a smal matter.

Great men ought especially to learne vertue.

The end of the fourth daies worke.

G

THE

Of Temperance.

The fifth daies worke.

of Temperance. Chap. 17.

A SER.

The Greeke word κόσμος vsed by Pythagoras, and translated by the Latines Mundus, and of vs World, signifieth a comely order.

No vertue can be without temperance.

The true markes and ornaments of a king.

What temperance is.

What Decorum or comeliness is.

THE diuine excellencie of the order, of the equall and wonderfull constancy of the parts of the world, as well in the goodly and temperate moderation of the seasons of the yeare, as in the mutuall coniunction of the elements, obeying altogether with a perfect harmony the gracious and soveraigne government of their Creator, was the cause that Pythagoras first called al the compasse of this vniuersall frame by this name of World, which without such an excellent disposition would bee but disorder and a world of confusion. For this word World signifieth as much as Ornament, or a well disposed order of things. Now as a constant and temperate order is the foundation thereof, so the ground-worke and preservation of mans happy life, for whom all things were made, is the vertue of Temperance, which containeth the desires and inclinations of the soule within the compasse of mediocrity, and moderateth all actions whatsoever. For this cause, having hitherto according to our iudgement sufficiently discoursed of the liuer of the fountaine of honesty, I thinke we ought to set downe here in the second place (although it be contrary to the opinion of many Philosophers, this vertue of Temperance, saying with Socrates, that she is the ground-worke & foundation of all vertues.

A M A N A. As a man cannot be temperate if first he be not prudent, because every vertuous action proceedeth of knowledge: so no man can bee strong and valiant, if he be not first temperate, because he that hath a notable and great courage without moderation, will attempt a thousand euils and mischiefes, and will soone grow to be rash and heady. Likewise iustice cannot be had without Temperance, seeing it is the chiefe point of a iust man, to haue his soule free from perturbations. Which cannot be done except he be temperate, whose proper subiect the soule is.

A R A M. Heroicall vertue (saith Plato) is made perfect by the mixture and ioyning together of Temperance and Fortitude, which being separated will at length become vices. For a temperate man that is not couragious, easily waxeth to be a coward and faint-hearted: and a noble heart not temperate, becommeth rash and presumptuous. Let vs then heare ACHITOBS discourse of this Temperance, so excellent and necessary a vertue.

ACHITOBS. Agapetus a man of great skill, writing to the Emperour Iustinian, amongst other things had this saying: We say that thou art truly and rightly both Emperour and king, so long as thou canst command and master thy desires and pleasures, and art beset and decked with the crowne of Temperance, and clothed with the purple robe of Iustice. For other principalities end by death, whereas this kingdome abideth for euer: yea others are many times the cause of perdition to the soule, but this procureth a certaine and an assured safety. When wee haue considered well of the worthy effects and fruits of this vertue of Temperance, no doubt but wee will subscribe to this wise mans opinion, and to as many as haue written of the praises and roialties of that vertue. Temperance (saith Pythagoras) is that light, which driueth away round about her the darkenesse and obscuritie of passions. Shee is (saith Socrates) the wholesomest vertue of all. For she preserveth both publicly and privately humane society, she lifteth vp the soule miserably throwne downe in vice, and restoreth her againe into her place. Temperance (saith Plato) is a mutuall consent of the parts of the soule from whence springeth Continencie) causing all disordered and vnbrideled desires to take reason for a rule and direction. Temperance (saith Cicero) is the mother of all dutie and honesty. It is the property of iustice not to violate the right of another man, and of Temperance, not so much as to offend him. In Temperance a man may behold modesty, with the priuation of every perturbation in the soule, as also a way how to frame all thiags according to that which is decent or seemely, which the Latines call Decorum, being a conuenience meete for the excellencie of man, and that wherein his nature differeth from other liuing creatures. For as bodily beauty mooueth and reioyceth the eyes, by reason of the goodly and seemely composition of all the members wherein all the parts with a certaine grace agree together: so this decency, which is honesty and seemeliness, shining in mans life by his good order, constancie and moderation both indeede and word, mooueth and draweth

Of Temperance.

75

The definition of temperance.

What passions are ruled by temperance.

Four parts of temperance.

The commendation of temperance.

Wonderfull examples of temperance Scipio. Africanus.

draweth the hearts of those amongst whom we live. This vertue then of Temperance is a steadfast and moderate rule of reason over concupiscence, and over other vehement motions of the minde. But she commaundeth chiefly over those two perturbations of the soule, grounded vpon the opinion of good, I meane, Unbridled desire, and unmeasurable ioy, whereof heretofore we made mention. Thus we see, that no man can finde out any thing that is so excellent and woonderfull as temperance, the guide and governor of the soule, which because of hir exceeding great light cannot be hid in darknesse: which compelleth vs to follow reason, bringeth peace to our mindes, and mollifieth them as it were by concord and agreement. She serueth for a bridle to restrain all pleasures, and in the midst of them maketh man good and vertuous. She serueth for a knife to cut off all superfluous, vaine, and vnecessary desires as well of the soule as of the body: and is as it were a rule directing naturall and necessary desires by fit choice of times, and by temperate vse of mediocrity. Wherefore we may say, that this vertue of temperance comprehendeth in it all the other vertues: that through hir a harmony, concordance, and coniunction of them all is made: that she ministreth vnto them alloccasions of beginning, and being begun confirmeth them by a firme and steadfast safety. Briefly, Temperance (as Plato saith) is a generall surname of those vertues, whereby a man moderateth his owne affections, and frameth his gesture and behauiour in some sort, that no effeminate or loose manners, no clownish or vnciuill fashions are seene in him. O saith (Euripides) how is temperance to be esteemed, which is the cause of such great glory & honour amongst men. This vertue is diuided into foure principall parts, into Continencie, Clemencie, Modesty, and Order. Continency is that part, whereby concupiscence and desire are gouerned by counsell and reason. Clemency, is that, whereby the mindes of men, rashly carried away with the hatred of any one, and with desire to hurt him, are kept backe by gentlenesse. Modesty is that, whereby honest shame and bashfulnes purchaseth good and due deserued renowne. Order is a disposition of all things in their conuenient place. All these vertues are vndoubtedly ioyned with temperance, and consist as well in action, as in the discourting of the mind. For by ioining a certaine mediocrity and order vnto those things that belong vnto this life, we preferue honesty and duty. Every vertue (saith Iamblicus, a notable man) despiseth whatsoever is fraile, mortall, and momentany, but temperance more then the rest: because she contemneth, and through chastity beateth downe all those delights & pleasures, whereby the soule (as Plato saith) is fastened vnto the body as it were with a naile. Therefore if temperance rooteth out whatsoever shee findeth vnperfect and subiect to perturbations, how shall she not therewithall make vs perfect? This is the meaning of that which the Poets would giue vs to vnderstand vnder that fained fable of Bellerophon, who being aided by modesty put to death, that Chimera, and all other cruell and sauage monsters. But as long as the immoderate force of our affections reigneth in vs, it suffereth not men to be men, but draweth them to the ill fauored nature of beasts void of reason. Contrariwise, this holy moderation, whereby pleasures are contained within certaine bounds, preferueth families together, and citties: and which is more draweth vs in some sort neere to the diuine nature. Thus we see that she is the foundation and ornament of all good things. If we should endeavour to rehearse here all those excellent praises, which Philosophers giue to this vertue of temperance, because of hir woorthy effects and wholesome fruits, which she bringeth forth in the soule, we were not able to performe it, although we should bestow this whole daies worke about it. But because in these queles of our discourses, as well in the handling of vices as of vertues, we may consider furthermore how necessary temperance is, and what profit it bringeth to the whole life of man, we will content our selues to learne of Plato, that temperance is the pillar of fortitude, the helmet and shield against luxuriousnes, the keeper & guide of the eies, the preseruer of good will, the razor of euill thoughts, the corrector of vntamed desires, an enemy to the disordered will of the soule: that it shunneth naturall desires, hindreth dishonest actions, breedeth continency, mollifieth mens hearts, and giueth reason for a rule in all things. Now let vs note out amongst the ancients, some examples of the force and greatnesse of this vertue of Temperance, which hath made many excellent men woorthy of eternall renowne, Scipio Africanus, Generall of the Romanes, at the taking of the city of Carthage had a yong damsell to this prisoner, of rare and excellent beautie. And when he vnderstood of what great calling she came, and how hir parents not long before had betrothed hir to a great Lord of Spaine, he commanded that he should be sent for, and restored hir vnto him, without abusing hir in any respect, although he was in the flower of his age, and had free and soveraigne authority. Moreouer, he gaue for a dowrie with her the money that was brought vnto him for her ranfome. An act no doubt of great continency in a victorious captaine towards his captiue, whereof Anlus Gellius, ioyning it with that which we reade of Alexander the Great, maketh this question, whether of the twaine behaued himfelfe more vertuously. For Alexander hauing vanquished in battell king Darius, and retaining as prisoner his wife, which excelled all the dames of Asia in beautie, and was withall but yong in yeares, the victorious monarch being but yong also, and hauing no superiour aboue him to whom hee was bound to giue an account of himfelfe, had notwithstanding such great knowledge how to command himfelfe, that albeit by his acquaintance and friends he was sufficiently certified of the excellent beautie of this Lady, yet he bare no ill thought towards her, but sent to comfort her, and caused her to be entertained and attended on with no lesse honour and reuerence, than if she had bene his owne sister. And to auoide all suspition and occasion of euill, he would not see her, nor suffer her to be brought before him. The temperance of Cyrus king of Persia is also very famous amongst the historiographers. For when one of his minions stirred him vp to goe and see faire Panthea, saying that her rare beauty was well worthy to be seene: That is the cause (answered this yong Prince vnto him) why I will altogether abstaine at this present from beholding her at thy perswasion, least she her selfe hereafter should induce me through the remembrance of her perfection to goe to her, and to cause me in the meane time to let slip many affaires of great importance. Architas was so temperate, that he would not so much as vtter one filthy word: and if he were driuen to declare it vpon some iust occasion, then he wrote it, shewing by this silence, how dishonest a thing it was to commit that, which being onely vttered ought to cause a man to blush. Xenocrates, was endued with such a great gift of continencie, that Phryna a very faire and notable curtisan laid a wager with certaine yong men, that if shee lay with him, she would cause him to breake his temperance. But Xenocrates, hauing granted her the halfe of his bed, for examples sake to those youths, was nothing more moued for any thing that shee could doe. Whereupon Phryna being very angry made answer in the morning to those that demanded the wager of her, That shee lay not with a man but with a blocke. Isaas the Philosopher beeing asked of one that looked vpon a very faire woman, whether shee seemed not vnto him to be faire, made this answer, My friend, I am not diseased any more in my eies, and so would not behold her at all. Caius Gracchus the Romaine, as long as he gouerned Sardinia, would neuer suffer a woman to set foote in his house, except it were to demand iustice. Antigonus king of Macedonia, hearing that his sonne was lodged in a house where there were three very faire daughters, made an edict, that no Courtier should lodge in any matrons house that had daughters, if she were vnder fiftie yeares of age. Pompeius would neuer speake to the wife of Demetrius his freeman, because shee was so faire, that he feared least he should bee in loue with her. In the number of these ancient, famous and vertuous men, that great captaine Francis Sforce duke of Millan deserueth to be placed, whose continencie, was wonderfull, euen when he was yet yong, and Generall of the Florentine armie, at the taking of Casanoua. For as certaine souldiers had taken a maide of an excellent beauty, and at her intreaty and earnest request had brought her before him, Sforce asked the maide why shee desired so earnestly to come before him. To this end (quoth she) that thou mightest deliuer me from the souldiers, and that I might please thee. Sforce seeing her to be very faire, accepted of her, and at night caused her to lie with him. But as hee would haue drawne neere vnto her, the maide cast her selfe on both her knees before him without the bed, and besought him to saue her virginity, and to restore her to him vnto whom shee was made sure. Whereunto Sforce willingly agreed, beholding the abundance of her teares, which were testimonies of the chastitie of her heart. Will we haue examples of this vertue of temperance in other circumstances of her effects? Ambition truly is the most vehement and strongest passion of all those wherewith mens mindes are troubled, and yet many notable and vertuous men haue so mastered it by the force of their temperance, that oftentimes they accepted of offices and estates of supreme authority, as it were by compulsion and with griefe: yea some altogether contemned and willingly forsooke them. Pompey receiuing letters of absolute authoritie from the Senate to conduct the warre against the two kings Tigranes and Mithridates cried out: O God, shall I neuer come to the end of so many trauels? Shall enuie alwaies hold me in such sort as her slave, that new and great charges daily laying holde vpon me, I cannot ridde my selfe of these soares, to the end I may liue sweetely with my wife and children at my house in the countrey? Pittacus one of the Sages of Græcia, beeing constrained to take vpon him the charge of an army, accepted it with great griefe, saying before them all: O how hard

Alexander.Cyrus.Architas.Xenocrates.Isaas.C. Gracchus.Antigonus.Pompeius.
P. Sforce.

The temperance of Pompey against ambition.

Pittacus.

hard a matter it is to bee a good man ! Pedareus the Lacedemonian having escaped to bee Pedareus, elected one of those three hundreth Senators, which governed the estate of Sparta, returned from the assembly very ioyfull, saying, That it was an easie matter to finde in the citie three hundreth better and more honest men than himselfe. What did Scipio, of whom we haue al- Scipio, ready spoken, after he had performed a thousand glorious facts for the greatnesse of the Ro- mane Empire ? He forced the nature of ambition, which is alwaies carried with a desire of new glory, and changed the rest of his life into quietnesse : and abandoning the affaires of estate, he went and dwelt in the countrey. Torquatus and Fabritius absented themselves from Torquatus & Fabritius, Rome, the one because he would not haue the dictatorship, and the other the consulship. It is not long since Aimans duke of Sauoy willingly gaue over his duchy into his sons hands, and became an hermit : and after that being chosen Pope, he gaue vp the seate willingly to ano- Aimans, ther. Amurathes, the second of that name, Emperor of the Turkes, after he had obtained infi- Amurathes, nite victories, and vanquished the king of Hungarie, became a monke of the straightest sect amongst them. The great Emperor Charles the fift, did he not resigne his Empire into the hands of the princes electors, and withdrew himselfe into a monastery ? But what neede we maruell at the knowledge of these examples, which shew the effects of this vertue of tempe- Charles the fift, rance against strange passions arising in vs, proceeding of our nature corrupted with sinne, and ruling in vs through the ignorance of that which is good, when we may see, that temperance doth not only serue for a good guide and schoolemaster to our passions, and to our naturall and necessary desires and pleasures that are borne with man from the beginning, to rule them with mediocrity & reason, but also compelleth them oftentimes to submit themselves, therby triumphing over their necessity, although (as Thales said) it be inuisible ? And then how much more easie will it be to restraine, yea, wholly to overthrow the foolish desires of vanitie ? Sois a Captaine of great renowne, and king of Lacedemonia, being besieged in a Sois, narrow strait, and very craggie place voide of water, after he had endured the necessity of thirst to the vttermost, he offered to the Clitorians his enemies, to restore vnto them all their land, which he had wonne of them, so that he and all his company might drinke of a foun- taine neere vnto them. Which being thus agreed vpon betweene them, he led all his men thither, and said vnto them, that if any one would abstaine from drinking, he would resigne his royalty of Lacedemonia vnto him. But none would accept thereof, insomuch that all dranke except himselfe, who going last downe into the fountaine did nothing but refresh himselfe, and wet his mouth a little on the out side, in the presence of his enemies, not drink- ing one drop thereof. By meanes whereof he maintained, that he was not bound at all vnto his promise, because all dranke not : and so he continued the warre to the great honour and advantage of his countrey. Lyfimachus, one of Alexanders successors in the Empire, had not Lyfimachus, so great power over the like passions. For being compelled by thirst, hee deliuered himselfe and all his army to the Getes his enemies. After he had drunke, being prisoner, O God (quoth hee) how faint-hearted am I, that for so short a pleasure haue deprived my selfe of so great a kingdome ! Cato the yonger, traueilling ouer the deserts of Lybia, endured very sore thirst. Cato, And when a souldier offered him a litle water in his motion, he threw it vpon the ground in the presence of them all, to the end his army might know, that he would be in no better estate than they. Truly a worthy example for all Captaines : for by so doing, that which would hardly haue quenched the thirst of one, restrained it in a whole army. The Emperor Rodolphus, Rodolphus, who of base estate attained to this dignity by his vertue, vpon the like occasion made an an- swer worthy to be remembred. For when a full cup of beere was brought vnto him in the war which he had against Ottocarins king of Bohemia, at what time he was in a place where his whole army was greatly troubled with thirst, he would not receiue it, but said vnto the bearer thereof, That his thirst was for all his army, and not onely for himselfe, and therefore that cup of beere was not sufficient to quench it. We reade of Socrates that whensoever he felt himselfe Socrates, very thirstie, he would not drinke before he had spilt and cast away the first pitcher of water, which he drew for himselfe out of the well, to this end (as he said) that hee might acquaint his sensuall appetite to expect the conuenient time of reason. Seeing therefore by such exam- ples, and infinite others contained in histories, we haue certaine and assured prooue of the force of temperance ouer naturall and necessary passions, how credible is it, that he may haue far greater power over those, other passions that came from without vs, after we fell from our first creation ? Let vs therefore conclude by our present discourse, that the vertue of Tempe- rance is very necessary and profitable for a happy life, as that which hath this propertie belong- ing vnto it, to be skilfull in chusing a mediocritie in pleasures and griefes, in keeping that which is honest and vertuous, and in shunning of vice, especially of carnall pleasures, although shee serue also to moderate all the actions of our life. And if a prudent man auoideth dishonest things in publike places, a temperate man goeth farther, eschewing them in solitary and obscure corners. If iustice suffereth no violence to be vsed, or wrong offered to any, Temperance further permitteth none to offend any: and therefore is very well called of the Philosophers, the mother of all dutie and honesty.

Of Intemperance, and of Stupiditie or Blockishnes. Chap. 18.

ACHITOB. Being instructed in the vertue of temperance, which, as well as her fellow vertues, consisteth in mediocritie, we are now to consider of her extremities and vices that are in excesse and in defect. Intemperance is cleane contrary vnto it, which, as Cicero saith, inflameth, prouoketh, and troubleth the tranquillitie of the spirit: but concerning the defect, I find no proper name giuen vnto it by the Philosophers. But I leaue the handling of this matter vnto my companions.

Predominant passions in Intemperance.

A SER. Intemperance (saith Plato) was so called of the ancients, because that peruerse, cruell, great and terrible beast Lust, exerciseth therein more power than it ought, as also disordered ioy doth the like. Whereupon it commeth, that intemperate men enjoying the pleasure of their senses, imagine falsely that true felicity accompanieth them therein. But truly whosoever obeyeth bodily pleasures, serueth most cruell tyrants.

A MANA. Nature (saith Archebas) hath giuen no plague more pernicious and hurtfull than the pleasure of the body. For whereas God hath bestowed vpon man nothing more excellent than the soule and reason, there is none so great an enemy to this heavenly gift as voluptuousnesse: because where luxuriousnesse and concupiscence reigne, there temperance can haue no place: yea, all vertues are banished out of their kingdome. But let vs heare A RAM discourse of these vices here propounded vnto vs.

Some finnes are punishments of other finnes.

Rom. I.

A RAM. I reade in Plato not long since, that there were many finnes, which ought rather to be called punishments of other finnes going before, than finnes. According to the course and sequele of his speech, if my memory be good, I thinke his meaning is, that men suffering themselves to be ouertaken of vice in the beginning, as it were in sport, neuer take heede vnto themselves, vntill they be wholly abandoned and giuen over (as Saint Paul saith) to their vile affections, and pleasures of their hearts, in all vncleannesse and turbulent passions of Ignominie and reproch. Inso much that after they haue opened the gate to their concupiscences, and to the desires of the flesh; of whooremongers, couetous persons, reuengers, of their owne wrongs, belly-gods, gluttons, and from other lesse imperfections, being notwithstanding foule & beastly, they become Sodomites, Church-robbers, parricides, Epicures, Atheists, and full of all execrable villanies, which are comprehended vnder this word of intemperance. Intemperance is very well defined of the Philosophers to be an overflowing in voluptuousnesse, forcing and compelling all reason in such sort, that no consideration of losse or hinderance is able to stay or keepe backe him that is through long custome infected with vice, from betaking himselfe of set purpose, and as a man would say, willingly and desperately, to the execution of all his desires and lusts, as hee that placeth his sole and soueraigne good therein, seeking for no other contentation than in that thing, which bringeth to him and to his senses delight & pleasure. For this cause Aristotle distinguisheth betweene intemperance and incontinencie (albeit many take them indifferently one for another) saying, that an incontinent man chooseth not, neither consulteth when he offendeth, as one that knoweth full well that the euill he committeth is euill, and had resolved with himselfe not to follow it, but being overcome with perturbations, yeeldeth thereunto. Whereas the intemperate man committeth euill of election and settled purpose to follow it, accounting it a good thing, and to be desired; and this commeth through a long custome and habite of vice, which is the cause that he neuer repenteth him of the fact, but taketh pleasure therein: whereas on the contrary side the repentance of an incontinent man followeth hard at the heeles of his sinne and transgression. In this manner then proceedeth Intemperance, vntill men are wholly addicted and giuen over to vice. This is the cause why the sensuall and vnreasonable part of the soule contendeth no more with reason, which then is as it were starke dead, and suffereth it selfe to be carried to vgly and vnaturall vices, and to all fleshly desires: because the diuine part of the soule is weakened in such sort, that she hath no more strength, nor feeling of her essence, which is an enemy to vice. And thus accustoming her selfe to follow

What intemperance is.

The difference betweene an incontinent and an intemperate man.

follow nothing but the will of the body, she forsaketh God altogether, who seeing himselfe forsaken, leaueth her to her concupiscences, from whence is engendred this exceeding luxuriousnes euen against nature, this mortall, venomous and bloody enny, this furious & barbarous cruelty, this insatiable couetousnes, this blood-thirsty ambition, and other incurable diseases of the soule, too well knowne amongst vs, whereof the sequels of our discourses will afford a more ample knowledge vnto vs. Thus we see that intemperance (as Cicero saith) is the mother of all the perturbations in the soule, and causeth man (as Socrates said) to differ nothing from a beast: because he neuer thinketh vpon that which is best, but onely seeketh how to satisfie and content the vnbrideled desires of pleasure and lust, hauing no more vse of reason than beasts haue. Intemperance (saith Eusebius) corrupteth the soule, and destroyeth the body, because it constraineth a man, for loue of pleasure, and desire to satisfie it, to do that which he knoweth well is dishonest and vile. And as the windes torment and tosse that shippe which they haue seized vpon, now here now there, and will not suffer it to be guided by her maister: so Intemperance moouing and compelling the soule to disobey reason, suffereth her not to enioy tranquillity and rest, which is an assured haue of harbour from all windes. Intemperance (saith Aristotle) is a vice that proceedeth from the couering part of man, whereby we desire to enioy vnlawfull pleasures. It is her property to choose the fruition of hurtfull and vile pleasures, supposing none to liue happilie, but such as passe away their life in them. This vice is vnseperably accompanied with the troubling of all Order, with impudencie, vncemelines, luxuriousnes, sloth negligence, and dissolutenes. In a word, Intemperance remooueth and troubleth all tranquillity of the mind, and leadeth men to all kind of wickednesse, the end of one vice being the beginning of another: which Socrates called the punishment of sinne, that doth not cleanse but kill the malefactor. There is no kind of dissolutenes wherein the intemperate man plungeth not himselfe, no wickednes or cruelty, which he executeth not for the satisfying of his vncleane desires and vn-satiable lusts; no feare or imminent danger, which can draw him backe. And further, he labourerth oftentimes to procure, that glorie and honour should be giuen to his most cursed and execrable misdemeanors, imagining and fancying with himselfe dreames answerable and agreeable to that he most desireth. Wherein he resembleth mad men, who haue alwaies before their eies those Ideas and shapes, which worke the apprehension of their furie, and hold them in the vision and inward view of that which most troubleth their diseased braine. But to make this vice of Intemperance more odious vnto vs, and to mooue vs more earnestly to fly those causes that nourish it, labouring to cut off all those branches and hurtfull fruites, which it bringeth with it, as superfluitie, gluttony, ambition, pride, and other excesses in all kinde of delight, whereof we wil intreate more particularly hereafter, let vs call to minde examples of such pernicious effects, as it hath brought forth in them that voluntarily submitted themselves vnder her tyrannous gouernment. Although we should search throughout all ancient histories, yet hardly could we alledge a more euident testimonie, than the life of Helio-gabalus: because there is no kinde of cursed mischiefe, of detestable lust, of iniustice and of cruelty wherewith he was not defiled. Yea, he fell into such a furious frensie of vice, that seeking to become a woman, and to be married to one of his minions, thinking in that sexe better to satisfie his beastlinesse, he appareled himselfe after such a fashion, that he was neither man nor woman. And knowing it impossible for him by reason of his impietie and corrupt life to escape a miserable end and violent death (which ought rather to haue binne vnto him an occasion of amendment) he was so bewitched with intemperance, that he prepared poysons ready at hand to poyson himselfe withall, if he perceived himselfe pressed of his enemies. And to make his death luxurious according to his desire, he kept his poysons in vessels made of precious stones. He provided also silken halters to hang himselfe withall, if hee saw that more expedient for him, than to be poysoned: or if he should thinke it better to murder himselfe, he kept for that purpose kniues made of precious mettals. Likewise he caused a high tower all gilded to be built, and al to choose his death as fittest occasion should be offered. In the mean while he gaue not ouer that execrable kinde of life, which through Gods iust iudgement he ended, being deprived of all those meanes wherewith hee desired to serue his owne turne in his death. For he was strangled by the souldiers of his guard, who trailed him in that manner through all places of the cittie of Rome. Nero, one of his predecessors, was little better then he. For he slew a Romane Consul called Atticus, that he might haue the free vse of his wife: and pleased himselfe so much in his cruelty, that he was the murderer of his own mother, brother, sister, and of two wiues which he had, named Othania and Poppa. Like-

A fit similitude.

The companions of Intemperance.

Intemperate men resemble mad folkes.

Helio-gabalus.Nero.

wife he put to death his Schoolemaster Seneca, and many other good men. But his end resembled not his life. For being hated of all and sought for to be slaine, hee killed himselfe.

Commodus. Commodus an other Emperor, not finding wherewith to satisfie his intemperancy in three hundred concubines, and three hundred buggerers, which he kept in his palace committed incest with his owne sisters. Caligula also did the like, but the one of them was slaine by his wife, and the other by his concubine. Proculus a Romane Emperor, was so much giuen to lust, that he bragged how in fifteene daies he had gotten with child a hundred virgins of Sarmatia, which he had taken prisoners in the war. Chilpericus the first, king of France, to the end he might the better enioy a whore called Fredegonda, whom afterwards he married, compelled his first wife named Andenora, to become a religious woman, and put to death two children which he had by her, through the counsell of his said concubine. Then having in his second marriage taken to wife Galsonda daughter to the king of Spaine, he caused her to bee strangled, and married Fredegonda, who perceiuing afterwar that he pored in himselfe this loosenes of life, and offensiue kind of government, caused him to be slaine. A iust punishment suffered by God for his intemperance. Xerxes monarch of the Persians, was so intemperate and giuen to lust, that he propounded rewards for those that could inuent some new kind of pleasure. And therefore comming into Græcia with an infinite number of men to subdue it, he was ouercome and repulsed by a small number, as being an effeminate and faint-hearted man. Epicurus a learned Philosopher was so intemperate, that he placed the soueraine Good and Felicity in pleasure. Sardanapalus monarch of Babylon, the first of the foure Empires, was so addicted to lust and intemperance, that he stirred not all day long from the company of women, being apparelled as they were, and spinning purple. Wherby he became so odious, that two of his Lieutenants iudging him y^e worthy to command ouer Asia, and ouer so many good men as were vnder his Empire, raised his subiects against him, and ouercame him in battell. Whereupon despairing of his safety, he caused a great Tabernacle of wood to be set vp in a sure place within the cloister of his pallace, and compassed it round about with great store of dryewood. Then he caused his wife and his concubines whom he loved best, to enter into it, and all the wealth he had to be brought thither. This done shutting himselfe within it, his Eunuches and seruants according to the oath which he had taken of them, put fire to the said frame, and so this miserable king of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, with all that was with him, was suddenly consumed with fire, and ended his monarchy, which his victorious lieutenants deuided betwixt them, the one taking himselfe for king of Babylon, the other of Media. Antonius one of Cæsars successors in the Empire, procured his owne ruine through intemperance and loosenesse, and stirred vp against himselfe, the enuie and murmuring of the Romanes for his retchlesnesse in feats of armes in that warre ouer which he was Generall against the Parthians. For to the end hee might quickly returne to his concubine Cleopatra Queene of Egypt, hee hazarded all in such sort, that without doing any thing worthy his first reputation, he lost more than twenty thousand of his owne men. Afterward Octauius his companion in the Empire, being armed against him, that hee might reuenge the iniury which he had done him in forsaking his sister whom he had wedded, to liue in his vnclennes, gaue him battell: wherein Antonius seeing his friend Cleopatra flye, who had borne him company in that warre, followed her with three-score of his owne gallies, albeit the fight was yet equall, and the victory doubtfull. Thus he betrayed those that fought for him, to follow her, who already had begun his destruction, to the end she might accomplish the same, as indeed it fell out after. For being besieged within Alexandria by the said Octauius, and without hope of safety, he thrust himselfe through the body with his sword, whereof he died: and Cleopatra also procured her owne death by the biting of the serpent Aspis. Boleslaus the second, king of Polonia, being giuen to all vncleanenes and filthinesse, made no doubt to take women by violence from their husbands. Whereupon the Bishop of Cracovia often admonished him thereof, and when, by reason of his obstinate perseuerance, he proceeded against him even with excommunication, he was carried headlong with such fury, that he killed this holy man. After that his subiects comming against him, he was constrained to flie into Hungary, where falling mad, he slew himselfe. The Emperor Adrian tooke such glory and pride in all execrable vices, that he commanded a temple with a sumptuous tombe to be made for a naughty man named Antinous, whom he had miserably abused in his life. In our time Iohannes a Casa Archbishop of Beneuento, and Legate in Venice, wrote a booke in praise of the abominable vice of Sodomitry. Sigismundus Malatesta, Lord of a part of Romainolaa prouince of Italy, strived to haue carnall knowledge of his sonne Robert, who who thrusting his poinado into his fathers bosome, reuenged that great wickednes. By these examples and infinite others, whereof histories are full, it appeareth sufficiently, that man burning with Intemperance, careth not at what price, with what shame, hurt, or hinderance, he may come to the execution and practise of all such pleasure and delight, as he propoundeth to himselfe. As if he purpose to haue his fame continue for euer, he will not sticke to do it, although it be by some notable wickednes. And thus we reade of him that burnt the Temple of Diana, which was accounted the fifth wonder of the world, and was two hundred and eight and twenty yeares in building by the Amazons within the city of Ephesus in Asia. The planks thereof were all of Cedar wood, and the doores and garnishing of the walles of Cyprus. This wretched caitife confessed, that he put fire to that sumptuous building for no other cause, than to leaue his fame and renowne behind him in the world: but commandement was given that none should set downe his name in writing. Neuertheles he is named Erostratus, by Solinus and Strabo: from whence came that prouerbe, This is the renowne of Erostratus, vsed when any man seeketh to be famous by a wicked act, which we may also apply to all intemperate men. As touching the defect of Temperance, whereof mention was made in the beginning of our present discourse, and which hath no proper name, but vnproperly is called by some Stupidity or senselesnes, it is rarely found amongst men, who by nature are giuen to pleasure, and carried away with all kinds of desires and lusts. For where shall we find any so dull and blockish, that hath no feeling of pleasure, and that is not moued with glory and honour? Such a man may be truly taken and accounted as one void of sense and feeling, and like to a blocke. Neither doth it belong to Temperance to be deprived of all desires, but to master them. For that man (as Cicero saith) that neuer had experience of pleasures and delights, neither hath any feeling of them, ought not to be called temperate, as he that hath done nothing which may testifie his continency and modesty. Thus ye see we haue no matter offered whereabout to bestow time in reproouing this vice of defect, from which men are too carefull to keepe themselves. But to come to the conclusion of our discourse, we say with Aristotle, that concupiscences and desires change the body, and make the soule outrageous: that so many as are infected with such a pernicious and damnable vice as Intemperance is, are no men, but monsters in nature, leading a life altogether like to that of brute beasts, which being destitute of all reason, know nothing better or more honest than pleasure: and hauing no knowledge of the iustice of God, neither reuerencing the beauty of vertue, bestow all the courage, craft and force that nature hath giuen them, to satisfie & to accomplish their desires. So that if death brought with it an end of all sense and feeling, and an vtter abolishing of the soule, as well to men as to beasts, intemperate folkes should seeme to gaine much by enioying their desires and lusts during their life time, and to haue good cause to waxe old, and euen to melt in their foule and filthy pleasures. But seeing we know (for truly he that doubteth hereof, is very ignorant and most miserable) that sense and feeling remaine after death, and that the soule dieth not with the body, but that punishment, yea euermorelasting paine is prepared for the wicked, let vs be carefull to doe the will of our Father which is in heauen, whilst we haue time, that in the triumphing day of his eternall Sonne, we may not heare to our confusion, that sentence of his mouth, Depart from me ye workers of iniquity. At which time, the iust shall shine as the Sun in the kingdome of God, and the wicked shall be cast headlong into euermorelasting fire, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

The Temple of Diana was burnt by Erostratus.

Of Stupidity.

Luke 13.27.

Of Sobriety and Frugality. Chap. 19.

ARAM. *S*ocrates vsed to dispute earnestly and grauely of the manner of living, as of a thing of great importance. For he said that continency in meate and drinke, was as it were the foundation and beginning of skill. And truly the minde is much more prompt to comprehend all good reason, when the operations of the braine are not hindered by vapours, which the superfluity of meates send vp thither. I am of opinion therefore, that we handle this vertue of sobriety, which dependeth of temperance, and is contained vnder the first part thereof, namely vnder continency.

ACHITO B. To liue well and frugally (saith Plato) is to liue temperately: and (as Epictetus saith) there is great difference betweene liuing well, and liuing sumptuously. For the one commeth of Temperance, Frugality, discipline, honesty, moderation of the soule, contented with her owne riches: and the other of intemperance, lust, and contempt of all order & mediocrity. In the end, the one is followed with shame, and the other with true & lasting praise.

A SER.

ASER. We cannot well vse our spirit (saith Cicero) when we are stuffed with meate. Neither must we gratifie the belly and intrals onely, but also the honest ioy of the mind. For that which is contained in the other parts, perisheth: but the soule separated from the body, abideth for euer. Let vs then harken to AMANA, of whom we may vnderstand how necessary sobriety is for a happy life.

The cause of the long life
of our Elders,
and of the
shortnes of ours.

Dionysius a monster, and why.

The sobriety
of old time,
and corruption
of ours compared together.

Sobriety preserueth health

There is more pleasure of the creature in sobriety, than in superfluitie.

AMANA. If we set before our eyes the long and happy life of the Ancients, so long as they obserued sobriety and frugality: out of doubt we will attribute one principall cause of our so short life, and so full of infirmities, to the riot, superfluity, and curiosity of diet, which at this day are seene amongst vs. The life of our first fathers, was it not maintained a long time with fruits, milke, hony, and water? Who euer came neere their long and happy daies, since those times? What preparation of exquisite victuals did those sixe hundred thousand Israelites thinke to finde, that came out of Egypt to goe into a neweland, walking forty yeares through the wildernes, drinking nothing but water, and many times wanting that? After those first ages, the Græcians and Romanes loued sobriety, more than all other nations. And as the Hebrewes vsed to eate but once a day, which was at dinner, so the Græcians onely sopped. For this cause we reade that Plato, being demanded whether he had seene any new or strange thing in Sicilia, answered, that he had found a monster of nature, which did eate twice a day. This he spake of Dionysius the tyrant, who first brought vp that custome in his countrey. In the time of Julius Cesar the Germanes, a strong and warlike people, liued onely of milke, cheefe and flesh, not knowing what Wheate or Wine were, nor yet what it was to labour the ground, or to sowe. Yea how many millions of men are there at this day in the West regions and Ilands, who know not what all this superfluity and daintinesse of fare meaneth, and yet liue long and healthy in all frugality, the greatest part of them vpon hearbes and rootes, whereof they make cakes in stead of wheate, and others of raw flesh? Whereby it is easie to iudge, that Sobriety is the preservation and maintenance of health, and of naturall strength and vigour, and so consequently of the life of man. But when we looke higher, and with the eyes of our mind marke the excellent glory and immortall praise, deserued by so many Camilli, Scipiones, Fabrij, Metelli, Catores, and by a thousand other famous families, which executed so many worthy acts by their owne vertue, and yet in the meane while kept such a simple and sober diet, that the most of them were contented with bread, hearbes, and water, endured and tollerated cheerefully all iniuries of weather, went but homely arraied, and altogether contemned gold and siluer: out of question we will iudge those men very blinde, and far from the white of such glory and honour, who imbrace nothing but dissolutenes, superfluity, lust, drunkennes, pride, and all such like imperfections that beare sway amongst vs, who behold Vice mounted so high, that men must in a manner blush as much to speake of Vertue, or to be vertuous in a thousand companies, as in that happy time of the Ancients, they were ashamed of Vice, or to be vicious. And truly I thinke that these men being past shame, care but little for the glory that hath beene in many ages, seeing they liue for the body only, after a brutish impiety, without all regard of the soule, or of the second life. What say I for the body? Nay rather they are the destroyers thereof, seeing it cannot be denied but that sobriety is a great benefite and helpe to preserve health and bodily strength, and to expell diseases, and it is to be vsed as a good foundation to attaine to a happy old age. The experience hereof is well knowne to every one, although there were no other prooffe but this, that we see the simple sort of people that labour and trauell, to liue with bread and water, grow olde in health; whereas our Princes and great Lords being delicately brought vp in idlenesse, dye yong men, tormented with infinite diseases, especially when they grow a little in yeares. Further, let such dissolute men as make pleasure the end of their desire, know, that Sobriety leadeth those that follow her, to far greater and more perfect pleasures, than incontinencie and superfluity doe. For these excessive fellowes neuer expect hunger, or thirst, or any other pleasure of the body, but through intemperance prevent them, and so enioy scarce halfe the pleasure. But sober and temperate men, forbearing the fruition of their desire a long time, haue a far more perfect taste of them, because (as Cicero saith) the pleasure of life consisteth rather in the desire, than in the satiety thereof. And if mediocrity bee not obserued, those things that are most acceptable and pleasant, become most vnpleasant. Doe we not also see that when the body is not overcharged with meate and wine, it is better disposed, and more temperate for euery good action? And as for the spirit for which we ought chiefly to liue, it is more ready and nimble to comprehend and conceiue what right, reason, and true honesty are. For (as Aristotle saith) sobriety causeth men to iudge better and according to the truth, of althings, & in that respect is very necessary for the attaining of Philosophy. Likewise sobriety retaineth that in a wise mans thought, which a foole without discretion bath in his mouth. And therefore (saith Cæsar) we must strue by all meanes to restraine our belly, because that onely is alwaies vnthankfull for the pleasures done vnto it, craving continually, and oftener, than it needeth: so that whosoever is not able to commaund ouer it, will daily heape vp mischief vpon mischief to himselfe. But frugolity and sobriety are the mistresses of good counsell, and the badges of chastity. For this cause Titus Livius commendeth more the barrenness and sterility of a countrey. Than fertility and fruitfulness, saying that men borne in a fatte and fertile soile, are commonly do litle, and cowards: but contrariwise, the barrennes of a countrey, maketh men sober of necessity, and consequently carefull, vigilant, and giuen too to labour. As the Athenians were, being situated in a very vnfruitfull place. We make great account (saith Paulinus) of frugality, not because wee esteeme the creatures themselues vile, and of small value, but that by meanes thereof we may encrease the greatnes of our courage. And if the greatest and chiefeest benefite that could come to man, were (saith Solon) to haue no neede of nourishment, it is very manifest, that the next to that is to haue need but of a litle. But amongst so many good reasons of such excellent men, the counsell of Epictetus is well woorth the marking, where he saith: then when we would eate, we must consider that we haue two guests to entertaine, the body and the soule, and that whatsoeuer shall be put into the body, departeth away quickly, but what good thing soeuer entred into the soule, abideth for euer. To this effect Timotheus a Grecian captaine, hauing supped with Plato in the Academy at a sober and simple repast (for the greatest festiuall dainties were oliues, cheefe, apples, coleworts, bread and wine) saide that they which sup with Plato, feeble the benefit thereof the next day, yea a long time after. For these wise men met together at banquets void of excess, not to fill their bellies, but to prepare & dresse their mindes, and to learne one of another by their goodly discourses of Philosophy, whereof a vertuous soule hath better taste, than the body of a well relished and delicate meale. Such were the feasts of Pythagoras, Socrates, Xenocrates, and of other Sages of Græcia, where the discussing of good & learned matters there handled, brought through the remembrance of them great pleasure, and no lesse liked commoditie, and that of long continuance to such as were present at them. And as for the pleasures of drinking and eating, they iudged the very remembrance thereof to be vnwoorthy and vnseeming men of honour, because it was to passe away as the smell of a perfume. Neither would they suffer that men should bring into their assemblies the vanity of foolish delights, as of the sonnd of instruments, of enterludes, or of any other pastime, which a wise man ought rather to esteeme as a hinderance of delight, than any pleasure at all. For hauing within themselues sufficient matter of recreation and reioicing, through their learned discourses, itt were meere folly to beg strange and friuolous delights from without them. And Plutarke saith, that the brutish part of the soule, depending of the feeding beast, and vncapable of reason, is that which is pleased, brought to order, and satisfied by songs and sounds, which are sung and tuned vnto it: euen as with the whistling of lips or hands, or with the sound of a pipe shepheards cause their sheepe to arise, or ly downe, because they vnderstand not an articulate or distinct speech, that hath some pith in it. Therefore I commend Euripides, for reprehending such as vse the harpe, so long as a feast lasteth (for quoth he) musicke ought rather to besent for, when men are angry, or mourne, than when they are feasting or making merry, thereby to make them giue more libertie to all pleasure, than before. I suppose the Egyptians did better, who vsed in the middest of their banquets to bring in the Anatomy of a dead body dried, that the horror thereof might containe them in all modestie. For this cause the memory of the Emperour Henry the third, greatly commendeth it selfe, who banished all pompe and vanitie from his wedding, and draue away the plaiers, and iesters, causing a great number of poore folke to come in their place. The custome which the Lacedomonians obserued, when they liued vnder Lycurgus lawes, is also woorthie to be remembered: which was, that no torches or lights should be brought vnto them, when they departed from feasts at night, that it might be an occasion vnto them to feare drunkenness, and so to auoide this shame, that they onely could not finde out their houses. Now in those happy times vines were planted and dressed, that wine might be drunke rather in time of sicknesse, than of health: in so much that it was not sold in Tauerne, but onely Apothecaries shops. Those ancient Sages commonly measured their drinking by that saying of Anacharsis, that the first draught which men drunke ought to bee for thirst, the second for nourishment: and as for the

of

The belly is an vnthankfull beast.

The counsell of Epictetus concerning eating.

How wise men in old time feasted one another,

Against vain-delights in feasts.

The belly a feeding beast.

When musick is most conuenient.

The custome of the Egyptians at banquets.

The custome of the Lacedemonians.

The manner of drinking in old time.

third

third, that it was of pleasure, and the fourth of madnesse. Pitbageras being much more religious in this matter, and liuing onely of hearbes, fruite, and water, said: that the wine brought forth three grapes, whereof the first quenbeth thirst, the second troubleth, and the third altogether dulleth. He neuer dranke wine, no more did that great Orato Demosthenes, nor any other famous men, of whom histories make mention. The kings of Egypt were forbidden wine, which they neuer dranke, except on certaine daies, and then by measure. And truly it bringeth with it pernicious effects, aswel to the soule, as to the body. For from it proceedeth the chiefe and most common cause of bodily diseases, and of the infirmities of the soule. But to continue the examples of loue which the Ancients bare to the vertue of sobriety, this was of Alexander.

The sobrietie

Against
excessiue
drinking.

Cyrus.

Porus.
Phaotes.
Alphonfus.

Agessilaus.

it that caused Alexander the Great to refuse those cookes and Paisterers which Ada Queene of Caria sent vnto him, and to send her word backe againe, that he had better than they were: namely, for his dinner, early rising, and walking a good while before day: and for his supper, a little dinner. Notwithstanding, in the end the Persian delicacies and riches (which alwaies is the propertie of such goods) caused this vertuous Monarch to change his commendable custome of liuing, and to approoue and like of excesse in drinking: to which vice, that hee might giue greater authority, he propounded sixe hundred crownes for a reward to him that dranke most, and called a great cup after his owne name. Which cup, when he offered to Calisthenes one of his fauourits, he refused, saying: that he would not for drinking in Alexander, stand in need of Esculapius. With which the king perceiuing himselfe touched, was so incensed against him, that he caused him to be put in a cage with dogs, where he poisoned himselfe, being impatient of his captiuitie. Wherein we may note how ridiculous their blockishnesse is, who for feare, not of such an entertainment as this wise man received, but of being taken and reputed as voide of good fellowship and vnciuill, cast themselues into the danger of a sore sicknesse, rather than they will refuse to drinke a carouse, when they are invited therunto. Hereby also those men shew their want of iudgement, and of conuenient matter to talke of, who cannot entertaine their friends without drunkennes and gluttony. And the other if they knew how to make deniall fitly, and in good sort, besides the profit which they should receiue thereby, their company would be more desired, than it will be for their drunkennesse. Cyrus, Monarch of the Persians, from his childhood gaue great testimony, that he would one day become a very sober man. For being demanded by Astyages his grandfather, why he would drinke no wine, he answered, for feare least they giue me poison, For (quoth he) I noted yesterday when you celebrated the day of your natiuitie, that it could not be, but that some body had mingled poyson amongst all that wine, which yee then dranke: because in the winding vp of the table, not one of those that were present at the feast, was in his right minde. Afterward, this vertuous Prince alwaies liued very frugally: for prooffe whereof may serue his answer made one day to Artabazus, as he marched in war, who asked him what he would haue brought vnto him for his supper: Bread, (quoth he,) for I hope wee shall finde some fountaine to furnish vs with drinke. Porus a noble king of India, liued with water and bread onely. Phaotes also king of the same countrey, did the like: and the greatest feastes which he made, or suffered his courtiers to make, was onely with a kind of venison. Alphonfus king of Arragon, and Sicilia, a very sober man, was demanded of certaine of his Princes, why he dranke no wine: because (quoth he) wisdome is hindred through wine, and prudence darkned: which two things onely are able to make a king worthy of that name he beareth. Agessilaus king of Lacedæmonia hauing alwaies beene brought vp in the discipline of Lycorgus, who had banished all ryot and superfluitie from that citie, by the vtter defacing and abolishing of gold and siluer, became very wonderfull, by reason of his simplicity and plainnesse, in feeding and clothing his body, and in behauing himselfe as the meanest of his subiects. He vsed to say (which he likewise put in vre) that hee which commanded and ruled many, ought to surpasse them, not in dainties and delicacie, but in sustaining labour, and in nobility of heart. The benefit which (as he said) he reaped thereby, was liberty, whereof he assured himselfe, that he could neuer be deprived by any alteration and change of fortune. And as he passed with his army by the countrey of the Thasians, they sent him certaine refreshing of floure, and of dainty cates, as comfites, and other dainty deuices made of paaft: but he would take nothing saue onely the floure. And being vrged of others to receiue all, he said: Well, if ye thinke it good, diuide the rest amongst the Ilots, (who were their slaues) for it agreeth not with them that make profession of manly fortitude and prowes, to take such iuncates. For that which allureth and inticeth men of slauish nature, ought not to bee acceptable to them that are of a franke and free courage. But is there any thing now adaies I pray you,

thing now adaies I pray you, that so much allureth and keepeth base mindes in the service of great men, as the dainties of their table? And surely the Ancients did not vnfitly apply the name of tyrant to a rich man, keeping a sumptuous table, as to one that compelleth men to follow and to obey him. Neuerthelesse, a couragious heart suffereth not it selfe to bee taken with such baites: but let vs continue the examples of Sobriety. Pompey the Great, hauing all his life time loued modesty and frugality, gave yet a more certaine testimony thereof, when, by reason of a lingering disease hee had lost his appetite to meate. His Physition appointing him to eate of a Blackbird, he was giuen to vnderstand by his seruants, that because they were out of season, it would be a hard matter to get any, except it were of Lucullus, who kept some all the yeare long, and would willingly giue him some. What (quoth he then) if Lucullus were not a dainty and nice glutton, could not Pompey liue? No, no, let mee haue something made ready that may easily be gotten. Marcus Cato, after he had overcome Spaine, and triumphed of notable victories, albeit he was now old and very rich, yet he would adde nothing to his ancient manner of liuing, which was very austere, but dranke almost nothing but water, and for the most part did eate nothing but bread and beefe, labouring in the field in time of peace as much as the meanest of his seruants. Epiniondas the greatest Captaine and Philosopher of his time, liued so thriftily and temperately, that beeing inuited by a friend of his to supper, and seeing great superfluity & sumptuousnes, he returned very angry, saying, that he thought he had beene requested to sacrifice, and to liue honestly together, and not to receiue iniurie and reproch by being entertained like a glutton. Caius Fabritius a noble Romane Captaine, was found by the Samnite Embassadors that came vnto him, eating of raddish roasted in the ashes, which was all the dishes he had to his supper, and that in a very poore house. Scipio Aemilius kept a very honourable table for his friends (for in his time riot had already begun to enter into Rome) but going aside himselfe, hee would eate nothing but bread. Masinissa king of the Numidians, was of so great sobriety, that euen at ninety yeares of age hee would eate but once a day, and then vpon homely meates without sauce. Mithridates king of Pontus being very old, neuer sate downe at the table to eate, and liued very frugally. Hannibal fed vpon no other meate, than did the meanest of his souldiers. The reason why I stay longer in the examples of this vertue of sobriety, is to shew the beattlines of men in our age, to whom it seemeth an impossible, vaine and contemptible thing, to liue in such sparing and austerity of life: saying, that there were none but certaine foolish Philosophers, (for that is the Epithite, which the ignorant sort giue to vertuous men) and some simple Hermites, who liued after that manner. Therefore that they may vnseale their eies, let them behold here, how in all sorts and conditions of men, euen in the greatest, the vertue of temperance, frugality and sobriety, did appeare and shine. The Emperour Vespasianus one day in every moneth vsed to eate nothing. The Priests of Egypt, the Sages of India and Persia, and Iupiter's priests, seruing false gods, did neuer eate any flesh, nor drinke wine. Notable examples for those that haue the first places in the Church, who ought to be as a lampe in the midst thereof, neither may they take examples by Ethnickes and Pagans onely, but also by many holy men, who had in them the true love and feare of God. Daniel and his companions neglecting the kings table, liued with pulse and water onely. S. Iohn Baptist passed ouer the great part of his age in the desert, eating nothing but locusts and wild hony. S. Hierome maketh mention of one Paul an Hermit, who liued from sixteene yeares vnto sixty, of dates onely: and from sixty yeares vnto the age of sixe score and five yeares (when he died) he was fed with a little bread brought daily vnto him by a crow. Maxentius bishop of Poytiers, liued alwaies with barely bread and water. But to the end we may reape profit by all that hath bene here spoken, let vs learne of Socrates, that the soule which hath gotten the habite of frugality, and is contented with her estate, passeth away her daies in this world, as he that in the Spring time taketh small and easie iournies in a pleasant and fruitfull region, with great contentation of minde and little labour. And let that notable and diuine precept of Empedocles sound often in our eares, Behaue thy selfe full soberly, and free from all offence.

Let vs adorne and deeke our life with this good and rare vertue of sobriety, which will teach vs to renounce worldly vanity, and to content our selues (next vnto God) in vertue onely, and in heauenly riches. And although delicacy of fare bee so common amongst vs Frenchmen, and maintained with such impudency, that wee permit amongst vs, and study kitchen Commentaries, as much as any good science, so that it may seeme a very difficulte matter to take it away, and banish it from amongst vs, yet it is not altogether impossible as many thinke. But let vs follow that ancient precept of Pythagoras; To choose the best kinde of life,

H

and

Good cheere
keepeth base
minds in subiection.

Pompeius.

M. Cato.

Epiniondas.

C. Fabritius.

Scipio.

Masinissa.

Mithridates.

Hannibal.

Vespasianus.

Daniel.

Iohn Baptist.

Maxentius.

Socrates feast

and no doubt but custome will by little and little make it easie and pleasant vnto vs. And if we be despised and rebuked of others, we may answer as Socrates did, who being reprooued because he had made no greater preparation of meate in a feast whereunto he invited many of his friends, said, If they be vertuous, there is ynough, and if they be not, there is too much. So let vs not seeke to please and to imitate the most part of men, but the best and smallest number: neither let vs looke vnto custome, but to that which is decent and honest. But if we perseuere in our dissolutnesse and superfluitie, as if we were Christians in name and sect onely, but Epicures in life, we are to feare that in the end need and necessity will force vs to forsake it. And as it fell out to king Darius, who after he had liued a long time in all abundance of delights, and neuer knew what hunger or thirst meant, as hee fled from the battell gotten by Alexander was very thirstie: and after hee had drunke puddle water proceeding from a riuer tainted with dead bodies, he burst forth into this speech, That in all his life hee neuer dranke better drinke: so likewise after we haue beene tamed with miseries and calamities, we must confesse, but too late, and peradventure (O dangerous downfall) without hope of recoverie, that our estate is yet better (albeit most miserable) than our offences haue deserved, even then when God for our dissolutenesse shall withdraw his blessing wholly from our grounds and possessions. This he hath already begun to performe in some measure, by causing the ground to bring forth vnto vs thistles and thornes, in stead of good graine and fruit, & by continuing amongst vs warres and hurly burlies, which are accompanied with pestiferous diseases, that he may overcharge those with the scourges of his iust vengeance, who will not humble themselves vnder the sweetnesse of his word.

Darius in his thirst, iudged puddle water to be good drinke.

Tokens of the wrath of God.

Of Superfluitie, Samptuousnesse, Gluttonie, and wallowing in delights. Chap. 20.

The chiefeft cause of destruction to Common-wealths is excessse in delights.

A M A. Seeing we haue summarily vnderstood the excellencie and profite of the vertue of sobrietie, that it may yet better appeare by the contrary, and that we may bee so much the more induced to desire it amongst vs, I thinke we shall doe well to intreate of superfluitie, sumptuousnesse, and gluttony, whose fruits are weltring in delights, which is the principall cause of destruction (as Plato saith) to kingdomes, monarchies, and common-wealths. Therefore I propound these vices to you my copanions to discourse vpon.

A R A M. Whatsoeuer is desired more than that which is necessary for the life of man, is superfluitie, which causeth so many foolish and excessiue expences amongst vs, that, besides the ruine and decay of many good houses, the destruction of the body, and, which is more to be feared, of the soule also, doth for the most part insue thereupon. Therefore Erasmus said verie well, that nothing is more abiect and hurtfull, than to liue as a slaue to the pleasure of the mouth and belly.

A C H I T O B. Those men (saith Plato) that are addicted to the seruice of their bellies, and care nothing for the food of their minds, are like beasts, who neuer enioy true pleasures. Which thing also may be said of them that like fools depend more of opinion than of reason. But it belongeth to thee A S E R, to handle this matter here expounded, more at large.

A S E R. Good things (saith Lycurgus) are contrary and enemies to him that abuseth the gifts of nature: as if a valiant man should loue rather to bee a theefe, than a souldier: or a beautifull person an adulterer, rather than a married man. So is it with the goods of fortune, as we tearme them, the possession of which giueth occasion to those that are vnworthie of them, to commit many follies. Amongst which we may note superfluitie for a very pernicious vice, hauing this propertie in it to draw the wils of men secretly, and to induce them to couet delights. Whereunto after they haue once addicted themselves, they busie their minds with nothing, but to make prouision offriuous, exquisite, and sumptuous things, taking small care, yea forgetting easily those things that are profitable and necessarie, whereof afterwards they perceiue themselves to stand in great neede. Now the end of all superfluities, wherein men plunge themselves after diuers manners, is pleasure, which chiefly and for the most part they seeke in such a riotous and delicate life, as causeth the body without labour to enioy all his desires, lusts, and delights: or else in the fruition of worldly glorie, wherein through vnprofitable and superfluous expences, they strue to excell, or at least wise to match those that are greater than themselves. Concerning the marke whereat they aime, there is nothing more hurtfull to man, than pleasure and delight, which (as Plato saith) serueth for a baite & allurement to draw him to commit wickednes, as hereafter we may discourse in more more ample manner thereof, as also of that luxurious life, whose desire and contentation is in whoredome. And that I may begin to handle the two other generall points, wherein they that are given to superfluitie and costlinesse, seeke delight, namely, the delicate life and curiositie of expences: let vs consider of the fruits that issue and proceede from them. First, when men suffer themselves to be overtaken with the Epicures doctrine, and appeare so carefull to serue their belly, nourishing it in excesse, daintinesse, gluttony, and drunkenness, is it not from this head-spring from whence diseases and euill dispositions of the body proceede? We are sicke (saith Plutarke) of those things wherewith we liue, neither is there any proper and peculiar seede of diseases, but the corruption of those things within vs, which we eate, and the faults and errors which wee commit against them. Homer going about to prooue, that the gods die not, groundeth his argument vpon this, because they eate not: as if he would teach vs, that drinking and eating doe not onely maintaine life, but are also the cause of death. For thereof diseases gather together within our bodies, which proceede no lesse of being too full, than of being too emptie. And oftentimes a man hath more to doe to consume and digest meate put into his body, than he had to get it. Physicians (saith Seneca) crye out, that life is short, and arte long, and complaint is made of nature, because she hath granted to beasts to liue five or sixe ages, and appointed so short a time of life for men, who are borne for many great things. We haue no small time, but we lose much time, and life is long enough, if it be well imployed. But when it passeth away through excesse and negligence, and no good is done therein, in the end through constraint of extreme necessity, although we perceiue it not going, yet wee feele it is gone. Moreouer a man may reckon greater store of griefes than pleasures, that come to him from his nourishment: or to speake better, the pleasure of eating is but small, but the toile and trouble that men haue in providing it, is great. It were hard to repeate the shamefull paines and toilsome labours wherewith it filleth vs. Many a mans soule (saith Solon) is overwhelmed, and as it were clothed with feare, least it should stand in neede within the body, as it were in a mill, and turning alwaies about like a millstone, it seeketh after nourishment. Hereupon it remaineth void and destitute of feeling, and desire of all honest things, and attendeth onely to the insatiable lusts of the flesh, which is neuer contented, because neede and necessity are alwaies ioyned with desire of superfluity. The ancient Egyptians vsed this custome, to cleave in sunder the body of a dead man, to shew it to the Sunne, and to cast the guts and intrails into the riuer, and being thus cleansed to embaulme the rest. And in very deede those inward parts are the pollution and defiling of our flesh, and are properly the very Hell of our bodies. But, which is worse, is it not the stuffing and filling of the belly that maketh the mind for the most part dull and vncapable of any science or reason, whereby the diuine part of man is oppressed and overwhelmed through the weight and force of that part, which is mortall? A wise soule is a cleare brightnesse, said Heraclitus. O how hard a matter is it (saith Cato) to preach to the belly, which hath no eares, and which will take no deniall, how soeuer the case standeth! And as when we behold the Sun through thicke clouds and vndigested vapors, we see it not cleare, but with a pale and wannish light, and as it were plunged in the bottome of a cloud: so through a troubled and defiled body, heauily laden with foode and strange meats, the brightnesse and clearenesse of the soule must needs become pale, troubled, and dimmed, not having such forceable light, as to be able thereby to pearce through vnto the contemplation of those things that are great, heavenly, subtile, exquisite, and hard to discerne. I thought in my heart (saith the wise man) to withdraw my flesh from wine, that I might bend my mind to wisdom, and eschew folly, vntill I knew what was profitable for the children of men. It is not for kings, it is not for kings to drinke wine, nor for princes strong drinke: least hee drinke and forget the decree, and change the iudgement of all the children of affliction. To whom is woe? To whom is sorrow? To whom is strife? To whom is murmuring? To whom are wounds without cause? And to whom is rednesse of the eyes? Euen to them that tarry long at the wine: to them that goe and seeke mixt wine, which in the beginning is pleasant, but in the ende pricketh like a Serpent, and poisoneth like a Cockatrice. And in another place, the wise man speaking of gluttony, saith, that it drieth the bones, and that more dye by it than by the sword. Wee see that beastes fatted vp languish through sloth and idlenesse: neither doe beastes faint through labour onely, but also by reason of the masse and heauy weight of their owne bodies. Furthermore, the vice of gluttony and drunkennesse is neuer alone, but draweth with it a thousand other excessive and dissolute fashions. For (as Plato saith) it stirreth vp lust, griefe, anger, and loue in extremity, and

Pleasure the end of superfluitie.

Of the delicate life.

The seede of diseases.

Of the shortnes of mans life.

The soule of gluttons compared to a millstone.

The custome of the Egyptians.

Prou. 31. 4, 5.

Prou. 23. 29, 30

Against
maskes and mummeries.

The Israelites
Lot.
Alexander.

Dionysius.

Lucullus.

The sumptuousnesse of a Franciscan Frier.
Philoxenus.

extinguisheth memory, opinion, and vnderstanding. Briefely, it maketh a man twise a childe. And in another place, the same Philosopher saith, that gluttonie fatteth the body, maketh the minde dull and vnapt, and which is woorse, vndermineth reason. Wine hath as much force as fire. For as soone as it hath overtaken any, it dispatcheth him. And as the North or South winde tormenteth the Lybian sea, so, and much more doth wine vex a man. For it discloseth the secrets of the soule, and troubleth the whole minde. A drunken gouernour and ruler of any thing whatsoever, bringeth all to ruine and ouerthrow, whether it be a shippe or a wagon, or an army, or any other thing committed to his keeping. We see by the goodly sentences of these Authors, how many discommodities and mischiefs come as well to the body as to the soule, by this excessiue superfluitie and curiosity of nourishment, whether it be in drinking or eating. We see also that from this selfe same spring-head proceede those vnumerable and loose behaviours in all kinde of delights, in carding and dicing, in dancing, masking and mumming, in loue of maidens, and adultery with wiues, the filthynesse whereof is so shamefull, and discouereth it selfe so much, that I shall not greatly neede to loose time in reproouing thereof. For it is most certaine, that all such innentions are meere heathenish, or rather diuellish, when men commit such reprobate actions with public libertie and licence. Especially we haue to note this well that concerneth maskes and mummeries, so common amongst vs, and the cause of infinite offences, that forasmuch as the face was appointed and ordained of God to be seene openly, and the mouth to speake, we destroy the ordinance of God, as much as lieth in vs, and become contrary vnto him, when wee take vnto vs a false face, and deprive our selues of speech. It may bee said, that many thinke no harme when they doe these things. But that which of it selfe is euill, cannot bee excused, and no fashion of liuing taken vp and practised through the onely motion of our sensuality (such are these delights and pleasures) can bee maintained, neither hath it any good and lawfull defence. Now let vs consider some examples of those pernicious effects which proceede from this Epicurian vice of intemperance. Esaú sold his birthright through a gluttonous desire. The selfe same cause moued the Israelites to murmore many times against God. The drunkennesse of Lot caused him to commit incest with his daughters. Alexander the Great darkened the glory of his valiant acts with this vice. For being overtaken with wine, he slew Clitus one of the valiantest captaines hee had, to whom he was beholding for his owne life. Afterward, when hee was come to himselfe, hee would oftentimes haue murdered himselfe, and wept three dayes together without meate and drink. Dionysius the yonger, was sometime more than nine daies together drunken: and in the ende hee lost his estate. Cyrillus sonne in his drunkennes wickedly slue that holy man his father, and his mother also great with child. He hurt his two sisters, and deflowered one of them. Ought not this to cause the haire of our head to stand vpright, as often as occasion is offered vnto vs, whereby we might fall into such inconueniences? Amongst the Romanes Lucullus, a man of great dignity, and commended of Historiographers for many braue exploits of war which hee did in Armenia, and for his bounty, iustice, and clemency, is yet greatly blamed, because towards the end of his daies, omitting all intermedling with the government of public affaires, he gaue himselfe to all kinde of excessiue sumptuousnes, and superfluous waiting of that great substance which he had. Whereof this onely testimonie recited by Plutarke, shall serue for sufficient prooffe. Cicero and Pompey meeting him one day in the city, tolde him that they would sup with him on this condition, that he should prepare nothing for them but his owne ordinary diet. At the least wise (quoth hee to them) giue mee leaue to bidde my Steward make ready supper in my hall of Apollo: and by that hee beguiled them. For his seruants vnderstood thereby what cost hee would haue bestowed thereupon: inso much that a supper of fifty thousand drachmes of siluer, which doe amount to fise thousand crownes, was prepared for them. This was so much the more wonderfull, because so great and sumptuous a feast was made ready in so short a time. But this was his ordinary dyet which hee caused many times to bee prepared for himselfe alone. And as his men asked him on a day who should dine with him, seeing he commanded them to make ready such a great feast: Lucullus (quoth hee) shall dine with Lucullus. This superfluous pompe and magnificence will not be thought very strange, if we compare it with that which not long since a simple Franciscan Frier called Peter de Ruere made, after he had attained to the dignity of a Cardinall through fauour of the Pope his kinsman. For within the space of two yeares which he liued in Rome, he consumed in feastes and bankets the summe of two hundred thousand crownes, besides his debts, which came to no lesse sum. Philoxenus the Poet wished wished he had a necke like a Crane, to the end he might enioy greater pleasure in swallowing downe wine and meate: saying that then he should longer fee the taste thereof. We reade of the Emperor Vitellius Spinter, that he was so much given to superfluitie and excesse, that at one supper he was serued with two thousand seuerall kindes of fishes, and with seven thousand flying fowles. But within a very little while after he changed his estate, being executed publicly at Rome at the pursuit of Vespasianus, who was chosen Emperor in his place. In our time Muleasses king of Thunes, was so drowned in pleasure and delight, that after hee had banished from his kingdome because of his whoredome, in his returne out of Almaine, being without hope that the Emperor Charles the fift would helpe him at all, he spent one hundred crownes vpon a peacocke dressed for him, as Paulus Iovius rehearseth: and that hee might take the greater delight in musicke, he couered his eyes. But the iudgement of God was such vpon him, that his owne children made him blinde with a bar of hot iron. Concerning examples of the misery that followeth and accompanieth riot and delight in playing, dancing, and mumming, we see daily that a thousand quarrels, blasphemies, losse of goods and whoredomes proceede from thence. And oftentimes God suffereth the punishment thereof to be notorious, even by vnlooked for and strange meanes: as not long since it happened to Lewes Archbishop of Magdeburg, who dancing with gentlewomen vtill midnight, fell downe so fiercely vpon the ground, that he brake his necke with one of the women which he led. Charles the sixt being clothed like a wild man with certaine of his familiar friends, and dancing by torch light, was also in great perill of burning, if a gentlewoman had not cast her cloake vpon his shoulders. And I thinke it will not be from the matter, if wee say that it is a shamefull thing to suffer amongst vs, or to lose time that ought to be so pretious vnto vs, in beholding and hearing players, actors of Interludes and Comedies, who are as pernicious a plague in a Common-wealth as can be imagined. For nothing marreth more the behauiour, simplicity and naturall goodnes of any people than this, because they soone receiue into their soules a liuely impressiō of that dissolutenesse and villany which they see and heare, when it is ioyned with words, accents, gestures, motions, and actions, wherewith players and iuglers know how to enrich by all kind of artificiall sleights, the filthiest and most dishonest matters, which commonly they make choise of. And to speake freely in few words, we may truly say, that the Theater of plaiers is a schoole of all vnchastnes, vncleannes, whordome, craft, subtilty and wickednes. Now let vs speake of those that propound (as wee said) vnto themselves the vaine glory of outward shew amongst the best, and men of great calling, through triuolous, vnprofitable and superfluous expences, as in sumptuous and cosily apparell, pretious and rich mooueables, goodly furniture and trapping of horses, great traine of seruing men, dogs, birds, and other vanities, gifts and presents sent to such as are vnworthy, therby to obtaine the good will of them that are most wicked in authority, to the end to prepare a way vnto high callings, and to preferments vnto offices. Besides the wasting of their goods hereupon to their shame and confusion, which they should imploy vpon charitable workes, they spend many times other mens goods, even the substance of the poore, which they craftily get by vnlawful meanes. This is that which at length (as Crates the Philosopher said very well) stirreth vp ciuill warres, seditions, and tyrannies within cities, to the end that such voluptuous men, and ambitious of vaine glory, fishing in a troubled water, may haue wherewith to maintaine their foolish expences, and so come to the end of their platformes. Hereof we haue many examples in the ciuill warres amongst the Romanes, as namely vnder Cinna, Carbo, Marius, and Sylla. Likewise in the conspiracy of Catiline and his complices, who beeing of the chiefe families in Rome, and perceiuing themselves to be brought to the estate of bankrupts, as we commonly say, sought by all meanes to prosecute their first deliberation, which was alwaies to seeme great and mighty. Thus dealt Cesar in procuring to his country that ciuill warre, which hee made against Pompey, after hee had indebted himselfe in seven hundred and fifty thousand crownes, to get the fauour and good liking of the people. This is that which Heraclytus meant to teach his countrimen, when, after a sedition appeased and quieted, being asked what way were best to be taken, that the like should not fall out againe: he went vp into that place from whence orations were made to the people, and there in stead of speaking, began to eate a morsell of browne bread, and to drinke a glasse of water. Which beeing done, hee came downe againe, and spake neuer a word. Hereby hee would signifie, that vtill daintinesse of fare were banished the cittie, and immoderate expences cut off, and sobriety and modesty brought in their place, they should neuer be without sedition. If this countell were ever requisite in a Monarchy, it is certainly most necessary at this present for ours wherein Vitellius.

Muleasses.

Lewes Archbishop.

Charles the sixt.

Against plaiers.

Against the curiosity of superfluous expences.

The beginning of ciuill warres.

How Heraclytus dissuaded superfluitie.

all kind of superfluitie, riot, and weltring in pleasures, curiositie in apparell, tapestrie, and pictures, vessels, perfumes, and painting of faces, aboundeth in greater measure than heretofore it did amongst the Persians, which was the cause of their finall subuersion, and of Alexanders greatnesse, who subdued them. That which for the space of five hundred yeares and more, maintained the Lacedemonian estate, being the chiefest in Græcia for glory and goodnesse of government, was the cuttingt off and abolishing of all superfluitie in diet, apparell, moouable, and of all strange wares, which Lycurgus banished. Whereby also forren merchants (the cause of corruption) banished themselves as they that seeke not after others but for gaine, by selling their nouelties very deere vnto them. Neither did the Roman Common wealth flourish more at any time, than when those men that carried about them perfumes and sweete smells, and those women that were found swilling like drunkards, were corrected with the same punishment. This caused Cato, being the Censurer of the election of two captaines, that one of them might be sent as Generall of the Panonian warre, to say with a loud voice, that he would dismisle Publius his Ally, because he neuer saw him returne wounded from the war, but had seene him walke vp & downe the city of Rome perfumed. What would he haue said of our Courtiers, so finely curled, rust, and perfumed? The Kings and Magistrates of those so happie times, were the principall obseruers of their owne lawes and edicts, reforming themselves before all others, and liuing so austerely, that their example constrained their subiects more to follow them, than all the punishments which they could haue deuised to propound vnto them. We haue a notable testimony hereof in Agis king of Sparta, who in his returne from the warre wherein hee had overcome the Athenians, being desirous to sup priuately with his wife, sent into the kitchen that was appointed for his band and company (for they liued all in common, being seuered into quarters) to haue his portion. But this was denied him, and the next morning for this fact he was fined by the Ephories, who were ioyned in soueraigne authority with the kings, for the maintenance of lawes, and of iustice: in which sentence and iudgement of theirs, he willingly rested. But to returne to our matter, how ought we to blush for our riot and excesse in apparell, which we maintaine with such glory? What folly is it to imploy the industrie of the soule ordained for heauenly things, in trimming, decking, and guilding hir enemy, hir prison, and if I may so speake, hir poison, the body? Excesse of apparell (saith Erasmus) is an argument of the incontinency of the soule, and rather whetteth the eyes of the beholders thereof to wicked desires, than to any honest opinion and conceit. Decke not thy house (saith Epicetus) with tables and pictures, but paint it with temperance. For the one is to feed the eyes vainely, but the other is an eternall ornament, and such a one as can neuer be defaced. If we make account of things of small importance, we despise those that are of great weights: but in not caring at all for little things, we make our selues worthy of great admiration. That great monarke Augustus Cesar wore no other garments than such as his wife and daughters made, and those very modest. Agessilaus king of Lacedemonia, neuer had but one kinde of garment for winter and summer. Epaminondas Generall captaine of the Thebans, was contented with one onely gowne all the yeare long. Further, if we looke vnto their simplicity and modestie in their traine and followers, truly it was worthy of reuerence, being without pride, pompe, or superfluous magnificence. Scipio, Africanus that great captaine, going as delegate into Asia, to compound and end certaine contentions that were betwene the kings of that countrey, was accompanied but with two of his friends, and with seuen slaues. Cato the elder, visiting the provinces of his government, tooke but three seruants with him. Now adaiies wee see that the least accounted gentleman amongst vs, thinketh it a cracking of his credite to ride so ill furnished. And yet the most part euen of the greatest, neuer make anie great inquiry how their traine defray their charges. But howsoeuer they may say, that they know not of the excesse and riot committed vnder their authority, & in their seruice, yet they are not thereby excused. For we ought carefullly to beware, that no man abuse our name. Now, if Princes and gouernors of Common wealths, in steade of abridging superfluous charges, take delight therein themselves, from thence proceedeth the necessity of charging and overcharging their people with imposts and subsidies to maintaine their excesse, and in the ende commeth the overthrow and subuersion both of the one and the other. But they ought rather both to abstaine from such vanities themselves, and also to seeke by all meanes to banish them from their subiects, and where there owne example and bodily punishments are not sufficient for this purpose, there ought they to lay great imposts vpon all such things as serue but to spill and corrupt their subiects. Such things are all exquisite dainties & prouocations

Lycurgus banished all strange wares from Lacedemonia.

Why Cato would not chuse Publius Generall of the war.

Agis.

Against excesse in apparell.

Augustus.

Agessilaus.

Epaminondas.

Examples of moderate traine of Seruing men.

A good lesson for Princes and Magistrates to learne.

Commendable imposts for Princes to lay vpon their subiects.

tions of Appetite, all sorts of toies and trifles, perfumes, cloth of gold and silver, silkes, fipers, net-workes, lace, wouen workes, and all workes of gold, silver, and inammell: all kinde of superfluous apparell, with colours of scarlet, crimson, and such like, the forbidding whereof hitherto hath profited little. For the nature of men is such, that they finde nothing more sweete and acceptable, than that which is straightly forbidden them, so that the more superfluities are prohibited, the more they are desired, especially of foolish men, and of such as are vainely brought vppe. Therefore it were good to raise the price of these things so high by meanes of imposts, that none but rich men and daintie folkes may vse them. And such subsidies would as much set forward the glory of God, the profite of the common-wealth, the desire of good men, and reliefe of the poore, as many others now adaies vsed are quite contrary hereunto. Then these speeches would no more be so common against vs, as now we heare them daily vttered by our Courtiers: We will (say they) keepe company and bee seene amongst the greatest, and bee esteemed thereafter. If we spend not freely, men will make no account of vs. It is our honour and greatnesse, and the way to procure glory and renowne to our houses and families. But I would gladly tell a great number of them, that they would be very much troubled to make answer to a law made by Amasis king of Egypt, and after established in Athens by Solon, whereby it was enacted, that every one should yearely make it appeare vnto his Prouost or Bailly how he liued, and if hee approoued not his manner and trade of life to be iust and reasonable, he was condemned to die. If in like case these great spenders were to giue an account from whence they receiue wherewith to satisfie their pride and vanities, a man should finde that their purchase (as we say) is farre better vnto them than their rents, and that they commit a thousand wrongs and detestable vices to make supply to their lauish expences. As for them that haue goods lawfully gotten, yet in spending them wastfully, they giue sufficient testimony, that they care and seeke for nothing but a vaine and vanishing glorie, which oftentimes, contrarie to their expectation, is waited vpon with great infamie, and with the certaintie of perpetuall punishment. And in the meane while they neglect that glory which is eternall and alwaies profitable, which they should enioy by wellving, and not by mispending their goods, whereof they are but gardeans and stewards, and must one day yeeld vp an account of them. O witlesse man (said one of the ancient Sages, what will the remembrance of vaine glory profite thee, if thou art tormented and vexed where thou art, and praised where thou art not? This deserueth a longer continuance of speech, but we may hereafter discourse thereof more at large. In the meane time let vs note another mischief, which commonly followeth superfluitie of expences, namely pouertie, whereinto many rich men fall before they be aware, and are then very much grieved therewith, and notable to beare it. But the shame and reproch thereof is yet greater, because they fell into it by their owne folly and misgouernment. Therefore to the end we walke not in such a slipperie way, which in the beginning is large and pleasant, but yet leadeth the traveller vnto a down-fall from which he can neuer escape, let vs leaue and forsake the discipline and life of Epicures, and beware that our pallate and tongue be no more sensible than our heart. Let vs leade a life worthy an honest Academie, and be seeming the doctrine of the ancient Sages, that is, a simple, sober and modest life, adorned with temperance and continency, knowing that diet and decking of the body ought (as Cicero saith) to be referred to health and strength, not to pleasure and delight, and that all outward excess is a witnesse of the incontinencie of the soule. And for the perfection of all that lasting and ineuitable misery which belongeth to them that are given to voluptuousnesse and superfluitie, let vs heare that sentence of Scripture, and feare least we be comprehended vnder the iudgement thereof, Continuall misery and mourning be vpon you that haue liued in pleasure on the earth, and in wantonnesse, and haue nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter.

A good law to cut of the occasions of idle expences.

Pouerty followeth superfluous expences.

Our pallate must not be more sensible than our hart.

James 3.1.5.

The end of the fifth daies worke.

The sixth daies worke.

Of Ambition. Chap. 2.1.

A SER.

73. Emperors of Rome
within 100.
yeares.

S often as I remember the strange tragedie of the Romane Emperours since the time that the Empire was mounted vp to the very top and height of her greatnesse vntill her declination, according to the vncertaintie of all humane things, and how within the space of one hundred yeares, wherein there were threescore and thirteene Emperours, onely three of them died of sicknesse in their beds, and all the rest by violent death; I cannot sufficiently admire (considering the inconstancy and short continuance of so great a government, which cannot but bee well knowne to every one) the folly of men, which commonly affecteth them with an vmeasurable desire to rule, whereby they are all their life time slaues to ambition, which is one point of the vice of intemperance, whereof we spake yesterday. And thus in my opinion we are to begin our daies worke with the description of this pernicious passion.

A M A N A. It is naturall in man, the greater his stomacke is, the more to labour to excell others, which is accompanied with an exceeding desire to rule: whereupon he is easily driven forward to doe vniustly, if by wisdom he be not moderated.

A R A M. Ambition and contention for honour (saith Cicero) are miserable. And many forget iustice, after they are fallen into a desire of glory, Empires and honours. Goe to then A C H I T O B, let vs vnderstand of thee more at large, what are the effects of this vice.

A C H I T O B. Eudoxus a Greeke Philosopher desired of the gods that he might behold the Sunne very neere, to comprehend the forme, greatnesse, and beautie thereof, and afterwards be burnt of it, as the Poets report, that Phaeton was: such a hardie and bold passion to vndertake most difficult and dangerous things, is the desire of enioying any pleasure whatsoeuer. This may chiefly be spoken of ambition, which is the most vehement, strongest, and most disordered passion of all those desires which so sore trouble mens minds, and fill them with an insatiable greedinesse of glorie, and with an vnbrideled desire to rule. But to handle it more profitably, we will make two kinds of ambition, the one respecting private men only that liue vnder the power and government of heads, of estates and pollicies: the other shall be of the heads themselves, of monarchs and gouernours of peoples and kingdoms. In the meane time we may thus generally define ambition, calling it an vnreasonable desire to enioy honours, estates, and great places. Further it is a vice of excesse and contrary to modesty, which is a part of temperance. For that man (as Aristotle saith) is modest, who desireth honour as hee ought, and so farre forth as it becommeth him: but he that desireth it more than he ought, and by vnlawfull meanes, is ambitious and carried away with a perturbation of intemperance. Ambition neuer suffereth those that haue once receiued her as a guest, to enioy their present estate quietly, but maketh them alwaies emptie of good, and full of hope. It causeth them to contemne that which they haue gotten by great paines and trauell, and which not long before they desired very earnestly, by reason of their new imaginations and conceits of greater matters, which they continually barke foorth, but neuer haue their mindes satisfied and contented. And the more they grow and increase in power and authoritie, the rather are they induced and carried headlong by their affections to commit all kinde of iniustice, and flatter themselves in furious and frantike actions, that they may come to the end of their infinite platformes, and of that proude and tyrannicall glorie, which, contrary to all dutie, they seeke after. These imperfections happen vnto them, because from the beginning they studied to hoord, and heape vp externall, mortall and hurtfull riches, before they had laide a good foundation of reason through knowledge and learning, thereby to direct aright their purposes and doings, according to comlineisse and honellie. And therefore oftentimes they are deceived and misle of their intent, and eueploose that which they might haue had, because they sought ouer boldly to lay hands on that which they could not so much astouch. So that wee may well saie with Timon: that the elements and matters of mischiefs, are ambition and auarice, which are found

The force of
desire to enioy any pleasure.

Two kinds of ambition.

What ambition is.

The effects
of ambition.

The cause of ambitious desires.

found both together for the most part in the same persons. But to enter into a more particular consideration of the nature of euery ambitious man, he hath commonly this property, to enuie the glory of others: whereby he becommeth odious, and stirreth vp against himselfe the enuy and ill will of euery one. Moreouer, this his ielousie ouer another mans glory, is so much the more hurtfull vnto him in that he might, being set in high estate and authority, vse the helpe and company of such as are vertuous and noble minded in the execution of great matters, if in stead of taking them for his aduersaries, in the pursuite of vertue he fauoured them, and drew them nere vnto himselfe. Whereby we may iudge, that there is none so pernicious a plague for the ouerthrowe of vertue, as ambition, because it is neuer without contention for glory and honour, even against the greatest friends, from whence in the end proceede the greatest enmities. Cicero also saith very well, that whatsoeuer hath this quality, that many things of the same kinde cannot be excellent, thereof ariseth for the most part such strife, that it is a very hard matter to obserue holy Societie. For equitie is not easily kept inuolable, when one desireth to bee greater then all the rest. It commeth through the fault of ambition (saith Aristotle) that many seditions arise in cities. For the mightier, not the vulgar sort, contend for honours and promotions. But if, as Pluto writeth, there were a Common wealth of good men, you should see as great strife for the auoiding of offices, as now men contend to commaund and rule. Also the honour of a good man (saith Plutarke to Traian) consisteth not in that estate or office which he presently enioyeth, but in his former deserts; so that it is to the office whereunto men giue new honor, as for the person hee hath but a painefull charge. Out of the sayings of these great Philosophers we will draw this conclusion, that we must labor more to deserue estates and honours, than dare to procure them, and account that thing vnworthy and vnseeming vs, which is obtained by vnlawfull meanes. Now as the ambitious man is intollerable in all his actions, so especially he bringeth himselfe in derision and reproch, through his burning desire of glory and praise, which he looketh that others should yield vnto him, and wherein he taketh vnmeasurable delight. Now, if hee perceiueth that he cannot be commended for his doings that are vnworthy of honor, the thirst of glory wherewith he pineth away, compelleth him to borrow of himselfe by his owne commendation against all seemlines: which is neither more nor lesse, than if the body of a man in time offamine, not receiuing nourishment else where, should take of it own substance against nature. Further, if we should go about here to make recitall of those notable euils and mischiefes, which the ambition of some particular men hath brought vpon Monarchies, cities, and common wealths, and generally vpon all those persons which were vnder their bloody reigne, the whole life of one man would not suffice to describe them. But to touch this point briefly: we may note in all ancient histories, that the greatest plagues of flourishing estates, and oftentimes their vtter subuersion, came from ciuill warres and dissensions stirred vp by ambitious men, desirous to command, and to be preferred before others. What did at any time procure the ruine of Græcia, flourishing in armes and sciences, so much as the ambition of those men who sought to bring the publike offices into their owne hands, as Leosthenes, Demosthenes, and many others did who were not affraid to kindle the fire of domesticall diuision, not caring what would be the issue of their damnable enterprises, so they might make way for their deuised platforms? How many mischiefes did Alcibiades procure to his country, being an enemy to peace, and giuen to al kinde of nouelties & seditions? Who vsed to say, that a noble heart ought to labour but for one thing in this world, namely, to bee great among his owne countremen, and to purchase fame and renoune among strangers. Which had beene well spoken, if he had added, by Iustice, and Vertue. Was it not from the same fountaine of ambition, that so hurtfull warres to both those common wealths of the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, the one being masters of the sea, & the other of the land, tooke their beginning, and thereby were both brought to ruine in the end? Was it not the same cause of ambition in certain particular men, which procured the speedy returne of that good king Agessilaus, to redresse the ciuill dissensions of Græcia, when he was in Asia continuing those goodly victories, which he had against the Barbarians, for the comfort and libertie of many Græcian cities? O ye Græcians (saith that wise Prince, being very sorrowfull) how many more mischiefes do ye procure to your selues, than were procured vnto you by the Barbarians banded together for your ouerthrow, seeing yee are so vnhappy as to stay with your owne hands that good speede, which conducted you to the top of felicitie, & to turne backe into your owne intrayles, those weapons which were so well guided against your enemies, by calling backe the war into your owne country, from whence it was so happily banished? The

Enuy a note of an ambitious man.

Sedition a fruit of ambition.

Ambitious men full of
seife-praise.

Ciuil warres
a fruite of ambition.

Alcibiades.

A very fit admonition for France.

great

Caesar and Pompey.

The Triumvirate.

The ambition of the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy.

Ambitious men can be no good counsellors to Princes.

Effects of ambition in great men.

The names of Peace and War abused much by Princes.

Dionides answered to Alexander.

great and large scope of the Romane Empire ouer three parts of the world, could not satisfie the ambition of Caesar and Pompey, whilst the one could abide no equall, and the other no superior: inso much, that they omitted and forgot no meanes to encrease their greatnesse, although it were with the charges of the Common wealth. As we may reade among other things of Caesar, who, to ground and vnderprop his power well for continuance, gaue at one time to Paulus the Consull, nine hundred thousand crownes, for feare least he should oppose himselfe against his enterprises: and to Curio the Tribune he gaue fiftene hundred thousand crownes, that he should take his part. After the death of these two Princes, that great dominion could no better content the Triumvirate, namely, Octavius, Antonius, and Lepidus, who by force of armes ceased not to put their country to sword & fire, vntill the soueraigne authoritie became resident in one alone. But why should we seeke among the ancients, or amongst our neighbors for examples of the pernicious effects of this vice, seeing we haue so many at our owne gates? Who kindled that fire in France, which had taken hold of alj the parts thereof, and almost consumed it vtterly vnder the reigne of the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, who strove together for the gouernment of the kingdome. Were there not vpon the same occasion more than foure thousand men slaine in one day within Paris, the most of them being men of name, at the instigation and procurement of the Duke of Burgundie who had taken possession thereof? But alas, the continuall and present remembrance of our late and vnspeakeable miseries, procured chiefly from the same fountaine of ambition, & known to women and children, staie me from seeking farther for testimonies of this our present matter. Yea, I feare greatly, that we shall shortly see (I would to God I might be deceived) the finall and entire ruine of our Monarchie, which hath flourished as long as ever any did, and continued longer vnuanquished of strangers. For we see her owne children bathing their hands in her blood, and seeking to plucke out her heart and intrails, and to cast them as a prey before her enemies. O how would Princes chafe far from them all ambitious persons, if they were well instructed in vertue, and in the knowledge of those evils which such men procure! Seeing it is impossible that any good counsell should proceede from them, but only such as tendeth to the aduancement of their priuate greatnesse. Now if ambition be the mother of ciuill wars, is it not the same also of all other wars, which are daily breed betwene Kings and Princes, through the desire of increasing their bounds, of seizing vpon other mens territories, to the treading downe, oppression, and ruine of their poore subiects, and oftentimes of their owne estates? Is it not ambition which blindeth men so, that they are not content to be chiefe among a million of others ouer whom they command, vlesse they be equal or superior to one or two of those whom they know to be greater than themselves? The desire of hauing more (saith Plutarke) is a vice common to Princes and great Lords, which by reason of ambition and desire to rule, bringeth forth in them oftentimes an vnsociable, cruell, and beastly nature. And as Ennius saith, there is no faith or assured society in kingdomes. For they, whose greedines neither sea, nor mountaines, nor vnhabitable deserts can staie, and whose vnsatiabie desire of hauing, cannot be limited with those bounds, which separate Asia from Europe, how will they content themselves with their owne, and not seeke to vsurpe that which belongeth to another, especially when their confines and borders touch one another, and are ioyned so neere together, that nothing is betwene them? It is impossible. And in truth, howsoeuer they dissemble, they purposely war one with another, watching continually for meanes to surprize and overreach each other. But in outward shew they vse these two words of Peace, and War, as a peece of mony, according as it shall make best for their purpose, not for duties sake, or vpon reason and iustice, but for their owne profit and aduantage, wickedly disguising in that maner the intemission and surceasing from the execution of their ill will and purpose, with the holy name of iustice & amity. Princes therefore must not think it strange, if sometime private men (howbeit that doth not excuse them) find the like dealing profitable vnto them, according as it falleth out for their purpose. For in so doing, they do but imitate and follow them that are their maisters in all disloyalty, treason, and infidelity, thinking that he bestirreth himselfe, who least of all obserueth that which equity and iustice require. This did Dionides the Pirat fitly giue Alexander the Great to vnderstand, when he asked of him why he troubled the whole sea, and robbed euery one. Know (quoth he to him) that thou and I are both of one disposition and calling, except in this, that I am called a pirat for scouring the seas with a few men, and thou a Prince, because thou inuadest and spoilest euery where with great and mighty armes. But if thou wert Dionides, and I Alexander, it may be I should be a better Prince than thou a good pirat. With which free speech Alexander

der was so delighted, that in stead of a guilty man brought before him to be punished, as was Dionides, he made him one of his great captaines. But to continue our matter, if Right (say ambitious men) may be violated, it is to be violated for a kingdome. O speech full of impiety, yea such as will cause them to bury the violating of so holy a thing very dearly, seeing they spare not him who calleth himselfe equity and iustice it selfe. Further, if (as histories teach vs) some haue beene so wretched and miserable, as to give themselves to the art of Necromancy, and to contract with the diuell, that they might come to soueraigne power and authority, what other thing, how strange soeuer it be, will not they vndertake that suffer themselves to be wholly carried away with this vice of ambition? It is ambition that setteth the son against the father, & imboldeneth him to seeke his destruction of whom he holdeth his life. Henry the fift by force deprived his father from the Empire, and caused him to die miserably in prison. Fredericke the third, after he had reigned thirty yeares, was miserably strangled by Manfroy his bastard son, whom he had made Prince of Tarentum. And after he had committed this paricide, he poisoned his brother Conradus lawfull inheritor to Fredericke, that he might make himselfe king of Naples. Antoninus and Geta, brothers & successors in the Empire to Seuerus their father, could not suffer one another to enioy so large a Monarchie: for Antoninus slue his brother Geta with a dagger, that himselfe might rule alone, Solyman king of the Turkes, grandfather to him that now reigneth, when he heard the lowd acclamations and shouts for ioy which all his army made to Sultan Mustapha his sonne returning out of Persia, after he had caused them to be strangled in his outward chamber, and presently to be cast out dead before his whole armie, he made this speech to be published with a lowd voice, that there was but one God in heaven, & one Sultan vpon earth. Within two daies he put to death Sultan Soba, because he wept for his brother, and Sultan Mabe-met his third son, because he fled for feare, leauing one only alive to auoid the inconueniency of many Lords. These are but of the smaller fruits of this wild plant of ambition, in respect of those that cause men to put innocents to death, that themselves may take surer footing to growe vp and increase. And no doubt but for thee most part, iust punishment for example to men, followeth such an ambitious passion, whereof there are infinite examples both in the Greeke and Latin histories. Marcus Crassus a Romane Consul, & the richest man in his time, not contenting himselfe with many goodly victories gotten by him, but burning with an excessive ambition and desire of new triumphs, and being iealous of Cesars glory obtained by his great feats of arms, presumed at the age of 60. yeares to vndertake the war against Ar-saces king of the Parthians, contrary to the will of the Senate, feeding himselfe with vain hope, which led him to a shamefull death ioyned with publike losse and calamity. For being overcome and his army discomfited, he was miserably slaine with twenty thousand of his men, & ten thousand taken prisoners, Marinus hauing passed through all the degrees of honor, & bin sixe times Consul, which neuer any Roman before was, not content with al this, would notwithstanding take vnto himselfe the charge of the war against Mithridates, which fell to Sylla by lot, euen then when he was weakened with old age, thinking with himselfe to get the Consulship the seventh time, and to continue that soueraigne authority in his owne person. But this was the cause of his vtter ouerthrow, and of that slaughter, whereby all Italy and Spaine were imbrued with blood by Sylla, and the popular estate brought in the end to extreame tyranny. Spurius Melius a Senator of Rome, was murdered for his ambition, and his house razed by Cincinnatus the Dictator, because he sought by meanes of a certaine distribution of wheat, to make himselfe king of Rome. Marcus Manlius was also vpon the like occasion throwne downe headlong from the top of a rocke. Therefore it appeareth sufficiently vnto vs how pernicious this vice of ambition is in the soules of great men, and worthy of perpetual blame. And although the matter be not of so great weight, when they that follow this vicious passion are but meane men and of small account, yet we are to know, that all they depart farre from duty and honesty, who, for the obtaining of glory and renowne, shew themselves inflamed and desirous to excell others in all those things which they ought to haue common together for the mutual aide & comfort of euery one. Onely we must seeke, without pride and enuy, after excellency and preferment in that which is vertuous, and profitable for humane society, contenting our selues notwithstanding with that, which we are able to performe, and so we shall neuer be blamed: but iustly may we be condemned, if we vndertake that which is aboue our strength. Especially let our desires and passions give place to the benefit of the Common-wealth, as heretofore Cretes and Hermias, two great men of Magnesia, dealt one towards another. Their citie beeing besieged by Mithridates, and themselves

Examples of
the fruits of ambition.

Fredericus 3.

*Antoninus and Geta.
Solyman.*

Marcus Crassus iustly punished for his ambition.

Marinus.

S. Melius.

M. Manlius.

How and wherein we may seeke for honour.

Cretes and ermias.

hauing H

hauing before beene at great strife for honour and preheminance, Cretes offered Hermias to let him haue the charge of capitaine Generall, in the meane time he would depart the citie: or if he had rather depart, that he should leaue that office to him. This offer hee made, least if both of them should be together, their iealousie might breed some mischiefe to their country. Hermias seeing the honest offer of his companion, and knowing him to be more expert in feats of warre, willingly surrendered the authoritie of commanding vnto him. Now to end our present discourse, let vs learne to know their outrageous folly, who for imaginary honours, and those of so small continuance, that the wise man compareth them to smoke disperfed of the winde, desire nothing more than to run out of the race of their daies in continuall miseries and calamities, trauels and cares, depriving themselves of all libertie, and which is worse, pawning their soules to an eternall and most miserable thraldome. Thus let vs detest ambition, which is an infinite euill and companion of pride, so much hated of God and men. Let vs consider a little that point of Philosophie which we finde written by Traian to Plutarke, Ienuie (said this good prince) Cincinnatus, Scipio Africanus, and Marcus Porcius, more for their contempt of offices than for the victories which they haue gotten, because a conqueror is for the most part in fortune's power, but the contempt and refusall of offices, and honours consisteth onely in prudence. Let vs marke well the example of the Emperour Plinius Vespasianus, who being admonished by his friends to beware of one Metius Pomposianus, (because it was a common rumour that he should one day be Emperour) was so farre from procuring him any harme or displeasure, or from hating or enuying him, (as it is the property of ambitious men, to feare aboue all things least their estate be touched, because they would reigne alone) that contrariwise he made him Consull the next yeare. Whereat his familiar friends wondering and disswading him from it, My meaning is (quoth hee to them) that he should one day remember this good turne. Let vs also propound to kings and princes that sentence of Titus the Emperour, who making a feast one day with a cheerefull countenance to the contentation of euery one, in the end of the banquet strake himselfe on the brest at the table, and fetched a great sigh withall: whereupon his fauorites demanding the cause why, I cannot (quoth he) keepe my selfe from sighing and complaining, when I call to minde that this great honour which I haue, dependeth vpon the will of Fortune: that my estates and dignities are as it were in sequestration, and my life as it were laid in pawne and pledged vnto me. Let the saying of that good prince Philip king of Macedonia be well noted of great men, who on a day falling all along in that place where wrestling was exercised, and beholding the fashion of his body printed in the dust, Good Lord (quoth he) how little ground must we haue by nature, and yet we desire all the habitable world. According to his example let vs all humble our selues to the acknowledgement of our imbecillitie and poore humane estate, and let vs moderate our vnruely affections through the contempt of those things which worldly men desire and seeke after, iudging them an vnworthy reward for vertue. Let every one of vs content himselfe with his estate and calling, so that it tendeth to the right end, namely to his glory, that gaue it vnto vs, and to the benefite and profite of his creatures, and let all be done according to that measure of graces, which hee shall bestow vpon vs.

Traians letter to Plutarke.

Vespasianus.

A notable saying of Titus. Another of Philip king of Macedonia.

Of Voluptuousnesse and Lecherie. Chap. 22.

ACHITOB

AMong those faults which men commit, beeing led with desire and pleasure that is naturally in them, we noted a little before, luxuriousnesse and whooredome. But because we then reserued it to a more ample handling of Voluptuousnesse, and of a lustfull life, which is the chiefe worke thereof, and whose desire and contentation is in lechery, to the end we may the better discover that sugred poyson, which lurketh vnder these detestable vices, I am of opinion that we must begin to enter into this large field, so fruitfull for thornes and thistles, which to sicke eies many times seeme faire blossomes of some goodly fruits: propounding to the sight of euery one, the nature and effect of the tyrannicall power of pleasure, a mortall enemy to the reigne of Vertue.

Pleasure the hooke of all euill.

A SER. Pleasure (saith Plato) is the hooke of all euils, because men are taken thereby as a fish by a hooke. For it quencheth the light of the soule, hindereth all good counsell, and through inticements turneth men aside from the way of vertue, throwing them down headlong into the gulf of confusion, which is luxuriousnesse and whooredome, a most wicked and abominable vice aboue all others, whereby all vertue is hurt and offended.

A MANA. Hee that is given to pleasure (saith Cicero) iudgeth all things, not according to to reason, but according to sense, esteeming that best, which most delighteth him: so that he easily suffereth himselfe to be kindled with the burning fire of luxuriosnesse, which is hurtfull to every age, and extinguisheth olde age. But let vs heare ARAM vpon this matter.

ARAM. It is no new opinion, that many iudging according to their sensuality and being altogether ignorant of the true nature and immortality of the soule, haue placed their soueraigne Good in pleasure, & in the inioying of those things which most of all tickle the senses. Aristippus and all the Cyrinaiks, Epicurus, Metrodorus, Chrysippus, and many others, who falsly tooke vnto themselves the name of Philosophers, labored to prooue it by many arguments, cloaking their wickednesse with graue and lofty words, saying: that none could perfectly attaine to pleasure, except he were vertuous and wise. But that which Cicero alleadgeth against them, is sufficient to discover the maske of their impudencie, and to conuince them of lying: namely, that we must not simply looke to mens sayings, but consider whether they agree in their opinions. For how is it possible, that he which placeth his chiefe Good in the pleasure of the body, and in neuer feeling griefe, should make account of to imbrace vertue, which is an enemy to delights and pleasures, & commandeth vs rather to suffer a cruel & dolorous death, than to start aside against duty. It is certaine, that he which placeth his chiefe Good in pleasure hath noregard to do any thing but for his private profite. Whereby he declareth sufficiently, that he careth not at al for vertue, especially iustice, which comandeth nothing so much, as to leaue our own particular pleasure & profit, and to imbrace, though with our peril and losse, the publike welfare. Moreouer, how could he be couragious, if he thought that griefe were the extreamest and greatest euill, or temperate supposing pleasure to be perfect felicitie? Besides what can be more vnseeming man, appointed for all great excellent things, then to take that for his chiefe Good, whereof brute beasts haue better part than we, and to leaue the care of that which is diuine and immortall in vs, to attend to that which is mortall and subiect to corruption? But these erronious & false opinions, being contrary to themselves, are so absurd and full of blockish ignorance, that we neede not heere lose much time in confuting them, & conuincing them of lies. Notwithstanding, it being so common a thing with men, to imbrace pleasure as the principall end of their actions, because naturally they desire pleasure, and shun griefe: will it bee eise for vs to shew, that ignorance onely guideth them, when being deprived of the knowledge of that Good which is to be wished for, and is pleasant and acceptable, they seeke after, through an euill choise, the greatest mischief of all. I meane pleasure vnseparably followed of griefe, which men labour most of all to eschue. Let vs then see what pleasure is, and what fruites shee bringeth with her. Voluptuousnesse or pleasure (saith Cicero) is properly called that delight, which moueth and tickleth our senses, which slideth and slippeth away, and for the most part leaueth behinde it occasions rather of repentance, than of calling, it againe to remembrance. For many through wicked and vnecessary pleasure haue fallen into great diseases, receiued great losses, and suffered many reproaches. It alwaies (saith Plato) bringeth dammage and losse to man, ingendring in his minde sorrow, sottishnesse, forgetfullnesse of prudence, and insolency. The fruits of Wherefoeuer sweete is (saith Anchippo) there presently followeth sowre. For voluptuousnesse neuer goeth alone, but is alwaies accompanied with sorrow and griefe. Pleasure (saith Plutarke) resolueeth mens bodies, mollifying them daily through delights, the continuall vse of which mortifieth their vigor, and dissolueth their strength, from whence abundance of diseases proceedeth, so that a man may see in youth the beginning of the weakenesse of old age. Voluptuousnesse is a cruel beast, making men her slaues, and chaining them (as Sophocles saith) with diamond chaines. She is so much the more odious, by howe much the more she hideth hir venome, putting vpon hir the garment of good liking, betraying vertue, and killeth a man euen when she flattereth him. When pleasure come (saith Erasmus) they flatter vs with a disguised visage & whē they depart, they leaue vs full of sorrow and sadnes. Which Xenophon very wittily deuiled vnder the name of Hercules, saying, that as he went one day into the fields, in a certaine threefold high way he met Vertue and Vice, both of them being in the shape and apparell of women. Vice being cloathed in a stately, delicate gorgious and lasciuious gown, with a smiling, painted, & coloured countenance, which did wonderfully allure by reason of the sweetnes & flourishing beauty that seemed to be in it, offered hir selfe suddenly vnto the said Hercules saying: that if he would follow hir, she would cause him to leade his whole life in delight & pleasure. But Vertue with a sorrowfull, leane, & distmaide face, & clad with a long and plaine robe, without any decking of her speech, vsed these words: If thou wilt come to me Hercules, thou shalt be indued not with bodily ornaments

Who they were that placed their chiefe Good in pleasure.

What pleasure is.

The fruits of pleasure.

The sundrie proffers which Vice and Vertue made to Hercules.

nor with fading and vanishing beauty, but with certaine other riches which are more worth and endure for euer. For whosoever beleueth me, forsaking that which seemeth faire, and cleauing to those things which outwardly appeare austere and hard, he receiveth in the end an eternall felicity. Let vs vncliothe voluptuous men (saith Plutarke) and consider their doings. They are drunkards, whooremongers, sluggish in all weighty matters, neglecting the benefit of the Common-wealth, of their parents and of their friends. But of all kind of voluptuousnesse, lechery is most defiled, filthy, vile, and pernicious, whereof especially we are now to discourse, beeing properly called of the Philosophers a furious passion, which corrupteth the sence of man, and a burning fire that consumeth him. All vnmeasurable pleasure, which men take by their five senses, is vile and dishonest: but the Græcians after a speciall manner called those men incontinent and immoderate, who exceeded in tastig and touching. And Hippocrates said, that he supposed copulation to bee a part of that foule disease, which wee call the Epilepsie or falling sicknesse. And truly there is nothing more certaine, than that immoderate vse of the venerous act spoileth beauty, defileth the body, drieth it vp, and causeth it to stinke, maketh the face pale, wan or yellow, weakeneth the members and ioints, ingendreth Sciaticke goutes, collicke passions, griefes of the stomacke, giddines of the head, or dimnesse of sight, the leprosie and pocks. It shorteneth life, taketh away the vnderstanding, darkeneth the memory and as the Prophet Osey saith, taketh away the heart. Moreouer, how odious all whooredome ought to bee vnto vs, so that it bee not so much as once named amongst vs, the onely curse that is laid vpon it of God, ought sufficiently to perswade vs, seeing thereby hee condemneth it both with temporall and with eternall death. But wee haue besides, many goodly sentences and notable examples of Ethniks and Pagans, and namely of the iust punishment, which for the most part followed this detestable vice hard at the heeles, and which ought to stir vs vp to hate it, and to flye from it with all our might, especially when adultery is ioyned therewith, which is when the sacred knot of marriage is violated and broken. Concupiscence (saith Aristotle) changeth mens bodies, and breedeth madnesse in their soules. The ende thereof is luxuriousnesse, from whence proceede a thousand wrongs, violences, incests, murders, poysonings, and innumerable other impieties. Is it not then a signe of great loosenesse and basenesse of minde, for a man to subiect himselfe to carnall concupiscences, which are disordered desires contrary to reason, and whose office and practise is to chooseth euill for good? Let vs here giue eare to Socrates disputation with Euthydemus, being very fit for our present matter. Tell me O Euthydemus, doest thou thinke that liberty is a good, great, and profitable possession, whether it belongeth either to a man, or to a city? Very great. Therefore whosoever serueth the pleasures and vnbrideled desires of the body, so that for loue of them he cannot execute that which he knoweth to be very good, doest thou thinke that hee is free? No. It may bee thou iudgeth it a thing worthy a free man to bee able to put in practise whatsoever hee taketh to bee good, and contrariwise, to bee hindred from so doing, to be seruile and slauish. So it is. Thou beleuest then that no incontinent men are free. Yea truly, and that iustly. Thinkest thou that incontinent men are hindred from doing that which is honest, or compelled to commit vicious things? I thinke they are as much compelled to doe the one, as hindred from practising the other. But what masters doest thou thinke them to bee, who forbid well doing, and constrain men to imbrace euill? In good truth, very wicked. And doest thou not thinke that bondage of all others is most troublesome, when one serueth most wicked and naughty masters? Yea. Then incontinent men are of all others most miserable, of what estate or condition soeuer they be. Besides, bee that neuer thinketh vpon goodnesse, but seeketh by all meanes to fulfill his vntamed desires of pleasure and lust, hath no more vse of reason, than beasts haue. This wise Philosopher teacheth vs sufficiently how hurtfull and pernicious a thing it is, to suffer the desires of the flesh to reigne in vs, considering that they draw vs vehemently to the practise of them, to our owne destruction: especially whoredome, which bringeth with it all kind of mischief, dissolueth and weakeneth the body, and offendeth all the vertues and goods of the soule. Through her it commeth that men abase themselves so low, as to submit both their bodies and soules to the inconstant will and vnruely desire of a foolish woman. For we see some men so bewitched with a harlot, that if neede bee, and shee command it, they will hazard their honour and credit, and oftentimes make themselves an example to a whole countrey vpon an open scaffold. And then they labour to couer their folly with this goodly name of Loue, which is better tearmed Euripides by the name of Fury and madnesse in men. For true and good loue, which is the fountaine of friendship, is alwaies grounded vpon vertue, and tendeth

What whooredome is.

The effects of immoderate copulation.

Osey 4.11.

The effects and end of concupiscence

Socrates disputation against incontinency.

The fruits of whoredome.

tendeth to that end: but this slipperie and loose loue, is a desire founded vpon a the opinion of a Good, which indeede is a most pernicious euill. And if adulterie follow vpon it (which according to Aristotle is a curious inquirie after another mans loue) the vice is twofold more detestable and wicked, because that hee which committeth it, seeketh against all dutie of nature to take away another mans honour and reputation, spoileth him of that which hee accounteth most precious, namely, of the loue and friendship of his wife, breaketh the peace of a house, causeth the wife to lose her soule, who otherwise peradventure would not haue yeelded, if he had not corrupted her. In a word, it is the cause of infinite miseries and offences which we daily see come to passe. Among the ancients this vice was so odious, that it was narrowly sought out, and chastised with very grievous punishments. In somuch that Julius Caesar caused one of his Captaines to be beheaded, because he had dishonoured the mistresse of the house where he lodged, not slaying vntill one accused him, and without any complaint made vnto him by her husband. There was a law among the Locrians, established by Zaleucus, which condemned all those that were conuicted of this vice of adulterie, to haue their eies pulled out. This law was afterward so well kept, that his sonne being taken with the fact, and all the people intreating for him, Zaleucus would neuer suffer the punishment to be any thing lessened. And yet to satisfie their importunitie in some sort, he caused one of his owne, and another of his sonnes eies to be plucked out, choosng rather to beare halfe the punishment allotted for the offence, than that it should remaine vnpunished, and the law violated. Augustus Caesar made the law Julia, intituled of Adulteries, wherein is declared, how proesse ought to proceede against those that are attainted of it, and how such as are conuicted thereof are to be punished, euen to permit the father to kill his daughter beeing taken in the fact with the adulterer. After that Fabius Fabritius was slaine by his wife through trecherie, to the end that she might haue greater liberty to commit adulterie, one of his yonger sonnes when he came to age slew his mother with the adulterer, & was absolved therof by the Senate. We read also that the least punishment vsed by the Egyptians against adulterers, was to cut off the womans nose, and the priuie parts of the man. Briefely, we shall finde, that in all nations where honour and ciuilitie is neuer so little regarded, this vice of adulterie hath beene grievously punished, and greatly hated of all noble mindes. Herein the example of Alexander is worthy to be remembred, who, when a woman was brought vnto him one euening, demanded of her why she came so late: to whom she answered, that she staid vntill her husband was gone to bed. Which he no sooner heard, but he sent her away, being very angrie with his men, because they had almost caused him to commit adulterie. He would not so much as touch his friends Concubine, although he loued her: and he tooke on wonderfully with Cassander, because he would by force kille a minstrels maide. So farre off was he from beeing willing to suffer his courtiers to force any wives or daughters of his subiects, or to induce them to suborne any for him. But contrariwise we see nowadaies, that they are most esteemed of great men whose skill is greater in corrupting of women. Antonius Venerus Duke of Venice may be vnto them an example worthie to be followed, who caused his owne sonne to die in prison, because he had rauished a maid. But let vs note a litle the eie witness of Gods wrath, who neuer, or very seldome suffereth whoordome to goe without present payment meet for such peruerse wickednesse. The reading of holy Scriptures doth furnish vs with notable examples, in the death of foure and twentie thousand Israelites for whoordome: in the punishment of the same sin committed by David, with the death of more than threescore thousand men in Israel: in the punishment of the same sinne in Salomon vpon his sonne, who was deprived of ten parts of his kingdome: in the overthrow of the cities of Sodomah and Gomorrah, and in many other places. When Satan seeketh for a readie way to cause men to fall, he commonly vseth whoordome. When Balaam taught Balaac that subtil practise to cause the Israelites to commit adolatrie, it was by meanes of the faire women of his countrie, thereby to cause them to fall into the wrath and indignation of God. Concerning histories written by men, the number of examples of Gods wrath vpon whoormongers is infinite, of which we will here alledge some, making mention of violent punishments, and of the deprivation and subuersion of flourishing estates, which haue proceeded from the same cause of whoordome. And truly it is more dangerous for a prince in regard of his estate, than any other vice, yea than cruelty it selfe. For cruelty maketh men fearefull, and striketh a terror in the subiects, but whoordome draweth with it hatred and contempt of the prince: because euery one iudgeth an effeminate man vnworthie to command a whole people. Tarquinius king of Rome, for his loftinesse surnamed the Proud, was deprived of his kingdome, because

The miserable effects of adulterie.

Zaleucus law against adulterie.

The law of Julia against adulterers.

The punishment of adulterers vsed among the Egyptians. Alexander hated adulterers.

Antony Duke of Venice.

Testimonies of Gods wrath against whoredome.

Numb. 25. 9.

This sinne of Dauid was in numbring the people, as appeared.

2. Sam. 24. 1.

1. King. 12.

Gen. 19.

The danger that dependeth vpon the loosenesse of a Prince.

Tarquinius.

because of the violence which one of his sonnes offered to Lucretia, a Romane Lady. And although he gathered together great forces, thinking thereby to re-enter into his estate, yet he could neuer attaine thereunto. Since which time the name of a king hath beene so odious among the Romanes, that they would neuer suffer any to beare that title amongst them, but from that time forward, changed the gouernment of a Monarchie into a Democracie or popular estate, abolishing all lawes appertaining to a king. In place of which they sent to the Athenians for Solons lawes, which afterwards were obserued by the Romanes, and called the lawes of the twelue tables. Appius Claudius, one of those ten that had all authoritie in the gouernment of the Romane estate, because he would haue rauished Virginia, daughter to Virginus a Citizen of Rome, who lue her to saue her honour, was banished with all his companions in that office, and their manner of gouernment changed into the authoritie of Consuls.

Cesar. What was like to haue befallen that mighty Cesar, after he had conquered France Almaine, England, Spaine, Italy, and Pompey himselfe, but a shamefull death, by reason of a foolish loue, which caused him to goe into Alexandria in disguised apparell to enioy Cleopatra, where an Eunuch and a childe had almost slaine him, if he had not cast himselfe from a high tower into the sea, and so saued himselfe by swimming to his campe vnder the gallies of his enemies?

Teuandezillus. Teuandezillus king of Spaine was, for committing violent adulterie with a Lady of a noble house, deprived both of life and kingdome. Marcus Antonius Caracalla Emperour, being carried away with intemperate lust, married his mother in law: and within a while after he lost both his Empire and life. Childericus the first of that name, king of France, after he had reigned a long time, was driuen out of his kingdome for his whoordome. Iohn, Countie of Arminack, married one of his owne sisters, and being therefore excommunicated of the Church, was deprived of his estate and life by the Emperour Charlemaigne. Rodoaldus king of Lumbardy being taken in adulterie, was slaine by the womans husband, whom hee abused. Roderigo king of Spaine, was deprived of his kingdome and life by the Saracins, who were called in by an Earle named Iulian, that hee might bee auenged of his king, who had forced his daughter. Geleatus Maria Duke of Millan being at Masse, was slaine by a citizen, who strooke him into the stomacke with a dagger, faining that hee would haue spoken with him. The chiefe cause hereof was for a suspicion which he had conceiued, that this Prince entertained his wife. In the time of Philip the faire, king of France, two knights that were brothers, named d'Aunoy, were slaine alieue for their whoordomes committed with a Queene of Nauarre, and with the Countesse of March, daughter to the Countie of Burgundy, which twaine also were condemned to perpetuall prison. Not long since, Peter Lewes Duke of Placentia, was murdered for his incest, and incredible whoordoms. Among other things, it is written of him, that he forced Cosmes Cheri Bishop of Valentia, whom he caused to bee held by his men, and after poisoned him, least he should haue accused him to the Emperour. Also not long ago, the cities of Almendine and Delmedine, were cut off from the kingdome of Fez, and brought vnder obedience to the Portingales, because a yong woman was taken away by force from her husband, by the Gouernour of them, who was afterwards slaine. Abusabid also king of Fez, was muredred with sixe of his children by his Secretarie, whose wife hee had abused. This is set downe by Leon in the description of Africke. In our time, and even amongst vs, too many such examples of the pernicious fruits of whoordome haue fallen out. Neuerthelesse, it beareth such sway in this desolate France, that they are accounted the gallantest men, who are the greatest pillars of whoordome. Yea, the greater sort, that ought to be patterns of chastitie to others, are bolde in the practise therof, thinking to couer their shame, to cloke & disguise their whoordome with the maske of vertue, accounting it a point of glory and honour to be the chiefe and most expert in that schoole. But let vs know that this vizard is but to make them altogether without excuse before him, from whom nothing can be hidden, and who abhorreth all maliciousnes and shameles impudency, wherewith whoormongers set forth their face. And seeing that he, whose mercie is endlesse, supplieth the want and infirmitie of his creatures, this vice of whoordome is without all colour of excuse before him, because he hath giuen vs a holy and honourable remedie against it, which is marriage, permitted to euery one, but yet despised of all whoormongers, to their ruine and eternall confusion. And if they were not wholly blinded through continuance in vice, the scourges of ciuill warre, of heresie, of famine, and of rebellion which France at this day suffereth, would be more than ynough to vnseale their eyes, that they might acknowledge the wrath of the Almighty, ready to destroy them both body and soule. Therefore let vs that are better instructed by our Academie, learne of Socrates, that a wise man ought to passe by pleasures pleasures as by the Syrens, if he long to attaine to vertue, his most happy countrey and dwelling place. And for a good helpe hereunto, let vs take the counsell of Epictetus, saying: When thy spirit is drawne with some desire of pleasure, beware thou tumble not into some downefall: and meditate a litle, considering diligently, that after thou hast beene overcome of pleasure there remaineth nothing but repentance, and thy hatred against thyselfe. Whereas if thou abstainest, a steadfast and assured ioy possesseth thy heart, which wholly driueth away sorrow. Thus let vs endeauour to decke our selues with puritie, chastitie, and vprightnesse, hating in such sort voluptuousnesse and lechery (the deere and costly pleasure whereof passeth away as the winde, and leaueth behind it a shamefull remembrance) that following the will of our law-maker, we shun all dissolutenesse tending that way, whether it be immodest garments, vnchast gestures and countenances, or vile and filthy words, which may induce others to euill. Let vs remember in good time what Archelaus, a great Philosopher said to a yong man clothed with superfluous apparell, that it was all one in what part soener of his body he declared his vnchastnesse, and that it was enermore to be condemned. But aboue all things let that diuine sentence found without ceasing in our eares, that no booremonger hath any inheritance in the kingdome of Iesus Christ. And if, being naturally giuen to loue pleasure, and to feare griefe, we would delight our soule with a ioy that is both profitable and pleasant: let vs lift it vp in the meditation of those vnspeakeable and endlesse riches, which are promised vnto it in that happie immortalitie: and so wee shall weaken and make fruitlesse that desire of worldly pleasure, which is borne together with vs.

Good counsell against whoordome.

1. Cor. 9. 9.
Ephel. 3. 3.

Of Glory, praise, honour, and of pride. Chap. 23.

A R A M. MEN hauing their eies covered with ignorance, vse commonly to say, that he hath a great lookie and noble minde, who aspieth to honours, estates, riches, and other worldly vanities. Albeit truly, if we narrowly looke vnto the end wherefore they direct their intents and actions that way, we shall see nothing else in them but a desire of vaine glory and praise, thereby to feede their pride and natural passions, which are so pernicious in the soule, that if they be not ruled by temperance and mediocritie, and grounded vpon vertue, which is the fountaine of honour, they will bring forth very dangerous effects, cleane contrary to mens desires.

The iudgement of ignorant men touching noblenes of minde.

A C H I T O B. They (saith Seneca) that would make choise of a happy life, most not follow the fashion and manner of life vsed by the multitude and greatest part of men, but such a one as is altogether contrary thereunto. And this we shall doe, if we despise the glorie, honour, praise and pride of the world, and iudge nothing worthy to be cared for of vs, but onely vertue, which is able to bring vs to the fulnesse of true glory, and of everlasting felicitie.

How wee should make choise of a happy life.

A S E R. The glory (saith Pindarus) that a man taketh to see himselfe in honour and credite, maketh paines to seeme pleasant, and trauell tollerable. It is the property of a stone (saith Cicero) not to haue any feeling of the difference that is betwene praise and dispraise: but it belongeth to a wise man not to be so moued with all these things, as that they should caule him to draw backe from duty. Let vs then heare A M A N A discourse more at large of the matter which is here propounded vnto vs.

A M A N A. Most certaine it is, that commonly nothing affecteth a man more than the coueting of glory, of praise, and of honour, whereof he is by nature desirous. But as all the passions and diseases of the soule are for the most part followed with those inconueniences, which men pretend most of all to eschue, so oftentimes they that glance at honour, as if that were vertue it selfe, leauing behind them the path of that vertue from whence honour ought to proceede, and which is able of it selfe to adorne and decke men, fall into the same reckoning that Ixion did, who (as the Poets say) had to doe with a cloude, supposing it to haue bin the goddesse Iuno, whereupon the Centaures were engendred. Euen so worldly men embracing vaine-glory onely, which is but a false shadow of true vertue, all their doings deserue so small commendation, that if they were well weighed, they should rather be found worthy of blame and dishonour, than of that honour, which they so greatly seeke and aske after. For this cause the ancient Romanes built two Temples ioyned together, the one being dedicated to Vertue, and the other to Honour: but yet in such sort, that no man could enter into that of Honour, except first he passed through the other of Vertue. But seeing the way of Vertue is so little frequented at this day, no maruel (as Hesiodus saith) if so great a heape of wickednesse be dispersed through the world, that all shame & honour haue forsaken & abandoned the

The common downefall of the passions of the soule.

The Romans built two Temples, the one to Vertue, and the other to Honour.

the life of man. Now if an honest man prefer the losse of his honour before his owne life, to the end hee bee none of those that content themselves with a deceitfull Idea and platforme, in stead of the thing it selfe, let him learne aboue all things to know wherein true glory and honor consist, and from whence he may deserue praise: which first is in Goodnes and Iustice: secondly, in guiding all humane actions prudently according to duty, comelinesse and honestie. These are the onely meanes to get durable and eternall honor, glorie, and praise, which alwaies follow vertue as the shadow doth the body, hauing this property to make men wise, iust, prudent, and to bring them to the best, excellentest, and most diuine habite that can bee in men, which is the vprightnes of reason and iudgement, and to the perfection (next after God) of the reasonable nature, which is such a disposition of the soule as consenteth and agreeth with it selfe. Therefore that goodnesse and excellencie which proceedeth of wisdom and good instruction, is the first stepp to come to honour, because from that as from a liuely fountaine floweth euery vertuous and praise-worthie action, practised by a prudent man. For (as Cicero saith) no man can be prudent, but he must needs be good. Now this is cleane contrarie to the common opinion of those that run so swiftly now adaies after honor and reputation, who being ignorant of euery good cause and reason, and hauing corrupt and wicked conditions, imagine in their mindes, that so long as they doe some act well liked of great men, and for which they may be noted out by them to bee men of valure, making good peny-worths of their skin, and of their conscience also, whether it bee in fight, or in the execution of some other commaundement of theirs, they shall haue cause to thinke themselves worthie of great honour, and to bee preferred before other men. For they suppose that honour ought to bee measured by that good will and liking which men conceiue of them, although they themselves be most wicked, and not by the triall of the work whether it be good or euill in it selfe. But I wonder at their follie. For seeing they haue no goodnes in them, how can they iudge what ought to be done or left vndone, according to equity and iustice? And what honour will they deserue in all their actions, being guided onely with a desire of worldlie glorie, which (as Quintilian saith) is the chiefe and principall euill? Do not they also propound to themselves as a recompence of their paine and trauell, aduancement to high estates and dignities, that they may the better enioie worldlie pleasures? Whereby they become slaues to mortall goods and riches all their life time, and deprive themselves of that precious liberty of the soule, for which a noble heart ought to fight and to suffer death. But a good man adorned with goodnesse and iustice, propoundeth vnto himselfe a far other end. For admiring nothing but vertue, hee seeketh not to bee honoured but in obeying her, in following her steps, and in referring all his doings to the infallible rule thereof. He knoweth (as Seneca saith) that glory is to bee followed, not to bee desired: that it is gotten by such a noble courage as measureth all things by conscience, not doing any thing for ostentation and vanitie. The price and reward which he expecteth in this life for euery laudable action, is to haue done it: and yet he deprieth not himselfe of glorie, which remaineth immortall vnto him among good men for his iust and vertuous deedes, neither careth hee at all what the wicked or ignorant fort thinke or speak of him. Hauing laid this ground and foundation of all his intents and purposes, he looketh not to the most beaten way, nor to the present state of things, that he might applie himselfe to the time, as though he feared that hee should be left behinde, but desireth rather to abide vnknowne in his simplicitie, than with the hurt and detriment of his soule, to intrude himselfe among the greatest. And if he vndertake, or execute any thing, he hath iustice and prudence alwaies for his guides: and then neither feare nor danger is able to driue him from his determinate purpose, which howsoeuer it falleth out, is alwaies no lesse worthy of honour and praise, than their actions, who doe nothing but for worldly glorie, deserue blame and dispraise, which they feare most of all, and labour to auoide. True it is, that these men, who ambitionly seeke after vaine-glory and greatnes, may say vnto mee, that things goe far otherwise than I speake of, and that their doings, who apply themselves to the pleasure and liking of the greater sort, without sparing their liues, are as much extolled as the others that respect the vprightnes of causes, are set light by and contemned. But I answer them againe, that it is the duty of a prudent man, rather to feare the iudgement and opinion of a few wise men, than of an ignorant multitude. Neither ought hee to leaue his conceiued purposes grounded vpon reason, for the praise of men. For they that doe otherwise, declare euidently, that they liue not but for the world, hauing no care of the principall and chiefe ende of their beeing. Bion compared such men very fitly to vessels with two handles, which are easily carried by the cares whither soeuer a man will. So these men

The first step to Honor.

Wherein
worldlings
place honor.

The White
at which e-uery good man ought to aime.

The iudge-
ments of the best, not of the most, is to be preferred alwaies.

men being praised and much made of, undertake all things boldly: yea the burning heate of glory oftentimes carrieth them so farre, that they praise and commend their owne doings to no purpose. Which is so vnseemely a thing (as Aristotle saith) that it is more blame worthy than lying, which commonly goeth with it, and is also a great argument of an inconstant minde. But as Plutarke saith, the more reason a man hath gotten by Philosophie, the more he looseth of his pride and arrogancy, and they that haue nothing before their eyes, whereunto they aspire, but vertue and duty onely, vse the occasion, time, and sequele of their affaires, without caring for any other praise than that which proceeded from the nature, iudgment and consent of all good men. It is true, that sometime it is tollerable in good men, yea necessarie for the benefite of others, to commend themselves in some sort, by speaking of themselves to their aduantage. As if labouring to be beleaued, wee rendred a reason of our vertue and goodnesse by our former effects, that so hauing meanes to continue our vertuous actions to the benefite of many, we may, as it were against their wils, worke their safetie, and compell those men to receiue a good turne, who shun all occasions thereby. This caused Themistocles to vse those speeches in the Councell of the Athenians, whom he perceined to be wearie of him: O poore men (quoth he to them) why doe ye oftentimes receiue benefits of the same parties? And another time he vsed these words: In rainie and stormie weather ye haue recourse to me, as to the shelter of a tree, but when faire weather returneth, ye snatch euery one a branch, as ye passe by. Homer bringeth in Nestor rehearsing his prowes and valiant acts, to incourage Patroclus and the other nine knights to undertake the combate against Hector man to man. Moreover, exhortation hauing the testimonie of workes ready at hand, and examples ioyned with the pricke of emulation, are liuely, and wonderfully whetteth men on: yea they bring together with courage and affection, hope of ability to attaine to the end of that thing, which is perceiued not to be impossible. But in this case, as in euery other action, let vs aboue all eschue pride, hated of God and men, and the cause of the corruption and transgression of mans nature. Yea, it causeth that worke to become wicked, which of it selfe is good: so that humble submission is better than the proud boasting of our good deeds, which causeth a proud man oftentimes to fall into more detestable vices than he was in before. Now in requiring first and chiefly those praises that proceede of bountie and iustice, my meaning is not that we should contemne, but rather search diligently after those that procure vnto vs immortall glorie by noble and couragious acts, provided alwaies that they passe not the bounds of equitie and iustice. For otherwise they cannot but falsly be called workes of fortitude and generosity, as hereafter in our discourses vpon these vertues we may vnderstand more at large. Therefore it is the ielousie of glorie gotten by vertue, after the examples of our predecesors that liued well, which ought to pricke forward euery noble heart, to build for himselfe an eternall monument through heroicall deeds, when dutie and reason inuite vs thereunto. Thus did that good and valiant capitaine Mattathias behaue himselfe, who, denying obedience to the tyrannicall edicts of Antiochus after hee had subiected and subuerted Ierusalem, and taking armes with his five sonnes, went into the fields, out of a poore village where he dwelt, and called vnto him such as would follow him to recouer againe their liberty. And after many victories obtained by him, when hee perceiued that he drew neere to death, hee exhorted his sonnes to follow his iust and holy deliberation without feare of any danger. True it is (quoth he to them) that our bodies are mortall, and subiect to the same decree that others are, but the memory of excellent deeds procureth to it selfe an immortalitie, whereunto I would haue you aspire in such sort, that ye thinke not much to die in behauing your selues valiantly. Thus it is lawfull for vs to be touched, and stirred vp with the ielousie of a good glory, so that it be without enuying the prosperitie and preferment of others, but onely so far forth as it may serue for a spur vnto vs to undertake and to effect all vertuous and commendable things. As for example: Themistocles hearing of the great victorie that Miltiades had obtained in the plaine of Marathron, said: that that newes would let him take no rest: meaning therby, that he should neuer be quiet, vntill by some other act of vertue he had deserued as much praise, as did this excellent Capitaine Miltiades. Titus Flaminius a Romane Consul, who deliuered Græcia from bondage, and twise in battell ranged, ouerthrew Philip king of Macedonia, shewed himselfe likewise greatly touched with a desire of glory and honour, not to be blamed, but to be praised of all excellent and noble natures, by putting to his helping hand whensoever hee could, with the first, yea, sometimes alone, to euery matter and exploit of importance. Hee kept company oftner and more gladly with those that stood in neede of his helpe, than with such as were able to aide him in well dooing, accounting

A good man may sometime praise himselfe.

Themistocles did so.

And Nestor

The effects of pride.

The worke of fortitude must bee grounded vpon equitie and iustice.

Mattathias exhortation to his sonnes.

How ielousie of glory is tollerable. Themistocles.

T. Flaminius.

Cæsar wept at the sight of A lexanders
image.

Cyrus.

A notable story of an In dian.

Examples of the contempt
and desire of
vaine glory.
Pompeius.

Tamberlans
seuerity towards Baiazet
the great Turke.

Saphors towards Vale-rianus.

Pope Alexanders towards Fredericke.
Psal. 91. 13

Agathocles.

The honor of great men
dependeth of their vertue,
not of their dignitie.

these men to be his competitors in the purchasing of honor and glory, and the othersto be matter whereupon he might exercise his vertue. It was an argument of yoong yeares which seemed to promise much, and to be borne to all great enterprises, when Iulius Cæsar being yet very yoong, and beholding the image of Alexander the Great at foure and twenty yeares of age, fell to weeping, and said: Am not I miserable that haue done nothing worthy of memory, and yet this prince at these yeares had executed so many notable things? Moreouer, we may obserue among the Ancients infinite worthy examples quite contrary one to another, in that many great and famous men haue altogether despised the honor of vaine-glory, which is neuer without presumption & pride: and contrariwise, others being led with pride and arrogancy, haue fowlie abused their authority and greatnes, purchasing to themselves more blame and dishonor, than praise and honour. That great Cyrus Monarch of the Persians, was of so meeke and gentle a nature, and so little desirous of vaine glory, that he would neuer prouoke his equals in age to any exercise wherein he perceived himselfe the stronger, but those rather, who were better practised than himselfe, to the end he might not displease them by bearing away the price from them; as also that he might reape this benefite, to learne that which he could not do so well as others. O right noble heart, giving euident proofe of the contempt of base and vile things, to treasure vp those that are great and excellent! But now a daies whereabout do we strue most? namely, who can most cunningly strike with the sword, runne at the ring, or ride and manage horses. And I would to God we did no worse. But as for excelling others in vertue, these times require no such matter. We reade of an Indian, who being commanded by Alexander the Great to shoote before him, because he had heard that he was very excellent in that art, would doe nothing. Whereupon the Monarch being incensed, condemned him to death, if he would not obey him. The Indian going to execution, told one of those that led him, that he had bene indeed heretofore a very good Archer, but because he had of long time intermitted that exercise, he feared that he had forgotten it: and therefore had rather die then lose the reputation, which he had once obtained. To this fellow we may compare those of whom we haue already spoken, who glory in nothing but in this, that they are taken of the greater sort for valiant men, and, as they vse to say, for such as make profession, that they carry about them a sharpe sword for their seruice. These men had rather die in a naughty quarrell, with the danger of loosing their soule, than to fall from this their reputation, which they desire to carry with them. But let vs follow our examples of the contempt of vaine glory, and of certaine others led away with an overweening pride. Pompey the Great, shewed a notable argument that he was not touched with vaine glory or pride, when, after he had vtterly vanquished Tygranes king of Pontus, and made him his prisoner, he chose rather to set him againe in his kingdome, and to make him an allie and confederate of the Romanes, than to reserue and lead him in maner of a triumph into Rome, according as they vsed then to deale with enemies, and with their spoiles: saying like a vertuous Monarch, that he much more esteemed the glory of a whole age, than of one day. The Great Tamberlane being puffed vp exceedingly, because of a Peasants sonne he attained to so great a Monarchie, vsed farre greater and more barbarous seuerity towards Baiazet Emperor of the Turkes, whom, after he had overcome him, and made him his prisoner, he caused to be led about with him in a cage, wherefoeuer he went, feeding him onely with the crummes that fell vnder his table: and whenfoeuer he tooke horse, he vsed his body for an aduantage. After the same manner Valerianus the Emperor was handled by Saphor king of Persia, by whom he was discomfited in battle, which this Barbarian had woon of him. He that trod vpon the Emperor Fredericke Barbarossa his necke, and pusht him twice with his foot when he had him at his deuotion, shewed himselfe more proud, cruel, and arrogant, in that he vsed for a pretence and cloke of his pride and wickednes, that text of Scripture. Thou shalt walk vpon the Lion and Aspe, the young Lion and the Dragan shalt thou treade vnder foote, as if it had bin spoken to him. That heathen man Agathocles king of Sicilia, left behind him a far more excellent example of the contempt of glory, that wee should not be lift vp too much, nor forget our selues by reason of the greatnes of our estate. For being come to that estate by his vertue, because he was borne of a poore Porter, he caused himselfe to be serued ordinarily at his table with earthen vessels, intermingled with his cups of gold, saying thus to those that came to see him, thereby to inflame them with a desire of well doing: Behold what it is to perseuere in trauell and in taking of paines to become vertuous and couragious. Heretofore we made these pots of earth, and now we make these of gold. Further we must know, that when fortune (if it be lawfull for vs vnder this word to vnderstand the ordinance of God) lifteth vp men of low degree vnto great and and honourable places through their valure and desert, and exalteth also many men that are vnworthy, letting vs see how proudly and wickedly these men behaue themselves in abusing their authority, and contrariwise how the other sort vse it well, she doth thereby so much the more honor, and recommend vertue vnto vs, as the onely thing whereof all the greatnes, glory, and honor of them dependeth, and not of the dignity wherein they are placed. Now how greatly haughtines of mind is hated both of God and men, among infinite testimonies which we haue, that of Herod Agrippa king of the Iewes, ought well to be marked. For being gone vp into the pulpit appointed for Orations, and reioicing because the people cried out to his praise, That it was the voice of God & not of man, he was suddenly strooken from heaven, so that when he perceived himselfe to consume away with Vermine, he cried out to the people, saying: Behold how he dieth now with intollerable griefes, whom not long since ye called God. Dio-cleianus the Emperor was so puffed vp with pride, that he called himselfe brother to the Sunne and Moone. and made an edict, whereby he would haue all men to kisse his feete, whereas his predecessors gaue their hands to the Nobility, and their knees to the simpler sort: but God suffered him to die a mad man. Moreouer we see daily, that proud men become odious to every one, and are in the end contemned, yea, that oftentimes it costeth them their life. The punishment that Philip king of Macedonia laide vpon Menacratius the Physicion was more gentle, yet pleasant, and woorth the noting. This fellow because he was excellent in his art, caused himselfe to be called Impiter the Savior. The good prince minding to correct him for his arrogancy, inuited him to a feast, and made a table to be prouided for him by himselfe, whereof at first he seemed to be very glad. But when he saw that in stead of meate they gaue him nothing but incense, he was greatly ashamed, and departed from the feast in great anger. Now for the conclusion of our discourse, we say with Solon, that to name a presumptuous and glorious man in right termes, is to call him a foole, as contrariwise, curtesie and meekenes is the foundation of wisdom and of a quiet life. Wherevnto that we may attaine, let vs learne, that whosoeuer beholdeth with the eyes of his minde the estate of mans nature, and considereth the basenes of his condition, together with the shortnes of this present life, subiect to an infallible decree, and marketh also the foule pollutions that are ioyned with the flesh, he shall neuer fall in that head-long downefall of arrogancie and pride. And thus detesting all presumption and loue of vanitie, let vs seeke for honour by the meanes of vertue onely, which as Euripides saith, is alwaies either followed or preuented with glory and praise. And let vs not greatlie care for the praises of men, but onely do those things that are worthy of commendation. Let vs rather reioyce and glory that we excell and go beyond others in all good duties towards them, than in any other aduantage, either of worldly glory, or of our priuate profite. Lastly, let vs rather loue to abide alwaies as it were vnknewne to the world, than by seruing vanities to turne aside from one onely iot of the duty of goodnes and iustice, which by the grace of God may procure vs a perpetuall praise among good men, and make vs acceptable before him, who euermore lifteth vp the humble, and beateth downe the proud.

am ad weli
dum ad vici
ni ad dion nam e

Herodes.

Dio-cleianus

Menacratius
finely punished for his prid
by Philip.

Euery vaine-
glorious man
is a foole.

Of Shame, Shamefastnes, and of Dishonour. Chap. 24.

A M A N A. Hitherto we haue briefly intreated of those principall points, which respect the vertue of Temperance, and the vice of Intemperance, contrary vnto it. Neuertheles for the finishing of our daies worke, I think we are to consider what shame and shamefastnes are, which, as the Philosophers say, are ioyned with this vertue of Temperance. For the more we loue glory & honor, the more we feare and labour to eschue shame and dishonour. Now seeing we haue bin taught where to seeke for true glory and honor, we shall receiue no lesse profit, if we learne wherein we ought to feare shame and dishonour.

Shame is the keeper of all vertues.

A R A M. There is (saith Cicero) a certaine shame and bashfulnes in Temperance, which is the guardian of all the vertues, and deserueth great commendation, being also a most goodly ornament to the whole life, as that which fashioneth it according to the patterne of decencie and honesty.

A C H I T O B. Two things (saith Plato) are very wel able to direct his life that will liue vertuously, namely, shame of dishonest things, & desire of those things that are good & vertuous. Let vs therefore heare A S E R discourse more amply of that which is here propounded vnto vs.

A S E R.

A SER. As we see that a good ground, although it be far and fertill, bringeth forth notwithstanding naughtie and wild plants: so a good nature, although it be indued with many great perfections, is yet neuer without some shame.

How shame
may be made profitable in a man.

And this of it selfe seemeth to be a hurtfull passion in the soule, albeit it may easily by the meanes of vertue be dressed and made profitable, if we cure it of all feare of reproch, by doing that which is good, decent and honest; and contrariwise suffer it to augment, and to strengthen it selfe more and more, when occasion, either of doing ill, or of speaking, approving, and counselling any thing that is against the duty of a good man, shall be offered. Honest shame and shamefastnes (saith Quintillian) is the mother of all good counsell, the right guardian of duty, the mistress of innocency, well liked of her nearest friends in all places, and at all times, courteously entertained of strangers, as that which hath a fauorable countenance. Honest shame, being (as Cicero saith) the moderator of concupiscences, procureth vnto vs a steadfast and commendable authority amongst all men. Hesiodus calleth it the hostesse of iustice. Of this Socrates spake, when he said, that vertuous shame beseeemed youth. I looke for small goodnes of a yong man (saith Seneca) except of such a one as blusheth after he hath offended. For he that blusheth (saith Menander) is not voide of all good nature. Therefore shamefastnes is to be nourished and much made of. For so long as it remaineth in any mans spirit, there is good hope to be conceiued of him. Many haue shrunk through feare of shame, with whom no reason or torment could in any sort preuaile. A wicked man (saith Euripides) hath no shame in him. Shamefastnes (saith one of the ancients) is sister to continency, & companion of chastity, yea by meanes of her society and fellowship, chastity is in greater safety. A fault is lessened through shame, as it is made greater by contention: & shame mollifieth the heart of a iudge, but impudency prouoketh him to anger. He that is touched to the quicke through a sharpe reprehension for the reformation of his maners, & yet is nothing restrained thereby, nor full of sweat and blushing for shame, which cannot beate to ascend into the face of euery one well borne, but remaineth inflexible & vnmoouable, smiling & ielling thereat, such a one I say giueth a great argument of a very blockish and senceles nature, which is ashamed of nothing, by reason of his long custome and conformation in doing of euill. To sinne

Sin is natural
in man.

How we must
auoid and re-presse sinne.

(saith Diodorus the Athenian) is a thing naturally ingrafted in men: neither was there euer any law so rigorous, that could stay the course thereof, although new paines and punishments were daily added to offences, to see if men be drawne from vice through feare of them. But some gather boldnesse through pouerty; others because of their riches become insolent, ambitious, and couetous, and others haue other passion and occasions which mooue and induce them to do ill. Now to turne these aside, and to make them fruitles, there is no better way than deeply to imprint in our soules the feare of a perpetuall shame and infamy, which are the inseparable companions of all wickednes and corrupt dealings. And as often as we commit any fault through frailtie, we must together with repentance imprint in our memory a long remembrance thereof: yea we must lay it often before our eyes, as also the shame and dishonor that might haue ensued thereof vnto vs; to this end, that afterward wee may be the better kept backe, and more aduised in the like matters. Herein let vs follow the example of way-faring men, that haue stumbled against a stone, and of Pilots that haue brused their shippes against a rock, who being mindfull of their mishap, are all their life time greatly afraid, not only of those stones & rockes, which were the causes of their euils, but also of all such as resemble them. There was apphobitiō (as Aulus Gellius writeth) that no yong Roman should dare to enter into a strumpets house, but with his face couered: and if it so fell out, that any man was so shameles as to come out of that place vncovered, he was as severely punished, as if hee had committed some forced adulterie. And truly when one is ashamed that he hath offended, we are to hope well of his amendment. Now, as shame of euill, seruing for a bridle to vice, is commendable; so that shame wherein want of prudence and of wisdom beareth sway, is euill and very hurtfull, not only to those that are touched therewith, but oftentimes procureth great euils to Communalities and Common-wealthes. Whereof those men haue too

A notable cu-
stome among the Romans.

What kinde of shame is very hurtfull.

great experience that liue vnder such Gouvernours, Magistrates, and Iudges, as of a foolish basenes and cowardlines of minde, either for feare to displease the greatest, or to be blamed and reprooued of an ignorant multitude, bowe and bend to another mans becke against right and equitie, as though they were ashamed to doe well. Whereupon thinking to elchue a light and small reproach, they fall into a perpetuall note of infamy and dishonour, not being able to declare more plainly the smalnesse of their courage (which fitly resembleth a weake temperature of the body, vnable to resist heate and cold) than in consenting to

to euill, because they dare not gaine say least they should be misliked. But Seneca saith, that he is no meete schooller of Philosophie, who cannot contemne a foolish shame. And this causeth farre greater mischiefes, when the Soueraigne Princes of any estate are intangled therewith. Which may be verified of them, if through ouer great bounty and simplicitie voide of prudence, they wholly giue ouer themselves to their pleasure that haue them as it were in possession, and dare not gaine say or deny them in any matter. For hereof it commeth, that flatterers, brokers, and such as are most wicked, carry away offices, charges, benefices, gifts, and wastfully consume the publike treasure: so that a man may behold an impunitie and liberty of vices, and of execrable offences, because a simple and bashfull king dare not denie a request. And thus vnder such a Prince publike welfare is turned into priuate wealth, and all the charges fall vpon the poore people. But not to stray farre from our purpose, hauing so neerely touched a matter worthy of a large discourse, I thinke we shall reape no small profit, if we call to mind here certaine notable instructions, which Plutarke giueth vs, to teach vs to repell far from vs all foolish and dangerous shame: namely, that so soone as yeares of discretion worke in vs any knowledge of goodnesse, we should exercise our selues in those things, which of themselves are easie ynough to practise, beeing without feare that any thing can (as the prouerbe saith) hang or take hold of our gowne. If at a feast (saith that great Philosopher) thou art inuited to drinke more than reason, or thy thirst requireth, be not ashamed to refuse to do it. If any babler or ignorant fellow seeke to stay and keepe thee by discoursing of vaine and tedious matters, be not afraid to rid thy selfe of him, and to tell him freely that another time thou mayest come and visite him, not hauing at that time any leisure to keepe him company any longer. If thy friend or any other man, communicate with thee any act or purpose of his, wherein thou knowest somewhat, though neuer so little, that is to be reprehended, tell him thereof hardly. If any man be importunate with thee by requests and intreaties, neuer promise more than thou art able to performe, and blush not because thou canst not doe all things, but rather blush to take vpon thee things that are aboue thy ability. If any man aske thee a question of any matter whatsoever, confesse freely that which thou knowest not, to the ende thou maiest receiue instruction. Now, if we exercise our selues in this sort, honestly to refuse, to depart, to breake off, to speake freely, and to submit our selues after a comely manner, so that no man can lightly complaine of vs, or blame vs, but vpon very slender occasion; we shall be in a ready way to accustome our selues not to be ashamed in matters of greater weight, and such as are necessarie for the preservation of dutie. For otherwise, if we are afraid to put back a glaasse of wine, which some one of our acquaintance in drinking doth offer vnto vs, how will we resist the request of a prince, which is as much as a commandement, or the importunate suite of a whole people, in an vnjust and vnreasonable matter? If we are ashamed to be rid of a babler, if as flatterers vse to doe, we commend one contrary to our opinion, whom we heare praised of many: or if we feare to tell our friend of some small fault of his, how will wee set our selues couragiously against those slanderers of the truth, and maintainers of lies, that are placed in authority? Or how shall we dare to reprove notorious faults boldly, being committed in the administration of a magistrate, and in ciuill and voliticall gouernment? This is that which Zeno very well taught vs, when meeting with a familiar friend of his that walked heauily by himselfe, hee asked him the cause thereof: I thun (said the other) a friend of mine, who requesteth me to beare false witnes for him. What (quoth Zeno) art thou (so foolish, that seeing him voide of shame and feare to request vnjust and wicked things of thee, thou hast not the heart to deny him, and to put him backe vpon iust and reasonable consideration? Agessilaus may be vnto vs a good Scholemaster in this matter. For beeing requested by his father to giue sentence against right, he was not ashamed to deny him graciously with this answer: You haue taught mee (O Father) from my youth to obey the lawes, and therefore I will now also obey you therein, by iudging nothing against the lawes. Pericles beeing likewise requested by a friend of his to sweare falsely for him, said, I am a friend to my friends vnto the altars: as if he wold haue said, so far as I offered not God. The same reaso was the cause that Xenophanes being called a coward at a feast because he would not play at dice, answered without feare of being accounted voide of ciuility, and good fellowship, I am indeede a cowarde and fearefull in dishonest things. Now besides all those pernicious effects of foolish and naughty shame that are already touched by vs, oftentimes it maketh the senses of a man so brutish through a long custome, that he neglecteth the care of that which concerneth his safety and private benefit, yea, sometimes of his owne life. I will not here stand to speake of those which, say they are ashamed to aske their due, or by way of iustice to pursue such as deuoure the substance of their poore

How we must
learne to resist all naughty shame.

Zeno.

Agessilaus.

Pericles.

Xenophanes.

Other pernicious effects of foolish shame.

Perseus. poore families, whereby they make it knowne, that they haue neither vertue, heart, nor courage. To this agreeth fitly that which we reade of one named Perseus, who being to lende money to a very friend of his, went with him to the common place of bargaining, calling to minde that precept of Hesiodus, who saith :

Euen when thou dost disport with thine owne brother,

Let present be some witnesse one or other.

Dion. His friend thinking this somewhat strange, said: What, so orderly by law? Yea quoth Perseus, that I may haue it againe of thee friendly, and not be compelled to demand it againe by order of law. But what shall we say of so many great personages as are mentioned in histories, who vnder pretence of a foolish shame badly grounded vpon this conceit, that they would not distrust them whom they tooke for their friends, offered themselves euen to the slaughter? Dion indued with great perfections, and one that delivered from tyranny and freed from thraldome the citie of Syracusa, although he was aduertised that Caplippus whom hee tooke for his Host and friend, watched opportunity to slay him, yet hee went to that place whither he had inuited him, saying: that he had rather lose his life, than be compelled to distrust his friends, and to keepe himselfe as much from them as from his enemies. And indeed it fell out so, that he was slaine there. The like befell Antipater, being bidden to supper by Demetrius. It seemeth also that Iulius Caesar as well as they, was in some sort the cause of his owne mishap, because hauing had many aduertisements, suspitions, and forewarnings of the miserable death that was intended against him, yet he neglected them all, as appeareth by that speech, which hee vsed the euening before he was murdered, being at supper with Marcus Lepidus. For a controuersie arising amongst the ghefts about this proposition, What kinde of death was best, euen that said this Monarch, which is least looked for. True it is which may be said, that destinie may possibly be better foreseene than auoided. But this were an euill conclusion thereupon, that we must let goe all care of keeping those goods, which God giueth vs as a blessing proceeding from his grace. For it is the dutie of a good and sound iudgement to confer that which is past, with the present time, to the end to foresee in some sort, and to determine of that which is to come, which is alwaies doubtfull and vncertaine vnto vs. Moreouer to resume our former matter of honest shame and shamefastnesse, which is the guide of our life to decency and vertue, we may see amongst the Ancients infinite examples, how it hath bene recommended and precisely obserued, and what strength it hath had in right noble mindes. The Persians brought vp their youth in such sort, that they neither did nor spake any thing that was dishonest, putting him to death that stripped himselfe stark naked in the presence of another. Yea they iudged euery vnciuill action how little soeuer, committed before others, to be great wickednesse. The Parthians would neuer suffer their wifes to come among their feasts, least wine should cause them to doe or to speake any dishonest thing in their presence. Hippocrates as he was walking, met with a yong man in a wicked mans companie, and perceiuing that he began to blush, said thus vnto him: My sonne, thou must goe with such as will not cause thee to blush: but be of good cheere, for thou maiest yet repent thee. Blinde Eutichus was set without the array of the battell by Leonidas, but being ashamed to leaue his fellowes in danger, he caused a slave to leade him to the place where they fought, and there wonderfully doing his endeauour, he was slaine. The Romanes were so shamefast amongst themselves, that the father would not bathe himselfe with his sonne, nor the sonne in law with the father in law. They so greatly esteemed honest shame and bashfulnesse, that when Philip king of Macedonia was accused before the Senate of many crimes, the shamefastnesse of yong Demetrius his sonne, who blushed and held his peace, stood him in greater stead than the shamelesse boldnesse of the eloquentest Orator in the world could haue done. The sonne of Marcus Cato the Censor, beeing at the battell wherein Perseus was discomfited, and fighting with a iavelin, his sword fell out of his scabbard, whereof hee was so ashamed, that alighting on foot in the midst of his enemies, and doubling his courage and strength, hee tooke it vp and mounted againe, fighting on horsebacke as before. The sonne of Marcus Scavrus Emilius Scavrus, hauing abandoned and giuen over the keeping and defence of the countrey of Trenta committed to his charge, was so ashamed thereof, that not daring to returne againe to his father, he slew himselfe. Parmenides taught his Disciples, that nothing was terrible to a noble minde but dishonor, and that none but children and women, or at least, men hauing womens hearts, are afraid of griefe. When speech was ministred at the banket of the seuen Sages, concerning that popular gouernment which was happiest, wherein all haue equall authoritie, Cleobulus affirmed, that that citie seemed vnto him best guided by policie, wherein

*What death Caesar
thought best.*

How the Persian youth was instructed

*Hippocrates saying to a yong man
that blushed.
Eutichus.*

The shamefastnesse of the Romanes.

Cato his son.

*Scavrus his sonne.
Parmenides.*

Cleobulus.

wherein the Citizens stood in greater awe of dishonour than of the law. Plutarch rehearseth a very notable historie of the force of honest shamefastnes in the Milesian maidens, who were fallen into such frenzie and perturbation of spirit, that without any apparant cause to be seene, they were suddenly overtaken with a longing to die, and with a furious desire to hang themselves. Which thing many of them had already put in practise, so that neither reasons, nor teares of fathers and mothers, no comfort of friends, no threatnings, policies, or devices whatsoeuer, could preuaile with them, vntill such time that a wise Citizen by his aduice procured an edict to be made by the Councell, that if any hereafter hung her selfe, shee should be carried starke naked in the sight of all men, through the market place. This edict being made and ratified by the Councell, did not only repress a little, but wholly staid the furie of these maidens that longed to die. Infomuch, that a simple imagination and conceit of shame and dishonour, which yet could not light vpon them before they were dead, did preuaile more with them than all other deuised meanes could doe, yea, than death it selfe, or grieve, which are two of the horriblest accidents which men commonly stand in feare of. To conclude therefore our present discourse, we learne that honest shame and shamefastnes, are alwaies commendable and befeeming all persons that purpose to obserue modestly in their words, gestures, countenances, and actions. We learne also that spirits well brought vp, are more easily wooon by shame than by feare, according to that saying of Quintilian, that shamefastnes is the property of a free man, and feare of a bondman. Further, we learne that every temperate man ought to be more ashamed of himselfe, when occasion of doing ill is offered, than of any other: that we must shun all euill, excessive and pernicious shame, proceeding from the want of discretion, because it hindreth men from effecting all good, wholsome and honest things, infomuch that of it selfe it is able to procure vnto vs losse, dishonour, and infamie.

A notable historie of the shamefastnes of the Milesian maidens.

Honest shame is alwaies commendable.

The end of the sixth daies worke.

The seuenth daies worke.

Of Fortitude. Chap. 25.

ASER.

AN endued with reason, and seeking to imitate as much as lieth in him, the Author of his beeing, (who albeit simply and absolutely he standeth not in need of any thing whatsoeuer, yet doth wonderfull workes without ceasing, for the benefit of his creatures) feeleth himselfe touched to the quicke in his soule, with a desire to profite all those among whom heeliueth, by all high, great, laudable, and laborious meanes, not fearing any peril, nor forcing any paine. Moreover, meditating and weighing the dignitie of the immortalitie of the soule, he careth not earthly & mortal goods, nor standeth in feare of the contrary: and whether it be for the hauing or not hauing of them, his minde is nothing at all the lesse quiet, neither doth he thinke that any good vpon earth can be taken from him. All which great and rare excellencies flow into him from the third riuer of the fountaine of Honesty, whereof we are now to speake: namely, of the vertue of Fortitude, which (as Cocero saith) cannot be forced by any force.

Fortitude is the third riuer of Honesty.

MANA. This vertue (saith Seneca) is very great, being able to resist and to fight against extreme miseries. Which is the property of Fortitude, that guideth a noble nature through hard and difficult things, that he may attaine to the end of his iust deuices.

ARAM. Fortitude is the cause that neither for feare nor danger we turne aside from the way of vertue add iustice. And as Plato saith, it lifteth vp our minds to attend to that which is most excellent, laudable, best, and most profitable. Therefore let vs heare ACHITOB discourse of the wonderfull effects of this great and worthy vertue.

ACHITOB. Whatsoeuer is done manfully, and with a great courage, appeareth verie decent, and befeeming a man. But the perfection of every worke consisteth in this, that it be done by a staid and constant reason, which teacheth vs, that there is nothing after God, but honestie, which we are to admire, to make account of, and to desire: and that we ought not in any sort to shrink & yeeld vnto perturbations, or to any other humane accidents whatsoeuer.

Wherein the perfection of euery worke consisteth.

Fortitude is a Good of the
soule, not of the body.

The properties that are required in a valiant man.

The part of Fortitude.

Fortitude
fighteth for iustice onely.

All hardy men are not valiant.

Which opinions being well imprinted in our mindes, pricke vs forward to enterprise those things that are most excellent, difficult, and fullest of labors and perils. For being free from all earthly care, and voide of feare or sorrow, we contemne euen death it selfe, and are in such sort prepared against all griefes, that our contentation lieth herein, that the greatest and most exceeding paines will not continue long, that the lest will vanish away of themselves, and that we shall be masters of the middle sort. This is that which the Philosophers by infinite learned writings required to be in the vertue of Fortitude, with which the force and strength of the body hath nothing common, as that which is a Good that belongeth to the body. But this is an immortall Good of the soule, consisting in the power and direction of the spirit, beeing fortified and confirmed through the studie of Philosophie, and causing man of his owne accord to make choice of, and to perfect all honest things for their owne sakes. Fortitude, then (as Cicero saith) is that part of honesty, which is knowne by the excellency, greatnesse, and dignitie of the heart, which after aduised counsell and good consideration, causeth man to vndertake without feare, all perillous matters, and constantly to endure all kind of travell. For constancy and dignity are neuer far from Fortitude in greatest distresses: because it adorneth him that possesseth her with the contempt of griefe and of death, causing him to esteeme nothing vntolerable that can happen to man, neither any thing euill that is necessarie. And so it is the preseruation of a firme and setled iudgement in things that seeme terrible and full of danger, seeing it is the knowledge of that which a man ought to endure. Plato also calleth it the knowledge of all good and euill: as though hee would say, that nothing can come to a valiant and noble minded man, against his expectation, although it may be contrarie to his will, because hee is setled and prepared to vndergoe all events, as if hee had certainly fore-seene them. Aristotle saith, that Fortitude is a mediocrity betweene searing and enterprizing. Moreouer, it maketh a man fit for all occasions of dangers and travells, and holdeth him betweene these two extremities of cowardlinesse and rashnesse, which vices are very hurtfull to a happy and commendable life. The same Philosopher saith, that whosoever will be strong and valiant, must be free from all feare of death, constant in aduersities, voide of feare in perils, choosing rather to die honestly, than to saue himselfe villanously. He must endeavor to build noble enterprises, hauing for his companions hardinesse, greatnesse of hart, good confidence and hope, besides, industry & patience. Then he commeth to set downe many kindes of Fortitude Cicero agreeing wel with him, saith that Magnificence, Confidence, Patience and Perseuerance are the parts of Fortitude. Magnificence sheweth it selfe in doing great and excellent things: Confidence in this, that a valiant man conceiveth good hope of the euent of them: Patience in a voluntary and continuall suffering for the loue of honesty and vertue: and Perseuerance in a perpetuall constancie, and in a firme and steadfast abiding in his purposes and resolutions vndertaken with good consideration following reason. Moreover, Fortitude (as the Stoicks said very well) is a vertue that fighteth for equity and iustice. And therefore neither they that suffer for vniust matters, nor they that fight for their priuate commodities, not being led only with zeale of publike benefit, can boast (except falsly) that they are decked with this precious vertue. For these latter sort of men are rather to be called cruel barbarous, mercenaries, and hired hangmen, destroying all humanity: and others impudent, shamelesse, and desperate yea so much more worthy of blame, as guilty of wilfull madnes, in that they shew themselves constant in doing euil. But those men are valiant & of great courage, who thinke that no actions whatsoeuer, no time or season ought to be voide of iustice, who deliuer the oppressed, and those that are wronged, who build all their deuises vpon vertuous workes. They (saith Aristotle) are voide of generosity, who fight either for feare of reprehension, or by constraint, or beeing stirred vp with other mens speech, or of choler, or through ignorance of dangers. And this was Platoes meaning, when hee said that all strong and valiant men hardy, but not all hardy men valiant: because hardinesse commeth to men either by art, anger, or policy: but Fortitude is ingendred in the soule by nature and holy education. And therefore this vertue standeth not in neede either of choler, rancor, ambition, pride, or of any other euill passion, whereby to bring to passe braue and glorious effects, but is rather an vtter enemy vnto them, because it proceedeth from a mature and ripe consideration and election of reason, which causeth a man boldly to put in execution whatsoeuer hee knoweth to belong to duty and honesty, according to that place whereunto hee is called. And this also is the cause that hee neuer taketh any thing in hand rashly, what pretence soeuer it hath, neither is hee kept backe by any feare in those matters which offer him good occasion of putting to his hand, what hazard or imminent danger

ger soeuer seemeth to threaten him. But (according to that sentence of Socrates, that the hardest things ought to be taken in hand and executed with greater constancy and valure of heart) after hee hath well and prudently grounded his enterprife vpon a certaine knowledge, and firme discourse of reason, neither reproches, nor praises, neither promises nor threatnings, or torments, neither pleasures nor griefes, are able to cause him to breake off, or in any sort to alter and change his resolution, which remaineth alwaies praise-worthy, and is neuer subiect to repentance, howsoeuer the matter falleth out: because we are not to iudge of enterprises by the euents, which are altogether out of our power, but by the ground-worke and foundation whereupon they were built. And further, when the greatest dangers are, then is the time wherein a valiant man being nothing at all abashed, most of all sheweth his strength and prowes, neuer taking himselfe to be overcome as long as his vertue is free & at liberty to giue him new supply of meanes to set forward againe his matters; otherwise in a desperate case. Briefely, to speake in a word, Fortitude is the cause, that neither for feare, nor danger we turne aside from the path-way of vertue and iustice, neither yet repent vs of well doing for any torment. And thus it belongeth properly to this vertue, to command chiefly over thesetwo perturbations grounded vpon the opinion of euill, namely, Feare and Griefe: as before wee saw that Temperance exerciseth her power ouer vnbrideled Desire and Excessiue ioy. Furthermore, because they that naturally haue greater stomacks, and more excellent spirits, are desirous and greedy of honours, power, and glory, and seeing that an excessiue desire to rule and to excell others, commonly groweth with the greatnesse of the heart, it is necessary that this vnruely affection should be moderated by the contempt of such things as are common to all men by nature. And this also is a propertie belonging to this vertue of Fortitude, which desiring the greatest and best things, despiseth those that are base and abiekt; aspiring to celestiall and eternall things, shunneth humane and mortall things, and iudgeth honours, riches, and worldly goods, an vnworthy recompence for his valiant acts. Which is the cause, that who-soeuer hath this vertue of Fortitude perfectly (if so great happinesse could be among mortall weights) he remaineth free from all perturbations of the soule to enioy a blessed tranquillitie, which together with constancy, procureth vnto him dignity and reputation. For this cause Cicero teacheth vs, that they which giue themselues to the gouernment of affaires, ought (at least as much as Philosophers) to make light account of temporall goods, from whence proceedeth all the rest of our mindes: yea, they ought to strue to that ende with greater care and labour than Philosophers doe, because it is easier for a Philosopher so to do, his life being lesse subiect to Fortune, and standing in lesse need of worldly Goods, than doth that of Politicks. And if any mishap befall them, it toucheth the Philosopher a great deale lesse. But whether it bee in warre, or in ruling a common-wealth, or in the gouernment of an house, there are alwaies meanes enough to exercise the workes of Fortitude: and many times this vertue is most necessary in things that seeme to bee of smalleth account. Besides, that honestie which wee seeke after is perfected by the forces of the soule, of which euery one hath great neede, not by those of the body. I will not say, that the firme knitting together of the members, and the good disposition of nature to sustaine manfully the iniuries of weather, & all kinde of paine and travell without sicknesse, is not a good helpe towards the execution of noble enterprises: onely I say, that it is not so necessarie, but that many being troubled with a thousand ill dispositions in their persons, especially such as were placed in offices of capitaines and conductors of armies, haue executed infinite great and glorious exploits, surmounting all weakenesse of their bodies, through the magnanimity of their heart. Yea, oftentimes they haue as it were constrained their bodies to change their nature, that they might bee made fit to execute whatsoeuer their wise spirit iudgeth to belong to duty. Was there euer any capitaine among the Romans greater than Iulius Caesar? Yet was he of a weake and tender complexion, subiect to great head-aches, and visited sometimes with the falling sicknesse. But in stead of vsing the weakenesse of his body for a cloake to liue nicely and delicately, he tooke the labours of warre for a fit medicine to cure the vntowardnes of his body, fighting against his disease with continuall labor and exercise, liuing soberly, and lying for the most part in the open aire, which made him to be so much the more admired and loued of his souldiers. As it may appeare by that which is reported of him, that being oneday by reason of a great storme and tempest greatly vrged with want of lodging in a plaine, where there was but one little cottage belonging to a Peasant, which had but one chamber, hee commanded that Oppius, one of his Capitaines, who was ill at ease should bee lodged there: for himselfe he lay abroad with the rest, saying: that the most honourable places were to be

The resolution of a valiant man is alwaies commendable and ynchangeable

Fortitude con-temneth mortall things.

Magistrates ought to make lesse account of worldly goods than Philosophers.

Of bodily force.

Iulius Caesar was sickly.

Marcus Sergius lacked his right hand.

Fabius the Greatest.

Pompey the Great.

C. Marius.

Agis.

Dienecus.

appointed for the greatest, and the most necessarie for such as were most diseased. What shall we say of those, who being impotent in some part of their members, did notwithstanding not diminish in any sort, but augment the glory of their doings? Marcus Sergius, a Romane captaine, hauing lost his right hand in a battell, practised so well with the left hand, that afterward in an army he challenged foure of his enemies, one after another, and ouercame them: such force hath a good heart, that it can doe more in one onely little member, than a man well made and fashioned in all points, that hath but a cowardly heart. Wee might here alledge infinite examples, whereof histories are full, of all those effects, which wee said were brought forth by the vertue of Fortitude in noble mindes: but wee will content our selues to touch certaine Generals that were of notable and politicke prowesse and valure, and constant in their resolutions; as well for shortnes sake, as also because hereafter we shall haue further occasion to bring others in sight, when we handle more at large the parts and branches that proceede from this happie talke of Fortitude. Fabius the Greatest commeth first to my remembrance, to prooue that the resolution of a couragious heart grounded vpon knowledge and the discourse of reason, is firme and immutable. This Captaine of the Romane army being sent into the field to resist the furie and violence of Hannibal, who being Captaine of the Carthaginians, was entred into Italie with great force, determined for the publike welfare and necessity to delay and prolong the warre, and not to hazard a battell but with great advantage. Whereupon certaine told him, that his owne men called him Hannibals schoole-master, and that hee was iested at with many other opprobrious speeches; as one that had small valure and courage in him, and therefore they counsell'd him to fight, to the end hee might not incurre any more such reprehensions and obloquies. I should be (quoth hee againe to them) a greater coward than now I am thought to be, if I should forsake my deliberation necessarie for the common welfare and safetie, for feare of their girding speeches and bolts of mockerie, and obey those (to the ruine of my country) whom I ought to command. And indeed afterward he gaue great tokens of his vnspeakeable valure, being sent with three hundred men only to encounter with the said Hannibal; and seeing that he must of necessitie fight for the safetie of the Common-wealth, after all his men were slaine, and himselfe hurt to death, he rushed against Hannibal with so great violence and force of courage, that he tooke from him the diademe or frontlet, which he had about his head, & died with that about him. Pompey, who by the renowne of his high enterprises, got to himselfe the surname of Great, being ready to saile by sea, and to passe into Italy, whither he was to carrie a certaine quantitie of wheate to meete with a famine, according to the commission given him of the Senate, there arose a very great tempest, in so much that the marriners made great doubt to weigh vp their anchors. But his resolution beeing well made before, and grounded vpon the dutie of a noble heart, hee tooke shipping first of all, and caused the sailes to bee spread in the winde, saying with a loud and cleare voice, It is necessarie that I goe, but not necessariethat I liue. Caius Marius, who was sixe times Confull, beeing in warre against the Allies of the Romanes that were reuolted, inclosed himselfe one day with trenches, and suffered a thousand iniuries and vaunting speeches, both of his enemies and of his owne men, but yet cared nothing at all for them, nor went from his deliberation, which was, that he would not fight at that time. And when Publius Silla, one of the chiefe captaines of the enemy cried vnto him, saying: If thou art such a great captaine, Marius, as men report of thee, come out of thy campe to battell: Nay, doe thou (quoth hee againe vnto him) if thou art a great captaine, compell me to come out to battell in despite of my teeth. Afterward this Marius shewed himselfe to be one of the most valiant and couragious men of his time, as well in the discomfiture of the said enemies, as in two other battells which he wan against the barbarous Cimbrians and Flemings, who were entred into Italy to inhabite there: in one of which battells about an hundred thousand fighting men were slaine in the field. Agis king of Lacedaemonia, beeing resolved to fight, his Counsellers told him, that there was no reason so to doe, because his enemies wereten against one. It must needs be (quoth this couragious Prince) that hee which will command many must fight also against many. Wee are ynough to put naughtie men to flight. The Lacedaemonians vse not to aske what number there is of the enemies, but onely where they are. The answer which Dienecus made to one that told the Councell of Grecia, that the multitude of the Barbarians was so great, that their arrowes couered the Sun, cometh neere to the couragious saying of king Agis. For concluding with their opinion who perswaded to fight, Dienecus made this answer: Thou tellest vs very good newes. For if the multitude of the Medes is such, that they are able to hide the Sunne, they will offer vs the meanes how to fight in in the shadow, and not in the beate of the Sunne. We may not here passe over with silence the testimony of invincible Fortitude, which alwaies findeth meanes to effect her glorious purposes, giuen by Themistocles, when hee saw the sundrie opinions of the chieftaines of the Græcian armie vnder the leading of Euribiades the Lacedæmonian, touching the place where they should fight with Xerxes fleet: The greatest part determined to forsake Salamis, where they were at that time, and to retire to Peloponensius, fearing the great force of their enemies, who were about twelue hundred vessels, whereas they themselves had but three hundred. But Themistocles sent Sicinnus his childrens schoolemaster secretly in a Sciffe towards the Persians, aduertising them of the resolution which the Græcians had taken to flie, faining (as he made Xerxes beleue) that hee fauoured their side. Vpon this watch-word Xerxes sent part of his armie to the other side of Salamis. Whereupon the Græcians considering that they were enuironed, resolued and settled themselves as men constrained to fight; and indeed the victorie remained on their side, to the confusion and ouerthrow of their enemies, who departed out of Grecia: which otherwise would haue bene greatly shaken, had not Themistocles vsed this notable stratageme, thereby to stay the shamefull flight of his countremen. It was this vertue of Fortitude, which caused Damindus the Lacedæmonian to make this answer to one who told him, that the Lacedæmonians were in danger to suffer much mischief, if they agreed not with Philip, who was armed against the Græcians. O my friend (quoth he) that art halfe a woman, what euill can he cause vs to suffer, seeing wee make no account of death it selfe? Dercyllides being sent from Sparta towards king Pyrhus, to know wherefore he marched with his army vpon their borders, and vnderstanding of him, that he commanded them to receiue againe their king Cleonimus, whom they had banished, or hee would let them know, that they were not more valiant than others already subdued by him, made this answer: if thou art a God we feare thee not, because we haue not offended thee: but if thou art a man, thou art no better than we. The answer which certaine Polonian Embassadors made to Alexander the Great, who threatned their countrey, sheweth also the excellencie of their courage. We are afraid (quoth they to him) but of one onely thing, namely, least the skie should fall vpon vs. Thunder (as Plato saith) terrifieth children, and threatnings fooles. Anaxarchus being likewise threatned by the same Monarch that he should be hanged: Threatensthis (quoth he) to thy Courtiers, who feare death: for my part, I care not whether I rot in the ground, or aboue the ground. Socrates also answered thus to one that asked him, whether he were not ashamed to commit any thing that would procure his death: My friend, thou doest not well to thinke that a vertuous man ought to make any account either of danger, or of death, or to consider any other thing in all his actions, than this; whether they are iust or iniust, good or bad. If wee desire to see farther what effects Fortitude bringeth forth in the greatest and most sinister dangers, Marcus Crassus shall serue vs for sufficient prooffe. When he was threescore yeares of age, albeit he had receiued the foile in a battell against the Persians, wherein the greatest part of his armie was destroyed, and his sonne being Captaine of a thousand men, was slaine, whose death seemed more to astonish the rest of his men, than any other danger, yet hee shewed himselfe in this mishap more vertuous than ever before, and went through all his bands crying aloud in this manner: It is I alone my friends, whom the sorrow and griefe of this losse ought to touch. But the greatness of the fortune, and glory of Rome remaineth whole and invincible, as long as you stand on your feete. Notwithstanding, if ye haue any compassion of me, seeing me lose so valiant and vertuous a sonne, I pray you shew the same by changing it into wrath against your enemies, to take vengeance of their cruelty, and be not abashed for any mishap befallen vs: for great things are not gotten without losse. Patience in trauels, and constancy in aduersities haue brought the Romane Empire to that greatnesse of power wherein it is now placed. With such speeches he fought vnto the death. Will we haue other examples of wonderfull prowesse and courage? Iudas Macchabeus, after many victories obtained by him against the Lieutenants of Antiochus, and against those of Demetrius, was set vpon and assailed with two and twenty thousand men, (others say two and thirtie thousand hauing himselfe but eight hundred, or a thousand with him. And being counselled to retire into some place of safety, God forbid (quoth he) that the Sunne should see me turne my backe towards mine enemies. I had rather die, than staine the glory which I haue gotten by vertue, with an ignominious and shamefull flight. In this resolute perswasion hee greatly weakened his enemies, and yet died more through wearisomnesse, than of blowes or wounds which hee had receiued in fight. Leonides king of Sparta, hauing with him but three hundred naturall Lacedæmonians, fought and put to flight at the straight of Thermopylae three hundred thousand Persians: but he and all his

L. Dentatus.

Eumennus.

Aristomenes.

Lyfmachus.

died of the wounds which they received in that fight. Lucius Dentatus a Romane, was endued with such Fortitude and Generosity, that one writeth of him, that he was in sixe score battels and skirmishes, and eight times came away Conqueror from fighting hand to hand: that he had received of his captaines by way of reward, and in token of his valure, eightene launces, twenty bards of horses, foure score and three bracelets, and sixe and thirty crownes: and lastly, that by his meanes nine Emperours triumphed in Rome. Eumennus a Macedonian Captaine, hauing beene put to the woorst by Antigonus, retired into a strong hold, where being besieged, and brought to parly through necessitie of victuals and munition, it was signified vnto him from his enemye, that reason would hee should come and speake with him vnder his faith and promise without hostages, seeing he was both greater and stronger. But Eumennus made him this answer, That hee would neuer thinke any man greater than himselfe, as long as hee had his sword in his owne power. And therefore demanding of him no woorse conditions, than as one that thought himselfe to bee his equall, he salied forth vpon his enemies with such valure and courage, that hee saued himselfe out of their hands, and afterward greatly troubled Antigonus. Aristomenes the Messenian, being taken by the Lacedamonians, and deliuered fast bound to two souldiers to be kept, he drew neere to a fire, and burned a sunder his bands with a little of his flesh: afterward comming suddenly vpon his keepers, he slue them both, and saued himselfe. Lyfmachus being cast to a Lyon by Alexander, because he gaue to Calisthenes the prisoner that poyson wherewith hee killed himselfe, fought with him, and stretching forth his arme and hand all armed into his throate, he tooke hold of his tongue and strangled him. Whereupon the Monarch euer after greatly esteemed and honoured him. By this small number out of infinite examples, which I could here mention, we see the great and wonderfull effects of this vertue of Fortitude, which are no lesse in euery part thereof touched in our discourse, as hereafter I hope we shall declare at large. Wherefore we may well say, that this vertue is very necessary to liue well and happily, and to leade vs to the ende of our being, which is, to refer both our life and death to the onely exercise of dutie and honesty: that by it wee enioy the true rest of the soule, which is nothing else (as Cicero saith) than a peaceable, sweete, and acceptable constancie, which vndoubtedly alwaies followeth Fortitude, being crowned with these two inestimable rewards, the contempt of griefe, and of death, whereby we forsake that which is mortall, that we may imbrace heavenly things in the hope and certaine expectation of that happy immortalitie.

Of Timorousnesse, Feare, and Cowardinesse, and of Rashnesse. Chap 26.

A CHI-TOB VVE may call to remembrance that saying of Plato before mentioned, that a temperate man, not endued with the vertue of Fortitude, falleth easily into cowardinesse and basenesse of minde, which is the defect of that vertue, which euen now we described: and likewise, that a strong and valiant man without the direction of Prudence and Temperance, is easily carried away with temerity and boldnesse, which is the excesse of the same vertue. Which two vices are so hurtfull in the soule, that he which is infected with them, holdeth much more of the nature of a beast, than of that essence wherein he was created. Let vs then consider what these imperfections are through the horror of that infamie which followeth them, we may bee more zealous to follow that which is decent and honest.

A SER. We must take good heed (saith Cicero) least through feare of perill, wee commit any thing that may iustly argue vs to bee timorous and fearefull. But withall we must beware that wee offer not our selues vnto dangers without cause, than which nothing is more foolish and blame worthy.

A M A N A. It is not seemely for a man (saith Plato) to commit any cowardly act to auoide perill. Temerity also setteth forth it selfe with courage, and contempt of dangers, but vnadvisedly and to no purpose. But let vs heare A R A M, who will handle this matter more at large.

A R A M. Albeit there is no greater disgrace than to bee iustly reproched with cowardly and faint heart, especially for youth to bee called effeminate, yet is that feare good, which turneth vs away from dishonest things, and maketh man staied and well aduised. This is the cause why the Ancients speaking of feare, made it twofold, the one good and necessarie, feare.

Two kinds of

necessary, the other euill and hurtfull. The first, which they grounded vpon a good discourse of reason and iudgement, was so esteemed and honoured of them, that in the city of Sparta, which for armes and arts flourished most among the Græcians, there was a temple dedicated and consecrated to this feare: which, as they affirmed, better maintained and preferred the estate of Common-wealths, than any other thing whatsoeuer, because thereby man was led to stand more in awe of blame, reproch, and dishonour, than of death or griefe. Which thing maketh him both apter and readier to vndertake and to execute all vertuous and laudable matters, whensoever good and iust occasion shall bee offered; and also more staied against euery rash and vniust enterprize that might procure dammage to the common wealth. And this was the occasion of that Prouerbe, Fear alwayes accompanieth shame. Another reason alledged by these wise men, why they honored in such sort this fained goddesse, was, because to doubt and feare nothing was more hurtfull to common wealths, than their very neighbor enemies, the feare of whom was their fastie and assurance. The other naughty and pernicious feare standeth of two kindes. The first being destitute of all good reason and assured iudgement, is that which we call Cowardlines and Puslanimitie, alwaies followed of these two perturbations of the soule, Fear and Sadnes; and is the defect of the vertue of Fortitude, which we purpose chiefly to handle at this present. The Grecians called it by these two words timor and shame, the one signifying Trouble, the other a Band; as if they would haue said, that it held the soule bound, and wholly troubled. They affirmed also, that this feare was as it were a giddines and alienation of the minde from the right sence, making the soule idle and dead, voide of euery good exploit or effect whatsoeuer. The last kinde of feare is that which workerh in the wicked a feare of paine and punishment appointed for offences, whereby they are as it were with a bridle kept backe and restrained from presuming to commit their villanies and damnable purposes. Now as the first kinde of feare said to bee good and necessary, is a great token of a commendable and vertuous nature, as that which for good cause is grounded vpon the feare of reproach and infamy, and vpon a desire to effect whatsoeuer belongeth to duty: so the one of these two last kindes testifyeth a vile, contemptible, and abiect nature; and the other a wicked and corrupt disposition. Plutarke speaking of this good feare, calleth it one of the Elements and grounds of vertue, saying, that it is chiefly requisite & necessarie for those that haue authority ouer others, who ought to feare rather to practise euill, than to receiue punishment for the same, because the first is the cause of the latter, not onely to themselves, but to so many as wallow in wickednesse, which is neuer without recompence. Therefore a prudent and well aduised man ought to haue this feare alwaies before his eyes, I meane this childlike feare, which is vnseparably ioyned with the true loue we owe to our common Father, and is the beginning of all wisdom, whereby we are induced to honour him. And looke how much the more the ancient Pagans were kept in awe by this good feare, so much the more shall our condemnation be doubled, if we despise it. The duty also of this profitable feare is, to haue an eye vnto the good and safety of our country, and to cause vs faithfully to discharge euery charge committed vnto vs, to the end we incure not perpetuall shame and infamy among all good men. It causeth vs to feare onely the dishonor of an vnauided counsell or action, and to account it very seemely and honourable to be blamed and euill spoken of for well doing, which Alexander the Great said did well become a king. This good feare made Phocion who for his desert and valure was chosen Generall for the Athenians fye and forty times, to say, that he would neuer counsell, but hinder to the vttermost of his power that enterprize of warre, which they would haue concluded against Alexander. For (said he) although the Athenians would cast away themselves, I will not suffer them to do so, because I haue for that intent and purpose taken vpon me the charge of a Captaine. And when Demosthenes, who perswaded this war, said vnto him, The people will kill thee, if they enter into a fury. Phocion replied, Nay they will kil thee, if they be wel in their wits. Antigonus the second, king of Macedonia, declared what benefite cometh of this good feare necessary for the foresight of a wise and experienced captaine in war, when retiring once from before his enemies who came to assaile him, and being told by certaine that he fled, hee answered, It is cleane contrary. For I looke backe to that profit which is behind me. As touching the opinion of the Ancients already mentioned, that to stand in feare of nothing is more hurtfull to Common wealths than forraigne enemies: it is that which Scipio Nasica a Roman senator meant to signifie, when vpon the hearing of some, who saide that Rome was in safety, if Carthage were laide wast: he replied, that it was far otherwise. For (said he) we are in greater danger now than euer, because we stand no more in awe of any whereb he wisely inferred,

A temple dedicated to feare.

The feare of neighbour enemies is the safety of a Common-wealth. Two sorts of pernicious feare.

Of the good feare.

It is ioyned with the true loue of God.

It causeth vs to respect the good of our country.

Antigonus.

Scipio Nasica.

that too great and vnlooked for prosperity of cities is commonly the cause of raising ciuill wars in them and secret diuisions, or else of bringing into them so great idlenes, that by it a gate is opened to all vices, as in truth it fell out with the Romanes. For they being in the top of their felicity and greatnes, by reason of the destruction as well of the Carthaginians by Scipio the yonger, as of the Macedonians vnder Perseus and Antiochus, the people began to abuse their authority, preferring vnto estates and places of honor, not the best and iustest citizens, but such as flattered them most in their vices and dissolutenesse, and wane their hearts with prodigall and superfluous feasts and distributions, to whom they sold their publike voices. Whereupon in the end, those ciuill warres arose, which was the cause of their final overthrow, and of the alteration of their popular estate into a tyranny, afterwards called a Monarchie. But this discourse being the matter of another subiect, let vs come to the defect of the vertue of Fortitude, which is a feare voide of reason and assurance, and argueth a faint and cowardly heart, causing a man through want of sense and vnderstanding to account this the surest way, to doubt all things, and to distrust every one. Of this feare one of the ancient said, Feare taketh away memory and all good effect from euery art, and industry. Yea sometimes some have bene found so faint hearted, that as soone as this feare seized vpon them, they gaue vp the ghost; not being oppressed with any other euil or violence. It is in this passion that Feare and Griefe fully practise their power, being grounded vpon a false opinion of euill, & sworne enemies to all rest and tranquillity, gnawing and consuming life as iust doth Steele or yron. Neither is this feare without an vntruly desire and immoderate ioy in things that are worldly, base, and contemptible; whereupon the soule is continually carried hither and thither, with pernicious and immoderate passions, which deprive her of the excellency of her immortallitie, to attend to the mortall & corruptible affections of the flesh. Alexander spake of such as are possessed with this feare, when he said, that no place is so strong by nature & situation, which feareful men iudge safe ynough. Therefore the Satyricall Poet said very wel, That Fortitude alwaies maketh timorous men little. For although they be born big of stature, yet the small courage of their hearts makes them so much the more contemptible, bringing forth worse & more dangerous effects, & making them vnworthy of al intermedling with matters of estate, or policie, or of warre. In this number, among many whom histories mention, we may here reckon Claudius the first of Cesars, who was so faint hearted, base minded, and blockish, that his mother said often of him, that Nature had begun, but not finished him. And truly a heartlesse fellow, or one of little heart, is nothing else but a body without a soule. The memory of such men (of whom we see but too many examples among vs) ought to be buried in obliuion, and during their life time they should remaine vnknowne as well for their owne honor, as for the good of the common societie of men, to which they could not but be offensive and hurtfull. For the most part they are not onely afraid of men, of the hazards of wars, of troubles and seditions, of the dangers of long voyages, of the losse of their goods, of diseases, of dolors, yea, of the least discommodities and aduerlities that can befall men: the euent of all which, causeth them vsually to forget all reason and duty, but they are also frighted with dreames, they tremble at sights and visions, they credite false abusing spirits, and with a forlorne feare they stand in awe of the celestiall signes. Briefly vpon the least occasions that may be, and such as are vnwoorthy the care of a prudent and valiant minde, they fall oftentimes into such vexation of spirit, that they lose it altogether, and become mad and enraged: insomuch, that many haue hastened forward with their owne hands, the end of their so miserable daies. As we reade of Mydas king of Phrygia, who being troubled and vexed with certaine dreames, grew to be desperate, and died voluntarily by drinking the blood of a bull. Aristodimus also, king of the Messenians, being in warre against his subiects, it happened that the dogs howled like woolues, which came to passe by reason of a certaine herbe called Dogs teeth, growing about his altar at home. Whereupon vnderstanding by the Soothsayers that it was an euill signe, he was strooken with such a feare and conceite thereof, that he slue himselfe, Cassius the captaine had a better heart when he answered a Chaldean Astrologian, who counselled him not to fight with the Partians vntill the Moone had passed Scorpio; I feare not (quoth he) Scorpions, but Archers. This he spake because the Romane army had bin put to the worlde before in the plaine of Chaldea by the Parthian archers. Neuertheles that which we spake of Mydas and Aristodimus is seldome followed, yea is rarely found among cowardes, and base minded fellowes, who commonly flie from temporall death as much as may be, as also from griefe, which they feare in such sort, that contemning all vertue and iustice, they labour for nothing more, than to preserue their liues together with their carnall commodities, for the obtaining

The effects of
too great prosperitie in co-
mon wealths.

Of that feare
which is the defect of Fortitude.

Timorous
men are alwaies little.

Claudius.
Cesar.

The feare of faint-hearts.

Mydas.

Cassius.

Base minds stand in great feare of death
and griefe.

obtaining of which they seeme to liue cleane without all care of their soule, as if her portion were in this world, & should end together with the bodie. The effects of this feare of death are sufficiently felt of euery one in particular, the number of the being very smal, who would not willingly make (as we say) a sluce to their consciences, that they might be deliuered thereof. Let vs then confesse our selues to be feareful and faint hearted, and not boast of Fortitude and generositie of heart, which will not suffer vs to stand in feare, no not of certaine death in an holy and honest cause: so farre is it from fearing and forsaking duty through doubt of an vncertaine death. That which Speron rehearseth in his dialogues of a gentleman of Padua, sufficiently sheweth what maruellous force is in the apprehension and conceite of death, which extendeth it selfe not onely vpon the spirits of men, but also changeth the nature of their bodies, who want constancie to beare and sustaine a small and light grieue for the enioying of eternall goods. T his yong gentleman being put in prison vpon some accusation, it was told him, that of a certaintie his head should be cut off the day following. Which newes altered him in such sort, that in one onely night he was all white and graie-headed, whereof before there was no shew or appearance, and so he liued long time after. Besides, experience daily ministreth vnto vs sufficient prooffe of the mischieues which proceede of want of courage and faint-heartednesse, especially in matters of estate, gouernment, and publike offices, wherein a fearefull and soft man, for euery reproch, dislike, or euill opinion of the world, yea of such as are most ignorant, and much more for the least dangers of his person, and for feare and threatnings of the greater sort, yeeldeth easily against all dutie, and suffereth himselfe to be drawne to the error of the wicked and common sort. As for the middle and lesser sort, wherefore seruethey being voide of reason and assurance? Homer saith, That king Agamemnon dispensed with a rich coward for going to warre personally, for a Mare which he gaue him. Wherein truly he had great reason, because a fearefull man hurteth much and profiteth little, not onely in warre, but euery good and vertuous action. T his caused that great capitaine Paulus Emilius to say, that magnanimity and courage were for the most part reuerenced in euery enemye of theirs, but that cowardlinesse, although it had good successe, yet was it alwaies and of all men despised. I might here mention sundrie vices, which ordinarily grow and are nourished of cowardlinesse and pusillanimitie, as namely, cruelty, treason, breach of promise, impatience, idlenesse, sloath, couetousnesse, enuie, backbiting, and all iniustice; were it not that I hope the sequelle of our discourses will offer vs matter and occasion to handle these vices particularly, our houre not affording vs time and leasure to enter vpon so many things together. There remaineth yet a word to bee spoken of that feare which I said did accompany the froward and wicked many times, being called by the Poet a seruile feare, which thorough the onely horror of punishment holdeth them backe from practising their wicked purposes. Of them spake Pythagoras when hee said, that hee which careth not for doing of euill in any other respect, but onely because he would not be punished, is very wicked. Now although such feare is accursed, and to be condemned in all, yet is it necessary for the preservation of humane society. For otherwise, all things would runne to confusion through the shamelesse malice of the wicked, of whom the earth is full. And it is a great deale better, that through such feare they should be restrained from their wicked desires and wils, than that they should without all feare abandon themselves to put them in execution: albeit they are no way excusable before God, who requireth to be serued with heart and spirit. Neuertheles, such feare doth not alwaies stay them from putting their malice in effect, but the more they are restrained, so much the more are they inflamed and kindled with a desire to satisfie their corrupt will, which in the end is constrained to burst forth, and evidently to shew that mischiefe which they kept secret a long time. But if the common sort (saith Seneca) be staied by lawes from committing euill, the Philosopher contrariwise hath reason for all lawes, doing good not because the law commandeth it, and abstaining from euill not because it forbideth it, but because he knoweth the one to be honest, and the other vile and wicked. Having now seene that vice which is cleane contrary to Fortitude, and knowing that euery vertue hath a counterfeir follower thereof, no doubt but Rashnesse is that vice which falsly shrowdeth it selfe vnder the title of Fortitude and valure. For this vertue easily ouerthroweth it selfe if it be not vnderpropped with good counsell, and the greater abilitie it supposeth to haue in it selfe, the sooner it turneth aside to wickednesse, if prudence gouerne it not. This is that which Isoocrates saith, that Fortitude ioyned with Prudence is auailable, but otherwise it procureth more euill than good to the possessors thereof. If Fortitude (saith Lactantius) without necessarie constraint, or for a dishonest matter hazardeth her selfe into dangers, shee changeth

A strange alteration of a Gentleman's haire in one night.

Agamemnon dispensed with a rich coward.

What vices proceed of cowardlines.

Of seruile feare.

Of Rashnesse and of the effects thereof.

Who is a ver-tuous man.

Cato.

Iphicrates
comparison
of an army to mans body.

The rashnes
of Ifadas.

How a man
may be valiant.

changeth into rashnes. He that doth any thing at al adventures (saith Aristotle) not cōsidreing how well he doth it, ought to be called vertuous: but only if he put it in executiō, after know- ledge, consultation & election. Therefore as it is a noble act to make such account of vertue, as for the love thereof, not to feare the losse of life. otherwise very deere: so is it a point of rash- nes and folly to contemne life vpon a small & light occasion. Rashnes then is that which cau- feth a man with ioy of heart, and for a vaine and friuolous matter, to cast himselfe into certain and vndoubted dangers, & to desire earnestly to fall into them, to vndertake all things vnad- uisedly, and vnconstrained to expect those perils which he knoweth will fall vpon him. The elder Cato hearing certaine men, to commend one openly who desperately hazarded him- selfe, & was bold without discretiō in perils of war, said vnto them. That there was great differēce between much esteeming of vertue, & little weighing of life, as if he would haue said, That it is a cō- mendable thing to desire life to be vertuous. And truly to liue and die are not of themselves good, but to do both of them rightly and in a good matter. So that to shun death, if it pro- ceede not from a faint heart, is not to be reprehended. But Rashnes is especially to be con- demned in Captaines and Heads of Armies, as that which procureth great damage to kingdomes and Monarchies, and to so many as march vnder their conduct. This is that which Iphicrates an Athenian Captaine would haue vs learne, who compared in an army the Scouts lightly armed to the hands: the Horsemen to the feete: the battle of foote men to the stomacke and breast: and the Captaine to the head of a mans body. For (said he) the Cap- taine that hazardeth himselfe too much, and throweth himselfe into danger without cause, is not retchlesse of his owne life only, but also of all those whose safety dependeth vpon him: and contrariwise, in taking care for the safegard of his owne person, he careth therewithall for all those that are vnder him. Ifadas the Lacedemonian seeing Epaminondas with the The- ban army at hand against the Spartans, ready to force and take their Citie, vnclothed himselfe starke naked, putting off his shirt and all, and taking a Partisane in one hand, and a sword in the other, he went with might & maine against his enemies, where he shewed great prowesse and valure. For which behauiour although he had a Crowne giuen him by the Seignorie ac- cording to the custome that was among them, yet he was fined, because he hazarded his life so rashly. Wee see daily among vs but too many examples of great mischiefes which befall men through their rashnes, led with ambition and desire of vaine glory. Therefore to conlude, and to draw some profite out of our present discourse, wee say, that we ought to feare the in- curring of blame and dishonor for filthy and vnhonest matters, and for euill deeds, and are to shun all feare proceeding of want of courage, of pusillanimitie, and of a depraued and corrupt nature: This last, as proper and peculiar to the wicked, and the other, as that which maketh a man vnapt to all good and commendable things. And as it is an act of Prudence and Forti- tude to provide for a tempest and for stormes to come, (when the ship is still in the Hauen) and yet not to bee afraid in the midst of stormes: so is it a point of rashnesse for a man to throw himselfe wittingly into an euident danger, which might be auoided without any breach of vertue and iustice. Therefore Plato saith, that timorous and rash men feare and enterprise vnadvisedly, whatsoeuer they take in hand, but that noble minds do all things with prudēce. This also is that which Seneca saith: Thou mayest be valiant if thou cast not thy selfe into perils, nor desirest to fall into them as timorous men doe: neither abhorrest or standest in feare of them, as beeing ti- morous. But following the sage aduice of Cicero, before we enterprise any thing, we must not onely consider whether it be honest and commendable, but also whether there bee any like meanesto execute it, that neither through cowardlines we giue it ouer, nor through greedy desire and presumption, wee purchase to our selues the reputation of rash men: obseruing moreouer in every matter of importance this Maxime of estate, that before wee beginne any thing wee must diligently prepare and fore see whatsoeuer is necessary thereunto.

Of Magnanimitie and Generositie. Chap. 27.

A R A M. VHen that saying of Aristotle cometh to my remembrance, that Fortitude is a mediocrity in fearing and enterprising, but that Magnanimitie consisteth in great things, I am somewhat troubled in the vnderstanding of this sen- tence: because it seemeth he would put a difference betweene Fortitude and Magnanimity, as if this latter had more excellency and perfection in it than the other. For this cause my com- panions hauing intreated this morning of the vertue of Fortitude, I propound now vnto you to discourse vnto vs what Magnanimity is.

ACHITO B.

ACHITON. Among mortall and perishing things, there is nothing (as the Philosophers say) that ought to trouble the Magnanimity of a noble hart. But I find that they propound vnto vs in this word such a wisdom, as cannot be in him that remaineth all his life time subiect to affections and perturbations. For this they would not haue in true Magnanimity, which notwithstanding is well able to bring forth infinite woonderfull effects out of a noble minde, causing it to be neuer vnprovided of a good resolution to be put in execution according to the ouerthwarts that happen vnto him.

ASER. The property of a noble spirit (saith Cicero) is not to bee turned aside through ingratitude from the desire of dooing good to all men, even to his enemies, as also to leaue carking for that which is mortall, that hee may embrace celestiall things. But wee shall vnderstand more at large of thee AMANA, how these maruellous effects are workes of true Magnanimity.

AMANA. Although the vertue of Fortitude be neuer perfected without Magnanimity (which is as much to say, as Generositie or noblenesse of heart) as that which vndoubtedly is comprehended vnder the first part of Fortitude, which Cicero calleth Magnificence, or a dooing of great and excellent things, yet notwithstanding it seemeth that this word Magnanimity carrieth with it some greater & more particular Emphasis, and that a man may say, that the woonderfull effects thereof appeare principally in three points, whereof I purpose here to discourse. The first concerning extreame and desperate matters, as when a man is past all hope of sauing his life, wherein perfect Magnanimity alwaies knoweth how to finde out a conuenient remedie and wise consolation, not suffering himselfe to bee vexed therewith.

The second respecteth duty towards enemies, against whom generositie will in no wise suffer a man to practise or consent to any wickednes, vnder what pretence soeuer it be, not for any aduantage which may be reaped thereby. The third causeth a noble minded man to contemne and to account that thing vnworthy the care of his soule which others woonder at, and labour by all meanes to attaine, namely, strength, health, beauty, which the Philosophers call the goods of the body: and riches, honour and glory, which, they say, are the goods of Fortune:

and likewise not to stand in feare of their contraries. Amongst the woorthy and famous men of olde time, whose names and glorious facts crowned with an immortall Lawrell, are ingraued in the temple of Memory, we finde no praise woorthy of greater admiration, or that ought to awaken and stirre vs vp better in Christian duty, than the effects of this vertue of Magnanimity, vpon these three occasions presently touched. Whereof one effect is, that wee yeeld not against reason, nor passe the limits of duty by fainting vnder that heauy burden of extreame distresses, which the horror of death bringeth with it: but that even in the midst of greatest agony which seemeth intollerable in mans iudgement, wee shew such grauity and woorthines, that wee depart not in any sort from the peace and quietnes of our soules, but with constancy and cheerefulnes of spirit, meditate vpon the ioy of that haue of saluation, which we behold with the eies of our soule, wherein through a happy death at hand, wee shall shortly be receiued. Another effect is, that wee accomplish (so farre as our frailty can approach to perfection) the commandement of the diuine will, by louing our neighbours as our selves, and by abstaining, even in regard of our greatest enemies, from dooing, procuring or consenting, yea by hindering that no treachery or treason should bee wrought them, nor any other thing vnbecoming that naturall loue, which ought to be in euery one towards his like, and further, by procuring them all the good and profit that may bee. The third effect of this great vertue, no lesse woonderfull than the rest, is in that a noble minded man so long as he liueth, wholly withdraweth his affection from worldly and corruptible things through a steadfast and constant reason, and lifteth it vp to the meditation and holy desire of heauenly and eternall things. The remedie which these great personages destitute of the right knowledge of the truth, most commonly vsed when their affaires were past all hope of mans helpe, was death, which they chose rather to bring vpon themselves by their own hands, than to fall into the mercy of their enemies, whereby they supposed that they committed a noble act, woorthy the greatnes of their innincible courage. And if peradventure they were surprisid, and forced in such sort by their enemies, that they were compelled to become their prisoners, they never desired them to saue their liues, saying, that it becomed not a noble heart; and that in so doing they should submit both heart and body to him, who before had but the body in his power, Cato the yonger being brought to such extremity in the town of Vtica, that by the aduice of all those that were with him, he was to send Embassadors to Cesar the Conqueror, to practise an agreement after submission to his mercy, yeelding thereunto in the behalfe of others

What Magnanimity is.

Magnanimity consisteth in three things.

The goods of the body and of Fortune.

The first effect of magnanimity.

The second effect.

The third effect.

The common remedy of the Ancients in desperate cases.

Cato of Vtica

The opinion
of the Stoicks

Brutus.

A notable historie of the Numantines.

No man
ought to hasten forward
the end of his daies.

Alcibiades
constancie
and courage
in death.

others, but forbad that any mention should be made of himselfe. It belongeth (quoth he) to those that are overcome, to make request, and to such as haue done amisse, to crave pardon. As for mee I will account my selfe invincible so long as in right and iustice I shall be mightier then Caesar. He it is that is now taken and overcome, because that which hitherto he denied to take in hand against the Common-wealth, is at this present sufficiently testified against him, and discovered. Neither will he be holding or bound to a tyrant for an unjust matter. For it is a point of iniustice in him to usurpe the power of saving their lives (like a Lord) over whom hee hath no right to command. After many other speeches of Philosophy vsed by him, and standing much vpon that Stoicall opinion, That onely a wise and good man is free, and that all wicked men are bond men and slaues, he went alone into his chamber, and slue himselfe with his sword. Sylla the Dictator hauing condemned to death all the inhabitants of Perouza, and pardoning none but his Host, hee also would needes die, saying that he would not hold his life of the murtherer of his countrey, Brutus, after the battell lost against Augustus Caesar, was counselled by certaine of his friends to flie: I must flie indeed (said he) but with hands, not with feete. And taking them all by the hand, he vttered these words with a very good and cheerefull countenance: I feele my heart greatly contented, because none of my friends haue forsaken me in this businesse: neither complaine I of fortune at all, but onely so farre forth as toucheth my countrey. For I esteeme my selfe happier than they that haue vanquished, as long as I leaue behinde me a glorie of vertue for bazarading all liberally, to free from bondage my brethren and countrymen. Which praise our conquering enemies neither by might nor money can obtaine, and leaue to posteritie: but men will alwaies say of them, that being unjust and wicked, they haue ouerthrowne good men to vsurpe a tyrannous rule and dominion, that belongeth not vnto them. After he had thus spoken, hee tooke his sword, and falling vpon the point thereof, gaue vp the Ghost. Cassius also his companion, caused his owne head to be cut off by one of his slaues, whom hee had made free, and kept with him long time before for such a necessity. The historie which we reade of the Numantines, commeth in fitly for this matter which we handle here. For after they had sustained the siege of the Romanes fourteene yeares together, and were in the end inclosed by Scipio with a great ditch of two and fortie foote in depth, and thirtie in bredth, which compassed the citie round about, the Consul summoned them to commit themselves to the clemencie of the Romans, and to trust to their promise, seeing all meanes of fallying foorth to fight, and of recovering any victuals were taken from them. To whom they made this onely answer, that forasmuch as they had liued for the space of 338. yeares in freedome, they would not die slaues in any sort. Whereupon, such as were most valiant, assembled together and slue those that were most growne in yeares, with women and children. Then they tooke all the riches of the citie, and of the temples, and brought it into the midst of a great hall, and setting fire to all quarters of the citie, each of them tooke the speediest poyson they could finde: so that the temples, houses, and riches, and people of Numantia ended all in one day, leauing to Scipio, neither riches to spoyle, neither man or woman to triumph withall. For during the whole time wherein their citie was besieged, not one Numantine yeelded himselfe prisoner to any Romane, but slue himselfe rather than hee would yeeld. Which Magnanimitie caused Scipio to bewaile the desolation of such a people, in these wordes: O happie Numantia, which the gods had decreed should once end, but neuer bee vanquished. Now albeit these examples and infinite other like to these, are set foorth vnto vs by Historiographers, as testimonies of an excellent Magnanimitie, whereby they would teach vs both to bee neuer discouraged for the most tedious trauels and irkesome miseries of mans life, and also to stand so little in awe of death, that for feare thereof, much lesse for any other torment or griefe, wee neuer commit any thing vnseeming a noble heart: yet notwithstanding, no man that feareth God, and is willing to obey him, ought to forget himselfe so much, as to hasten forward the end of his daies for any occasion whatsoever. This did Socrates know very well when he said, that wee must not suffer our soule to depart from the Centinell wherein shee is placed in this body, without the leave of her Captaine: and that so weightie a matter as death, ought not (as Plato saith) to bee in mans power. But if it bee offered vnto vs by the will of God, then with a Magnanimous heart voide of all starting aside in any thing against dutie, wee must set free this passage, beeing slaid and assuredly grounded vpon that consolation, which neuer forsaketh a good conscience, not onely through the expectation of a naked and simple humane glory, which most of the Heathen propounded to themselves, but of that life which abideth for euer: following therein the constancy of Alcibiades, a great Captaine of Grecia, who hearing the sentence of his condemnation to death pronounced, said: It is I that leaue the Athenians, condemned condemned to die, and not they mee. For I goe to seeke the gods where I shall bee immortall, but they shall remaine still amongst men, who are all subiect to death. Socrates also hauing a capitall accusation laide against him wrongfully, directeth his speech to the Iudges, and saide vnto them, that his accusers by their false depositions might well cause him to die, but hurt him they could not: adding further, that he would neuer leaue his profession of Philosophie for feare of death. I am perswaded (quoth he in Plato) that this my opinion is very good, namely, that every one ought to abide constantly in that place and trade of life, which either he hath chosen himselfe, or is appointed him by his superior: that hee must account that for the best, and hazard himselfe therein to all dangers, without feare either of death or of any other thing whatsoeuer. And therefore I should erre greatly, if I should now for feare of death forsake that rancke wherein God hath placed mee, and would haue me remaine in, as I alwaies beleened and thought: namely, that I should liue a student in Philosophie, correcting mine owne and other mens vices. Now, if I should doe otherwise, I might iustly bee accused for calling my selfe a wise man, not being so in deede: seeing to feare death, is to thinke that to bee, which is not. But neither I, nor any other man, ought to doe all that wee may in iudgement or in war, to the end to auoide death. For it is very certaine, that he who would in time of battell cast downe his armour and flie away, might by that meane auoide death, (and the like is to be vnderstood in all dangers and perils) if hee were not afraid of infamie. But consider (O countrey men) that it is no very hard matter to auoide death, but farre more difficult to eschue wickednesse and the shame thereof, which are a great deale swifter of foote than that is. O speech worthy of eternall praise, and such a one as instructeth a Christian notably in a great and noble resolution: namely to runne the race of his short dayes in that vocation, whereunto God hath called him, and that in the middest of tortures, torments, and all agonies of death. From which, whilest wee expect a happie passage, wee ought to be no more destitute of an apt remedie in all those things, which according to the world are most irksome and desperate, but sustaine them with like constancy and woorthinesse, not departing from the tranquillitie and rest of our soules, which is a more noble act, than to hasten forward the end of our daies, that wee may be deliuered of them. But howsoeuer it bee, let vs alwaies preferre a vertuous and honest death, before any kinde of life, be it neuer so pleasant. And seeing that one and the same passage is prepared as well for the coward as the couragious, (it being decreed, that all men must once die) the lovers of vertue shall doe well to reape to themselves some honor of common necessity, and to depart out of this life with such a comfort. Now to come to the second commendable effect of this vertue of Magnanimity, whereof Heroicall men were so prodigall heretofore for the benefite and safety of their enemies, wee can bring no better testimony than the courteous fact of Fabritius the Romane Consul towards Pyrrhus, who made warre against him, and whose Philition wrot vnto him, that he offered himselfe to murder his maister by poyson, and so to end their strife without danger. But Fabritius sent the letter vnto him, and signified withall, that hee had made a bad choise of friends, as well as of enemies, because he made warre with vpright and good men, and trusted such as were disloyall and wicked: whereof hee thought good to let him vnderstand, not so much to gratifie him, as least the accident of his death should procure blame to the Romanes, as if they had sought or consented to ende the warre by meanes of treason, not being able to obtaine their purpose by their vertue. Camillus a Romane Dictator, is no lesse to be commended for that which he did during the siege of the Citie of the Fallerians. For hee that was schoole master of the chiefest mens children among them, being gone out of the Citie, vnder colour to haue his youth to walke, and to exercise themselves along the walles, deliuered them into the hands of the Romane Captaine, saying vnto him, that he might bee well assured the Citizens would yeeld themselves to his deuotion, for the safety and liberty of that which was deereft vnto them. But Camillus knowing this to bee too vile and wicked a practise, saide to those that were with him, That although men vsed great outrage and violence in war, yet among good men certaine lawes and points of equity were to be obserued. For victory was not so much to bee desired, as that it should be gotten and kept by such cursed and damnable meanes, but a Generall ought to warre, trusting to his owne vertue, and not to the wickednesse of others. Then stripping the saide schoole master, and binding his hands behinde him, hee deliuered him naked into the hands of his schollers, and gaue to each of them a bundle of rodde, that so they might carry him backe againe into the citie. For which noble act the citizens yeelded themselves to the Romanes, saying: that in preferring iustice before victorie, they had taught them to choose rather to submitte themselves vnto them, than to retaine still their libertie: confessing withall, that they were overcome more by their vertue, than vanquished by their force and power.

Socrates
speech at his arraignment.

What it is to
feare death.

Examples of the second effect of magnanimity.
Fabritius.

Camillus.

A good lesson for a Generall to learne.

Treason and crueltie neuer
finde place in a noble heart.

Of the third
effect of Magnanimitie.

Aristides.

Magnanimitie
is invincible.

So great power hath Magnanimitie, that it doth not onely aduance Princes to the highest degree of honor, but also abateth the heart of the puissant and warlikeemie, and oftentimes procureth victorie without battell. Truly we may draw an excellent doctrine out of these examples, which make all those without excuse, that spare nothing to attaine to the end of their intents and devices, making no difficulty, at the destruction of innocents, but exercising all kinde of crueltie, so they may overthrow their enemies by what meanes soeuer: vsing commonly that saying of Lysander, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, That if the Lions skinne will not suffice, the Foxe his skinne also is to bee sewed on. But let vs resolutely hold this, that treason neuer findeth place in a noble heart, no more than the bodie of a Foxe is found in a Lions bodie. Further, it is notoriously knowne, that the Ancients strined to procure all good and profite to their enemies, vsing clemencie and humanity towards them, when they had greater occasion and meanes to bee reuenged of them. Hereof wee may alleadge good examples, when wee discourse hereafter particularly of those vertues that are proper to a noble minded man, who ought to hate crueltie no lesse than treason. Wee are therefore to looke vnto the last effect, and sound proofe of Magnanimity and Generositie here propounded by vs, which wee said, consisted in the contempt of earthly and humane goods. Wherein truly relecth the very perfection of a Christian, who listeth vp his desires to his last and soueraigne Good in heaven. Now, because there are but few that loue not themselves too much in those things that concerne the commodities of this life, and fewer that seeke not after glorie and honour, as a recompence of their excellent deeds, and that desire not riches earnestly to satisfie their pleasure; in these three points also a noble minded man causeth his vertue to appeare more wonderful, because hee doth not iudge them to be a worthy reward for the same, but rather altogether vnworthie the care of his soule, for which principally hee desireth to liue. This is that which Cicero saith that it is not seemely that hee should yeeld to couetousnesse and concupiscence, who could not bee subdued by feare, or that hee should bee overcome by pleasure, who hath resisted griefe: but rather that these things ought to bee shunned by all possible meanes, together with the desire of money, seeing there is nothing more vile and abiect than to loue riches nor more noble than to despise them. This also is that which Plato saith, that it belongeth to the dutie of a noble heart not onely to surmount feare, but also to moderate his desires and concupiscences, especially when he hath libertie to vse them, whether it bee in the pleasure of the bodie, or in the ambitious desire of vaine-glorie, honour and power. In this sort then, hee that hath a right noble and woorthy minde, will no more weigh greatnesse among men and estimation of the common sort, than hee doth griefe and pouertie, but depending wholly vpon the will of God, and contenting himselfe with his workes wrought in him, hee will not that any good thing vpon earth can bee taken from him. And because he aspieth to those things that are best, highest, and most difficult, hee abideth free from all earthly care and griefe, as beeing long before prepared for all dolours, through the contempt of death, which bringeth an end to the greatest and most excessiue pangs, serueth him for an entrance into eternall rest. Wee haue already alledged many examples of ancient men, fit for this matter which now we speake of, and the sequelle of our treatises will furnish vs with mo when we shall come to intreate of riches and worldly wealth, whereof we are to speake more at large. But here we will propound Aristides onely to be imitated, who was a worthy man among the Athenians, whose opinion was, that a good citizen ought to be alwaies prepared alike to offer his bodie and minde vnto the seruice of the commonwealth, without hope or expectation of any hire & mercenary reward either of money, honour, or glory. And so with an vspeakable grauity and constancie, hee kept himselfe alwaies vpriight in the seruice of his countrey, in such sort that no honour done vnto him could cause him either to bee puffed vp in heart, or to bee more earnest in imploying himselfe: (as it is the manner of some to doe seruice according as they are recompenced) neither could any repulse or deniall which hee suffered, abate his courage or trouble him, or yet diminish and lessen his affection and desire to profit his common-wealth. Whereas now adayes wee see that the most part of men with vs vpon a small discontentment, labour to make publike profite to serue their desires and passions, in stead of giuing themselves to the good and benefit of their country. Now concluding our present discourse, we learne that true and perfect Magnanimity and Generosity is in invincible and inexpugnable, because vpon this consideration, that death is the common end of mans life, & that happy passage to life eueralting, she despiseth it altogether, & makes lesse account thereof than of bondage & vice: sustaining sustaining also with a great and vnappalled heart, most cruell torments, not being moued thereby to doe any thing that may seeme to proceede of the common weakenesse, and frailtie of mans nature. Further we learne that this vertue maketh him that possesseth her, good, gentle, and curteous, even towards his greatest enemies, against whom it suffereth him not to vse any couin or malice, but keepeth him alwaies within the limits of equitie and iustice: causing him further to make choice of and to finish all honest matters of his owne will, and for their loue, not caring at all for mortall and corruptible things, that he may wholly apprehend and take hold of those things that are diuine and eternall

Of Hope. Chap. 28.

A M A N A. Considering that the perfection of a wise mans life consisteth in the practise of great and excellent things, hee that is borne to vertue feeleth himselfe touched to the quicke with desire to bring them to passe. But the instabilitie and small assurance which hee knoweth to be in that which dependeth vpon the doubtfull euent of every high enterprise, oftentimes cooleth his vertuous intents, if a certaine confidence and good hope did not make easie vnto him the meanes of attaining thereunto. Likewise, when hee feeleth the sharpe pricking that proceedeth from the ouerthwarts and miseries of man, which sequester themselues very little from his life, hee is soone daunted with sorrow and care, if hee haue not this hope that comforteth him with expectation of speedie redresse. Of you therefore (my companions) wee shall vnderstand the excellency of this Good that belongeth to the soule and is so necessarie for a happy life, I meane Hope, which dependeth of the vertue of fortitude, whereof wee haue discoursed all this day.

A R A M. Learned men (saith Bias) differ from the ignorant sort in the goodnesse of hope, which truly is very profitable, sweete and acceptable to a prudent man. But euill hope leadeth carnall men, as a nauty guide, vnto sinne.

A C H I T O B. As good hope serueth to increase strength in a man, so rash hope oftentimes beguideth men. But it belongeth to thee A S E R to handle this matter.

A S E R. Alexander the Great beeing by the States of all Græcia chosen generall Capitaine to passe into Asia, and to make warre with the Persians, before hee tooke shippe hee inquired after the estate of all his friends to know what meanesthey had to follow him. Then hee distributed and gaue to one lands, to another a village, to this man the custome of some haven, to another the profite of some borough towne, bestowing in this manner the most part of his demeanes and reuenues. And when Perdicus one of his Lieutenants demanded of him what hee reserued for himselfe: hee answered Hope. So great confidence had this noble Monarch, not in the strength of his weapons, or multitude of good warriors desirous of glorie and honour, but in his owne vertue, beeing content and satisfied with a little, in his incontinencie, beneficence, contempt of death, magnanimitie, curtesie, gracious entertainment, beeing easie to bee spoken with, having a free disposition by nature, without dissimulation, constant in his counsels, readie and quicke in his executions, willing to bee the first in glorie, and alwaies resolute to doe that which dutie commaunded. From this Hope thus surely grounded, hee neuer shrubke, vntill the last gaspe of his life: which caused him to make this answere to Parmenio, who counselled him to accept of the offers which Darius made vnto him for peace: namely, sixe thousand talents, beeing in value sixe Millions of golde, and the halfe of his kingdome, with a daughter of his in marriage; If I were Parmenio, I would accept of his proffers. Besides, hee sent word to Darius, that the earth could not beare two Sunnies, nor Asia two kings. Neither was hee deceiued of his good hope, which led him to such a perfection of worldly glory and felicitie, that he was the first and last that euer approached neere vnto it. This Hope was that foundation whereupon so many great and excellent Heathen men and Pagans built their high and noble interprises. For prooffe hereof may bee alleadged that definition which Cicero giueth of Confidence, being the second part of Hope, affirming it to be that vertue, whereby the spirit of man putteth great trust in weightie and honest matters, having a certaine and sure hope of himselfe. And elswhere he saith that he shall neither reioyce, nor be troubled out of measure, that trusteth in himselfe. But we know that this Hope

Wherein the perfection of a wise mans life consisteth

Alexander reserued hope onely for himselfe.

Properties requisite in a Generall.

The definition of confidence.

Our hope must bee
grounded vpon
the grace
of God.
Of vaine
hope.

Who are soonest
throwne downe with aduersitie.
Wencelaws.

The diuision
of hope.

Of the true
and infallible
hope.

Of earthly
hope.

Speeches vn-becoming a wise man.
The fruite of
hope.

is weake and vncertaine, if it bee not settled and grounded vpon a sure expectation of the helpe and grace of God, without which wee can neuer prosper. Now this is out of doubt, that wee cannot hope and waite for that grace, vnlesse our counsels and enterprises, haue reason for their guide, and right and equitie for their bounds. For (as an ancient man saith) that man hopeth in vaine that feareth not God, and they onely are filled with good hope, whose consciences are cleane and pure. So that all they that are led with sundry euill passions, either of ambition, of vaine-glorie, or of any other vnbridled desire, can neuer haue that happie and good hope, which neuer deceiueth men. And indeede they misse oftentimes of their intent, yea, are deprived of that which was their owne and certaine, because they are desirous to get vniustly another mans right, beeing also vncertaine. The selfe same thing falleth out to those that trust and stay in such sort vpon their owne strength, vertue and constancie, that fearing in no respect (as they say) the greatest calamities that can come to man, assure themselves in their prosperitie to bee inuincible in their resolutions, and presume that nothing is able to pull them downe, or to cause them to change their opinion: and yet so soone as the winde of aduersity bloweth, they are the first that are throwne to the ground, and soonest shew forth the inconstancy and imbecillity of mans nature left to it selfe. As contrariwise, they to whom God giueth eies to acknowledge themselves, are then humbled, so that they reuerence the ordinance of God, who derideth all the enterprises of men. The practise hereof was well knowne to Wencelaws king of Hungary, beeing driven out of his kingdome, and forsaken of his owne, who oftentimes vsed to say, The hope I had in men hindered me from putting my trust in God: but now that all my confidence is in him, I assure my selfe that he will helpe me by his diuine goodnesse. As indeed it fell out so vnto him, beeing reestablished againe in all his estates and dignities. But to the end we confound not together that which is simply diuine, with that which is humane, I thinke we ought to make a double hope, the first, true, certaine, and vnfallible, which concerneth holy and sacred mysteries: the other doubtfull, respecting earthly things onely. Astouching the first, we know things to come by the assurance thereof, as well as if they were already done. Wee are taught in the holy Scripture what is the vndoubted certaintie of this hope, which through faith ought to bee so imprinted in our hearts, that by the strength, power, and vertue thereof, wee should runne the race of our short daies in all ioy, happinesse and peaceable tranquillitie of our minds, expecting without doubting the perfect and absolute enioying of those goods that are immortall, vnutterable and endlesse in the second and eternall life. Without this hope grounded vpon the free goodnesse of the Almighty, let vs assuredly perswade our selues, that mans estate is more miserable than that of brute beasts, seeing this is, the onely way of his saluation. The other hope which concerneth this present life onely in all such things as we propound to our selues for the benefit and contentation thereof, hath such need to be ruled, guided, and referred to the happie end of the first excellent and heavenly hope that otherwise it cannot but be doubtfull, inconstant, and rash, what humane reason soeuer wee can alleadge to perswade the possibility of attaining to the end of our pretended deui-ces, which in one moment may be quite ouerthrowne, the occasions whereof beeing for the most part secret and hid from vs. Moreouer the imperfection of whatsoever men commonly most esteeme vpon earth is so great, that together with their continuall vncertain-tye, the perturbations which hinder the tranquillitie of the soule, redouble and abound so much the more, as the enioying of these earthly commodities increase and augment, leauing in man a continuall desire to multiplie them, and a feare to lose them. Astouching this hope therefore of humane things which wee wish might alwaies prosper with vs, wee may well hope what wee will, but withall wee must prepare and settle our selues to support constantly whatsoever falleth out, that that which commeth vnto vs against our expectation: and that wee neuervse such repinings as these, vnbecoming a wise man, I would neuer haue thought it: I looked for another matter: I would neuer haue supposed that such a thing could haue happened. In the meane while wee must not omitte to Hope the best alwaies in our crosses and calamities, because nothing lenifieth so much the sharpnesse of present aduersities as the hope of future benefit, the certaine expectation whereof as it were slealeth away our labours, and causeth all feare of perill to vanish away. This is that which Apollodorus saith, that we must neuer be discouraged for aduersities, but alwaies hope for better things. The calamities of mortall men (saith Euripides) in the end leaue of themselves: and as the winds do not alwaies blow vehemently, so happie men are not euer fortunate. The one flieth from the other: but he is a good man, who is alwaies full of good hope, Pindarus calleth it the nurse of olde age.

Thales

Thales said, that nothing in all the world was more common than Hope, because it abideth with them also that haue no other goods. The Elpisticke Philosophers affirmed, that nothing better maintained and preserued the life of man, than Hope. And truly without hope, which easeth the burthen of mans miseries, the world were not able to sustaine life. For it greatly helpeth man to liue contentedly and happily, if, as wee said, it haue respect to the best ende, vnto which all our desires and inclinations ought to bee referred, and ought to bee gouerned thereby according to reason and iustice. Otherwise it is certaine that a man can neuer peaceably and to his contentation, enioy his present estate and condition, but alwaies some new hope of better things to come, will cause him to neglect that whereof hee is assured, and to runne after an vncertainty, vntill in the ende beeing often deceiued and missing of his purposes and enterprises, hee bee ouerthrowne quite through his great hope. Therefore Plato writeth, that Fortune is more contrary to that man whom shee suffereth not to enioy that which hee hath, than to him whom shee denieth to graunt that which he demandeth of her. This gaue occasion to Cineas (a very wise man, and so excellent an Orator, that one writeth of him, that hee brought more townes in subiection to his master Pyrrhus by his tongue, than himselfe did by his valure) when he saw that although this king might enioy a happy peace and quietnesse, if hee would bee contented to reigne peaceably ouer his subiects: yet hee burned with desire to vndertake warre against Italy; to enter into talke with him, and to aske of him this question. If Sir, the gods shew vs this fauour that wee should remaine Conquerors in this warre, what good would the victorie doe vs? Wee might afterward (answered Pyrrhus) easily subdue the Græcian and Barbarian cities bordering vpon that countrey. Well, when this is done, (replied Cineas) what shall we doe afterward? Sicilia (answered Pyrrhus) will of it selfe yeelde vnto vs. Shall Sicilia then (quoth Cineas) ende our warre? What will stay vs after (quoth this Monarch) from passing into Afrike and to Carthage, and from the recoverie of the kingdome of Macedonia with ease, that so wee may command all Græcie without contradiction? Whereunto Cineas replied, When all is in our power, what shall wee doe in the ende? Pyrrhus beginning to smile, said, Wee will rest vs at our ease, my friend, living in all pleasure, and as merrily as may be. Then Cineas hauing brought him to that point which hee desired, said vnto him: And what Sir, letteth vs from rest at this present, and from living in ioy and pleasure, seeing wee haue all things requisite and necessary, without seeking it with so much effusion of mans blood, besides infinite hazards and dangers, and that in such places where it is vncertaine whether we shall finde it: These wise speeches sooner offended Pyrrhus than caused him to change his minde. And although this Prince could not doubt at all what happinesse and great felicity he forsooke, yet was it vnpossible to take the hope of that which he desired out of his minde. Wherefore Antigonus king of Macedonia compared him very fitly to a Dice plaier, to whom the Dice speake faire by giuing vnto him good chances, but yet so that hee cannot call the same againe to serue his turne. For he lost that by hope, which he had gotten indeed, desiring so earnestly that which he had not, that he forgot to make that sure which was already in his possession. And indeed it fell out very unhappily with him in the ende. For after hee had fought prosperously a certaintime, hee was discomfited by the Romans, and being after besieged, was slaine with a tile which a woman let fall vpon his head. Was there euer Monarch who ought rather to haue contented and delighted himselfe peaceably in the enioying of his vnspeakeable prosperities than Iulius Caesar? And yet not beeing satisfied with the Romane Empire, which he had obtained by so many trauels and innumerable dangers, hee made preparation (whilest the conspirators sought his death) to goe himselfe in person to warre against the Parthians. So that as long as he liued, the hope of that which was to come, caused him to contemne the glory gotten by his former deeds, and to depriue himselfe of that commendation, which he should haue no lesse deserved in preseruing himselfe, and in the good government of his great estate, than he did in conquering the same: whereof hee reaped no other benefit, but onely a vaine name and glorie of small continuance in his life time, which procured him the enuie and hatred of his countrymen, so that hee was murdered with three and twentie blowes of the sword on his body, after hee had ouerliued Pompey (who was vanquished by him) foure yeares onely, or little more. Histories are full of sundrie such alterations, which commonly follow them that are not content with their estate: from whence wise men and of good iudgement may draw this instruction, to limitt their thoughts and desires. For as Diodorus the Athenian said, these two things are very hurtfull to men, Hope and Loue, of which the one leadeth, and the other accompanieth men.

Our life
would be insupportable
without hope.

Cineas talke with Pyrrhus
concerning his great
hope.

Pyrrhus compared to a Dice-plaier.

Caesar was led continually with new hope.

Two things
hurtfull to
men.

We must not iudge of en-terprifes by the euent.

Ill hap is more common than good.

Seneca adui-
feth vs to prepare our selues to all euent.

What the author vnderstandeth by the word Fortune.

accompanieth them; the one seeketh out the meanes to execute their thoughts, and the other perswadeth them with good successe. And although these two things are not seene with the eye, yet are they mightier then visible punishments. Hereof came that old proverbe, that proud men eat themselves with vaine hope, which by little and little choaketh them, as a naughty fat doth mans bodie. And if wee bee willing to keepe our selues from so dangerous a downefall, let vs cure our soules of all hurtfull hope, and let reason and dutie (as wee haue already said) leade and limit all our affections and enterprises, considering wisely their beginning, namely, that we ground them vpon right & equity onely, knowing that they ought not to be iudged of by the euent and end of them, which oftentimes seeme to fauour vniust counsels and doings. And this offereth some colour and occasion to the wicked to prosecute their dealings, hauing no care of violating right and iustice. But howsoever it bee, a miserable end bringeth them an ouer late repentance. Neither let vs perswade our selues, that the issue of our imaginations and enterprises, although they be well grounded, shall certainly fall out according to our meaning; (for this is that hope, which greatly hurteth, and most of all troubleth them) but let vs know, that as in all things which grow, there is alwaies some corruption mingled in them) it being necessaries that all mortall feedes should presently bee partakers of the cause of death) so from the same fountaine ill happe floweth vnto vs in great measure, yea sooner and more abundantly than good successe. Which thing Homer willing to giue vs to vnderstand, fained that there were two vessels at the entrie of the great Olympus, the one being full of hony, the other of gall, of which two mingled together Iupiter causeth all men to drinke. And Plutarke saith, that men can neuer purely and simply enioy the ease of any great prosperitie, but whether it be fortune, or the enuy of destitute, or else the naturall necessitie of earthly things, there ease is alwaies intermingled in their life time, with euill among the good; yea in the like mishap, that which is worse surmounteth the better. All these things beeing considered of vs, they will make vs more aduised and staied in all our counsels and aduices, and in such sort affected and prepared with true prudence, fortitude and magnanimitie, that whatsoeuer hapneth vnto vs, wee shall not bee troubled or farther moued, but receiue it, as hauing long before expected and looked for it. This doth Seneca very learnedly teach vs, saying: that wee ought not to be astonished or maruell at vnlooked for chances that light vpon vs, but prepare and conforme our hearts to all euent that may come vnto vs, premeditating and thinking aforehand, that wee are borne to suffer, and that nothing commeth to passe, which ought not to be. Destinie (saith he) leadeth those that are consenting, and draweth gainsayers by force. Neither ought wee, through doubt of that which is to come, to neglect good, heroicall, and farre remooued hopes of excellent things, hauing thus grounded them as wee haue said. For wise and famous personages desirous of honour and glorie, were alwaies of opinion, that they ought to bee entertained and kept in a sound and settled resolution of the minde, because of the varietie of accidents, which daily happen contrary to the common opinions of men: wherein experience teacheth vs, that according to the direction of a good spirit, and the good successe that followeth and accompanieth it, whatsoeuer concerneth the managing of worldly affaires, is changed, and turneth about with the moouing of fortune, if be it lawfull for vs vnder this Heathen word to vnderstand the ordinance of God. Therefore to end our present discourse, wee will note this, that first wee are to defend our selues by the grace of God, with that happie and certaine hope which can neuer deceiue or confound any, being a certaine guide to keepe vs in this long and tedious pilgrimage from going astray out of the way of saluation. Secondly from this, the prop, stay, and comfort of mans life against all miseries and calamities will flow and issue. Thirdly and lastly, wee shall bee stirred vp to all great and noble workes, for the good and common profit of euery one, referring the euent of them to the wonderfull counsell of the providence of God, and receiuing them asiust, good and profitable.

The end of the seuenth daies worke.

The eight daies worke.

Of Patience, and of Impatiencie: of Choler and Wrath. Chap. 29.

ASIR.

IF vertue consisteth in hard matters, if that which commeth nearest to the diuine nature, and is most vnease and least of all vsed of all men, better beseeming a valiant and noble minded man, than any other thing whatsoener; no doubt but patience is the very same thing: whereof the Scripture teacheth vs, that God is the author, and that he putteth it in daily practise among his creatures, deferring the full punishment of their faults by expecting their repentance. Further this vertue so much resembleth fortitude, whereof we discoursed yesterday that we may say with Cicero, that Fortitude is borne of her, or else with her, seeing there is nothing so great and burthensome, which shee cannot easily sustaine and overcome, euen the violentest and most common passions of mans nature, as impatiencie, choler & anger, which commonly procure the vtter ruine of the soule. Therefore let vs (my Companions) begin our daies worke with the handling of the effects of this great vertue of patience, and of the vices that are cleane contrarie vnto it.

Rom. 15. 5.
Exod. 34. 9.

A MANA. Patience (saith Plantus) is a remedie for all griefes. Endure patiently, and blame not that which thou canst not auoide. For he that is able to suffer well, overcommeth. But this vertue is so rarely found among men, that moe will offer themselves to death, than abide griefe patiently. Neuerthelesse, it is the point of a wise man (saith Horace) to set a good face vpon that which must needs be done.

Patience a salue for all fores.

ARAM. By patience (saith Cicero) we must seeke after, that which we cannot obtaine by fauour: and if we endure, all the inconuenience will turne to our profite. But learned men whilest they resist not their perturbations, trouble, and ouerturne with a suddaine vehemencie those things which they had begun with a quiet spirit and minde, throwing downe at one blow whatsoeuer they had builded with long labour. But of thee ACHITO we shall vnderstand the praise and propertie of this vertue of Patience, with the contrary effects thereof, namely, Impatiencie, Choler and Anger, and the meanes to shun and auoide them.

ACHITO. Among all the ancients, the Stoike Philosophers were most zealous and precise obseruers of all points concerning this vertue of patience, which they grounded vpon the fatall cause of necessitie, requiring such exactnesse and perfection thereof in men, that they would haue a noble heart to be no otherwise touched with aduersitie than with prosperitie, nor with sorrowfull things than with ioyfull. For this cause Aristo. said, that vertue onely was to be wished: and therefore that it was all one to be sicke or sound, poore or rich: briefly, that in al other humane and necessary vses of nature, there was no more euill in one kinde, than in another. Whereby it seemeth that these Philosophers delighted in painting out a picture of such patience, as neuer was, nor shall bee among men, except first they should be vnclodhed of all humane nature, or become as blockish and sencelesse as a stone. For so long as man remaineth in this life, hee cannot be voide of affections and perturbations, that draw the soule to care and to provide for the bodie, which continually crieth out against her for feare of griefe, and of wanting that which belongeth vnto it. But it is the dutie of a wise man to moderate all passions in such sort, that in the end reason remaine mistresse. Moreouer wee say that vertue, which is a habite of comelinesse and mediocritie in affections, ought neither to be without her motions, nor yet too much subiect to passions. For the abolishing of desire maketh the soule without motion, and without ioy even in honest things: as on the otherside ouer vehement motions thereof altogether trouble her, and cause her to be as it were beside her selfe. Further, we seeke after the common practise of men, not for that perfection which they wish for, and whereunto they ought to aspire: and wee desire that affection should shew it selfe no otherwise in vertue, than a little shadow of a hidden cloud, or a line in a picture. Therefore true patience which wee ought to imbrace in all things, not as compelled and of necessitie, but cheerefully and as restoring in our welfare, is a moderation and tolerance of our euils, which, albeit we sigh vnder the heavy burthen

Of the Stoicall Patience.

Vertue is neither without affection, nor subiect to affections.

Of true patience.

The definitiō
of patience.

of them, cloth vs in the meane while with a spirituall ioy, that strueth so well and maffeth in such sort the sence of nature which shunneth griefe, that in the end it worketh in vs an affection of piety and godlinesse, ioyned with a free and cheerefull mind, vnder the yoke and obedience of the iust and rightfull will of God, through a certaine expectation of things promised, and causeth vs to iudge impatiency to be contumacie and rebellion to this diuine will, and sufficient of it selfe to make a man to be called wretched. Patience (saith Plato) is a habite that consisteth in sustaining stoutly all labours and griefes for the loue of honestie. The law saith, that it is a very good thing to keepe the tranquillity of our spirit as much as may be in aduersities, and not to complaine of that which is vncertaine: because men know not whether that which is light vpon them be good or euill for them, as also because sorrow can not helpe that which is to come, but rather hindereth the curing of the euill: and lastly, because there is nothing in humane matters, whereof any great account is to be made. But if I must needs support them, my desire and labour is to do it nobly, honestly and couragiously. It skilleth not what we endure, but how we endure it. And then doth patience preuaile most, when we know that whatsoeuer we haue done, was executed of vs for godlinesse sake. The

The fruits of
patience.

conflict of Patience (saith Euripides) is such, that the vanquished is better than the vanquisher. And let vs not thinke that there is any calamity, which cannot be sustained by the nature of man armed with Patience, which is an inuincible tower. Patience, (saith Cicero) is a voluntarie and long suffering of labours, calamities, trauels, and difficult matters, for the loue of honestie and of vertue. And when all things are overthrowne, and counsaile will doe no more good, there is but this one onely remedy, to beare patiently whatsoeuer shall come vpon vs. Patience serueth vs for a meane to attaine to great matters, staying men from fainting in dangers and trauels. By patience whatsoeuer is disordered, may be brought againe to good order, as that wise Emperor, Marcus Aurelius would giue vs to vnderstand, when hee said, That patience had no lesse holpen him in the gouernment of his estate than knowledge. Likewise it is for the most part followed of courtesie and gentlenesse, which make him well liked of that is adorned therewith, and sooner draweth good will, the cause of mans obedience, then force or violence doth. He that is slow to anger (saith the wise, is better than the mighty man, and he that ruleth his owne minde, is better than he that winneth a citie. True patience loueth the afflictions which she suffereth, causing him that possesseth her to giue praise to God in the midst of aduersities, and to submit himselfe to his iudgement when he is pressed with diseases: neither can pouertie keepe him backe from commending highly his bounty and goodnes. To be short, as a pearle sheweth her beautie euen in the midst of a puddle: so a patient man causeth his vertue to appeare in all aduersities. Moreover this patience which we shew in aduersities, mooueth those to compassion and pittie that see vs suffer. Which thing as it greatly comforteth in affliction, so oftentimes it causeth others to reape inestimable benefit, when they behold vs to suffer vniustly. For it serueth to awaken and to strengthen the weake in the knowledge of their duty, that they suffer not themselves to be deceived with the poysonfull sweetnesse of worldly goods and commodities. In a word, the vertue of patience is so necessarie for a good and happy life, that no part or action of mans life

Of impatien-cy, choler, &
wrath.

can be guided to their proper end without her. And as she is a branch of Magnanimity, Fortitude, and greatnes of courage: so Impatiencie is a weakenes and imbecility of a base, vile, and contemptible nature, wherein choler, and in the end wrath, are easily ingendred: which are two very pernicious passions in the soule, and differ nothing from fury (as the elder Cato said) but onely in this, that they continue a lesser time, and this a longer. This is that which Possidonius teacheth vs, saying, that anger is nothing else but a short fury. Aristides called it the inflammation of blood, and an alteration of the heart. Cicero saith, that that which the Latines call Anger, is named of the Gracians desire of reuenge. And Solon being demanded to whom a man fraught with Anger, might be compared, answered: To him that maketh no account of loosing his friends, and careth not although he procure enemies to himselfe. But besides the sayings of all these Sages, experience sufficiently sheweth vs, that Choler and Anger are enemies to all reason: and (as Plutarke saith) are no lesse proude, presumptuous, and vncasie to be guided by another, than a great and mighty tyranny: inso much that a ship given ouer to the mercy of the winds & stormes, would sooner of it selfe receiue a Pilot from without, than a man carried headlong with wrath and choler, would yeeld to the reason and admonition of another. For an angry man (like to those that burne themselves within their owne houses) filleth his soule in such sort with trouble, chafing, and noyse, that he neither seeth nor heareth any thing that would profite him, vnlesse he make provision long time before

fore to succour himselfe with reason through the studie of wisdom, whereby he may be able to ouerthrow his impatiencie and choler, which argue and accompany for the most part a weake and effeminate heart. And that this is true, we see that women are commonly sooner driuen into choler then men: the sicke then the sound: the old than the yoong: all vicious, gluttonous, ielous, vaine-glorious, and ambitious men, than those that vnfaignedly hate vice. Whereby it is euident enough, that choler proceedeth from the infirme and weake part of the soule, and not from the Generosity thereof. Neither doth it make against our saying, to alleadge the opinion of Aristotle, and of all the Peripateticks, who maintained that wee ought to moderate these affections and passions of the soule: but otherwise that they were necessarie to pricke men forward to vertue. Yea Aristotle saide, that choler was as a whetstone to sharpen and set an edge vpon Fortitude, and Generositie. The Accademicks, and Stoicks contend greatly against this opinion, and namely Cicero and Seneca, who said, that for as much as choler is a vice, it cannot be the cause of vertue, seeing they are two contrary things that have nothing common together. And considering that Fortitude proceedeth from an aduised consultation and election of reason, which perfecteth the worke, whereas choler hindereth and troubleth it in such sort, that an angrie man cannot deliberate, it is not possible that it should stand him in any stead in the performance of excellent actions. And this is an invincible reason, because vertue cometh not of vice. Now, this being the ende of all Philosophie for a man to know his vices, and the meanes, how to deliuer himselfe from them, and seeing that the infamie and discommodity which accompany impaciency and choler, cannot but be knowne vnto vs, yea are notwithstanding so common amongst vs, that the perfectest are infected therewith, let vs looke for some helpe and meane to cure our selues thereof. First let vs know, that although men may be moued to wrath and choler for diuerse causes, yet vnto all of them, the opinion of being contemned and despised is commonly ioyned. And therefore the true and soueraigne remedy for this, (that so we may auoide such a cold and slender occasion of entring into choler against our neighbors, altogether vnbecoming the loue we owe them) will be to put from vs as much as may bee, all suspicion of being despised and contemned, or of brauerie and boldnesse, and to lay all the fault either vpon necessitie or negligence, vpon chance, vntowardnesse, lacke of discretion, ignorance, or want of experience which are oftentimes in them that offend vs. This will seeme very strict counsell, and hard to practise, yea hatefull to many of our Frenchmen, chiefly to those of the Nobilitie, who are so curious in the preservation of their honour, with which title they would disguiseth the desire of worldly glory, whereunto they shew themselves so much affectionated. But they tell us sufficiently, that they neuer knew wherein true honour consisteth, which is no more separated from vertue then the shadow from the body: also that they know not what patience is, accounting it rather to be faint-heartednesse and cowardlinesse, than a part and daughter of the vertue of Fortitude and Generosity, yet iudging it a dishonour to a man that is contumeliously handled, not to render the like again. But contrariwise we are to know, that to support & endure wrong and iniurie patiently, and even then when we haue most meanes to reuenge our selues, is a note of a most absolute, noble, and excellent vertue. Yea it becometh a Christian most of all, and such a one as hath those words of the Scripture well engrauen in his heart; Thou shalt not auenge, nor be mindefull of wrong against the children of thy people, but shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe: I am the Lord, vengeance and recompence are mine. But I hope that hereafter we shall discourse of this subiect by it selfe, which deserueth to be handled more largely. Following therefore our matter, we must vnderstand, that choler is bred of a custome to be angry for small things, & afterward becommeth easily afire of sudden wrath, a reuenging bitterness, and an vtractable sharpenesse, making a man froward and furious, disliking every thing. Wherefore a wise man ought presently to oppose the iudgement of reason to every little anger, and to suppress it. This will helpe to make the soule firme and of power to resist and beate backe all fiercenes of choler in matters of greater weight and consequence. For he that nourisheth not his anger in the beginning, nor inflameth it himselfe, may easily auoide, or at least scatter it. Moreover this will be a great meane to overcome our choler if wee obey it not, nor giue credite vnto it from the very first instant wherein it beginneth to appeare, imitating Socrates therein, who, whensoever he felt himselfe somewhat more eagerlie moued against any man than he ought (like to a wise Pilot that getteth himselfe vnder the Lee of some rock) let fall his voice gently, shewing a smiling countenance and more courteous looke, thereby setting himselfe directly against his passion. Besides, it will greatly helpe vs, if when wee are moued with anger, wee stay our tongue a certaine space, and delay a little while

Who are most
giuen to im-patiencie and choler.

Aristotle contrary in opinion.

How impati-
ency and cho-
ler may be cured.

What the wicked iudge
of patience.

Leuit. 19. 18.
Deut. 32. 35.

Whereof cho-
ler is bred.

A good way
to remedie
choler.

The counsaile that Athenodorus
gaue to Augustus.

Eph. 4. 26.

Anorable cu-
stome of the Pythagorans.
Cotis breake
his glasses to auoid occasions of wrath.

Magistrates
ought not to punish any in their choler.

As Theodosius did.

Plato refused to correct his seruant in his anger.

Aure lianus
anger was the cause of his death.

Valentinian
in his anger
brake a veine & died ther-
of

while our owne reuenge. For it is very certaine that a man promiseth, speaketh, and doth many things in his anger, which afterward he wissheth had neuer beene in his thought. Vn- to this fitly agreeth that counsaile which Athenodorus taking his leaue, gaue to Augustus the Emperour to stay the pernicious effects of quicke & readie choler. This Philosopher minding to teach some remedy to be opposed at the very instant when this monarch should feele him selfe overtaken with anger, whereunto he easily suffered himselfe to be carried, willed him to rehearse the foure and twenty letters of the Greeke alphabet before he did any thing in his anger. But knowing, this that it is a special property of mans imbecillity to be stirred vp to anger and to bee troubled, let vs follow that commandement of the Scripture. Not to sin in our anger, neither to let the Sunne goe downe upon our wrath, least wee shew our selues to haue lesse vertue and curtesie than the Ethnike Pythagorian Philosophers, who albeit they were nei- ther kin nor allied, yet kept this custome inuiolable, that if peradventure they were entred into some contention and choler one against another, before the Sunne went downe, they appointed a mee- ting where they imbraced and shooke hands one with another. Further wee haue carefully to a- uoide all occasions which wee know might induce and prouoke vs to anger. As Cotis king of Thracia wisely behaued himselfe, when one brought him a present of many goodly ves- sels curiously made and wrought, but verie brittle, and easie to breake, because they were of glasse. After hee had well recompensed the gift, he brake them all for feare, least through choler, whereunto he knew himselfe subiect, he should bee moued with wrath against any of his seruants that should breake them, and so punish him too seuerely. And of this matter we may also draw a good instruction for all those that are placed in authority aboue others, namely, that they beware least they correct or punish any body in their choler, but onelie when they are void of all vehement passions, considering the fact in it selfe aduisedly, and with quiet and settled senses: knowing that as bodies seeme greater through a miste, so doe faults through choler, which for the most part carrieth Princes headlong to commit execra- ble and cursed cruelties. Among many examples we may note that of the Emperour Theodo- sius, who being moued with anger against those of Thessalonica for a comotion which they made, and for slaying his lieutenant, sent his armie thither, with commandement that they should bee vtterly rooted out: whereupon fiftene thousand were slaine, neither women nor children being spared. Of which fault repenting him, but too late, he made a law afterward, whereby hee willed that the execution of his letters Patents and commandements should bee held in suspence and deferred, thirtie daies after signification and knowledge of them, namely, when any were to be punished more rigorously than of custome he vsed. Neither is it lesse dangerous in an estate that the administration of publike charges should bee commit- ted to such as suffer themselves to be ouer ruled with wrath, seeing there are not in a man- ner fewer matters which are to be winked at and dissembled, than to bee punished and cor- rected. And although Magistrates haue authority and iust cause to punish vices, yet haue they nolicence to shew themselves to be passionated. But this being a matter of Policie, let vs con- tinue our morall instructions, & note that which we reade of Plato, deseruing to be considered of here, who being very angry with a seruant of his for a great fault committed by him, and seeing Xenocrates to come towards him requested him if he were his friend, to correct that seruant of his, because at this present (quoth hee) anger surmounteth my reason. Whereby this wise Philosopher declared sufficiently, that if the first motions are not at all in our pow- er through the imperfection of our nature, yet at the least, reason may serue for a bridle to hinder every naughty execution: teaching vs likewise, that we ought to vse and exercise our power and authoritie ouer others without any extreme passion. Further that wee may haue such imperfections in greater hatred, we are to note that choler hath beene the ouerthrow of many great men, as it was of the Emperour Aurelianus who was endued with notable ver- tues, but otherwise easily moued to anger, whose wrath was such, that their death with whom he was displeased, was the onely remidy to appease it. For being one day incensed a- gainst Mnestheus his Secretary, hee knowing his masters disposition, for the safegard of his life deuised to write (counterfeiting the Emperours hand) in a little scroules the names of the principall capt aines of his army, putting himselfe in the number of those whom hee had ful- ly purposed to put to death, and bearing it vnto them, said, that he saw this bill fall out of the Emperours sleeue. Whereat they beeing astonished, and giuing credite thereunto, resolved with themselves to preuent it, and so falling vpon him, slue him. Moreouer it is well known to every one, that choler may greatly hurt health, whereof men are for the most part desirous enough. It was cause of the Emperour Valentinians death, who through crying out in his cho-

his choler, brake a veine in his necke. From this vice proceedeth another detestable imperfection, which is swearing, a thing directly contrary to a wise mans life, and condemned by the law both of God and man: whereof we might easily be cured by custome, if first we destroyed Impatiencie and Choler, which prouoke blasphemie. The Romanes obserued an ancient decree, which expressly commanded, that when yong men would sweare by the name of some god, they should first goe out of the house wherein they were. Which was a commendable meane both to retaine and keepe them from swearing lightly and vpon the suddaine, also that they might haue good leisure and space to bethinke themselves. This would be very profitable for vs towards the correcting of this vice, the vnumeasurable licence whereof ought to be kept backe and chastised by some better meanes. Yea, it were very expedient and necessary to renew and put in practise that law of good king S. Lewis, that all blasphemers should be marked in the forehead with an hot yron, yea, punished with death; if they would not be corrected otherwise. Such contemners of the name of God ought to learne their lesson of Charilaus the Ethnick and Pagan, who being demanded why the images of the gods in Lacedaemonia were armed, To the end (quoth he) that men might feare to blaspheme the gods, knowing that they are armed to take reuengement. Concluding therefore our present discourse, let vs learne to decke our liues so well with patience, (which is so profitable and necessary to saluation, and to a good and happie life) that we be patient towards all men in all things, to the end we may obey the will of God, and reape the fruite of his promises, as the end of patience is the expectation of things promised. And let vs know, that the learning and vertue of man is knowne by patience, and that he is to be accounted to haue lesse learning and vertue, that hath lesse patience. Further, let vs learnethat the office and duty of a prudent and noble minded man is to winke at many things that befall him, to redresse other things, to hold his peace at some things, and to suffer much, so that he follow reason alwaies, and flye opinion. Lastly, wee are to know, that he which endureth euill patiently, shall know also how afterward he may easily beare prosperity, and that euery christian offereth an acceptable sacrifice to God, when hee yeeldeth vnto him daily thanks in the midst of infinite troubles and vexations: which benefit will worke in vs the vtter ouerthrow of all impatiencie, choler and wrath, sworne enemies to all reason and vertue.

Valentinian in his anger brake a veine and died thereof. Against the infamous vice of swearing. A notable decree of the Romanes.

S. Lewis his law against swearing. Charilaus.

1. Thes. 5. 14. Heb. 10. 36.

Of Meekenes, Clemencie, Mildnes, Gentlenes, and Humanitie. Chap. 30.

A CHI. A Philosopher in a great assemblie of people, taking a lanterne & a candle lighted TOB. At midday, and going into an high place in all their sight, was demanded what he meant to doe withall: I seeke (said he) for a man but can see none, no not one. And truly it is a very rare and excellent thing to finde one that indeede is a Man, which is as much to say, as curteous, or made of meekenes, and gentlenes: for which cause Plato calleth him a ciuill creature, and sociable by nature. Now therefore let vs vnderstand of you my companions, what worthy effects this vertue of meekenes bringeth forth in man.

A SER. Mercie (saith Plato) ought no more to be taken away from the nature of man, than the altar out of the Temple. And every noble heart ought to be so curteous and gracious, that he be reuerenced more than feared of his neighbours.

A MANA. There is no nation so barbarous, which loueth not meekenesse, curtesie, beneuolence, and a thankfull soule: and contrariwise, which hateth and contemneth not proud, wicked, cruell, and vngratefull persons. But it belongeth to thee A RAM to discourse of this matter vnto vs.

A RAM. Sinne hauing depriued man of the perfection of graces, wherewith the image of God in him had enriched and beautified him (namely, with perfect goodnes and holy righteousness,) there remained nothing in his soule but a weake desire to aspire to that soueraigne Good, of which she felt her selfe spoiled. For further confirmation whereof, this incomparable beauty of the visible shape of the body was left vnto him, to the end that in his principall worke, as in a rich picture, he might finde large matter to moue him to contemplate and to admire the excellency and greatnes of his Creator, who is able to set him againe in his former glory & brightnes. By means of this knowledge a man feeleth himselfe effectually moued & touched with the loue of his like, imprinted in euery nature, which desireth vially to shew forth the effects thereof to the profit of many, if it be not wholly depraued and accursed. This loue ought to be so much the greater and more perfect in man, by how much

This word Man is in Latin Homo from whence is deriued Humanitas, which signifieth curtesie or gentlenes.

No nation voide of curtesie.

Reasons to mooue vs to loue our neighbours.

much the neerer he approacheth to the vnderstanding of the incomprehensible secrets of the diuinity. For what thing ought more to stirre vs vp, and to mooue vs with zeale to do good to our neighbours, than the consideration both of their creation after the image of God, whereunto we owe all honour, loue, and obedience, and also of their reestablishment into the same image by his pure grace and mercie: besides the contemplation of the excellent composition and building of this frame of man? These things being well considered in our minds whom shall we take for our enemy, for a stranger, as contemptible, vnworthy, and of no account, seeing this brightnes and grace of God shineth in euery one, and especially in those whom the world despiseth? Moreouer when we know by his word that Man is substituted of God in his place, that we should acknowledge towards him the inestimable benefites which we haue and daily receiue from the helpe and goodnesse of our common Father, who promisseth to accept as done to himselfe, what good thing soeuer we procure to his creatures, so that it be done with a glad some and cheerefull countenance, and with a sweete and courteous kinde of beneficence, voide of arrogancy, and contumely, or reproch; shall any thing

A Temple de dicated to Mercy.

stay vs from exercising towards euery one all duties of humanity? We reade in Macrobius, that long sithence there was a Temple in Athens dedicated to Mercy, into which none was suffered to enter except he were beneficiall and helpfull, and then also with licence from the Senate. In somuch that through a desire which the people had to haue access into it, they studied earnestly to exercise workes of pitie and pietie. Yea, the greatest reproch which an Athenian could vtter to his neighbour, was to hit him in the teeth, that hee was neuer in the Academie of the Philosophers, nor in the Temple of Mercy, girding him by this onely reproch with two shamefull things, the one of ignorance and want of prudence, the other of cruelty and inhumanity. Now if among those of old time the only naturall seed of the loue of their like, which also is seene in beasts, was so strong and powerfull that it brought forth in them (notwithstanding they were destitute of the heavenly light) fruits worthy of perpetual memory, as they that had nothing in greater estimation than to shew themselves meeke, gentle, courteous, helpfull and gracious towards others, even towards their enemies: what ought they to do, that say they are all members of that one head, who recommendeth so expressly vnto them meekenes, mildnes, gentlenesse, grace, clemency, mercy, good will, compassion, and euery good affection towards their neighbor? All which things are comprehended vnder this onely sacred word of Charity, which is the indissoluble band of God with vs, whereby we are inflamed with the loue of him for that which we owe vnto him, and thereby also are induced to loue our neighbors for the loue of God. But let vs consider how the Ancients hauing but the shadow of this perfect Charity, praised and esteemed this vertue of Meeknesse, from which they knew how to drawe so many good commodities for the profit and succour of euery one, that after we may note here certaine woorthy examples to stirre vs vp so much the more vnto our duty. Meeknesse (saith Plato) is a vertue that belongeth to the couragious part of the soule, whereby we are hardly mooued to anger. Her office and duty is to be able to support and endure patiently those crimes that are laid vpon her, not to suffer her selfe to be hastily carried to reuenge, nor to be too easily stirred to wrath, but to make him that possesseth her, mild, gracious, and of a staied and settled minde. Meekenesse and gentlenesse (as he saith else where) is that vertue whereby a man easily appeaseth the motions and instigations of the soule caused by choler, and it standeth him in steade of a moderate temperance of the spirit, decking him with mildnes & courtesie, which draweth vnto him the loue of strangers, and good seruice of his owne. Whereby it appeareth, that whosoever is milde and courteous to others, receiue much more profit and honor than those whom he honoreth. They are not to be credited (saith Cicero) who say that a man must vse cruelty towards his enemies, esteeming that to be an act proper to a noble and couragious man. For nothing is more commendable or worthy a great and excellent man, than meeknesse and clemency. It seemeth also that liberality, beneficence, iustice, fidelity, and many other good deeds, wherof many men taste, and which procure to a man greater good will of euery one, are proper to mildnes and meekenes, called by an auuncient man the characters of an holy soule, which neuer suffer innocency to be oppressed, and as Chilo saide, which leade noble hearts slowly to the feasts of their friends, but speedily to the succouring of them in their calamities. This vertue of meekenes is truly most necessary for a valiant man. For without it he should be in danger to commit some actions which might be iudged cruell. And seeing that a noble minded man commeth neere to the diuine nature, he must resemble it as much as may be in gentlenesse and clemency which adorneth and honoureth those especially that are life

What Charity is.

The definitio & effects of meekenesse.

vp

vp in dignitie, and haue power to correct others. True it is also, that they are deceived that commend, and as it were adore the bounty of great men and Magistrates, who of a certaine simplicitie without prudence, shew themselves gracious gentle, and courteous towards all men. Which is no lesse pernicious to an Estate, than is the severity and cruelty of others. For of this ouer great lenity, among many other inconveniences, an impunity of the wicked is bred, and the sufferance of one fault quickly draweth on another. Therefore the mildnesse of those that haue power and authoritie, ought to be accompanied with severity, their clemency mingled with rigour, and their facilitie with austeritie. This is that which Plato learnedly teacheth vs, saying: That the noble and strong man must bee courageous and gracious, that hee may both chastise the wicked, and also pardon when time requireth. And as for those offences which may bee healed, hee must thinke that no man is willingly vnioist. Therefore Cicero saith, that it is the property of a noble minded man simply to punish those that are most in fault, and the authors of euill, but to saue the multitude. And thus the rigour of discipline directing meekenesse, and meekenesse directing rigour, the one will set foorth and commend the other: so that neither rigour shall bee rigorous, nor gentlenesse dissolute. By the learned sentences of these Philosophers, it is very euident, that the vertue of meekenesse is not onely a part of Fortitude, which cannot bee perfect without it, but hath also some particular coniunction with all the other vertues, yea is as it were the seede of them, and induceth men to practise all dutie towards their neighbours. But because the order of our discourses will offer vs matter and occasion to intreat particularly hereafter of iustice, and of reuenge of wrongs and iniuries which a man receiue of his enemy, as also of other vertues here briefly mentioned, we will now come to certaine notable examples of meekenesse, gentlenesse, mildnesse, and goodnesse of nature. The first that commeth to my remembrance is Philip king of Macedonia, who giueth place to none in the perfection of these gifts and graces. When it was tolde this good Prince, that one Nicanor did openly speake ill of his maiesty, his counsellors being of opinion that hee was to be punished with death: I suppose (quoth he to them) that hee is a good man. It were better to search whether the fault commeth not from vs. And after hee vnderstood that the said Nicanor was a needie fellow, and complained that the king neuer succored him in his necessity, hee sent him a rich present. Whereupon afterward it was told Philip, that this Nicanor went vp and downe speaking much good of him. I see well (said hee then to his counsellors) that I am a better Physician for backbiting than you are, and that it is in my power to cause either good or euill to be spoken of me. The good disposition of Antigonus king of Macedonia, commeth in here not vnfitly vpon the like occasion. For hearing certaine souldiers speake ill of him hard by his tent, who thought not that the king could ouer-heare them, he shewed himselfe, vttering these onely words without farther hurting them: Good Lord could you not goe further off to speake ill of me? And to say truth, such gifts and graces become a noble Prince very well: yea, he cannot more worthily and more befitting himselfe giue place to any wrongs, than to those that are done to his owne person. As contrariwise those men are vnworthy their scepters, who cruelly reuenge their owne iniuries, and pardon such as are done to others, yea such faults as are directly against the honour of God. A prince well instructed in vertue (saith Xenophon in his Cyropædia) ought so to behaue himselfe towards his enemy, as to thinke and consider that at some time or other hee may bee his friend. Was there euer Monarch more feared of his enemies than Alexander the Great, inuincible in all things hee tooke in hand, in so much that hee would not onely force all humane powers, but also times and places themselves, and yet who hath left greater proofes of meekenesse and curtesie than hee? As he was on his voyage vnder taken for the conquest of the Indians, Taxiles a king of those countries came and desired him that they might not warre one against another. If thou (said this king vnto him) art lesse than I, receive benefits: if greater, I will take them of thee. Alexander greatly admiring and commending the grauitie and courteous speech of this Indian, answered thus: At the least wee must fight and contend for this: namely, whether of vs twaine shall be most beneficiall to his Companion: so loath was this noble Monarch to giue place to another in goodnesse, mildnesse, and curtesie. Hereof he gaue a great argument, after hee had vanquished Porus (a very valiant Prince) of whom demanding, how he would bee entertained of him, this king answered, Royally. Neither would he giue him any other answer, albeit Alexander vrged him thereunto. For he said that all was contained vnder that word. As indeed the Monarch shewed that he was nothing ignorant thereof. For he did not onely restore his kingdome vnto him, but enlarged it also, wherein he surmounted his victorie, and

A mediocrity must be kept betweene mildnes and cruelty.

Philip a prince of a good and milde nature.

Antigonus.

Oh that Princes would consider this.

Alexander.

A commendable combat.

Bessus cruelly
put to death
for killing Darius.

Julius Caesar.

Aurelius.

Dion.

Al priuate reuenge cometh
of frailtie.

Lycurgus.

Lewes the 12

procured to himselfe as much renoune by his clemency, as by his valure. Had hee euer any greater enemie than Darius vanquished and subdued by him? And yet when he saw himselfe letted from vsing towards him any bounty woorthie his greatnesse, because Bessus one of his captaines had slaine him, hee was so displeased therewith, that he caused the murderer to bee punished (albeit he was one of his familiar friends) with a most cruell death, causing him to bee torne asunder with two great trees bowed downe by maine strength one against another, vnto each of which a part of Bessus his body was fastened. Then the trees being suffered to returne backe againe to their first nature, with their vehement force rent asunder the body of this poore and miserable wretch. Julius Caesar was of such a courteous disposition, that hauing conquered Pompey and all his enemies, he wrote to his friendes in Rome, that the greatest and most pleasant fruit which he gathered of his victory, consisted in sauing daily the liues of some of his countrey men who had borne armes against him: as in truth he did so. And for a great prooffe of his meekenes, and gentlenes, that speech may serue, which he vttered when he vnderstood that Cato retiring into the towne of Vtica after the losse of the battell had killed himselfe. O Cato (said this monarch, being then very peniue) I enuy thee this thy death, seeing thou hast enuiued me the glory of sauing thy life. I neuer yet denied clemencie (said that good Emperor Marcus Aurelius) to him that demanded of mee, much lesse haue I euill entreated or offered dishonor to anie that trusted in me. Neither can anie victorie be called a true and perfect victorie, but that which carrieth with it some clemencie. To overcome is a humane thing, but to pardon, is diuine. Hereof it is (said the same vertuous Prince) that we esteeme the greatnes of the immortall gods not so much for the punishment, as for the mercy which they vse. The clemencie and bountie of Dion the Syracusan is worthy of perpetuall memorie. For hauing brought to ruine the tyranny of Dionysius the yonger, and recovered the liberty of his countrey, one of his greatest enemies named Heraclides, beeing a very pernicious fellow, fell into his hands: whereupon all his friends gaue him counsell to put him to death. Vnto which Dion wisely answered, that other captaines and heades of armies vsed commonly to imploy most of their studie in the exercise of armes and of warre, but as for himselfe hee had long since studied and learned in the schooles of the Vniuersitie to overcome anger, enuie, and euery euill affection and will: the prooffe whereof consisted not onely in behauing himselfe well towards his friends, and towards good men, but also in pardoning, and in the exercise of gentlenesse and humanitie towards his enemies, so that hee had rather excell Heraclides in bountie and courtesie, than in power and worldly glorie. And although (quoth hee) mens lawes auouch it to bee more iust, to reuenge an iniurie receiued, than to offer it vnto another, yet nature teacheth vs, that both the one and the other proceede of the same imbecillitie: and howsoeuer that man is hardly altered, who hath gotten an habite of wickednesse, yet are there few men of so brutish and vntamed a nature, or so sauage in reclaiming that their peruersenesse cannot in the end be well overcome by beneficence, when they see that men returne good turnes againe and againe into their bosome. By these learned discourses it appeareth that Dion forgave Heraclides, and bestowed vpon him great benefits. Lycurgus the reformer of the Lacedæmonian estate, by whose meanes that common-wealth so long time flourished, doth yet passe all those before alleadged through the goodnesse and mildnesse of his gentle nature. This graue and gracious personage hauing receiued such a blow with a staffe, that one of his eyes was put out in a sedition stirred vp against him in the citie, because of the rigour of those lawes which hee had established there, after the sedition was appeased, had the offender deliuered into his hands to punish him as hee thought good. But hee not hurting or displeasing him at all, kept him in his house, and instructed him in all vertue and good discipline, and within the yeares end hee brought him forth into the publike assembly, beeing no lesse vertuous and well nurtured than before hee was vicious: vsing these words vnto the people: Behold I restore him vnto you, beeing milde gracious and fit to doe you seruice whom ye gaue to mee proud, outragious and dissolute. O act befeeming the soule of a Christian rather than of an Ethnike: which ought to make them greatly ashamed, who for the least wrong receiued of another, would not sticke to slaine not one man onely, but a thousand, yea tenne thousand rather than their worldly honour should bee hurt or touched: which pretence of honour they vse very often to colour their brutishnesse withall. Now leauing here the auncients of whome wee haue a million of testimonies in the reading of histories, I thinke we shall doe well to propound here vnto our Princes being too much inclined to reuenge iniuries, the clemency of king Lewes the 12. who succeeding

Charles

Charles the eight in the kingdome, would neuer reuenge himselfe of any outrage or iniurie done vnto him, even then when he was but Duke of Orleance. In so much that being incited by some to punish one that was his great enemie during the life of his predecessor, he answered: That it would not becom a king of France to goe about to reuenge iniuries offered to a Duke of Orleance. Neither ought we to let passe in silence the goodnesse and clemencie of that great king Francis, who going in person to chastise the rebellion of the Rochelers, forgave them, and put not one to death, saying: That albeit he had no lesse occasion to reuenge this iniurie than the Emperour Charles, who punished very cruelly those of Gaunt, yet he had rather increase his praises by preserving than by destroying his subiects. After his example king Henry the 2. having given in commission to the Duke of Montmorencie Constable to chastise the rebellion of the countrey of Guyen, and especially the inhabitants of Burdeaux, afterward gaue out a generall absolution, and forgave the racing of the Town-house, the paiment of two hundred thousand pounds, and the defraying of the charges of the armie wherein they were condemned. And truly as it belongeth to the Sunne to lighten the earth with his beames: so it appertaineth to the vertue of a prince to haue compassion vpon the miserable. Yea so many, as stand in neede of mercy, and beeing worthy thereof craue for it, ought to finde harbour in the haven of his excellency. Now to come to the end of our present discourse, if by so many examples which we haue touched, and innumerable others, of which histories are plentiful, wee may note amongst the famous, noble and courageous men of olde time, such effects of meeknesse, gentlenesse, bountie, mildnesse, clemency and humanitie towards their enemies, no doubt but they endeouored to doe much more for their friends, brethren and countrimen, for whose safety they feared not many times to die, as heretofore wee haue seene examples thereof, and may see more hereafter. And how much lesse would they haue failed to succour them in all other duties and charitable offices? So that if wee be men and not monsters in nature, let vs learne what are the fruits not onely of true Christians, but also of true humanitie, and of nature not beeing wholly depraued and corrupted: to the end that framing our manners, milde, gentle, and gracious, to the succour, benefite, and profite of euery one, and following the steppes and traces of the vertue of Fortitude and Magnanimitie, which is neuer churlish, idle or proude; wee may liue a happy life directly to her proper end, expecting our renewing in that life which is immortall and euerlasting.

Henrie the 2.

Of Good and Ill hap. Chap. 31.

AR. AM. THere hath beene alwaies men of great humane learning, but voide of the sincere knowledge of the truth, that haue maintained one of these two opinions: some, That all things were gouerned by nature: others, that they were ruled by fortune. They that acknowledge nature for the first cause of all things did attribute vnto her a constellation, which through the strength and efficacie of the starres gouerned the counsell & reason of men. The other sort acknowledging fortune, maintained that all things were done at aduenture and by chance. Now albeit there are too many at this day that follow this error, yet is it so absurd a thing, that in the writings of Ethniks and Pagans, a thousand inuincible reasons are found of sufficient force to conuince such opinions of meere lying and over-great sottishnesse, and to constraîne those that are most impudent and shamelesse to acknowledge an infinite almighty power to be the Creator of nature, and of all things mouing therein, and to dispose and order them with an eternall and euerlasting providence. True it is, that I would not absolutely deny the marvellous effects which many haue noted in heavenly bodiesthroughout nature: neuertheless I hold this for certaine, that as all their vertue dependeth of one only God, so hee withdraweth from them his power when and as soone as it pleaseth him. Of this I inferre, that they greatly deceiue themselves, who thinke that the seeking out of the starres, and of their secret vertues diminisheth any thing from the greatnesse and power of God: seeing that contrariwise his maiestie is much more famous and wonderfull in doing such great things by his creatures, as if hee did them himselfe without any meane. Now that which I haue touched here, my companions, is, not to offer any occasion to discourse of the Mathematicks, or of any part thereof, which would be to depart out of those bounds which we appointed to our Academy. But seeing nothing is so common

The Stoicks.

The Epicures

amongst vs to vse, or rather to abuse these words of Good and ill hap, by attributing vnto them some power and vertue ouer our doings: inso much that wee commonly say there is nothing but good or ill lucke in this world, I thinke it will not be without fruit to consider narrowly that we ought to thinke of these words, and wherein we are to seeke and desire good hap, & wherein to feare and fly ill lucke. Now therefore let vs be instructed of you touching this matter.

Wherin good and ill hap consist.

Who is happy in Socrates
iudgement.

The cause
why Amasis
forsook his al liance with Polycrates.

An ordinarie imperfection
in man.

A meanes to auoid the griefe of our misery.

Another im
perfection.

A CHITO B. Good hap consisteth in that contentation which proceedeth from the perfection of the subiect thereof, being adorned with a perfect habite and entire possession of all kind of Good, in the priuation whereof all ill hap consisteth. This cannot be verified of the passions and affections of men, nor of their worldly affaires, which are alwaies intermingled with diuerse and sundry accidents, turning one while on this manner, by and by after another, and carrying the soule continually vp and downe with these two perturbations, Desire and Griefe. Therefore if there be a happy man in the world (said Socrates) it is he that hath a pure and cleane soule, and a conscience defiled with no thing. For the mysteries of God may be seene and beheld of him onely.

A S E R. A temperate and constant man that knoweth how to moderate feare, anger, excessive ioy, and vnbrideled desire, is very happy: but he that placeth other fading Goods in his felicity, shall neuer haue a quiet mind. Let vs then heare of A M A N A, wherein wee ought to iudge that happines or unhappines consisteth.

A M A N A. The continuall alteration and sudden change of one estate into another cleane contrary, which might alwaies be noted in the nature, disposition, and events of mens actions, counsels and desires, gaue occasion to some of the ancient Philosophers to thinke the sicke more happy than the sound: because (said they) sicke folkes looke for health, where as the healthy expect sicknes. For this very consideration it seemeth that Amasis, almost the last of those kings that reigned peaceable in Egypt, shooke off all the alliance and league with Polycrates king of Samos, who was so happy in worldly respects, that do what he could, yet could he not know what sorrow meant, but all things fell out vnto him better than hee desired. For prooffe whereof may serue that which happened vnto him, after he had cast into the sea a ring of great value which he loued exceedingly. Now, although he did so of purpose, to the end he might tast of some sorrow and griefe, yet he found it quickly againe in the belly of a fish taken by Fisher men, and bought for his kitchen. Whereupon this wise Egyptian iudged it a thing altogether impossible, but that some great misery was to follow hard at the heeles of so great happines: and therefore he would not be partaker thereof, as of necessitie he should haue beene, if he had continued still that league which before was betwixt them. Neither was Amasis any thing deceiued in his opinion. For within a while after Polycrates was deprived of his kingdom, and shamefully hanged, seruing for a common and notable example of the instability and variableness of mans estate, as also to shew that it is a very absurd thing to place happines in so vacertaine felicity. And yet among infinite imperfections borne with man, this is common in him, to loose quickly the remembrance of a benefit received, but to retaine a long time the memory of a calamitie fallen vpon him. Which is the cause that he alwaies suppoeth his mishaps to bee without comparison greater than all the good happe that he can haue: so that he complaineth continually of his miseries and calamities, not remembring the innumerable benefits which are daily offered and presented vnto him from the grace and bountifullnesse of God. Notwithstanding, if all men (as Socrates said) as well as rich as poore, brought their mishaps, and laid them in comming together, and if they were in such sort diuided, that euery one might haue an equall portion, then should it be seene, that many who thinke themselves overcharged and oppressed, would with all their hearts take againe vnto them their fortune, and be contented withall. Wouldst thou (said Democritus) auoid the griefe of thy miserie? Behold the life of the afflicted, and by the comparison thereof with thine thou shalt see that thou hast cause to thinke thy selfe very happy. Hee that will measure his burthen (saith Martiall) may well beare it. Now, with this common complaint in men of their estate and condition, this custome also is ioyned to lay the cause of that which they suffer vpon cruell and intolerable destiny, accusing that to accuse their owne fault.

Where-

Wherefore we cannot more aptly compare them than to blinde folks, who are angry, and oftentimes call them blinde that vnawares doe meete and iuſle them. But if wee deſire to cure our ſoules of ſo many miſerable paſſions, which deprive vs of true reſt and tranquillitie neceſſary for a happie life, let vs be carefull to learne how to diſcerne true happineſſe from miſhap, that we may reioyce in that which is good, and as readily giue thanks to the Author thereof, as naturally, through a falſe opinion which we haue of euill, we ſuſtaine humane miſeries and croſſes vnpatiently. Firſt then let vs heare the ſundry and notable opinions of many ancient men touching good and ill hap. If thou knoweſt all that ought to be knowne in all things (ſaid Pythagoras) thou art happy. Let them be accounted very happy (ſaid Homer) to whom Fortune hath equally weighed the good with the euill. The greateſt miſerie of all (ſaid Bias) is, not to be able to beare miſery. That man is happy (ſaid Dionyſius the elder) that hath learned from his youth to be vnhappy. For he will beare the yoke better wherunto he hath bene ſubiect and accuſtomed of long time. Demetrius, ſurnamed the Beſieger, ſaid, that hee was indged none more vnhappy than hee but neuer taſted of aduerſity, as if he would haue ſaid that it was a ſure argument, that Fortune indged him to be ſo baſe and abiect, that he deſerued not that ſhe ſhould buſie her ſelfe about him. That man (ſaith Cicero) is very happy, who thinketh that no humane matters, how grieuous ſoeuer they may be, are intollerable or ought to diſcourage him: iudging alſo nothing ſo excellent, whereby hee ſhould bee moued to reioyce in ſuch ſort, that his heart be puffed and liſt vp thereby. Yea, hee is very happy, who ſitly and conueniently behaueth himſelfe in all things neceſſary for him. Nothing is euill (ſaith Plutarke) that is neceſſary. By which word, Neceſſary, both he and Cicero vnderſtand whatſoeuer commeth to a wiſe man by fatall deſtiny: becauſe he beareth it patiently, as that which cannot bee auoided, thereby increaſing his vertue ſo much the more, and ſo no euill can come to a good man. Solon drawing neerer to the truth of ſincere happines, ſaid, that it conſiſted in good life and death: and that to indge them happy that are alive, conſidering the danger of ſo many alterations wherein they are, were all one, as if a man ſhould be fore hand appoint the reward of the victorie for one that is yet fighting, not being ſure that hee ſhould ouercome. Socrates ſpeaking rather with a diuine than a humane ſpirit, ſaide, that when we ſhall be deliuered from this body wherein our ſoule is incloſed as an oſter in his ſhell, we may then be happy, but not ſooner: and that felicity cannot be obtained in this life, but that we muſt hope to enioy it perfectly in the other life, as well for our vertues, as by the grace and mercy of God. Not the rich (ſaid Plato) but the wiſe and prudent auoide miſery. They that thinke (ſaith Ariſtotle) that eternall goods are the cauſe of happineſſe, deceiue themſelues no leſſe than if they ſuppoſed, that cunning playing on the harpe came from the inſtrument, and not from art: but we muſt ſeek for it in the good and quiet eſtate of the ſoule. For as we ſay not that a body is perfect becauſe it is richly arraid, but rather becauſe it is well framed and healthfull: ſo a ſoule well inſtructed, is the cauſe that both hir ſelfe and the body wherein ſhee is incloſed, are happy: which cannot be verified of a man becauſe hee is rich in gold and ſiluer. When I conſider all the aboue named wiſe opinions of theſe Erbnikes and Pagans, I cannot ſufficiently maruell at the ignorance and blockiſhnes of many in our age touching Good and ill hap, becauſe they labour to make theſe words priuate, and to tie them to the ſucceſſe of their affections in worldly matters: which if they fall out according to their deſire and liking, behold preſently they are raiſhed with extreme ioy, boaiſting of themſelues, that they are moſt happy. But contrariwiſe, if they miſſe of their intents, by and by they deſpaire, and thinke themſelues the vnhappyeſt men in the world. Doe we not alſo ſee that moſt men iudge them happy that poſſeſſe riches, pleaſure, delight, glory and honour: and thoſe men miſerable that want, eſpecially if after they had abundance, they loſe it by ſome miſhap, the cauſe whereof they commonly attribute either to good or ill lucke, which they ſay ruleth all humane affaires? We reade that Apollonius Tbianus hauing trauelled ouer all Asia, Africke and Europe, ſaid that of two things wherat he maruelled moſt in all the world, the firſt was, that he alwaies ſaw the proud man command the humble, the quarrellous the quiet, the tyrant the iuſt, the cruell the pittifull, the coward the hardie, the ignorant the ſkilful, & the greateſt theeuſ hang the innocent. But in the meane while who may doubt whether of theſe were the happyeſt: that the good were not rather than the wicked? If happines according to the Ancients, and to the truth, be perfected in good things, then it is certaine, that whoſoeuer enioyeth al good things ſhall be perfectly happy. Now nothing can be called good but that which is profitable, and contrary to euill: ſo that whatſoeuer may as ſoone be euill as good, ought not to be called good. Moreover, it muſt be the poſſeſſion of ſome firme, ſtedfaſt, & permanent Good that maketh a man happy. For nothing ought to waxe old, to periſh or decay of thoſe things wherein a happy life conſiſteth, ſeeing he that feareth to loſe them cannot be ſaid to liue quietly. Therefore neither beauty, nor ſtrength, and diſpoſition of body, neither riches, glorie, honour

Notable opinions of good & ill hap.

Solon ſaid that happines conſiſted in a good life and death.

The doctrine of Socrates & of the papists is all one touching the hope of life and death.

The common opinion of men concerning happines & unhappines

Wherat Apollonius maruelled moſt.

Notable reaſons to ſhew that no worldly thing can be called good and that happines cannot be perfected by any ſuch thing.

Wherein true
happines con-
sisteth.

Who are vn-
happie.

The happines
of man commeth from within him.

Our life is compared to
table-play.

Alexander & Crates opposed one against another.

honor or pleasure can be truly called Goods, seeing oftentimes they are the cause of so many evils, waxe old, and vanish away many times as soon as a man hath received them; and lastly, worke in vs an vn-satiabie desire of them. How many men are there to whom all these men haue bene the occasion of euill? And how can we call that good which being possessed, and that in abundance, cannot yet keepe the owner thereof from being vnhappy and miserable? Wherefore we may say, that happines cannot be perfected by the possession of humane and mortall things, neither vn-happinesse through the want of them, but that the true felicity which we ought to desire in this world, consisteth in the goodnes of the soule, nourished in the hope of that vn-speakable and euerlasting happines, which is promised and assured vnto it in the second life. And so we say, that none are vnhappy but they, who by reason of their peruerfenes, feeble their conscience a doubting of the expectation of eternall promises: as also they that giue ouer themselves to vice, whose nature is to corrupt, destroy, and infect with the venome that is alwaies about it, all things whereof it taketh hold. As for the common miseries of mans life, they cannot in any sort make him vnhappy, whose naturall disposition and manners being framed and decked with vertue, are able to giue and to impart to every condition of his life, whether it be poore or rich, prosperous or aduerse, honorable or contemptible; happines, ioy, pleasure and contentation, which flowe in his soule abundantly from that fountaine and liuely spring which Philosophie hath discovered vnto him in the fertile field of Graces and Sciences, whereby he enioyeth true tranquility and rest of spirit, as much as a man may haue in this mortall life, moderating the perturbations of his soule, and commanding ouer the vn-pure affections of the flesh. And then as the shoo turneth with the fashion of the foote, and not contrary wise, so the inward disposition of a wise and moderate man causeth him to leade a life like vnto the same, that is, milde, peaceable and quiet, beeing neuer carried away with vn-reasonable passions, because she neuer enioyeth or reioiceth immoderately in that which she hath, but useth well that which is put into her hand, without feare or repining if it be taken away: following therein in the saying of Democritus, that whosoener mindeth to liue alwaies happily, must propound to himselfe and desire things possible, and bee content with things present. Therefore seeing the fountaine of all felicity and contentation in this life is within vs, let vs cure and cleanse diligently all perturbations which seek to hinder the tranquility of our spirits, to the end that externall things which come from without vs against our will and expectation, may seeme vnto vs friendly and familiar after wee know how to vse them well. Plato compared our life to table-play, wherein both the dice must chance well, and the plaier must vse that well which the dice shall cast. Now of these two points the euent and lotte of the Dice is not in our power, but to receiue mildly and moderately that which falleth vnto vs, and to dispose every thing in that place where it may either profit most if it be good, or doe least hurt if it be bad, that is in our power, and belongeth to our duty if we be wise men. Fortune (saith Plutarch) may well cast mee into sicknes, take away my goods, bring me in disgrace with the people: but shee cannot make him wicked, a coward, slothfull, base minded or enuious, that is honest, valiant, and noble minded; nor take from him his settled and temperate disposition of prudence, which maketh him to iudge, that no tedious, grievous or troublesome thing can befall him. For being grounded, not vpon vanishing goods, but vpon philosophicall sententes, and firme discourses of reason, he may say, I haue preuented thee fortune, I haue closed vp al thy chances, & stopped the waies of entrance in vpon me: & so led a ioyfull life as long as vertue, and that part which is proper to man are strongest. And if peradventure some great inconuenience happen vnto him against all hope, which humane power is not able to ouercome, then with ioy of spirit hee considereth that the haven of safety is at hand, wherein hee may saue himselfe by swimming out of the body as out of a Skiffe that leadeth, departing boldly and without feare from the miseries of the world, that he may enioy absolute and perfect happines. Alexander the Great, hauing vnder his dominion more than halfe the world, when he heard the Philosopher Anaxarchus dispute and maintain that there was innumerable worlds, he began to weep saying, Haue I not good cause to be sorrowfull and to mourne, if there be an infinite number of worlds, seeing as yet I haue not bin able to make my selfe Lord of one? But Crates the Philosopher being brought vp in the schoole of wisdom, and hauing in stead of all wealth but an old cloke and a scrip, neuer wept in all his life, but was alwaies seene merry, and passing ouer his daies cheerfully. By which two kinds of life contrary one to another, it appeareth sufficiently that it is within our selues, and not in outward things, wherein we must seeke for the foundation of a certaine ioy, which is watered and flourisheth in strength by the remembrance of good and vertuous actions actions proceeding from the soule guided by right knowledge and reason. Homer bringeth in Agamemnon complaining greatly because hee was to commaund so great a part of the world, as if he had an intollerable burthen vpon his shoulders. Whereas Diogenes when hee was to be sold for a slave, lying all along, mocked the Sergeant that cried him to sale, and would not rise vp when he commanded him, but scoffingly said vnto him, If thou wert to sell a fish, wouldest thou make it arise? Crie this rather, that if any man want a master, he should buy me: for I can serue his turne well. Whereby we may fitly note this, that all the happinesse, rest, and contentation of man dependeth of vertue onely, and not of worldly greatnesse and glorie. For this reason the selfe same Diogenes beholding a stranger come from Lacedemonia, more curiously decked on a festiuall day than he was wont, said vnto him: What? Doth not an honest man thinke that every day is festiuall vnto him? And truly there is nothing that ought to moue vs so much to shew all outward signes of ioy, or that breederh such fereuitie and calmenes against the tempestuous waues of humane miseries and calamities, than to haue the soule pure and cleane from all wicked deeds, wils, and counsels, and the manners vndefiled, not troubled or infected with any vice. For then acknowledging the estate of mortall and corruptible things, we iudge them vnworthy the care of our soules, that we may wholly lift them vp to the contemplation of heavenly & eternall things, wherein our happinesse and perfect felicitie consisteth. Hereby we learne, that in the second life only we are to seeke for and to expect the fruition of true happinesse, which can neuer increase or be diminished. For as no man can make a line straighter than that which is straight, and as nothing is more iust than that which is iust: so he that is happie can not be more happy. Otherwise vntill a man had gotten all that might be had, his desires would neuer be settled, and so no man should be called happie. But felicitie is perfect of it selfe. Cicero knew it well enough, when hee said: That no man standeth in feare of great things, could be happie: and in that respect no man liuing can be so, but to speake in deede of a happie life, that is it which is perfect and absolute. To the end therefore that we may reape some profite by our present discourse, let vs neuer thinke that any man may be called happie or unhappie, because he is aduanced or disgraced, with honours, goods, and worldly commodities, or because he is partaker either of prosperitie or aduersitie, throughout his whole life. But he onely ought to be esteemed happy in this world, that knoweth in rest and quietnesse of soule how to vse both estates, and neuer suffereth himselfe to be carried away or troubled with vn-cleane desires, but with all his heart seeketh for the possession of a firme, stedfast, and abiding Good, being assured, as we said, that not one of those things wherein a happie life consisteth shall waxe olde, perith, or fall to decay. To conclude, he is happy that sheweth in all his workes and actions of this life a paterne of honesty and vertue, being moderate in prosperitie, and constant in aduersitie. A man thus affected and disposed, will behaue himselfe without reproofe in the time present, will call to minde with ioy and pleasure the time past, and will boldly and without distrust draw neere to the time to come, even with a cheerefull and ioyfull hope of better things, and with a stedfast expectation of that vnspokeable and endlesse happines, which is prepared for the elect.

Agamemnon.

Diogenes.

Common.

Where we must seeke for true happines.

Who is happy in this world.

Agamemnon.

Of Prosperitie and Aduersitie. Chap. 32.

AMA- Being in our former discourse entred into the diuers and contrary effects which the nature and condition of worldly affaires draw with them, whereof euery one in his particular place may daily haue good and sufficient testimonies: and seeing through the malice and corruption of our age, all things are at that point, as if they meant to lay more hard and difficult crosses vpon vs to sustaine, I thinke we shall not depart from our matter, if we seeke for some instruction whereby to gouerne our selues prudently in prosperitie and in aduersitie, considering the effects of both of the one and the other, to the end we may auoide those that are most pernicious, and retaine still with vs that constancie and worthinesse that is required in the vertue of Fortitude, which teacheth a man how hee ought to behaue himselfe nobly in euery estate and condition of life. For as gold transfigured by the workeman, now into one fashion, and then into another, is transformed into sundrie kindes of ornaments, and yet remaineth alwaies that which it is, without any alteration of substance: so it behooueth a wise and noble minded man to continue alwaies the same in things that are contrarie and diuers, without any alteration and change of his constancie and vertue. But I leaue the discourse of this matter to you my Companions.

A pretie comparison.

A similitude. ARAM. As a man (saith Scipio) deliuereth ouer his horses, (which because they haue beene in many skirmishes, are become resty, furious, and untractable) to the yomen of his horses, to bring them into good order againe: so men that are growne to be unruly through prosperitie, must be brought as it were to a round circle, that they may consider of the inconstancy of worldly things, and of the variablenesse of wretched fortune.

A similitude. ACHITO B. In prosperitie (saith Euripides) bee not lift up too much, and in aduersitie hope the best alwaies. And as in a fire (saith Socrates) it is good to behold a cleare brightnesse: so is a moderate soule in felicitie. But let vs heare A SER: who will handle that which here is propounded more at large.

Common effects of the fraile nature of man.

Prosperitie more hurtfull than aduersity

Plato was requested by the Cyrenians to giue them law.

A SER. As men prouide bulwarks and banks against a river that vseth to overflow: so he that desireth to liue happily, must fortifie himselfe with powerfull and conuenient vertues, to resist the hurtfull assaults which the vnlooked for successe of humane affaires make vpon him continually, both in prosperitie and in aduersity. For questionlesse nothing is hardlier kept within compasse, than hee that hath all things according to his hearts desire: neither is any thing so much cast downe, or sooner discouraged than the same man, when hee is afflicted and misseth of his purpose. All minds are not resolute and constant enough from slipping beside themselves, and beyond the limits of reason, neither in great prosperitie, which puffeth and lifteth vp mens hearts, especially theirs that are base by nature; nor yet in vnlooked for aduersitie, which through the heauy burthen thereof oftentimes astonisheth and amazeth them that are thought to be best settled and assured. But if we consider apart the pernicious effects which issue from these two contraries, when reason doth not guide and gouerne them, we shall finde nothing but pride in the one, and faintnes of heart, basenes of minde, & oftentimes despaire in the other. Notwithstanding we may well note this, that prosperitie hath alwaies bin the cause of far greater euils to men than aduersity, and that it is easier for a man to beare this patiently, than not to forget himselfe in the other. Whereof I thinke we may not vnfitly alledge for a reason that which Menander saith: that man of all other living creatures is aptest to fall suddenly downe from high to low, because hee dareth undertake the greatest matters although he be weake. Whereupon being as it were naturally subiect to falling, it is not so strange vnto him, being better furnished for that (seeing he is or ought to bee prepared therto long before) than when against his naturall disposition hee ascendeth to some greatnesse not hoped for. Now, whether it be for this reason, or because vice is his proper inheritance, the memorie of the time past aswell as of the present time, furnisheth vs with sufficient testimonies, seeing few are found that forgoe not themselves in their prosperitie, whereas many haue behaued themselves wisely, and taken occasion to bee better in their aduersitie. Which beeing vnderstood of Plato, when hee was requested by the Cyrenians a people of Grecia, to write downe lawes for them, and to appoint them some good forme of government for their common-wealth: he answered, That it was a very hard matter to prescribe lawes to so rich, happy, and wealthie a people as they were. For commonly those cities which in short time come suddenly to great felicity, grow to be insolent, arrogant, and vneasie to range in order: neither is there any thing for the most part prouder, than a poore man made rich: as contrariwise none are so ready to receiue counsell and direction, as he whom fortune hath ouerrunne. He that is pressed greatly with aduersity, is seldome puffed vp with pride, or vanquished of lust, or drowned in couetousnesse, or overtaken with giuttonie, or lift vp with desire and worldly glory: all which imperfections happen commonly to those vpon whom fortune too much fawneth. That felicitie (saith Seneca) which hath not beene hurt, cannot endure one blow: but when it hath had a long and continuall combate with discommodities, and hath hardened it selfe by suffering and bearing iniuries, then doth it not suffer it selfe to be overcome of any euill. Now one of the greatest benefits that a man may haue in this life, is, neither to bee changed by aduersitie, nor lift vp with prosperitie: but to bee as a well rooted tree, which, although it bee shaken with sundry windes, yet cannot bee ouerthrowne by any of them. And truly it is very ridiculous that that which commeth to all worldly things by an ordinary and naturall course, euen by the sequelle of causes linked together and depending one of another, changing the estate of mortall things, should haue power to alter or to make any mutation in reason and wisdom, which ought to abide stedfast in the minde of man. For this cause Plato said that there was nothing but vertue could tame it, and that men furnished therewith behaued themselves constantly and courageously in both kindes of fortune. Vertue (saith Cicero) abideth calme and quiet in the greatest tempest, and although she be driven into exile, yet shee stirreth not out of her place and countrey, but shineth so alwaies of her selfe, that she cannot cannot bee soiled with the spots of another. This excellent Orator and Philosopher giueth vs also wholsome counsell to oppose against the dangerous effects that are to bee feared in prosperitie. When we are (saith he) in best estate we must vse the counsell of our friends more than we doe commonly, and as long as it continueth we are greatly to beware that wee open not our cares to flatterers, who are the plague and destruction of the greater sort, because all their labor is to propound vnto vs occasions and meanes to enioy delights and pleasures, and to shew our selues to be proud and arrogant, during the time of our prosperity: to the ende wee should put good men farre from vs, and reserue to them onely that authority wherein they are settled. Whereas on the contrary side our true friends would leade vs backe to consider the inconstancie of humane things, to the ende that wee abuse not our felicitie, but behaue our selues as a wise Pilot doth, who alwaies feareth a smiling calmes in the maine sea. Which consideration maketh a man constant and resolute to beare and endure all sinister chances, and not so ready and easie to be deceiued, because hee alwaies feareth and distrusteth fortune. Let vs now come to examples of that which we haue here alleadged. As touching the pernicious effects of ouer great prosperitie, they may well bee noted in Alexander the Great, who although hee was endued with notable and rare vertues, yet could not vse moderately the great good speed and happie successe of all his enterprises, but being conquered of the Persian delights, gaue himselfe ouer to commit many insolencies, and then filled with presumption and pride, would haue beene worshipped. Iulius Caesar being ascended into the highest degree of fauourable fortune that he could desire, and lending his eare ouer freely to flatterers, would be called and declared a king, (which name was most odious to the Romans since the time that Tarquinius was banished, as we mentioned before) and retained alwaies to himselfe the authority and power of a Dictator, which before continued but a certaine time. He bestowed the publike offices and places of honour vpon whom he thought good, whereof proceeded the ill will of his subiects, and in the ende his destruction. The greatnesse of Pompey was that which afterward ouerthrew him. For imploying his credite to fauour others vnjustly, it fell out to him as to cities that suffer their enemies to enter euen into their strongest places, diminishing so much of their owne forces, as they add to others that wish them no good. Which thing Sylla the Dictator did very notably giue him to vnderstand, when he saw that Pompey by his countenance and fauour had brought Lepidus a wicked man to the dignity of Consulship. I see well (quoth Sylla to him) thou art very glad because thou hast preuailed in this suite: and sure thou hast great cause so to bee. For it is a goodly matter, and the point of a noble man to be so gracious with the people, that through thy fauour Lepidus the wickedest man in the world hath carried away the Consulship before Catullus the honestest man in all the citie. But I aduise thee to beware of sleeping now, and to haue a vigilant eye to thy busines, because thou hast armed and made strong an aduersarie against thy selfe. Whereof Pompey had experience afterward in those warres which Lepidus raised, against whom he was sent by the Senate, and in the end obtained the victorie. But the fauour he bare to Caesar, entring vpon the government of publike affaires, came not to that passe. For he was afterward ouerthrowne by the same meanes wherewith he had strengthened Caesar against others. Out of which we may draw an excellent doctrine for all that are placed in authority, or that haue the cares of great men at commandement, that they neuer cause the wicked to bee aduanced. For as the worme that is bred at the foote of a tree, groweth with it, and in the ende destroyeth it: so a wicked man aduanced by the fauour of one greater than himselfe, becometh afterward vnthankfull and trecherous vnto him. This moued Archdamides the Lacedaemonian to answer in this sort one that commended Charilaus king of Sparta, because hee shewed himselfe alike curteous to all: But how deserueth that man praise, who sheweth himselfe curteous towards the wicked? Now to returne to our speech touching the effects of prosperitie, not ruled by the reason of true prudence, what is more hatefull, or hath at any time beene more hurtfull to men than pride? Which (as Plato saith) dwelleth with solitarinesse, that is to say, is so hated, that in the ende it is forsaken of all the world? And whereof it is bred sooner than of prosperity? Which that wise man and excellent Romane captaine Paulus Aemilius knowing full well, after the victory gotten by him against Perfes king of Macedonia, being desirous to admonish the men of war that were in his army, and to keepe them within the compasse of their duty, he vsed these or the like speeches vnto them: Is there any man now my friends and companions, that ought to waxe proud, and to glory in the posteritie of his affaires, if hee hath lucke too his liking and not rather to feare the sicklenes of fortune, who euen at this present setteth before our eyes such a notable example of the common frailty of man, subiect to the ordinary course

Good counsell for those that are in prosperitie.

Alexander.

Iulius Caesar.

Pompey.

A wise foresight of Sylla.

An excellent oration of P. Aemilius to his souldiers.

course

course of fatall destinie, which turneth about continually: You see how in a moment of an houre wee haue beaten downe and put vnder our feete the house of Alexander the Great, who was the mightiest and most redoubted Prince in the world. You see a King not long since followed and accompanied with so many thousand fighting men brought to such miserie, that being prisoner hee must receiue his meate and drinke at the hands of his enemies. Ought wee to trust more to our good happe, and to thinke it more firme and assured? Truly no. And therefore let vs learne to humble our selues, and to restraine this foolish arrogancy and proud insolencie, wherewith our youth seemeth to be overcome by reason of the victory obtained by vs: and let vs expect to what ende and issue fortune will guide the enny of this present prosperitie.

M. Aurelius

Philip king of Macedonia

Archidamas.

Cyrus.

The instability of humane
things.

The common effects of aduersity

The fruits of the studie of Philosophie.

Marcus Aurelius after hee had vanquished Popilion, Generall of the Parthians, spake thus vnto him: I tell thee of a truth that I stand in greater feare of Fortune at this present, than I did before the battell. For hee careth not so much to ouertake the conquered, as to subdue and vanquish the Conquerors. This selfe same consideration caused Philip king of Macedonia, after he receiued newes of three great and sundry prosperities in one day, to vtter this speech: O fortune (said hee) (holding vp his hands towards heauen) I pray thee send mee for a counterbuffe some meane aduersity. Likewise after hee had overcome in battell the Athenians at Cherronenus, and by this victorie obtained the Empire of Græcia, hee commanded a little Page to crye vnto him thrise a day, Philip, remember that thou art a man: so greatly did hee feare least through arrogancy arising of his prosperity, hee should commit any thing that did not beecome him. The same thing did Archidamas the sonne of Agesilaus very well and wisely teach him, to whom Philip after hee was a Conqueror had written a very sharpe and rough letter: If thou measurest thy shadow (answered Archidamas) thou shalt finde that it is not waxen greater since thou didst overcome. The prosperity which Cyrus Monarch of the Persians alwaies had in all his enterprises, was the cause of that trusting too much thereunto, hee would not giue eare to the counsell of Cræsus, when hee diswaded him from that warre, which hee purposed to vndertake against Tomyris Queene of the Scythians, (which fell out hardly for him) vsing these wordes: Know that all worldly things haue a certaine course, which doth not suffer them to ende happily that haue alwaies had fortune prosperous, which hee might well speake by experience in himselfe. But Cyrus hauing already subdued all Asia, part of Græcia, the kingdome of Babylon, with infinite other places, and beholding his army to consist of sixe score thousand men, thought hee could not bee vanquished. Whereupon giuing battell to Tomyris, he lost his life, together with the renoune of so many goodly victories (being now overcome by a woman) his whole army also being hewen in peeces. And truly as one puffe of winde causeth the goodliest fruits, which beautifie the whole Orchard, to fall from the tree: so a little disgrace, a sudden mishap in one instant bringeth to nothing, and pulleth downe the greatnesse, wealth, and prosperity of men. And when wee thinke to lay a sure foundation of prosperity, even then is all changed, and the order of our conceits peruered and turned into an vnlooked for disorder and confusion. Now let vs come to consider particularly of the effects of aduersitie. There are few folks (if they bee not destitute of all good iudgement) that are ignorant and vnderstand not what belongeth to their duty, so long as prosperity lasteth: but few there are, who in great ouerthwarts and shakings of fortune, haue hearts sufficiently staied to practise and imitate that which they commend and make account of, or to flye from that which they mislike and reprehend. Nay rather they are carried away, and through custome of liuing at ease, together with frailty and faintnesse of heart, they start aside, and alter their first discourses. This is that which Terence meaneth, where hee saith, That when wee are in good health, wee giue a great deale better counsell to the diseased, than wee can take to our selues when wee stand in neede thereof. Notwithstanding hee that is beaten downe and humbled by affliction, easily suffereth himselfe to bee directed, gladly receiveth and harkneth to the aduice of good men, and if there bee any little seede of vertue in him, it increaseth daily, whereas prosperity would soone choake it. And if hee hath profited well in the studie of of wisdom, hee doth as Bees doe, which draw the best and driest honie out of Time, although it bee a very bitter herbe. So out of most troublesome accidents hee knoweth how to reape benefit and commodity, resolving with himselfe and taking counsell according to the mishaps that light vpon him. He doubteth not of this, that it is the duty of wise and vertuous men not onely to desire prosperity in all things, but also to endure aduersity with constancy and modesty. Hee knoweth that as the fruition of prosperity is for the most part full of sweetnesse, when it is not abused, so the constant suffering of aduersity is alwaies replenished and accompanied with great honour; and such a one may truly bee called noble and couragious, yea, he sheweth himselfe a great deale better to bee so in deede when hee yeeldeth not, nor fainteth in afflictions, than if hee were

were in prosperity, which puffing vp the hearts of cowards and base mindes, causeth them sometimes to seeme couragious, when as they are lift vp by fortune into a high degree of honour and felicity, whereas in truth there is no such matter in them. Cræsus king of the Lydians being throwne from his estate and made prisoner to Cyrus, shewed greater vertue & generositie of hart at that time, than he did al the while he enioyed his great wealth, through which being puffed vp with pride, he would haue had Solon iudged him most happy. For being vpon a blocke ready to be buried, and both remembring and fitly applying to himselfe those wise discourses which hee heard Solon make vnto him concerning the small assurance that we haue in worldly felicity, and how no man ought to be called happy before the hower of his death, he resolued with himselfe to die constantly and cheerfully. And calling to mind this benefit which he receiued by the meanes of that wise man, whereupon he felt his soule filled with ioy: he repeated aloud three times the name of Solon, vnto no other words. Whereof Cyrus asking the cause, he vttered vnto him the selfe same discourses, which touched the heart of this Monarch in such sort, that presently changing the ill will he bare to Cræsus, he fully restored him to the fruition of his kingdome, and kept him neare vnto himselfe for one of his chiefe and principall counsellors. The Romanes (as Polybius saith) neuer observed their lawes more straightly, neuer caused the discipline of warre to be kept more seuerely, & were neuer so well aduised and constant, as after the Carthaginians had obtained of them the third victory at the battle of Cannas. And contrariwise, there were nothing bur partakeings and factions in Carthage, lawes were neuer lesse esteemed, magistrates neuer lesse regarded, nor manners more corrupted than at that time. But within a litle while after, they fel from the highest degree of their felicity, into vtter ruine, and the Romanes restored their owne estate into greater glory than it was in before. Vertue is, alwaies like to the Date tree: For the more she is oppressed and burthened, the higher she listeth vp her selfe, and sheweth her invincible power, and strength, ouer which fortune can nothing preuaile. And although aduersitie somewhat troubleth a vertuous man, yet is it not able to altar his noble courage, but remaining firme and constant, he knoweth how to take all things as exercises of his vertue; which, as an ancient man said, withereth and loseth her vigor without aduersitie. It is euident therefore that the effects of aduersitie are not so perditionous to a man, as those which prosperity commonly bringeth vnto him. For this latter is of a proud and presumptuous nature, alwaies enuied; and as commonly it is not freely admonished so it giueth eare vnto and receiueh as little: but the other is plaine and simple, followed of compassion, and ready to receiue counsell. Besides, it awaketh a Christian, and stirreth him vp to humble himselfe before the maiesty of God, to call vpon him, and to trust wholly on his only grace and vertue. Now if some (as I haue said) are so fainthearted, that they suffer themselves to be ouerwhelmed vnder the burthen of turmoiles and calamities, let vs attribute the causes thereof to ignorance, and want of good iudgement, which depriueth them of learned and sound cogitations and discourses that tend to a constant disposition, wherein the happines of this life consisteth. As for vs, if we desire to approach neere to that perfection which is required by the Sa- ges, let vs propound to our selues their examples to follow, that we may be temperate and constant in every estate and condition of life. Wee reade of Socrates that one and the same countenance was noted in him all his life time, that it was neither sadder nor pleasanter for any thing that hapned vnto him. He changed it not when he heard the sentence of his death pronounced, no not when he dranke the poison, following therein the contents of his condemnation, albeit then he was about threescore yeares of age. Publius Rutilus a Romane, being vniustly banished, neuer changed his countenance or behauiour, neither would put one any other gowne than that he vsed to weare, although it was the custome of such as were banished, to altar the same. Neither would he leaue off the marks of a Senator, nor request the iudges to absolue him, but led the rest of his daies with the same greatnesse, grauity and authority that he vsed before, not shewing himselfe any thing beaten downe with sorrow for the strange alteration of his first estate. Quintus Metellus surnamed Numidicus, because hee had subdued that countrey of Numidia, being driuen into exile through a popular faction and sedition, went into Asia, where as he beheld certaine plaiers, he receiued letters from the Senate, whereby he was certified that the Senators and people with one common consent had called him backe againe. Which good newes he bare with the like modesty that he did his banishment, not departing from the Theater before the sports were ended, nor shewing his letters to any of his friends that were round about him before he had assembled them together in his lodging to deliberate of his returne to Rome. The same grauity and constancy cau-

*Cræsus.*The Romanes were wise & constant in aduersitie.The property
of vertue
oppressed.The wonder-full constancy
of Socrates.P. Rutilus.Q. Metellus.

Diogenes.

caused Diogenes, when he heard one hit him in the teeth with his banishment from Pontus by the Synopians, to make this answer: And I haue bounded them within the countrey of Pontus. Wee must account the whole scope of the firmament for the bounds of our countrey as long as weeline here. Neither ought any man within those limits to esteeme himselfe either banished, or a stranger: seeing God governeth all things by the same elements. Therefore Socrates said, that hee tooke not himselfe to bee either an Athenian or a Græcian, but a worldling. And how shall wee thinke that they who sustained so courageously their banishment from their countrey, (which was so deare vnto them, that they preferred the benefit thereof before the safety of their life) their deprivation and absence from their families, friends and goods, would not much more vertuously haue suffered all lesse aduersities? Therefore to end our present discourse, let vs learne that nothing belonging to this present life hath neither more euill nor good in it, than according to the ende which befalleth it, and that it is our duty to keepe our selues moderate, constant, and vpright, both in prosperity and in aduersitie, which is the propertie of true magnanimitie and greatnesse of courage. Let vs not lift vp our selues aboue measure for any temporall felicitie, nor bee too much discouraged because wee are visited with aduersity, but wisely expect what will bee the end of both, which a good and vertuous man shall alwaies find to bee happy when hee changeth his mortall estate for a life that is certaine and euermlasting.

Socrates tooke
the whole world for his countrey.

The end of the eight daies worke.

The ninth daies worke.

Of Riches. Chap. 37.

ASER.

Yesterday wee bestowed the better part of the day in discoursing of good and ill hap, of prosperity and aduersity, which with a swift pace following each other, seeme to change, to turne, and to overturne incessantly the dealings and desires of men. Now forasmuch as wee made mention of the ignorant multitude which placeth happinesse and felicitie in the fading goods of the world, and affirmed to the contrarie, that this felicity was very miserable, because it maketh a man more insolent and arrogant, and giueth him greater occasion to bewaile, than to reioyce in his fortune; I thinke wee ought to consider more neerely of the nature of such goods as are no goods, beginning with riches whereunto men are slaues, more than to any other thing, albeit they procure them the greatest euils.

A MANA. Riches (saith Epictetus) are not in the number of goods. For they stir vs vp to superfluity, and pull vs backe from temperance. And therefore it is a very hard matter for a rich man to be temperate, or for a temperate man to be rich. As a man cannot vse a horse (saith Socrates) without a bridle, so hee cannot vse Riches without reason.

The fruits of riches.

ARAM. It is almost impossible (saith Diogenes) that vertue should dwell in a rich cittie or house. For riches bring with them pride to him that possesseth them, excessive desire in gathering them, couetousnesse in keeping them, and filthinesse and dissolutenesse in the enioying of them. But let vs heare ACHITOB, who will handle this matter more at large.

ACHITOB. As children of three or foure yeares of age haue no more care or thought, but how they may play and passe away their time with the hauiing of daily foode according to their appetite, not considering or taking any care for the meanes which they might haue, and which would bee necessary for the nourishment of their olde age: so it seemeth to me that the men of our time behaue themselves, when through a more than childish ignorance they labour without ceasing to gather and to increafe wealth, which will doe them seruice but a little while, not caring in the meane time for certaine and immortall goods which will nourish them for ever. And yet the soule created according to the image of God, cannot better preserue and shew forth her diuine nature in this mortall body, than by contemning all earthly, humane, and fading things. But to the end we be not of the number of those that fill themselves with such passions, to purchase their owne destruction, let vs consider by the testimonies testimonies of the auncient Sages, of the nature and quality of riches, and of the visible effects which they daily bring forth in those that serue and possesse them: next, we wil behold some examples of these famous personages, that we may bee induced thereby to contemne such pernicious goods. Men ought to make great account of riches (saith Socrates) if they were ioyned with true ioy, but they are wholly separated from it. For if rich men fall to vsing of them, they spoile themselves with ouer great pleasure; if they would keepe them, care gnaweth and consumeth them within; and if they desire to get them, they become wicked and unhappy. It cannot be (saith Plato) that a man should be truly good, and very rich both together, but he may well be happy and good at one time. And it is a very miserable saying, to affirme that a rich man is happy: yea it belongeth to children and fooles to say so, making them unhappy that beleue and approoue it. Slouth and sluggishnes grow of riches, and they that are addicted to heape them vp more and more, the greater account they make of them, they lesse esteeme vertue. So that if riches and rich men are greatly set by in a Common wealth, vertue and good men will be much lesse regarded: and yet greater matters are brought to passe, and Common wealths preserued by vertue, and not by riches. Riches (saith Isocrates) serue not so much for the practise of honesty as of wickednesse: seeing they draw the liberty of men to loosenesse and idlenesse, and stirre vp young men to voluptuousnesse. Men (saith Thales) are by nature borne to vertue, but riches draw them backe vnto them, hauing a thousand sortes of sorceries to allure them to vices, and through a false opinion of good to turne them from those things that are truly good. They suffer not him that hath them to be able to know anything, but draw him to externall goods. They are passing arrogant and most fearefull. If they vse themselves, they are riotous; if they abstaine, miserable. They neuer content their owners, nor leaue them void of sorrow and care: but as they that are sicke of the dropsie, the more they drinke become the thirstier, so the more that men abound in wealth the more they desire to haue. Riches of themselves breed flatterers, who helpe to vndoe rich men. They are the cause of infinite murders and bired slaughters: they make couetous persons to contemne the goods of the soule, thinking to become happie without them. They prouoke them also to delicacies and to gluttony, whereby their bodies are subiect to diseases and infirmities. Briefely, riches greatly hurt both body and soule. They stirre vp domesticall sedition, and that among brethren. They make children worse in behauiour towards their fathers, and cause fathers to deale more hardly with their children. Through them it cometh that friends suspect each other: for a true friende is credited no more by reason of a flatterer: Besides, rich men are angry with good men, saying, that they are arrogant: because they will not flatter them, and in like manner they hate such as flatter them, thinking that they keepe about them onely to rob them and to diminish their wealth. These are the euils, which may be said to bee commonly in riches. But these also accompany them, beeing execrable diseases, namely, presumption, pride, arrogancy, vile and abiect cares, which are altogether earthly, naughty desires, wicked pleasures, and an insatiable coueting. Besides, if they were not pernicious of themselves, so many mischiefes would not take their beginning from them. For men commit a thousand murders for gaine. They rob Churches, fidelitie is lost and broken, friendship is violated, men betray their countrey, maidens are loosely giuen: briefly, no euils are left vnexecuted through the desire of riches. They that giue themselves (saith Bion) to gather riches, are very ridiculous, seeing Fortune giueth them, couetousnes keepest them, and liberality casteth them away. Men must haue rich soules, (saith Alexides) as for silver it is nothing but a shew and veile of life. It is a naughty thing (saith Euripides) but common to all rich men, to liue wickedly. The cause thereof as I take it, is this, because they haue nothing but riches in their minde, which beeing blinde, seale up likewise the eies of their understanding. I pray God neuer sende mee a wealthie life, which hath alwaies sorrow and care for her companions, nor riches to gnaw my heart. Speake not to mee of Plute, that is to say of riches, for I make no reckoning of that God, who is alwayes possessed of the most wicked vpon the earth. O riches, you are easie to beare, but infinite cares, miseries, and griefes keepe you companie. Hee (saith, Democritus) that woondereth at such as haue great riches and are esteemed of the ignorant multitude to bee happy, will surely through a desire of hauing, commit and vndertake wicked things, and those oftentimes against the lawes. As drunkennes (saith Aristotle) begetteth rage and madnes, so ignorance ioyned with power, breedeth insolencie and furie. And to those whose minds are not well disposed, neither riches, nor strength, nor beauty, can bee iudged good but the greater increase ariseth of them, the more harme they may procure to him that possesseth them. Morouer, do wee not see that the most part of rich men, either vse not their riches, because they are couetous, or abuse them, because they are giuen ouer to their pleasures, and so they are all the seruants either of pleasures, or of trafficke and gaine, as long as they liue? But he that would bee (as Plato saith) truly rich, ought to labour not so much to augment his wealth, or to diminish his desire of hauing, because he that appointeth no bounds to his desires, is alwaies poore and needy. For this cause the liberty of a wise mans soule, who knoweth nature of externall goods belonging to this life, is neuer troubled

Of the nature quality, and effects of riches.

Riches of themselves are the good gifts of God,
but the euils
wrought for or by them come from the corrupt nature of man

The Poets
fained Plute
to be the God
of riches,
appointing hell for his kingdome.

The euil disposition of the mind is the true cause
of the hurt
that cometh
by riches.

From whence
happines and contentation
cometh.

Great madnes in coue-
ting in ony.

Examples of the contempt
of Riches.

M Curius.

Phocion.

Philopamen.

with the care of them, being assured (as Plutarke saith) that as it is not apparell which giueth heate to a man, but onely staieth and keepeth in naturall heate that proceedeth from the man himselfe, by binding it from dispersing in the aire: so no man liueth more happily or contentedly, because he is compassed about with much wealth, if tranquillity, ioy, and rest, proceede not from within his soule. Heape vp (saith the same Philosopher) store of gold, gather siluer together, builde faire galleries, fill a whole house full of slaves, and a whole towne with thy debtors: yet if thou doest not master the passions of thy soule, if thou quencheest not thy insatiable desire, nor deliuerest thy soule of all feare and carking care, thou doest as much to procure thy quietnesse, as if thou gauest wine to one that had an ague. Life of it selfe (saith Plato) is not ioyfull, vnlesse care bee chased away, which causeth vs to waxe gray headed, whilest wee desire but meane store of riches. For the superfluous desire of hauing, alwayes gnaweth our hearts. Whereupon it commeth to passe, that oftentimes amongst men we see pouerty to be better than riches, and death than life. And truly there is great madnesse in the greedy coueting of monie. For they that are touched with this maladie, follow after riches with such zeale, as if they supposed that when they had gotten them, no more euill should come neere them. And then also they set so light by those which they haue, that they burne with the desire of hauing more. How then shall wee call that good, which hath no end or measure? Or that which being gotten, is the beginning of a further desire to haue more? A horse (saith Epictetus) is not said to bee better, because hee hath eaten more then another, or because he hath a gilt harnessse, but because hee is stronger, swifter, and better made: for euery beast is accounted of according to his vertue. And shall a man be esteemed according to his riches, ancestors, and beauty? If any thinke that his old age shall bee borne more easily by the meanes of riches, hee deceiuet himselfe. For they may well cause him to enioy the hurtfull pleasures of the body, but cannot take from him sadnesse, horreur, and feare of death: nay rather double his griefe, when he thinketh that hee must leaue and forsake them. In this short discourse taken from ancient men, the vanity of riches appeareth sufficiently vnto vs, as also the hurtfull effects that flow from them, if they be not ruled by the reason of true prudence. Hereafter wee are to see how wee may vse those riches well, which God putteth into our hands, being iustly gotten by vs: which is a part of iustice, whereof we are to entreate. In the meane time, that wee fasten not our hearts to so friuolous and vaine a thing, let vs call to minde some examples of wise and famous men, worthy of immortall renowne, who haue altogether contemned, eschued, and despised the couetous desire and hoording vp of riches, as the plague and vnauoideable ruine of the soule. Wee reade of Marcus Curius a Romane Consul, (the first of his time that receiued thrice the dignity of triumphing for the notable victories which he had obtained in the honor of his countrey) that he made so small account of worldly riches, that all his possession was but a little farme in the countrey sorily built, wherein he continued for the most part when publike affaires suffered him, himselfe labouring and tilling that little grounde which hee had there. And when certaine Embassadors vpon a day came to visit him, they found him in his chimney dressing of radish for his supper. And when they presented him with a great summe of monie from their Comonalty, he refused it, saying: that they which contented themselves with such an ordinarie as his was, had no neede of it: and that hee thought it far more honourable to command them that had gold, than to haue it. Phocion the Athenian being visited with Embassadors from Alexander, they presented him with a hundred talents (being in value threescore thousand crownes) which this Monarch sent vnto him for a gift. Phocion demanding the cause why, seeing there were so many Athenians besides him, they answered. Because their maister iudged him only among al the rest to be a vertuous and good man. Then (quoth he) let him suffer me both to seeme and to be so indeed, and carry his present backe againe to him. Notwithstanding hee was needie, as may bee prooued by the answer which he made to the Athenian Councell, who demanded a voluntary contribution of euery one towards a sacrifice. And when there were no more left to contribute but he, they were very importunate with him to giue somewhat. It were a shame for me (said he vnto me) to giue you money, before I haue payed this man, & therewithall hee shewed one vnto them that had lent him a certaine sum of money. Philopamen Generall of the Achaians, hauing procured a league of amity betweene the City of Sparta, and his owne, the Lacedemonians sent him a present of sixescore Talents, which were worth threescore & twelue thousand crownes. But refusing it, he went purposely to Sparta, where he declared to the Councell, that they ought not to corrupt and win honest men, or their friends with money, seeing in their need they might bee assured of them, and vse their vertue freely without cost: but that they were to buy & gaine with hired rewards, the wicked, and such as by their seditious orations in the Senate house vsed to raise mutinies, and to set the citie on fire; to the end that their mouthes being stopped

ped by giftes, they might procure lesse trouble to the gouernment of the Common-wealth. A great Lord of Persia comming from his countrey to Athens, and perceiuing that hee stode in great neede of his aide and fauour of Cimon, who was one of the chiefe in the city, he presented vnto him two cuppes that were both full, the one of Dariques of golde, the other of siluer Dariques. This wise Græcian beginning to smile, demaunded of him whether of the twaine he had rather haue him to be, his friend, or his hireling? The Persian answered, that he had a great deale rather haue him his friend. Then (said Cimon carry back again thy gold and siluer. For if I bee thy friend, it will bee alwaies at my commaundement to vse as often as I shall neede. Anacreon hauing receiued of Polycrates five talents for a gift, was so much troubled for the space of two nights with care how he might keepe them, and about what to imploy them best, that he carried them backe againe, saying: That they bee not woorth the paines which he had already taken for them. Xenocrates refused thirty thousand crownes of Alexander, sent vnto him for a present, saying: That hee had no neede of them. What (quoth Alexander) hath hee neuer a friend? For mine owne part, I am sure that all king Darius treasure will scarce suffice mee to distribute among my friends. Socrates being sent for by king Archelaus to come vnto him, who promised him great riches, sent him word, that a measure of flower was sould in Athens for a Double, and that water cost nothing. And although it seemeth (quoth this Philosopher) that I haue not goods enough, yet I haue enough, seeing I am contented therewith. What is necessary (said Menander) for the vse of our life besides these two things, Bread and Water? Bias flying out of his city which he fore saw would bee besieged without hope of rescue, would not lode himselfe with his wealth as others did. And being demaunded the cause why, I carrie (quoth hee) all my goods with mee: meaning the inuisible gifts and graces of his mind. Truly gold and siluer are nothing but dust, and precious stones but the grauell of the sea. And (as Pythagoras said) we ought to perswade our selues, that those riches are not ours which are not inclosed in our soule. According to which saying, Socrates when he saw that Alcibiades waxed arrogant because of the great quantity of ground, which he possessed, shewed him an vniuersal Map of the world, and asked him whether he knew which were his landes in the territory of Athens. Whereunto when Alcibiades answered, that they were not described nor set downe there: How is it then (quoth this wise man) that thou braggest of that thing which is no part of the world? One meane which Lycurgus vsed, and which helped him much in the reforming of the Lacedemonian estate, was the disanulling of all gold and siluer coine, and the appointing of iron monie onely to be currant, a pound weight whereof was woorth but sixe pence. For by this meanes he banished from among them the desire of riches, which are no lesse cause of the ouerthrow of Common wealths than of priuate men. This moued Plato to say, that he would not haue the Princes and gouernors of his Common wealth, nor his men of war and soldiers, to deale at all with gold & siluer: but that they should haue allowed them out of the common treasure whatsoeuer was necessary for them. For as long gownes hinder the body, so do much riches the soule. Therefore if we desire to liue happily in tranquility and rest of soule, and with ioy of spirit, let vs learne after the example of so many great men to withdraw our affections wholly from the desire of worldly riches, not taking delight and pleasure (as Diogenes said) in that which shall perish, and is not able to make a man better but oftentimes woorse. Let vs further know that (according to the Scripture) no man can serue God and riches together, but that all they which desire them greedily, fall into temptations and snares, and into many foolish and noisome lusts which drowne men in perdition, whereof wee haue eye-witnesse daily before vs. This appeareth in that example which the selfe same word noteth vnto vs of the rich man that abounded in al things, so that he willed his soule to take her ease, and to make good cheere, because she had so much goods laid vp for many yeares: and yet the same night he was to pay tribute vnto nature, to his ouerthrow and confusio. Being therefore instructed by the Spirit of wisdom, let vs treasure vp in Iesus Christ the permanent Riches of wisdom, piety, and iustice, which of themselves are sufficient through his grace to make vs liue with him for euer.

Cimon.Anacreon.Xenocrates.Socrates.

Five Doubles
in France
make a peny
of our coine.

Lycurgus abrogated the vse
of gold & sil-
uer coine.

Luk. 16. 13.

1. Tim. 6. 9.

Luk. 12. 16.

What riches
we ought to treasure vp.

Of Pouerty. Chap. 34.

ACHI-
TOB.

NOW that we haue seene the nature of Riches with the most common effects which flowe from them, and seeing the chiefe and principall cause that leadeth men so earnestly to desire them, is the feare of falling into

N 2

pouerty

The chiefe
cause why riches are so earnestly desired.

pouerty, which through error of iudgement they account a very great euill, I am of opinion, that we are to enter into a particular consideration thereof, to the end that such a false perswasion may neuer deceiue vs, nor cause vs to goe astray out of the right path of Vertue.

A S E R. Pouerty (saide Diogenes) is a helpe to Philosophie, and is learned of it selfe. For that which Philosophie seeketh to make vs know by words, pouerty perswadeth vs in the things themselves.

A M A N A. Rich men stand in need of many precepts, as, That they liue thriftily and soberly: that they exercise their bodies: that they delight not too much in the decking of them, and infinite others which pouerty of her selfe teacheth vs. But let vs heare A R A M discourse more at large of that which is here propounded vnto vs.

Against those that thinke
poore men
lesse happy
than the rich.

A pretty comparison.

Mat. 19. 21. 23

No comparison betweene
worldly and heavenly treasures.

A R A M. If we consider how our common mother the earth, being prodigall in giuing vnto vs all things necessary for the life of man, hath notwithstanding cast all of vs naked out of her bowels, and must receiue vs so againe into her wombe, I see no great reason wee haue to call some rich, and others poore; seeing the beginning, being, and ende of the temporall life of all men are vnlike in nothing, but that some during this little moment of life haue that in abundance and superfluitie, which others haue onely according to their necessitie. But this is much more absurd, and without all shew of reason, that they whom wee call poore according to the opinion of men, should be accounted, yea commonly take themselves to be lesse happy than rich men, and as I may so say, bastard children and not legitimate, because they are not equally and alike partakers of their mothers goods, which are the wealth of the world, for the hauing whereof we heare so many complaints and murmurings. For first we see none, no not the neediest and poorest that is (except it be by some great and strangemishap) to be so vnprovided for, but with any labour and paines taking (which is the reward of sinne) hee is able to get so much as is necessary for the maintenance of his life, namely, foode and raiment; neither yet any that for want of these things, howsoener oftentimes he suffer and abide much, is constrained to giue vp the ghost. But further, as touching the true, eternall, and incomparable goods of our common Father, their part and portion is nothing lesse than that of the richest. Yea many times they are rewarded and enriched aboue others, in that beeing withdrawne from the care and government of many earthly things, they feele themselves so much the more rauished with speciall and heavenly grace (if they hinder it not) in the meditation & contemplation of celestiall thing: from whence they may easily draw a great and an assured contentation in this life, through a certaine hope that they shall enioy them perfectly, because they are prepared for them, in that blessed immortality of the second life. For nothing is more certaine than this, that as the Sun is a great deale better seen in cleare and cleane water, than in that which is troubled, or in a myrie and dirty puddle: so the brightnesse that commeth from God shineth more in mindes not subiect to worldly goods, than in them that are defiled and troubled with those earthly affections which riches bring with them. This is that which Iesus Christ himselfe hath taught, speaking to him that demaunded what he should do to haue eternall life: If thou wilt be perfect (saith hee) sell that which thou hast, and giue it to the poore, and thou shalt haue treasure in heauen: adding besides, that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdome of heauen. If a father diuiding his substance among his children, should leaue to one as his eldest or best beloued, the enioying of his principall manner by inheritance, and to rest their mothers goods, which are of much lesse value, and that only for terme of life, what folly were it to iudge that these last were more preferred, and had better portions than the other? And I pray you what comparison is there betweene the greatest worldly and transitorie riches that can be, and the permanent treasures of heauen, seeing those cannot be compared but to a thing of nought, than which they are weaker, being moreouer accompanied with innumerable hurtfull euils, as wee haue already shewed? What happinesse and felicity can wealth adde to rich men aboue the poorer sort, that these should bee accounted miserable and wretched? Take away (saith Lactantius) insolencie and boasting from rich men, and there will be no difference betweene a poore man and a rich. And if he that made the condition both of the one and the other, and that provideth nourishment for vnreasonable creatures, doth distribute vnto vs as much as hee knoweth in his eternall praescience and foreknowledge to be needfull for vs, whereof shall we complaine, except, as inheritors of that damnable vice of ingratitude from the first man, we forget so many benefits receiued, as also those that are daily proffered and promised vnto vs of his heauenly goodness and grace? In a fealt (saide Epictetus) we content our selues with that which is set before vs, thinking it an impudent and vile part to aske any other thing of him that entertaineth vs.

vs.

vs. And how can we be so impudent and shamelesse in this world, as to aske those things of God, which he will not giue vs, and not content our selues with the vse of that which he hath liberally and freely bestowed vnto vs? But there is a further matter. For if we would consider the great, yea the vnspokeable fruits which pouertie bringeth with her, and whereof shee is able to make vs partakers in this life, without doubt she will bee found to bee a thousand times more happy than riches. Pouerty (saith Aristophanes) is the mistres of manners. Pouerty (saith Archeilaus) seemeth to be sharpe, hard, and trouble some, but shee is nurse to a good linage, as shee that acquainteth her selfe with frugality and abstinence. In a word, shee is a schoole of vertue. Wealth is full of wickednesse, (saith Euripides) but pouerty is accompanied with wisdom, and all honest men are contented with necessary things. And if they offer sacrifice to the gods with a little incense in the palme of their hand, they are for the most part sooner heard than they that kill many beasts for sacrifice. For (as Menander saith) the poore are under the protection of God, and it is better to possesse a little wealth with ioy, than a great deale with sadness. To desire but a little (saith Democritus) maketh pouerty equall with riches: & if thou desirest not many things, a little will seeme to thee to be very great. Pouertie (saith Anaximennus) maketh the spirit more sharpe, & men more excellent in all things belonging to this life. For shee is a very good mistres of knowledge and skill. The life of poore men (saith Aristonimus) is like to a nauigation made along the shore of some sea: but the life of rich men to that which is in the maine sea. For the first sort may easily cast anchor, come ashore, and save themselves, whereas the others cannot do so, because they are no more in their owne power, but in Fortunes. Fly not from pouerty (saith Hipscus) but from iniustice and wrong. For no man was euer punished because he was poore, but many because they were vniust. Neither is a mans life commended because he is rich, but because he is iust. Hunger (saith Plutarke) neuer engendreth adultery, nor want of money, lust: so that pouerty is a short kind of temperance. If thou wert borne among the Persians (saith Epictetus) thou wouldest not wish to dwell in Gracia, but to liue there in happy estate. Art thou not then a very foole, because thou seekest not rather to liue happily in pouerty, seeing thou art borne therein, than to strue with so great labour for riches that thou maiest liue? As it is better to lie downe in a very little bed with health, than in a great and large bed, being sicke: so is it a great deale better to liue in rest with a little wealth, than in trauell and care with abundance. For neither pouerty procureth trouble, nor riches driueth away feare: but reason is that which causeth men neither to desire riches, nor to feare pouerty. If other things (saith Bion the wise) could speake as well as we, and were licenced to dispute with vs, might not pouerty iustly say vnto vs after this manner? O man wherefore fightest thou against mee? Why art thou become mine enemy? Haue I robbed thee of any thing? Haue I bene the cause that thou hast receiued any iniurie, or haue I deprived thee of any good thing? Haue I taken from thee either Prudence, Iustice, or Fortitude? But thou fearest least necessary things should faile thee. What? Are not the waies full of herbes and fruits, and the fountaines of water? Hast thou not as many beds as the earth is great, and as many couerlets and mattresses as there are leaues? Hast thou not a good Cooke by my means, that maketh good sauce for thee in hunger? And hee that is a thirst, doth hee not take very great pleasure in drinking? Doeest thou thinke that a man shall dye for hunger, because hee hath noe tart, or for thirst, if hee haue not very delicate wine cooled with snow? All such things are but for delicacie and nicenesse. Doeest thou want a house, when there are so many goodly Churches in citties? What answer could bee made to pouerty, if shee should speake thus? Truly hee that hath vertue possesseth all goods, because that alone maketh men happy: which may bee spoken as well of a poore man as of a rich. For they (saith Thales) that thinke pouerty hindreth Philosophie, and that riches are a helpe vnto it, greatly deceiue themselves. For prooffe that it is not so, how many moe haue withdrawne themselves from study through riches, than through pouerty? Doe wee not see that the poorest study Philosophy best, which the wealthie because of their money and many matters, cannot doe? For this cause Theophrastus said very well, that many more haue perished through surfetting than through hunger. And to let you know that pouertie is more happie, and better esteemed of than riches, consider the examples of Aristides surnamed the Iust, who being very poore, was chosen to leuie and to gather tribute before all the rich men in Athens. And Callias the richest man of all the Athenians, sought by all meanes to haue his friendship, whereas the other made no great account of him. Epaminondas was not called halfe a God, nor Lycurgus a Sauiour, because they abounded in wealth, and were slaues to their passions, but because they profited their countrey exceedingly, and were content with their pouerty. Therefore wee may gather out of the sayings of so many great and vertuous men, an assured testimonie of the benefite and profite that commonly followeth the condition of poore men. And for inuincible proofes, haue wee not the examples of the liues of infinite Sages and learned Philosophers, who willingly forsaking, and wholly contemning riches, went to the Academie, commonly called the Schoole of Pouertie, there to enioy the pouerty.

The fruits of

An excellent
defence for pouertie.

Examples to shew that pouertie was more esteemed of than riches.

treasures of wisdom and vertue? Yea, which is more, wee finde that pouertie hath beene the onely and principall cause of enriching many with this vnspokeable treasure, according to that saying of Aristotle, that calamity is oftentimes the occasion of vertue. Zeno the founder of the Stoicall Academie, after he had possessed much wealth, and suffered many losses, had no more left but one ship of merchandise, which being cast away, hee vttered this speech: Thou dost well Fortune to bring mee to the studie of Philosophie, wherein hee continued ever after. The exile and banishment of Diogenes driven from his countrey, was the cause and beginning of his studie of Philosophie. And if any man thinke it a difficult and strange matter that a poore man should be skilfull, seeing that whilest he studieth, he must haue wherewith to nourish his body, let vs see what Cleantes answered to Antigonus king of Macedonia, who asked him if hee turned the millstone alwaies: Yea sir (said hee) I turne it yet about to get my liuing, but forsake not Philosophy for all that. How great and noble was the minde of that man, who after his labour wrote of the nature of God and of the heauens, with the same hand wherewith hee turned about the millstone? Others say, that he got his liuing by drawing water for a gardiner: about which hee bestowed the night onely, that hee might spend the day in hearing the Philosophers dispute. This man calleth to my remembrance two other Philosophers, named Menendemus and Asclepiades, who being accused before the Areopagites the chiefe iudges of Athens, as idle persons having no goods in possession, and being willed to declare how they liued, their answer was, that inquiry should be made of their Host who was a Baker. This man being called, said, that they bestowed the whole day in the studie of letters, and the night in sitting and boulding his meale, for which he gaue each of them a peece of money whereof they liued. But what? These ancient Sages wanted but few things to liue withall, seeing the most of them contented themselues with bread and water, and many times with herbes and fruites in stead of bread, and so Pythagoras alwaies liued. And yet they found so great contentation and felicity in such a life, that one Philoxenus having as yet but tasted of the first fruits of his profession of study, and being of that number which was sent by the Athenians to inhabite a new city in Sicilia, wherein a good house with great commodities to liue at ease, fell to him for his part, and seeing that delicacie, pleasure and idleness, without any exercise of letters reigned in those quarters, hee forsooke all and returned to Athens, saying, by the gods these goods shall not destroy me, but I will rather destroy them. All these fruits which are noted to be in pouerty, gaue occasion to an ancient man to say, that it was a vertue of Fortitude to sustaine pouerty patiently, but to desire it was the praise of wisdom. Now forasmuch as it will bee very hard if not altogether vnpossible, notwithstanding all reason that can be alleadged to men, to dispossesse them of the hatred and feare of pouerty, which naturally they shun, let vs learne of the Ancients, who ought to account himselfe poore, that we abuse no more this word Pouerty. Diogenes was vpon a time visited by Alexander, who said vnto him, I see well Diogenes that thou art poore, and hast need of many things, therefore aske of mee what thou wilt, and I will giue it thee. Whereupon this excellent Philosopher despising such offers of goods whereof he stood not in need, answered: Whether of vs twaine Alexander seemeth to thee to haue most neede, and therefore poorest, either I that desire nothing but my pile of wood and a little bread, or thou who being king of Macedonia, dost hazard thy selfe to so many dangers to enlarge thy kingdome, insomuch, that the whole world will hardly suffice to bound thy ambition, and to content thy couetousnesse? The Monarch so greatly admired the magnanimity of this man, that hee vttered these words with a loude voice, If I were not Alexander, I would bee Diogenes. Marins a Consul of Rome distributing land among his countrey-men, gaue to euery one fourteene acres onely. And vnderstanding that some were not contented therewith but demaunded more, I would to God (quoth hee then) that no Romane would care for any more land than would suffice to nourish him. So goodly and commendable a matter was it esteemed of these wise men to bee content with a little, and with that which is sufficient, rather than to thinke those men onely rich that were furnished with store of wealth. And to say truth, seeing God alone simply and absolutely standeth not in neede of any thing whatsoever, it may easily be presupposed, that the most excellent vertue of man, and that which commeth nearest to the diuine nature, consisteth in causing a man to stand in neede of fewest things. This is that which Socrates said, That to desire nothing (meaning worldly things) is in some sort to resemble God. And how can wee call him poore, whose soule is enriched with many great and rare perfections? Cicero writing to Atticus said, That a friend was bound to wish but three things vnto his friend, namely, That hee bee healthy, that hee bee well accounted of, and that hee bee not needy. Now that all these things are found in a temperate and noble minded man, wee may learne by

Zeno.

Diogenes.

Cleantes.

Menendemus & AsclepiadesPythagoras kept a spare
diet.
Philoxenus.Who ought to be esteemed poore.Diogenes supposed Alexander to be poorer than himselfe.A friend is to wish 3. things
to his friend.

by the effects of Sobriety, whereof wee haue heretofore discoursed, and by those of honour, which is neuer separated from vertue, no more than the shadow is from the body. And as for the necessary vse of foode and raiment, it is not wanting to them that stand most in neede thereof, as we haue already touched it in our present speech: and so a vertuous man cannot be called poore. But let vs yeeld a little to the common opinion of worldlings, that pouerty and want of earthly riches is odious and contemptible, yet that pouerty onely which proceedeth of sloth, Idlenes, & ignorance, or otherwise of foolish expences, of riot and superfluitie, may be said to be ful of reproch & shame, & is to be shunned. For whe pouerty is found in an honest, painefull, diligent, iust, valiant & wise man, it serueth for a great prooue of his magnanimitie & greatnesse of courage, because hee hath set his minde vnto great and high matters, and not vpon such small and vile things as the riches of the world are. Amongst many others of this number we may say, that Aristides was, being captaine and gouernour of the Athenian estate, as wee haue already mentioned, who after many excellent and great offices which hee bare to the good of his countrey, was so smally enriched thereby, that being dead, all his goods would not suffice to bury him. He vsed to say, that none ought to be ashamed of pouerty, but they that were poore against their will: and that it was a rarer matter, and worthy of greater praise, to sustaine pouerty vertuously and with a noble minde, than to know how to vse riches well. And so pouerty is neuer accompanied with shame, except it bee to them that fall into it through negligence or misgouernment of those goods which God hath put into their hands, that they should bee faithfull keepers and disposers thereof in charitable workes. This is that which Thucydides saith, that it is no shame for a man to confesse his pouerty, but very great to fall into it by his owne default. Therefore to reape profit by that which hath beene here discoursed, let vs put off that old error which hath continued so long in mens braines, that pouerty is such a great and troublesome euill, whereas it is rather the cause of infinite benefits: and let vs say with Pythagoras, that it is a great deale better to haue a quiet and settled minde, lying vpon the ground, than to haue much trouble in a golden bed. Moreover let vs know, that to possesse small store of earthly goods, ought not to bee called pouerty, because all fulnesse of wealth aboundeth in the knowledge and assurance of the fatherly grace and goodnesse of the author and creator of all things, which he offereth liberally to all without accepting either of pompe or greatnesse. And further, when as, continuing the care which it pleaseth him to take of vs, he giueth vs although in trauaile & sweate, wherewith to feede and to clothe vs in all simplicity and modesty, and that according to our necessity, wee should bee vnthankfull and altogether vnworthy the assistance of his helpe and fauour, and of his eternall promises, if not not contented, nor glorifying him for our estate, wee complained, or wondred at, and desired the calling of other men offering thereby in will and affection our birthrights through a gluttonous desire, whereas wee ought to preferue to our selues the possession of that heavenly inheritance, wherein consisteth the perfection of all glory, rest, and contentation.

What pouerty is odious.

Aristides.

Where the fulnes of riches is to be sought

Of Idlenesse, Sloth, and Gaming. Chap. 35.

A R A M. TWO things being the cause of all passions in men, namely, Griefe and Pleasure, they alwaies desire the one, but shie from and feare the other. But the occasion of the greatest euill that befalleth them, is, because these desires and affections being borne with them from the beginning, doe also grow and encrease along time before they can haue any iudgement framed in them through the right vnderstanding of things. Whereupon as well by nature, which of it selfe is more inclined to euill than to good, as through a long continuing in vice, they are easily drawne to follow the appetite and lust of their sensuality, wherein they falsly iudge that pleasure consisteth, and thinke it painefull not to please it. Being thus guided by ignorance, and walking like blinde men, they haue experience for the most part of such an ende as is cleane contrary to their purposes. As we may see in those men, who purposing with themselves to liue at their ease in ioy, rest, and pleasure, giue ouer all intermedling in serious matters, and such as be seeme the excellency of vertue, that they may liue in idlenesse: wherewith being bewitched they are partakers of many false pleasures, which procure them a greater number of griefes and miseries, all which they thought to auoid very well. And this we may the better vnderstand, if we discourse of Idlenesse, the enemy of all vertue, and cleane contrary to Perseuerance, which is a branch of Fortitude. Therefore I propound the handling of this matter to you my companions.

Griefe & pleasure the causes of all passions in men

A C H I T O B. Although we haue not a singular excellencie of spirit, yet we must not suffer it to be idle, but constantly follow after that which we haue wisely hoped to obtaine. For (as Erasmus saith) that which is often done and reiterated, and continually in hand, is finished at last.

A S E R. They that do nothing (saith Cicero) learne to doe ill, and through idlenesse the bodie and mindes of men languish away: but by labour great things are obtained, yea trauell is a worke that continueth after death. Let vs then giue care to A M A N A, who will handle more at large for our instruction that which is here propounded vnto vs.

Idlenes is the mother and nurse of all
vice.

Idlenes is a gainst nature.

Scipio was neuer idle.

To what end
we must study Philosophie.

Pythagoras
precept against Idlenes

Notable examples of the redresse of Idlenes.

A M A N A. As wee admire and honour them with verie great commendation, in whom wee may note as we thinke, some excellent and singular vertues, so wee contemne them whom wee iudge to haue neither vertue, courage, nor fortitude in them, and whom wee see to bee profitable neither to themselves nor to others, because they are not laborious, industrious, nor carefull, but remaine idle and slothfull. And to say truth, the manners, conditions, and naturall disposition of such men, are wholly corrupted, their conuersation is odious, vnprofitable, and to bee auoided, seeing that Idlenesse is the mother and nurse of vice, which destroyeth and marreth all. Therefore it was very well ordained in the primitiue Church, that euery one should liue of his owne labour, that the Idle and slothfull might not consume vnprofitable the goods of the earth. Which reason brought in that auncient Romane edict, mentioned by Cicero in his booke of Lawes, That no Romane should goe through the streetes of the cittie, vnlesse hee carried about him, the badge of that trade, whereby hee liued. In somuch that Marcus Aurelius (speaking of the diligence of the auncient Romanes, writeth: That all of them followed their labour and trauell so earnestly, that hauing necessary occasion one day to send a letter two or three daies iourney from the towne, hee could not finde one idle body in all the cittie to carrie it. The great Orator and Philosopher Cicero, minding to teach vs how we ought to hate Idlenesse, as being against nature, sheweth that men are in deed borne to good wookes whereof our soule may serue for a sufficient and inuincible prooffe, seeing it is neuer still, but in continuall motion and action. And for the same cause hee greatly commendeth Scipio, who vsed to say, that hee was neuer lesse quiet than when hee was quiet. Whereby hee giueth vs to vnderstand, that when hee was not busied with weightie affaires of the Common-wealth, yet his owne priuate matters, and the searching after knowledge, were no lesse troublesome vnto him, so that euen then in his solitarinesse hee tooke counsell with himselfe. It seemeth (saith this father of eloquence) that nature doth more require of a man such actions as tend to the profit of men, than shee doth the perfect knowledge of all things: seeing this knowledge and contemplation of the workes of nature should seeme to be maimed and vnperfect, if no action followed it; whereas vertuous deedes are profitable to all men, for which ende nature hath brought vs forth, which sheweth sufficiently that they are better and more excellent. So that vnlesse the knowledge of things bee ioyned with that vertue, which preferueth humane societie, it will seeme to bee dead and vnprofitable. Therefore Chrysippus the Philosopher said, that the life of those men that giue themselves to idle studies, differed nothing from that of voluptuous men. So that wee must not studie Philosophy by way of sport, but to the ende wee may profit both our selues and others. Now, if action must of necessity bee ioined to studie and contemplation, to make a happie life, so that otherwise it is as it were dead and idle: what shall we say of that life that is void both of studie and action, but that it is more beast-like than humane? And how many millions of men are there in the world, who liue in this sort, and more in France than in any other nation? Yea, how many are more idle and lesse carefull than brute beasts, neglecting the provision euen of things necessarie for this present life? Amongst the obscure precepts which Pythagoras gaue to his Disciples, this was one: Take good heede that thou sitte not vpon a busshell: meaning, that Idlenesse and Sloth were especially to be eschewed. Likewise, when wee shall enter into the consideration of those evils that issue from Idlenesse and Sloth, no doubt but wee will flie from them, as from the plague, of our soules. They are greatly to be feared in a Common-wealth, because they open a gate to all iniustice, and kindle the fire of sedition, which setteth afloat all kinde of impietie. Furthermore, they are the cause of the finding out of infinite false and pernicious inuentions, for the releuing of pouertie, which for the most part floweth from the same fountaine of Idlenesse. This moued the wise and auncient kings of Egypt, to imploy their idle people in digging of the earth, and in the drawing forth and building of those Pyramides, the chiefe of which is by the Historiographers placed among the seven wonders of the world. It could not bee perfectly finished before the space of twenty yeares, albeit that three hundred and threescore thousand men wrought about it continually.

The

The Captaines and Heads of the Romane armies fearing the dangerous effects of idlenesse, no lesse in their host, than in their townes, caused their souldiers to trauell in making of trenches, when they were not vrged of their enemies, as Marius did alongst the river of Rhone. The Emperour Claudius enjoying an assured peace, caused the chanell Fucinus to be made, that Rome might haue the commoditie of good waters: about which worke thirtie thousand men were daily imployed for the space of twelue yeares. Adrianus seeing a generall peace within his Empire, continually vnderooke new and long iournies, one while into France another while into Germanie, sometimes into Asia, and into other strange countries, causing his men of warre to march with him: saying, that hee did it for feare, least they beeing idle should be corrupted, and forget the discipline of warre, and so be the cause of nouelties. And it seemeth that this was the cause why a wise Romane counselled the Senate not to destroy Carthage, least the Romanes beeing in safety by the vtter subuersion thereof (which onely at that time made head against them) should become idle. But now we may iustly say of them, that through a lazie and cowardlinesse, they haue lost the dignitie and vertue of their forefathers. The Ephories, who were, Governours of the Iacedemonian estate, beeing moued with the same reason with which the Romane Scipio Nasica was touched, after intelligence had of the taking and sacking of a great towne into which their men were entred, said: that the armie of their youth was lost. Whereupon they sent word to the Captaine of the armie, that hee should not after the same manner destroy another towne, which hee had besieged, writing these words vnto him: Take not away the pricke which stirreth forward the hearts of our yong men. Gelon king of Syracuse led his people oftentimes into the fields, as well to labour the ground, and to plant, as to fight, both that the earth might be better, being well dressed, as also because he feared least his people should waxe woorse for want of trauell. So greatly did these ancient wise men feare the pernicious effects of idlenesse and sloth, which bring to nothing and corrupt the goodnesse of nature, whereas diligence and exercise in good education correcteth the naughtinesse thereof. For as close waters (saith Plutarke) putrifie quickly, because they are covered, shadowed, and standing: so they that busie not themselves, but remaine idle, albeit they haue some good thing in them, yet if they bring it not forth, neither exercise those naturall faculties that were borne with them, they corrupt and destroy them vtterly. And which is woorse, as concupiscence (saith Plato) and luxuriosnesse are quenched with great, sharpe, and continuall labour, so are they kindled through idlenesse. A richlesse and slothfull man can finde out nothing that is easie. But there is nothing (saith Seneca) whereunto continuall labour is not able to attaine, and through care and vigilancie men come to the end of most difficult matters. Fortune (saith a Poet) helpeth and fauoureth them that boldly see their hand to the work, but giueth the repulse to fearefull and base minded men. Let vs beleue (saith Pythagoras) that laborious and painefull things will sooner leade vs to vertue, than those that are nice and delicate. And (as Hesiodus saith) the Gods haue placed sweat before vertue: and the way that leadeth vnto her long, difficult, and craggie. A good Pilot seeing a tempest at hand, calleth vpon the gods, that they would grant him grace to escape it: but in the mean while he taketh the helme into his hand, he veileth the foresaile, and bringing about the maine saile, labourerth to come out of the dark sea. Hesiodus commandeth the husbandman to make his vovs to Iupiter and to Ceres, before he either ploweth or soweth, but he must doe it with his hand vpon the plow taile. Plato writing his lawes, forbiddeth a man to fetch water at his neighbours house, before he hath digged and delued in his owne ground even to the claie, and that it be perceived that no water springerth there. In like sort, lawes must provide for necessity, and not fauour sloth and idlenesse. By sloth wee lose that which we haue already gotten, but by diligence we attaine to that which we haue not, and which may be necessary for vs. I passed (saith the wise man) by the field of the slothfull, and by the vineyard of the man destitute of vnderstanding: and lo it was all growne ouer with thornes, and netles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken downe. It is sloth and negligence that causeth a man through want of good vnderstanding and iudgement not to care for the getting of that which is needfull for him, because he feareth least hee should lose it. Whereupon this would follow (which is a very absurd thing) that nothing how deere and precious soeuer it bee, ought to bee sought for or desired, seeing all things are subiect to change, yea knowledge through great diseases, and other inconueniences may bee lessened and lost. Idlenesse and sloth do not hurt the soule onely, but impaire also the health of the body. Yea that rest which a man taketh by negligence, is much more hurtfull vnto him, than painefull exercise. And they which thinke that health needeth necessarily a continuall rest to preferue it well, vsing that goodly pretence because they would not bee troubled with

*Claudius.Adrianus.*The Ephories of Lacedaemonia, Scipio Nasica.Gelon.

A similitude

Sweat is placed before vertue.*Prou. 24.
30. 31.*Idlenesse decaith the health of the body.

moē

No man
ought to hide
his life.

Of gaming
and of the effects thereof.

Chilon refused to make a league with diecers.

The occasion
that moued
the Lydians to inuent games.

Alphonfus
decree against play.

more matters than needs they must, especially with those which concerne publike commodities, as also because they would not take paines in the studie of wisdom; they cannot be better compared than to such as will not vse their eyes in beholding any thing, that they might keepe them the better, neither will speake at all to preserue their voice well. Every kinde of life hath both sicknesse and health, but a sound man cannot take a better course to preserue his health, than to imploy himselfe in the practise of many good and honest duties of humanitie. Yea, we must yet goe farther, and say with Socrates, that diseased men ought not to bee so carefull of their health, that they leaue the studie and exercise of vertue, seeing we are to make but small account of death it selfe. And therefore Plutarke is very earnest against this Epicurian sentence, Hide thy life: which was set downe by Neocles brother to Epicurus, meaning thereby to perswade them that would liue happily, not to intermeddle with any publike matter. But contrariwise (saith this Philosopher) it is dishonest to liue so that no man may know any thing. Art thou vicious? shew thy selfe to those that are able to admonish, to correct and to cure thee, that so thou maiest amend and repent. If in the knowledge of nature thou hast learned by songs to praise God, his iustice, and heauenly providence: or in morall knowledge to commend the law, humane societie, the government of the common-wealth, and therein to respect honour, not profit, hide not this talent, but teach it others, and giue thy selfe an example vnto them of well doing, and of profiting everyone. O diuine counsaile proceeding out of the mouth of an Ethnik, as necessary to be practised at this day, as we see it contemned of so many wise worldlings, who say they haue the absolute and sound reformation of our estate of France in their head, but that as yet there is no time to speake of it. Thus some liue idly and like to recluses because they will take no paine, and others doe worke in maintaining the corruption of the estate, and in cleauing wittingly to the destruction thereof. But let vs proceed to looke vpon the fruits of idlenesse. It is of that fountaine whereof cursed ignorance drinketh and maintaineth her selfe, and from thence flow all pleasures followed with bitterness and griefe, which withdraw vs from all vertuous occupations, to imploy our selues about all kindes of trifles, that are neither good, honest nor profitable, but rather hurtfull and very pernicious. Of which number wee may note gaming, which is as common amongst vs, and as blame-worthie, as any other imperfection, seeing her foundation is laid vpon lucre and couetousnesse, or else vpon the losse of time. Those cursed effects which it bringeth forth daily, as quarrells, murders, blasphemies, cogging, overthrow of houses and families, doe sufficiently testifie vnto vs the infamous nature thereof. Likewise it hath beene so abhorred of the ancient Sages, that Chilon being sent from Lacedemonia to Corinth, to intreat of a league betweene those two peoples, and finding the rulers playing at dice, returning backe againe, and would not speake of his commission, saying, that he would not staine the glory of the Spartanes with so great an ignominie as to ioyne them in societie with dice-players: How many happy ages haue our forefathers passed ouer, and yet neuer heard word of so vnhappy an exercise? And some say that the Lydians were the first inuentors of games, but it was when their countrie was brought into great necessitie of victuals: to the end that by playing, they might finde some helpe and meane to sustaine and to resist hunger the better, by spending every other day in gaming without any meate. Which they continued for the space of twenty and eight yeares, preseruing their countrie by that meane from a generall famine through the great sparing of their prouision. But now adays we see, that men are so farre from recompencing the fault of so vile an occupation by fasting, that contrariwise it is followed with all kinde of dissolutnesse, gluttonie, riot, and superfluitie. And this is seene too much in these new faculties of careless men, who haue taught vs this goodly prouerbe, That a man were betrer loose than bee idle. But if they knew their inestimable losse, not of money which they abuse, but of the richest and most precious thing that may bee spent, and which can neuer be recovered, I meane of time, they would speake cleane contrarie: That to loose is worse then to be idle, because it is ioyned with a naughty action, which of necessitie turneth to the detriment of himselfe or of his neighbour, and oftentimes of both. Among many goodly and holy ordinances, which Alphonfus sonne of Ferdinando king of Spaine, caused those knights to obserue, which he made of the order of the band, (himselfe and all his children being of the same order) this was straightly kept, that no knight should presume to play for any money at cardes or dice, or giue his consent to any such play in his house, vpon paine of forfeiting his wages for one moneth, and himselfe to be forbidden another moneth and a halfe from entring into the kings pallace. But because the nature of man is not able to abide continuall labour, and occasion of busines is not alwaies offered, it shall be lawfull for vs, according to the precept of Plato his Academy,

to

to bestow our leasure vpon some honest pastime and game of moderate pleasure, that is not farre separated from study or vertue, which will not be blame-worthie in vs, so wee vse it as we doe rest or sleepe, after wee haue dispatched and ended graue and serious affaires, according to the gift and facultie of our spirits. Moreouer let vs propound to our selues for example the liues of so many famous and graue men, who both in youth and age laboured to doe good and to profite euery one, esteeming it great honour to end their daies in such a commendable exercise: according to that saying of Erasmus: That in vaine men follow that which is good, and strue to doe well, if they stand still before the end of their daies. For that man loseth his time in running swiftly, who fainteth before he come to the end of his race. Nothing will be vnpossible to thee (saith the same author) so that thy heart faint not. Not to goe forward in the way of the Lord, is all one with turning backward: yea it were better neuer to begin, than not to perseuere vnto the end. This also is that which Cicero teacheth vs, that it is not sufficient to know what ought to be done, but we must abide firme and stedfast in that wherein vpon aduised and good counsell we are once resolved. And though we are out of hope of attaining to perfection, yet we must strue to come vnto it. Many (saith he) that are weakened with despaire, will not undertake that thing which they feare they shall neuer be able to finish: but they that would obtaine great things, and such as are most to be desired, must trie every way. And if any man hath not this excellencie of spirit and greatnesse of heart by nature, neither yet the knowledge of euery good discipline, let him take that course which he is able to attaine vnto. For it is great praise to him that followeth after the excellentest and best things, to stay in the second and third place, if he can doe no better. Those things are great, which are next to perfection. It is our dutie therefore to abide firme and constant in that good and commendable kinde of life, which we haue chosen from the beginning, so that the end thereof be to liue well. And let vs shunne idlenesse in such sort, as to say with Cato, that this is one thing whereof wee ought to repent vs most; if we know that we haue spent a whole day, wherein wee haue neither done nor learned some good thing. Phocylides minding to instruct vs in this matter, said, that in the euening we ought not to sleepe, before wee haue thrice called to our remembrance whatsoever we haue done the same day, repenting vs of the euill, and reioicing in our well doing. Apelles the best painter that euer was, would not suffer one day to passe without drawing of some line, meaning thereby (as he said) to fight against idlenesse, as with an arrow. Aleas king of Scythia said, that hee seemed to himselfe to differ nothing forme his horsekeeper, when hee was idle. Dionysius the elder beeing demaunded if hee were neuer idle, answered: God keepe me from that: for as a bowe (according to the common prouerbe) is marred and breaketh by beeing too much bent: so is the soule through too much idlenesse. This is that which Masinissa the Aphrican would learnedly teach vs, of whom Polybius writeth that hee died when he was fourescore and ten yeares of age, leauing behind him a sonne that was but foure yeares old. A little before he died, after he had discomfited the Carthaginians in a maine battell, hee was seene the next day eating of course browne bread, saying to some that marvelled thereat, That as iron is bright and shineth so long as it is used by the hand of man, whereas a house falleth into decay when no man dwelleth therein, (as Sophocles saith) so fareth it with this brightnesse and glistering light of the soule, whereby we discourse, vnderstand, and remember. The same reason moued Xerxes father to say to Darius, that in perilous times and dangerous affaires, hee increased in wisdom. Likewise politicall knowledge, which is such a prudence, settled mind, iustice, and experience, as knoweth full well how to make choice of, and to take fit opportunitie in all things that happen, cannot be maintained but by the practise and managing of affaires, by discoursing and iudging. Now to conclude our present treatise, seeing wee know that we are borne to all vertuous actions, let vs flie from idlenesse and sloth, the wel springs of all iniustice and pouertie, the stirrers vp of infinite passions in the soule, and the procurers of sundry diseases in the body, euen to the vtter destruction of them. And let vs embrace diligence, care, travell, and studie, which are sure guides to leade vs to that ende for which wee ought to liue, that is, in glorifying God, to profite our selues in honest things, and also all those with whom we liue, wherein consisteth all the happinesse and contentation of the life of good men. And let vs not doubt but that all time otherwise spent, is lost time: knowing that all times in respect of themselves are alike, but that which is imploied in vertue is good in regard of vs, and that which is vnprofitable wasted, and in vice is naught. Further, let vs learne neuer to giue over the effecting and finishing of that which we once know to belong to our dutie, seeing that without perseuerance neither he that fighteth can obtaine the victory, neither the conquerour the garland, but hee that continueth to the end, shall be saued. Therefore let

How we may recreate our selues.

Of perseue-
rance.

An excellent precept of Phocylides.
Examples against idlenes.

An excellent
comparison.

How political knowledge
must be preserved.

The fruits of idlenesse.

The end of
our life.

Math. 10. 12.

vs be carefull to make profite of that talent which is giuen vs to keepe, that we be not found euill and vnprofitable seruants before him, to whom we must yeeld an account euen of euery idle and vaine word.

Math. 12. 36.

Of an Enemy, of Iniurie, and of Reuenge. Chap. 36.

A M A-N A.

HAuing hitherto in three daies workes discoursed (according to our iudgement) of all the parts of the vertue of Fortitude, and of those commendable effects that issue from it, to the correcting of many vices and imperfections, which abound in mans nature, I thinke that to end this afternoone, we are yet to resume and to continue the speech already begun by vs (as also we then promised) of one principall point concerning true magnanimitie, and greatnesse of courage, which respecteth our enemies, thereby to know more particularly both our dutie towards them, and also what good may come to vs from them, if we sustaine and beare couragiously their iniuries, forsaking all desire and lust of reuenge.

A pretie comparison.

A R A M. As industrious Bees gather the driest and most pearcing hony of bitter Time: so a wise and vertuous man (saith Xenophon) knoweth how to draw profite and commoditie from his enemies, vpon whom we must beware of reuenging our selues, least (as Theophrastus saith) we hurt our selues more than them.

A C H I T O B. It is the propertie (saith Cicero) of famous personages and noble hearts to contemne iniuries offered vnto them by knowne wicked men; whose commendation of a man importeth some dishonesty in him. Now then A S E R, teach vs somewhat of this matter wherein we haue so great need of instruction.

Good friends or sharpe enemies are necessarily required to a happie life.

A S E R. The Cynicke Philosophers said, that if a man would be in safetie and partaker of happinesse, he must of necessitie haue good friends or sharpe enemies, that the first sort by good and wise admonitions, and these by notable iniuries, might withdraw him from doing of euill. And truly if we consider the profite and commoditie which may come vnto vs from him that voluntarily without occasion giuen him, (as it is our dutie not to offend any) is become our enemy, by gouerning our selues therein with the reason of a true Academical prudence, besides that we shall shew forth the effects of that title which we beare, and of the end of our being, wee must bee so farre off from hating an enemy, that wee should rather thinke our selues beholding and bound vnto him for that great good which hee procureth vnto vs.

Why men are beholding to their enemies.

That this is so, is not this one propertie of vice to make us more ashamed before our enemies when wee haue committed a fault, than before our friends? Doe wee not take our enemy for a spie and enuier of our life? If any imperfection reigne in vs, who will more freely giue vs to vnderstand thereof than hee that hateth vs, who will not bee slacke to publish it euery where? For this reason Plutarke calleth an enemy a Schoole-master that costeth vs nothing of whom wee learne that which may greatly profite vs, and which we know not. To this effect hee maketh mention in his Apothegmes of an Athenian captaine who complained to Aristo cheife captaine of the Lacedæmonians, that his souldiers blazed abroad the manners of the Athenians: If the Athenians (said Aristo vnto him) did looke well to their doings, they should not neede to care what the Spartans could say of them. These things being well considered by vs, if we haue enemies, they will be a meane to make vs more fearefull and restrained from offending, and more earnest and diligent to order well our behauiour, to direct our doings, and to correct our imperfections. But let vs marke a little how the noble and couragious youtnes of the world behaue themselves now adaies. The reproofes and iniuries of an enemy, may peradventure bee tolerated in some sort by the skilfullest sort of those that boast themselves to be so curious obseruers and readie defenders of their honour, so that they be not vttered in their presence: because they say that they cannot be offended at that which is spoken of them in their absence, and that they which speake so, will not auouch that slander before their faces, which they raised behinde their backs. According to these weake reasons they would haue other men iudge of reproch and iniurie, either to credit or to discredit them according to their power, and not as the truth of the fact it selfe requireth: whereupon also they passe that ouer with profit & amendment of the life, which they knew was disliked in them. There are others, who vpon a bare report made vnto them, thinke themselves greatly misused and harmed by those that spake ill of them, so that presently they purpose to be auenged of them. But herein they agree all, that if any man voluntarily offereth iniurie to another,

How men behaue themselves now adaies towards their enemies

they would haue the sworde presently to decide the controuersie, What say I, for an iniury? Nay for a yea or a nay, they forthwith thinke that the lie is given them, and that they are outfaced, so that nothing but the death of the one, or of both together, and oftentimes of their dearest and best friendes, is able (as they thinke) to repaire the preiudicate and supposed offence, and all for this vaine honour of the world. O detestable fury, not to bee found in most cruell beasts, which spare the blood of their sexe! It is not conuenient, that any time should bee lost in reproouing the same, beeing of it selfe so odious, that it cannot so much as be once named but with shame, trembling and horror. For no man is so dull of vnderstanding, but he knoweth that effusion of blood is forbidden by God, and that outrage being in no sort permitted, much lesse may a Christian forget himselfe so farre as to kill another, except it be through necessitie in defending his owne body, or in the seruice of his prince and country in a iust warre. Amongst all the sententious sayings of Socrates the wise, and the wonderfull works of Plato his scholler, I find none more diuine, or worthy of greater praise than the sentence so often repeated by them, That reuenge is not in any sort to bee vsed. It is not iust (saide the same Socrates) to offend any, although hee had offended vs wrong. For a good man neuer ought to do euill: yea it is a great deale better to suffer, than to offer contumely, so bee slaine, than to slay, because the one bringeth no detriment to man, who is the soule, but the other procureth the utter ruine and destruction thereof. This will sound very ill in many mens eares. But if they will iudge without passion, and had eyes to see, and eares to vnderstand the end of their being & calling, as also the reason of true prudence and generosity taught vs the by study of Philosophy, no doubt but they would subscribe to the opinion of these wise Philosophers, agreeing very well with that which is taught by the spirit of God, who cōdemneth the murderer, and him that offereth wrong and iniurie to another: but calleth himselfe the defender of innocency, and such a one as returneth a double reward and recompence to those that suffer for righteousnes and equitie. Who may therefore doubt but that it is farre better to receiue than to do euil, to be killed than to kill, seeing by the one the good houre of our perpetuall rest and felicitie is hastened forward, and by the other wee are vtterly frustrated thereof, and throwne into a hell of eternall fire? So that if wee endeouour to shew forth the effects of true Magnanimity and greatnesse of heart, there is no doubt but to beare and to endure withall modesty and patience the outrages and wrongs of our enemies, is the marke of that vertue which is most absolute and perfect. That it is so, doth it not appeare in this, that vertue consisteth in difficult things? And that vertue that commeth nearest to the diuine nature, which is hardest to bee obtained, and least familiar with men, it is not more woorthy and vnbeseeeming a noble and valiant man, than all the rest? Vnto which may wee attribute better this marke than to the vertue of patience, whereof we haue already intreated? We see no man vpon earth of so base estate, no woman so feeble and weake, no liuing creature so little, but if they bee stricken they will reuenge themselves very willingly as well as they can. How greatly then ought this vertue to bee accounted of, which forceth this naturall lust of reuenge, bred in all liuing creatures, and how noble must the mind of that man needes be which is able to maister such a violent passion, so common to all men, thereby procuring to it selfe the name of a mild and gracious spirit, and ready to forgive, which is proper and peculiar to the diuine nature? Therefore that great Monarch Alexander, said, That a man wronged had neede of a more noble heart to forgive his enemy, than to be reuenged of him, and to kill him. Behold the saying of as noble a prince as euer the earth bare. What can the Courtiers of these times say to the contrary? It is a great vertue (saith Epictetus) not to hurt him of whom thou art misused. It is a very commendable thing to pardon him whom thou mightest hurt, and it is a praise worthy kinde of reuenge, to lett them goe to peace that are ouercome. Therefore Pittacus the Sage hauing one in his power that had dealt contumeliously with him, hee suffered him to depart vnharmed, saying, That pardon was better than reuenge, the one beeing proper to the spirit of a man, the other of a cruell beast. But further, although it were onely in respect of our owne benefite during our life, wee ought to shunne all motions of iniury, and all desire of reuenge: forasmuch as wee cannot either determine or execute the same, but with a thousand perturbations, which causevs to want the rest and tranquillity of our soules, wherein all our happinesse and felicity consisteth. And therefore Seneca saith, If hee that wronged thee bee weaker than thou, forgive him: if hee bee mightier, spare thy selfe. For who soeuer nourisheth his neighbours anger, who soeuer prouoketh and incenseth him more, when hee seeth him vehement and importunate against him, hee committeth two faulks. First hee hateth himselfe by procuring his owne trouble and grieve: Secondly, his brother, because he maketh him sad, and vexeth him. Moreouer prudent men (as Theophrastus saith)

Murder forbidden.

A notable sentence.

Leuit. 24. 17.
Psal. 9. 9. 16.
Mat. 5. 10.

To suffer iniury patiently is a badge of a most absolute vertue.

A commendable kinde of reuenge.

Good counsell of Seneca.

ought

We must do nothing in choler.

An apt simi-litude.

How a man
may profit by the backbit-
ing of his enemies.

The best kind of reuenge.

How many waies a man
may receiue
iniurie.

Men must not take the law into their owne hands,
although it
be not rightly executed.

Of the offence done to honor.

ought to doe nothing in choler. For that vnreasonable part of the soule beeing mooued, foreseeeth nothing wisely, but beeing driuen forward with a contentious desire, suffereth it selfe to bee carried hither and thither, as if it were drunken. Also wee must take great heede, that wee doe not alwaies put in execution whatsoeuer wee haue a minde vnto, but onely that which moderate reason commaundeth vs. Wherein wee shall deserue the praise of true Magnanimitie, if I say, wee can commaund our selues and all vehemency of choler, which driueth men forward to be auenged on their enemies, and is in act that saoureth more of a vile and abiect heart drawing neere to brutish fiercenes, than of a noble minde which despi- seth whatsoeuer is earthly, mortall, and fading, that it may thinke of nothing but of heauen and immortality. This is that which the study of our Philosophy teacheth vs; and even as ex- pert Phisitions know how to drawe medicines apt for the preservation of life out of serpents, poisons, and other deadly and venomous things: so we ought to draw from our enemies, not their life, which ought to be onely in the power of God and of his iustice, but profit and com- modity by their backbitings, reproches, and iniuries. Which will easily be done, if we make small account of their intent, and consider narrowly the fact which they speake ill of, to the end that if we be guilty of that which they condemne in vs, wee may purge and correct our selues. And if so be they harme vs wrongfully, their impudencie will cause their reproaches and iniuries to be turned backe, and sent against themselves, together with that shame and dammage, which they thought to procure vnto vs, whereas we shall be no lesse honest and vertuous men than before. So that the best teuenge and most honourable victorie, which wee can carry away from our enemies, will be to surpass them in diligence, bountie, mag- nanimity, good turnes, and in all vertuous actions: whereby they will sooner perceiue and confesse themselves vanquished and constrained to stoppe their mouth, and to repress their tongue, than by any other force, which wee can oppose against them. Then may wee say, that as he who enterprised to kill Pormetheus the Thessalian, gaue him so great a blowe with a sword vpon an apostume which put him in danger of death, that by launcing it hee saued his life contrary to his meaning: so the iniurious speeches of our enemies vttered in wrath and of ill will to hurt vs, haue bene the cause of curing many euils in vs whereof we made no account, and of making vs much better than we were before. But because iniurie seemeth so hard and vnease to be tollerated by the imbecility of mans nature, which is so soon offen- ded, and by the heart of man beeing full of reuenge, let vs yet see whether we can finde any remedy, if not to cure that which is incurable, at least wiseto purge and to cleanse the acci- dents of this euill. Iniurie is offered either to the goods, to the honour, or to the person of a man. As touching the first and last, namely, the spoiling of our goods, and violence offered to our person, what other reuenge either by the law of God or of man can wee haue than to repulse force with force, I meane when wee are constrained thereunto, or else by the way of the Prince his iustice, which is open to euery one? If any haue robbed thee, must thou be- come a theefe or satisfie thy selfe by thine owne strength? Much lesse oughtest thou to sette thy selfe against him that is not faultie, as many doe. If thou being the weaker are overtaken hurt and wronged, oughtest thou to vse new force, violence and murder to reuenge thy selfe, and to repaire thy iniurie receiued? The sword is in the hands of the King and of the Ma- gistrate that representeth his person: and it belongeth to him onely to vse it against them that trouble publike tranquillity and ciuill society; to the ende there should be no shew, that any other either would or durst meddle with the soueraigntie, whose greatnesse and preser- uation consisteth in the administration of iustice. Yea the lawes haue alwaies so abhorred vi- olence and priuat force, that they haue restored theeuers and robbers into those places which they vniustly possessed, if they had bin driuen from them by violence. But some man will say, that these things ought indeed to be duly considered of, if iustice were executed, and had not forsaken the earth to dwell in heauen. And how then canst thou execute it, seeing thou art not called to doe, but to demaund iustice? Tarie, and the iust Iudge will returne double that which hath bene vniustly taken from thee, which thou hast suffered, or which hath bene denied thee, even then when you shalt haue greater need than now that thy daies are so short: and then shalt thou liue for euer of that which thou hast reaped in this poore and miserable life. Concerning honour, the iniurie whereof we feare more than of the other let vs know, that it cannot be hurt in a good man, because vertue, which is inuincible, prote- cteth & defendeth it. But now adaiies we fetch it not so far off. For we wil haue our honor ty- ed to the vaine opinion of the world, which reiecteth & contemneth those men as cowards and base minded, that haue but once put vp the least iniurie offered by another, but honoreth as noble and couragious those that can lustily kill their enemies. This is the cause why many, who would willingly forgette an iniurie receiued, dare not doe it for loue of their friendes: as also because they see, that it would rather bee imputed vnto them as a token of a fainte heart, than of a desire to follow reason. But let all these blood suckers, inclined to reuenge and to murder, couer their beastly cruelty as well as they can, yet haue they no other reason to disguise it but this, that it is an vsuall kinde of behauiour now adaies amongst men, to the ende they may bee welcommed, praised, and fauoured of Kings, Princes, and great Lords, otherwise they must take a Coule, and shutte vp themselves in some cloister, But they must needs affirme this withall, that they had rather vndoe and condemne themselves with the multitude, so they may haue worldly honour, than bee saued with the small number of honest men, except peradventure they will say, that they knowe no other life but this, and that they will liue onely for the world, without beleefe or hope of a second and eternall life. And albeit they confesse a second life with their mouth, yet their deeds declare sufficiently, that they are altogether ignorant of the nature and happinesse of the other life, and that they care not greatly to come vnto it. But let vs that are better instructed imitate Socrates, who beeing counselled to reuenge a wrong receiued made this answer, what? If a Maffiue had bitte mee, or an aile giuen mee a blow, would you haue mee serue writtes vpon them? So let vs behaue our writs towards them that are froward and vicious, making a great deale lesse account of their iniuries, than of a blow that burterth, which they cannot doe at all to our honour. As for good men we shall neuer be hurt by them. Now, if wee draw neere, although neuer so little, to the perfection of such a nature, much lesse ought we to bee prouoked and stirred vp through any laughter or gibing which cannot touch or offend any but those that are troubled and carried away with passions. Thus much did Socrates wisely giue one to vnderstand, who told him that certain mocked him, I doe not (quoth he) think that I am mocked. Hereupon I remember a notable answer made by one Ptolemæus king of Egypt, who was counsellor to punish a Gramarian. The king demaunding of him by the way of gibing, who was father to Peleus, hee made this answer: that he desired first to know who was Lagus his father, noting thereby that the king was borne of base parentage, If it bee vnseemlie (quoth Ptolemæus to his friends) for a king to be mocked, it is also vndecent for him to mocke another. Now although it be our duty to treade vnder foote all desire of reuenge, and to make no account of iniuries and mocks, yet it is lawfull for vs sometime, if wee bee disposed, and no greater offences arise thereof, to stoppe the mouthes of such as are iniurious and impudent, with a little short reply, not in wrath or choler, but with a certaine meekenes and graue smiling, and somewhat nippingly, so that it passe not the boundes of modestly. Cato knew well how to behaue himselfe after this sort, who being iniuriously dealt withal by one that had alwaies liued wickedly, saide thus vnto him: I am not able to deale with thee in this manner by contending with iniuries. For thou hast thoroughly used thy selfe both to utter reproches freely, & to suffer with ease when any man offereth thee wrong or iniury. But as for me, I delight neither in hearing, nor in uttering the same. Likewise Demosthenes answered another in this sort: I wil not enter into this combat with thee, wherein the vanquished is better than the vanquisher. Plato also being touched with iniurious speeches, saide: Goe on to speake ill, seeing thou diddest neuer learne to speake well. Lysander, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, being reuiled with many bitter speeches, said to him that offered the iniury: Spue out boldly my friend, spue out boldly and often, and spare not, so see if thou canst emptie thy soule of that euill and wickednesse wherewith it is replenished. Shall wee thinke now, that these famous men, making so small account of iniuries and wrongs, had any other bound than right and iustice onely in the hatred of the vices of wicked men, or that they would haue sought by any other way for the satisfying of those wrongs, which they receiued? Let vs consider how Scaurus behaued himselfe towards his enemy Domitius, against whom he was to put vp a complaint by way of iustice. There was one of Domitius his seruants, who before iudgement was giuen of their processe, came to Scaurus, and said, that he would disclose vnto him a matter of great importance against his maister, which vndoubtedly would cause him that was his aduerser partie to gaine his sute, But he not minding to heare him any further, tooke order that he should be straightly bound, & so fet him to his maister. The means which Agefilaus vsed to make his enemies his friends, in stead of reuenging himselfe vpon them, are worthie of eternall praise, and ought to mooue vs greatly to correct our naturall imperfections, so much inclined to reuenge. For when he could come to the knowledge of them, without any further shew, hee thrust them into publike offices and charges. And if it fell out so that they committed any offence wherebie they were drawne to iudgement, hee holpe them as

The excuse
of quarrellersSocrates void of reuenge.We must not be mooued
with mocks.

Ptolemæus.

How a man may repulse a mocke.

Cato,

Demosthenes.

Plato.

Lysander.

The limits
that are to be vsed in hearing the wicked.

Scaurus.

How Agefilaus made his enemies his friends.

Augustus.

The Venetia

Pontinus.

The prudēce
of Dyonisius
in punishing euil speakers.Anti henes
counsaile.

Matth. 5. 44.

Rom. 12. 19.

much as he could, by that meanes winning the friendship of euery one. For although wee commonly say, that as one and the same Sunne softeneth the waxe, and hardeneth the clay, so good deeds winne the hearts of good men, but prouoke the wicked; yet there is no man of so peruerse a nature, whom a man cannot make his friend by plying him often with benefits, and when occasion is offered, by binding him with some notable good turne. For this cause Augustus, after the conspiracy of Cinna was discovered, notwithstanding that he had him in his power, being convicted by his own letter, yet he did not onely forgive him, but taking him by the hand, sware friendship with him, and bestowed vpon him great estates and dignities, wherein Cinna afterward serued him faithfully. And it seemeth that for the same reason the Venetians hauing taken the Duke of Mantua their deadly enemy, in steade of taking his estate from him, they made him their Generall capitaine: so that he euer abode their faithful friend. Pontinus also an ancient captain of the Samnites, said, That they were either fiesly to set at libertie the Romane armie, which was surprised in the streights of the mountaine Apeninus, and so make them loyal friends through the bond of so great a good turne, or else to put them all to death, thereby to take from the enemies a great part of his strength. Neither may wee here let goe in silence the discretion of Dyonisius the elder, king of Syracusa, in punishing an iniury. Which example ought to cause all them to blush: who in surie and choler, after an iniury receiued, or after some report thereof, seeke presently for some cruell reuenge. This king beeing told that two young men as they were drinking together, had spoken many outrageous words of him, he inuited them both to supper. And perceiuing that one of them, after he had taken a little wine into his head, vttered and committed much folly, and that contrariwise the other was very staied, and drunke but a little, hee punished this fellow as one that was malicious, and had beene his enemy of set purpose, but forgave the other, as beeing drunken, and moued by the wine to speake ill of him. Concluding therefore our present discourse, let vs learne that it is the property of a great and noble minde to be milde, gracious, and ready to forgive. and that it is a greater point of Magnanimity to surmount the common nature of men by a wonderfull diuinitie of the soule, than to follow after that which beasts are able to do better than we. For many of them in this earthly generosity, whereof many men make so great account, excell and surpasse the best of them all. In all debates and controuersies with our enemies, let vs retaine (as Cicero counelleth vs) grauity and constancy, and chase away all choler: because nothing that is done through perturbation can be done constantly, or be approoued of any. Let vs not be afraid (said Antisthenes) to wish all the good in the world to our enemies, except valure, which may make them rash to venture vpon our life: and let vs giue ouer all will to procure them any hurt or displeasure, or any maner of reuenge. Let vs rather desire not to be spared of them in those things which are blame worthy in vs, in that so we may be more ready to amend and correct them. Let vs lone our enemies, blesse them that curse vs, do good to them that hate and persecute vs, overcoming euill with good, and leauing all vengeance to him that hath reserved it to himselfe, who by his power directeth the nets, swords, hatchets, instruments and scourges of his wrath, all which are our enemies for the amendment of our life: and then shall wee shew forth those true effects of the vertue of Fortitude and Magnanimity, with our heauenly Father requireth of vs.

The end of the ninth daies worke.

The tenth daies worke.

Of Justice. Chap. 37.

A S E R,

What true Philosophy is

Iste Philosophie (saith Socrates) is to know and to practise both privately and publicly those things that are honest and iust. This is that prudence which teacheth vs well and nobly to gouerne both domesticall and ciuill affaires, the name whereof is Temperance and iustice. By which speech this wise Philosopher taught vs the straight and vnseparable coniunction and knotte of the foure morall vertues, being neuertheless distinguished by their proper and particular effects. Which hauing hitherto offered vs matter wherein to reioyce our spirits about the three first riuers flowing out of the fountaine of honesty nelly, thereremaineth now for vs to consider of the last of them, which although it bee but one particular, yet in truth it is the very perfection of all duty, and is called Iustice: the precepts whereof if we keepe diligently, we shall truly become images of God his essence, and be made according to his likenesse. Let vs then begin my Companions, to intreate of this great and heavenly vertue.

AMANA. Iustice (saith Cicero) is the mistresse of all the other vertues, and as it were their Queene. Shee is the ground-woke of euerlasting glory and renowne, and without her nothing can be praise worthy. Shee putteth a difference betweene the good and the bad, which being taken away (saith Seneca) nothing followeth but confusion. For to reward the wicked and not the good, to afflict the vertuous, and not to chastise the euill man, is to make a gallimaufrey of vice and vertue.

ARAM. What is Iustice but godlinesse (saith Lactantius) and what is godlines but the knowledge of God our Father? Notwithstanding in respect of vs, Iustice is commonly taken for an equall distribution of right and of lawes. But of thee (ACHITO) we shall presently vnderstand the greatnesse and riches of this precious vertue, and the vnspcakable fruits which she distributeth liberally for the profit of all men.

ACHITO. *No kingdome, common wealth, or city (saith Plato) can be either well ruled or instituted in the beginning, or preserved and kept in a happy estate without diuine or humane Iustice, without the counsell of the aged, or without the fauour of the heavenly wisdome. Now that is diuine iustice (as Lactantius saith) whereby we are ioyned to God by deuotion and good will: and humane iustice knitteth vs vnto men by mercie and humanitie. Whereby we see that the foundation of all iustice is grounded vpon that honour and seruice which we owe to God, whereupon wee are induced to be dutifull to our neighbours according to charitie. Therefore wee must aboue all things loue iustice, and apply all our studie thereunto, seeing it is the first and principall point that concerneth the direction of a Christians mans life, yea moe are partakers of the fruite thereof, than of any other vertue. Iustice (saith Seneca) is the law of God, and the bond of humane society. For auoiding therefore of confusion in this matter, we say with Plato, that Iustice obserued and kept towards God, taketh vnto it the name of pietie. But we will enter in to the handling of that iustice onely, which hath respect to our dealing with men, beeing by the same Plato called an equall distribution towards all the world, according to the deserts of every one, and a sure foundation of cities and common-wealths. He saith also, that iustice requireth vpright dealing thoroughout a mans calling and charge, and that nothing is more like to the greatnesse of God, than a man perfectly iust. Aristotle calleth iustice a generall vertue, because hee that hath her perfectly, may boast that he hath within him all the other vertues. For hee could not know what were iust and vniust, nor make choise of the one and shie from the other, if he were not prudent, to which vertue that thing doth properly belong. Neither could he exercise the precepts of iustice, if by temperance hee knew not how to moderate all his passions and priuate affections, not suffering himselfe to bee overcome either with wine, gluttonie, lust, couetousnesse, or with any other desires and motions, which hinder the vse of reason. Besides, he could not practise one principall and diuine point of iustice, which is, to succour with all his might the afflicted and oppressed, and to prouide that no man bee wronged if it lie in his power, notwithstanding any danger whereunto hee may fall, although it be certaine losse of life, and of all earthly and transitory goods, I say hee could not practise this, if through Fortitude and Generosity hee contemne not death, the earth, and whatsoever fauoreth of the world, that he may be (so farre forth as his humane nature will suffer) a follower of the diuinitie. Iustice (saith Cicero) is a constant and perpetuall will and desire to giue to euery one his right. Shee is the proper vertue of a noble minded man, because shee is profitable to others, but to herselfe fruitlesse, laborious, and perilous. Yea that man onely may be called iust, that profiteth as many as he can, but hurteth none, that is alwaies at agreement within himselfe, and is a friend to God, to men, and to himselfe. Iustice (saith Diogenes) worketh great tranquillitie and perfect felicitie in our soules. For to be affraid of none, and not to blush at the sight of any mans person, bringeth with it great contentation, and is as it were the perfection of life, which is proper onely to a iust soule. Iustice (saith Hesiodus) is a chaste and reuerent virgine, not violated or defiled, but lodged alwaies with chastity, and simplicitie. Pindarus calleth her the Queene of all the world. Pythagoras teaching by his riddle-like precepts, how a man ought to beware of transgressing iustice, saith: Goe not beyond the ballance. If we purpose (saith Plato) to exercise iustice perfectly, we must make no difference of men in regard either of their friendship, kindred, wealth, pouerty, or dignity. This vertue (saith Cicero) requires of vs the forsaking of our pleasures & priuate commodity,*

The diuision
of Iustice.
The difference
betweene
Commuta-
tiue and Ditributiue Iustice.
The ende of Iustice.
The necessity
of Iustice.

Diuers names agree to Iustice in diuers
respects.

Jerem. 21. 12.
& 23. 3.

What Iustice
and Iudge-
are.

The Egyptians were zealous of Iustice
How they painted Iudges.

The Græcians and Ro-manes.

What city is best governed.

modity, that wee may procure the benefit of the Common-wealth, although it bee to our perill and losse. And those men commaund and gouerne very well, who forbid vs to doe any thing whereof wee doubt whether it bee iust or vniust: because equity is so cleare of it selfe, that when we doubt of any thing, we may bee assured that there is some iniustice in it. Aristotle and Cicero diuide Iustice into these two parts, Distributiue and Commutatiue. Distributiue iustice consisteth in giuing to euery one according to his desert, whether it be honor and dignity, or punishment. Commutatiue iustice is in keeping fidelity, and in causing it to be kept in promises and contracts, and in behauing our selues no otherwise to another, than we would be dealt withall. Many parts and particular duties are also attributed by the Philosophers to iustice, as Liberality and sundry other, whereof wee will particularly discourse hereafter. But we must heere learne, that the end of all iustice tendeth to the preservation of the common society of men. For the preservation of the lawes (which are the Gardian & Tutor of good men, and a mortall enemy to the wicked) is so necessary for euery estate & condition of life, that (as Cicero saith) the very pyrates, theeues & robbers could not liue together without some part therof. If we desire to know more of her vnspeakable fruits, let vs consider that which Paulus the Pythagorian hath written, saying: Iustice among men ought in my opinion to be called the mother & nurse of all the other vertues. For without her no man could be either temperate, valiant or prudent: the profit wherof will be very euident if we consider all her effects. For the providence of God is that iustice which governeth the world, & hath the principallty ouer it. In cities & townes iustice is rightly called Equity and Peace: in particular houses betweene the husband and the wife, Vnity & Concord: in respect of seruants towards their masters, Goodwill: of masters towards their seruants, Humanity and Gentleness: and in mens bodies, Health & Perfection of the members. Thus you see that iustice is the beginning & perfection of all the vertues. By these short sayings of ancient & graue personages, the excellency of this holy and sacred vertue iustice, appeareth sufficiently vnto vs. Yea it is so earnestly commanded by the spirit of God vnto Magistrates in these words of exercising iudgement and iustice, so often repeated, that whosoever infringeth and violateth it, cannot auoide the curse and wrath of the Almighty, which will both light vpon their owne heads, and also worke the destruction of them that are committed to their charge. It belongeth to iustice, to receiue the innocent into protection and safegard, to maintaine, defend, sustaine, and deliuer them: and to iudgement, to resist the boldnesse of the wicked, to repress their violence, and to punish their offences: because Magistrates are therefore armed with the sword and with power, that publike peace should not bee disturbed. This also is that which Solon meant to teach vs, when hee said: That the greatnesse and preservation of all Common-wealths consisteth in two things, in the reward of the good, and in the punishment of the wicked: which beeing taken away, the whole discipline of humane society must needs bee dissolued and come to nothing. For there are many that haue no great care to doe well, if they see not vertue recompenced with some honour: although this becometh not a noble minded man, who ought to doe nothing but onely for the loue of vertue. And againe, the malice of the wicked cannot bee bridleed, if they see not vengeance and punishment prepared for offenders. All these aboue specified considerations did so greatly recommend iustice to the men of old time, and caused them to esteeme so much of it, that whensoever occasion was offered to maintaine and execute it, it was preferred before all things: insomuch that the father did not pardon his owne sonne. The Egyptians were the ancientest Law-makers, as Historiographers report, and were very carefull and diligent obseruers of iustice. In their cities they painted Iudges without hands, and the President or chiefe Iustice with his eyes blind-folded: to teach, that iustice ought not to bee either a briber or respecter of persons, that is, shee must neither take any thing, nor iudge for any fauour. The kings of their countrey obserued this order, to cause Iudges when they were installed by them in their offices, to sweare, that albeit they were commaunded by them to iudge vniustly, yet they should not obey them. Since their time, the auncient Græcians and Romanes shewed themselves great, true, and zealous followers of this vertue of iustice, and that towards their greatest enemies. They iudged it a very noble act to accuse the wicked, so it were not vpon any any private occasion or passion: they delighted greatly to see yong men by way of iustice to pursue transgressors, as gray-hounds well flesht follow after wilde beafts. This caused Solon being demanded what city seemed to him to be best gouerned, to answer: That city wherein they that are not wronged, do as eagerly follow after satisfaction in the behalfe of another man wronged, as if themselves had receiued the iniurie. For the truth is (quoth he) that they which violate and breake lawes, do not offend one man alone, but the whole city and common-wealth: therefore euery ought to desire and seeke seeke after iust punishment: Moreouer, the severity which the Lacedæmonians obserued in their iudgements, procured such a publike safety, that for a long time they vsed not to put either locks to cofers, or barres to gates. Aristotle maketh mention of a certaine countrey, where the inhabitants were to assure the safety of the waies, and to repay vnto passengers that losse, which they had receiued by theeues and robbers. Neither is it long since the like statute was obserued in many places of Italie. But I stand greatly in doubt, that at this day it is ifsauredlie kept. O happie, yea an hundred times happy was the golden age of those famous men, full of heavenly spirit, because vnder their gouernment Iustice was had in such honour and reuerence. But let vs rub vp the memorie hereof by some notable examples. If any thing causeth Magistrates to commit iniustice, it is chiefly the fauour which they beare, and the bond wherewith they are bound more to some than to others. Therefore Cleon the Lacedæmonian minding to deale in publike affaires, gathered all his friends together, and told them that hee renounced and discharged himselfe of all their friendship, because friendship many times caused men to yeeld, and to step aside from their good and right purposes in matters of iudgement. True it is that when we haue none but good men to our friends, who are moued and possessed with the same zeale to vertue that we are, as before was mentioned, we shall neuer fall into these inconueniences. The example of Aristides the Athenian his loue vnto iustice, is worthy of speciall remembrance. For calling into the law an enemy of his, after hee had set downe his accusation, the Iudges were so moued against the accused partie, for the impietie of the fact in controuersie, that they would haue condemned him vnheard: so greatly did they trust to the honestie of the accuser, that he had set downe nothing but the very truth. But Aristides, who for his great and rare vertue had before deserued the surname of Iust, went with the accused party and cast himselfe at the Iudges feete, beseeching them, that he might bee heard, to iustifie and to defend himselfe, according as the lawes commaunded. Further, one writeth of him, that when hee was vpon a time Iudge betweene two parties that pleaded before him, one said: My aduersary hath done thee great wrong, Aristides. But he forthwith interrupting his talke, made this answer, My friend, declare onely whether hee hath wronged thee. For I am hereto doe thee right, and not my selfe: shewing thereby, that Iustice ought to bee executed without any priuate passion, reuenge, or choler, wherewithall many at this day are overcome. Innius Brutus Consul of Rome, condemned his two sonnes, Titus and Tiberius, to bee beheaded, beinge conuicted for conspiring the reentrie of Tarquinius race vnto the kingdome of Rome, from whence they had benee vanquished for wickednes and whoredome. Truly a notable example, and cleane contrarie to those that are fauourers and accepters of persons. Phocion refused to helpe his sonne in law Charillus in iudgement, beinge accused for taking certaine money vniustly, saying vnto him: That hee made him his Ally in all iust and reasonable matters onely. Alexander the Great vsed this commendable custome as hee sate in place of Iustice to heare criminall causes pleaded, that whilest the accuser declared his accusation, hee stopped one of his eares with his hand, to the ende hee might keepe it pure and vpright, not admitting thereinto (as hee gaue them to vnderstand) any preiudicate or false impression, that so hee might heare the accused partiespeake in his owne defence and iustification. Truly an example meete for Kings and Princes, that they should not lightlie beleuee slanderers, nor giue sentence of execution presently vpon their report and perswasion: because they ought not to take pleasure, or to glut themselves as it were, with some pleasant pastime, in the corrections and punishments of men, which is the property of a tyrant. Neither ought they, after the punishment is inflicted, to repent them thereof, which is a token of ignorance, and basenesse of minde: but Iustice must see execution done when reason and iudgement require, and that without either griefe or pleasure. Augustus Caesar knowing that Asprenas a very familiar friend of his, was accused in iudgement, and fearing that if hee went to the place where the matter was to bee heard, hee should offer wrong to Iustice, as also if he went not, hee should seeme to abandon his friend, as iudging him culpable: hee asked counsell of the Senate, with whom hee resolved to bee present at the iudgement of his friend, but to speake nothing, because in so doing he should neither doe him wrong, nor violate Iustice. Agessilaus king of Lacedæmonia deserued likewise great praise for his vertue, albeit hee were a very assured friend to his friend, and of a gentle nature, ready to imploy himselfe in the behalfe of all them that stood in neede of him. Neuerthelesse, when a friend of his contended with him about a matter, which hee desired to obtaine of this Prince, saying, that he had made him a promise thereof: If the thing (quoth he) be iust, I haue promised it; but if it bee vniust, I haue not promised, but onely spoken it. Hee vsed also to say, that hee esteemed Iustice as the loue of Iustice.

Examples of

Cleon.

Aristides.

Innius.

Phocion.

Alexander.

Augustus.

Agessilaus.

Prowes without iustice is worth nothing. The difference between a great and little king

Philip.

Traianus.

1. Sam. 8. 5.

What causeth kingdomes to flourish.

God is the author of iustice.

What manner of men magistrates ought to be.

One meane whereby the abuse of iustice may be taken away. The inconuenience that cometh by setting offices to sale. Exod. 18.

chiefe of all the vertues, and that valure was of no value if it were not ioyned therewith, yea would be needlesse if all men were iust. And when certaine men who were sent vnto him to confer about some agreement, said one day vnto him, that the great king would haue it so: wherein (quoth he vnto them) is he greater than I, if he be not more iust? Whereby he iudged very well, that the difference betweene a great and a little king ought to bee taken from iustice, as from a kingly measure and rule, according vnto which they ought to gouerne their subiects, seeing they were at the first established to doe iustice, as Herodotus speaking of the Medes, and Cicero of the Romanes, make mention. This is that which a poore old woman signified to Philip king of Macedonia, when she came to him to haue her complaint heard. To whom when the king made answer, that he had no leifure at that time to heare her, shee cried with a loud and cleare voice, Bee not then king. Whereupon this meeke Prince (by which name he said he had rather be called for a long time, than by the name of Lord for a little while) was so touched at the heart with the consideration of his duty, that he returned presently into his pallace, where setting aside all other affaires, he gaue himselfe many daies to heare all their complaints and requests that would come before him, beginning first with the said poore woman. Another time being overtaken with sleepe, and not well hearing the iustification and defence of one Machetas, he condemned him in a certaine summe. Whereupon the said party cried out aloud, that he appealed to Philip after he should be throughly awake. Which being noted by the said Prince, he would needes heare him againe: and afterward declared him not guilty, paying notwithstanding with his owne money that summe whereia he had before condemned him, that so he might keepe inuiolable the authority of of his sentence. The Emperor Traian is iustly commended of Historiographers, because hee alighted from his horse, as he was going to warre, onely to heare the complaint which a poore woman was about to make vnto him. And truely nothing doth so properly belong vnto, or is so well befitting a prince of a good and gentle nature, as the practise and exercise of Iustice. Therefore when the Hebrewes asked a king of Samuel, they added this, To iudge vs like all nations. Yea these heads which had the soueraignty over them before were onely in the nature of Iudges. It is Iustice onely, which through the grace of God causeth kingdomes and monarchies to flourish: as Archidamus did very well signifie to one, who asked of him what were those gouernors of the Lacedaemonian common wealth, by whose meanes it was maintained in such and so great glory as was then to be seene: They (are said he) the lawes first, and next the magistrates observing the lawes. Moreover, the law must be the rule of Iustice, as Iustice is the end of the law. In some other place we shall vnderstand more at large by the grace of God, what the law is, and how we are to obey it, where also we will consider particularly of the duty of Magistrates, and of their dignity. In the meane time let vs marke well for our instruction the notable sayings and examples of ancient men here mentioned of vs, which doe sufficiently testifie vnto vs how greatly they recommended the preservation of this vertue of iustice. Whereof if we beleue (as the truth is) that God is the author, that he doth continually exercise the same amongst vs, by visible testimonies, and that he will bring it to a full period and perfection at the appointed time, which is onely knowne to him, let vs take good heede that we neither contemne nor violate it. Let such as are decked with diademes for the administration of Iustice, who neuertheless commit this duty to others vnder them, make choise of sufficient and able men to beare so heavy a charge, I meane able, both for their learning, and also for their good example of life. Otherwise let them be sure, that this great Iudge will require at their hands the wrong that is offered to innocencie. To meete with which inconuenience, and to take away the cause of so many abuses and naughty dealings which now adays are knowne to such as are most ignorant, to the vtter overthrow of a million of poore families, I thinke that this is one of the best and surest meanes, not to leaue Iustice, which is so pretious a thing, to the licence of any whosoever will take it vpon him, whereby it is set to open sale, as it were some merchandise of small account. Which dealing (that I may speake my minde freely) giueth occasion, yea constraineth those men to take bribes, and to be couetous, who (according to the counsell of Iethro giuen to Moses) ought to be farthest from it. For so long as the places of iudgement shall be vendible, and bestowed vpon him that offereth most, we shall alwaies see that for money, such as are most ignorant worst liuers & vnworthiest, will be the first and chiefest. Now what iustice can be hoped for of such men? For after they are once placed therein, the chiefest respect is to reape gaine, profit and aduantage, according to that value and rate of money which they laid out vpon it. Did my office cost me so much? then it must be thus much worth vnto me. For if I had imployed my money elsewhere elsewhere, I might have had thus much of reuenues and inheritance. Truly this saying full of impiety neuer caused them to blush that haue vttered it sundry times, although it hath wrought the same effect in many that haue heard it. The Emperour Alexander, and after him Lewes the 12. vsed this speech long since by way of prophecy, That buyers of offices would sell by retaile as deare as they could, that which they brought in grasse. And for this cause a wise Politician of our time hath written very learnedly, that they which set to sale estates, offices and benefices, sell withall the most sacred thing in the world, which is Iustice. They sell the common-wealth, they sell the blood of the subiects, they sell the lawes: and taking away the reward of honour, of vertue, of knowledge, of godlinesse, of religion, they open a gate to thefts, to bribes, to couetousnesse, to iniustice, to ignorance, to impietie: in a word, to all kinde of vice and filthinesse. Neither doe I doubt but that they which buy them are as greatly to be reprobated, and blamed, as those that sell them: because they minister life and nourishment, as much as in them lieth, to this monstrous Hydra of couetousnesse and lucre, which sucketh vp and deuoureth the substance of the poore. But they will say, if we lay not out our money hereupon, others will doe it that are as well provided with coine, and yet peradventure are not so zealous of iustice as we are. What? wilt thou doe euill for feare least another should doe it before thee? Besides, if thou considerest thy selfe well, what leadeth thee hereunto but ambition or couetousnesse? And if peradventure some one among a hundred is touched with a good desire to profit and to serue his countrey, what can hee doe alone amongst ten that are corrupted? But let this be spoken without offence to good men, who for the most part bewaile their estate and condition beeing in such company. And let not such buyers of offices thinke, that because of their bought estates they deserue any honour, (if for other respects they are not worthy) which is the reward of vertue onely: but rather let them know, that they deceive themselves no lesse than those men did, who thought to flie with the golden wings, of Euripides: making that thing of the heauiest matter that could bee, which ought to be most light. The Emperour Aurelianus was so fearefull of placing an vnworthy man in the seate of iudgement, that he neuer preferred any to the dignity of a Senator, but with the consent of the whole Senate. But to end our speech, we will hold this, that nothing is more necessarie to guide and to order the life of man to her proper and happy end, than the vertue of Iustice: which beeing taken from amongst vs, all other vertues, sequester themselves farre from vs, giuing place to the perturbations of our soules, which draw vs into ruine and confusion. And when as the greater sort being well instructed in their dutie, bestow the administration of Iustice vpon those men onely that deserue it, opening that gate vnto them onely for their vertue, then doe they put in vnto the first point requisite for the preservation of their estates, namely, the recompensing of good men. This will cause every one to seeke out the way that leadeth to vertue, whose property it is to bring men to honour. And from this good beginning will proceede the other point no lesse necessary, beeing the entire ornament and preservation of Iustice, namely, the punishment of the wicked: so that all things shall bee maintained in good order, to the benefit, rest, profit and greatnes of this French Monarchie.

The saying
of Alexander
and Lewes
the 12.

Against buyers of offices.

Aurelianus.

A meane to preserve policies.

Of Iniustice, and of Seueritie. Chap. 38.

ACHI-TOB. AS there is but one only way to hit the white, and many to misse it, by shooting either higher or lower than is requisite: so fareth it with our actions, which cannot be good but after one sort, but are euill many waies. This is that which we noted before in discoursing of three principall vertues, called Morall, which consist in the midst of two vices, namely: too little and too much. And this may also be noted in the fourth of those vertues, whereof we intreated euen now, whose defect and contrary vice is Iniustice, and her excelsse and counterfeit follower is Seueritie. Of which vices, according to the order begun by vs, we are now to discourse. This matter therefore I leaue to you my Companions.

A SER. They make themselves guilty of great Iniustice, who beeing appointed of God to persecute the wicked with the sword drawne, will (forsooth) keepe their hands cleane from blood, whereas the wicked in the meane while commit murder, and offer violence vntroubled. But it is no lesse crueltie to punish no offence, than not to forgive any in whomsoever it be: the one being an abuse of clemency, the true ornament of a Soueraigne: and the other, to turne authoritie into tyranny. Neuertheless Magistrates in the execution of Iustice ought to take great heed, least by ouer-great seuerity they hurt more than they heale.

A pretty comparison.

Every vertue
is in the midst
of two vices.

A M A N A.

How the throne of kings may be established in iustice.

All men haue
some knowledge of good
and euill, and some inward
sense of a di-
uine nature.

The fruits of Iniustice in
the wicked.

Virtue is to be preferred
before all worldly
things.
Iniustice is a generall vice.

How many
waies a man
may be vniust.

A M A N A. As a Goldsmith can make what vessel he will, when the drosse is taken from the silver: so when the froward man is taken away from the kings presence, his throne shall be established in Iustice. Notwithstanding the seat of a Iudge that is too seuerer, seemeth to be a Gibbet already erected. But we shall vnderstand of thee A R A M, the nature and effects of these vices, Iniustice, and Seueritie.

A R A M. None are so peruerse, nor giuen ouer so much to the desires and concupiscences of their flesh, that they can vtterly deface through obliuion the knowledge of good & euill, or the inward apprehension of some diuine nature, both which are ioyned together in all men. In somuch that by reason of that which vrgeth them within their soules, they are constrained to confesse themselves culpable for their vniust deeds before the iudiciall throne of this Deity. Therefore with what impudency soeuer the wicked outwardly gloze their corrupt dealings, as if they gloried in them, yet seeing they haue, as well by the testimony of their conscience, as by prooffe and experience, this knowledge euen against their wils, that Iniustice is vnfruitfull, barren, and vngratefull, bringing forth nothing worthy of any account; after many great labours and trauels which it affoordeth them, the remembrance of their vnpure deedes abateth their courage, and maketh it full of trouble and confusion. So that although a corrupt and naughty man, doring the sway of his vicious passion, perswadeth himselfe, that by committing a wicked and execrable deede, hee shall enioy some great and assured contentation, yet the heate, thirst, and furie of his passion being ouerpasse, nothing remaineth but vile and perillous perturbations of Iniustice, nothing that is either profitable, necessarie, or delectable. Moreouer, this troubleth his minde, that through his dishonest desires he hath filled his life with shame, danger, distrust, and terror of the iust iudgement of God. For these causes the Philosophers speaking of iniustice, said very well, that there was no vice whereof a man ought to be more ashamed than of that, because it is a malice and naughtinesse that hath no excuse. For seeing men haue this inward sence and feeling, that their very thoughts doe accuse or absolue them before God, they ought to make account thereof, as of a watchman that watcheth and prieth into them to discouer all those things which they would gladly hide if they could. This caused Cicero to say, that it is more against nature to spoile another man, and to see one man to increase his riches by the hurt of another, than either death, or pouerty, or griefe, or any losse of goods, belonging either to the bodie or to fortune. And if a good man neither may nor ought for profit sake, to slander, deceiue, lie, or execute any such like things: it is certaine, that there is nothing in this world of so great value, no treasure so precious, which should moue vs to forgoe the brightnesse and name of vertuous and iust. Now as we learned before, that Iustice was a generall vertue, so Iniustice also comprehendeth all those vices whereinto men commonly fall. For this is Iniustice, not to giue to euery one that which belongeth vnto him. In respect of God it taketh the name of Impiety, in regard of men, of deniall of rights and lawes. Our discourse is of this latter, which bringeth forth pernicious effects after diuerse manners, destroying all duties of honesty. But not to stay ouer long in the kindes of Iniustice we will note this, that we are so many waies guilty of Iniustice, as we denie to our neighbours those duties which we owe vnto them, and which our vocation requireth of vs: as also when we seeke to enrich our selues by their hinderance, whether it be openly, or by sinister and subtile meanes against Christian sinceritie, which ought to shine in all our dealings. Let vs see how the Auncients hated this vice, and spake of the pernicious effects thereof. No man (saith Socrates) ought to commit any vniust act, how small soeuer it be, for any treasure, wealth, or profit, which he may hope to reape thereby: because all the treasures of the earth are not to be compared to the least vertue of the soule. For this cause all men ioyntly ought to haue this one end and intent, that when they profit themselves, they should also be beneficiall to euery one. For if all men should haue respect but to their owne, their vniety would soone be dissolued. And although it were so (said Cato) that Iniustice did procure no perill to him that doth practise it, yet would it be to all others. Plato calleth it a corruption of the soule, and a ciuill sedition which neuer looseth strength, no not in those that haue it onely within themselves. For it causeth a wicked man to be at variance within himselfe: it vrgeth, troubleth, and turmoileth him continually, vntill it haue plunged him in the gulfes of all vices: whereupon after ward he easily ouerfloweth in all impiety, not caring for any thing but to satisfie his vnbrideled desires. And if it fall out that they who haue the sword in hand to correct Iniustice, doe either authorize or practise it themselves, then is the gate of all miseries opened vpon euery one, through the vnruely licence of the wicked, who wallow in all kinde of cruelty: from whence all disorder and confusion proceedeth to the vtter ruine and final subuersion subuersion of most flourishing townes and cities, and in the end, of Empires, Kingdomes, and Monarchies. Thus doth Iniustice disanell the force of lawes, which are the foundation of every estate: it is an enemy to good men, and the gardian and tutor to the wicked. Briefly, it bringeth forth all effects contrary to those which wee mentioned to bee the fruits of Iustice, and is the wellspring of the other vices that hinder duty. Is it not Iniustice that giueth authoritie to murders, robberies, violent dealings, and to other damnable vices; which at this day are unpunished, and are the cause that of many great, goodly, and wealthy families, poore widdowes onely and orphans, quite vndone, doe remaine, crying for vengeance, and expecting it from above, for the wrong that is offered to their innocency? How many such are set before our eyes by histories, which are the light of truth? But alas the unhappinesse of our age is growne to greater measure. How many of the greater sort, I meane of the gouernours and magistrates of this desolate kingdome, may iustly challenge that praise whereby Pericles captaine and gouernour of the Athenians, thought himselfe more honoured, than by all his braue exploits done in his life time, either in warre, or in politike gouernment, wherein hee was the chiefe of his time, and which his friends laid before his eyes, beeing readie to die, thereby to assure him, and to cause him to reioice in a true immortalitie of glorie? O my friends (said he vnto them) Fortune hath had her part in those exploits: but I make greater account of this, that I neuer caused any of my Countrey men to lament, or to weare a mourning gowne, which onely thing ought to be attributed to my vertue. O excellent and honourable praise, which every good man ought to seeke after, and to desire: namely, to be no cause of bringing sorrow and griefe to the common wealth through any act of Iniustice. Moreover this vertuous Athenian died willingly and without repining, taking delight in an acceptable remembrance of those good turnes, which he had done to his Countrey men. But contrariwise, it will be a very hard matter for others, who haue beene the cause of many euils to their countrey, and for all those that delight in committing Iniustice, not to die in great feare, horror, and trembling, tormented with remorse of conscience for their life past. The whole course whereof cannot be much more unhappy, seeing euery wicked act ingendring it owne torment from the very instant wherein it is committed, through the continuall remembrance thereof filleth the soule of the malefactor with shame and confusion, with frights and perturbations, with repining and terrible disquietnesse of spirit. This is that which Plutarke saith, That euery wicked man committing a trespassse, is the prisoner of Iustice as soone as he hath done it. This life is his prison, out of which he hath no meane to depart, or to flie, but is to receiue the execution of that sentence which is giuen against him by the soueraigne Iudge. And it in the meane time he feast it out, send presents and gifts, yea if he solace himselfe with sundry sports, delights, and pleasures, it is all one as if condemned men that were prisoners should play at dice and cardes, and vse other pastime, with the halter ouer their heads wherewith they must be strangled. But there are many men that cannot be better compared than to little children, who seeing men worth nothing, to dance and play vpon a Theater, apparelled with cloth of golde and silver, or with other rich garments, and crowned with precious ornaments, haue them in great estimation and admiration, and thinke them happy, vntill in the end they see them pearced through with great thrusts of a speare, or hewen in pieces with swords, or behold fire comming out of those goodly precious robes of gold, which consumeth them. The selfe same thing is by them, who when they see many wicked men, either placed in great authority and dignity, or descending of good and famous houses, they honour, admire, and esteeme them the happiest men and most at ease in the world: neuer considering that they are chastised and punished for their offences, before they see them either put to death, or else quite fallen from the height of their fortune. Now seeing it is a thing flatly confessed of those that haue any knowledge of our Philosophy, and prooued sufficiently by our former discourse, that nothing can bee called honourable or profitable which proceedeth of Iniustice or of malice; that excuse which men giuen ouer to vice do commonly alledge to cloke their impiety withall, namely, that Iniustice bringeth with it very ripe and ready fruit, and that the punishment if there bee any, commeth very late and long time after the delight taken by the offence, hath no more any shew of reason in it. For, as we haue already learned, the punishment of any sin is equall with it both for age and time. Furthermore God permitteth oftentimes his diuine iudgement to bee publickly knowne and shewed vpon the vniust: yea hee declareth himselfe so much the more openly, by how much the lesse men exercise Iustice and vpriight dealing. And yet in respect of his maiestie, we must not looke vnto time, which is alwaies one and the same to him, and not future or past: yea the whole continuance of mans life is as nothing vnto him,

The effects of Iniustice.

Pericles.

A notable example for eu-ery ciuill Magistrate.

Why the life
of the wicked cannot be happy.

A comparison.

A comparison.

The wrong
conceit which men haue of
the wicked
that prosper.

The punishment of sinne
is equall with it both for age & time.
All things are present with God.

A sure token of a desperate common wealth.

The miserable estate of France.

The deniall of Iustice is dangerous,
Philip.

Demetrius.

Henry King of Sweath-
land.

A notable historie of the death of Ferdinando the fourth.

8 Notable Iniustice committed by a Prouost of Paris.

him, and lesse than the present instant. But if according to our carnall senses, we desire examples of the greatnesse and swiftnes of his wrath, iustly kindled ouer our heads for our execrable impieties, contrary to the nature of his gentlenesse and benignitie, which moued him to waite for vs along time; who can be ignorant of them in the vnspeakeable affliction of this poore France, wherein it were very hard in mans iudgement to discerne, whether is most lamentable, either iniustice, or the miserie and calamitie, which by the vengeance of God fol-loweth it, the horrible punishment whereof the fautors of iniquitie both haue and daily doe feele vpon their heads? Those common-wealths (saith Cicero) which are ready to bee ouer-throwne, and haue all things forlorne and desperate in them, fall into this miserable issue, that they whom the lawes condemne are restored, and iudgements giuen are recovered and broken. And when such things come to passe, let none be ignorant of this, that destruction is at hand, neither can any man iustly conceiue hope of safetie. What other thing can I say of France (I would to God I were deceiued) seeing that all Iustice is turned to plie turuie therein, the wicked are placed in authoritie, and good men driven away: suits in law are commenced against every one more vpon knauerie than equity, corruption than integritie, fauour than vprightnes? But to the end that the greater sort, and every particular man may open his eies and behold this shipwracke that threatneth vs, let vs consider in our Ancestors, thorough the reading of histories, the like causes of the ruine, alteration, and subuersion of many very flourishing estates, proceeding from the reigne of Iniustice, which being the daughter of tyranny (as Dionysius the elder said) must needs be of the same nature: namely, that by vsurping an vniust and intollerable dominion, it must of necessity fall speedily into a miserable and wretched ende. Wee haue in all our former discourses alleadged sundry examples of vices, which (as we said euen now) take their beginning, or at least wise are inseparably ioyned with Iniustice, and hereafter we will make mention of others, when wee handle certaine points, which properly depend of this selfe same originall. In the meane while we will here note, that the deniall of Iustice hath procured to many their death or vndoing. Philip the first, king of Macedonia, was slaie by Pausanias a meane gentleman, because hee would not let him haue Iustice against Antipater, who had offered him wrong. Demetrius the besieger, hauing receiued many requests and supplications of his subiects, threw them all into the water, as he went ouer the bridge of a river: wherupon his subiects conceived such hatred against him, that within a while after his armie forsooke him, and yeelded themselves to Pyrhus his enemy, who draue him out of his kingdome without battell. In our time, Henrie king of Sweathland, striking with a dagger a Gentle-man that asked Iustice of him, stirred vp the Nobility and people in such sort against him, that putting him into prison, where he is at this present, they elected his yonger brother to bee their king, who now reigneth. But for a more woonderfull matter, wee might here rehearse, how God, to shew vnto vs his detestation of Iniustice, hath sometimes suffered his iudgement to fall out in that very howre and time, which such as were vniustly condemned did assigne to their vniust Iudges. In the liues of the kings of Castile, wee finde that Ferdinando the fourth of that name, putting two knights to death more through anger than iustly, one of them cried aloud in this sort: O vniust king, we cite thee to appeare within thirty daies before the tribunall seate of Iesus Christ to receiue iudgement for thy Iniustice, seeing there is no other Iudge in earth to whom wee can appeale from thy vniust sentence. Vpon the last of which daies he died likewise. True it is, some man may say, that death is so naturall, and the houre thereof so vncertaine, although determined, that no other cause thereof ought to bee supposed, but onely necessity. But yet when it followeth so neerely some notable wickednesse committed, and some disquietnesse and torment of minde is mingled therewith in the soule, as it commonly falleth out, we may take such a death for a testimony and beginning of the iustice of God, who will not suffer the vniust man to rule any longer, but exerciseth his iudgements diuersly in due time and season, vpon those that are not to giue an account of their doings to men like themselves. And as for such as are of meaner estate, and lower in degree, God suffereth also many times their punishment to bee notorious, and that sometime by such as are not much better than themselves. Hereupon Apollonius that great Philosopher said, that in his peregrination ouer three parts of the world, hee maruelled most at two things, whereof the first was, that hee alwaies saw the greater theeues hang the lesse, and oftentimes the innocent. And thus it fell out in the time of king Philip the long, wherein a Prouost of Paris, named Henry Lapperell, caused a poore man that was prisoner in the Castelet to be executed, by giuing him the name of a rich man, who being guiltie and condemned, was set at liberty by him. But this reward followed him hard at the heeles:
being

being for the same accused, conuicted, hanged, and strangled. Not long after, a president of the Parliament, named Hugues of Crecy, met with the same fortune, for a certaine corrupt iudgement given by him. Therefore let every one of vs learne to flie from this pernicious vice of iniustice: namely, from every action repugnant to the duty of Chrillian charity, & destroying the bond of humane society, through the vtter spoiling of the riuers that flow from the fountaine of honesty. And let vs be afraid through such impiety to fall into the indignation and wrath of the Almighty, to whom onely (as to the author of iustice, and to whom all time is as nothing) it belongeth to define and to determine thereof, when, after what sort, and how farre it standeth with reason, all which things are vnknowne to vs. If he defer sometime the punishment of Iniustice, let vs know that it is for their greater and more grievous condemnation, who multiply and heape daily vpon their heads iniquity vpon iniquity. And for an example, which great men ought to follow, and not suffer iniustice to be practised according to every mans fancie, or vnder any other pretence whatsoever, we will propound vnto them the fact of a Pagan king, who shall rise vp in iudgement against them, if they doe otherwise. The prince I meane is Artaxerxes, surnamed Longhand, and king of the Persians, who being requested by a Chamberlaine of his whom he greatly fauoured, to doe some vniust thing, and hauing by his diligence found out, that he vnderooke this suite for another, who had promised him thirtie thousand crownes, called of them Dariques, he commanded his treasurer to bring the like sum vnto him, and then said vnto his chamberlaine, Take this money which I giue thee. For in giuing it vnto thee, I shall bee neuer the poorer, whereas if I had done that which thou requirest of me, I should haue bin more vniust. Alexander Seuerus the Emperour handeled after another fashon, yea more iustly, a seruant of his, who vsed like a horse-leach of the court to sucke their blood that had to deale with his master, by thrusting himselfe forward, & proffering his meanes to fulfill their request for a good reward, by reason of the fauour which hee bare him: which turned to the great dishonor of his imperiall Maiestie, because a Prince ought not to make greater account of any thing, than of the grace and fauour of his gifts and benefits. This monarch caused him to be tyed to a post and choked with smoke, making this proclamation by sound of trumpet, That they which sell smoke, should so perish with smoke. Now to enter into the last point of the matter which is here propounded vnto vs, wee must diligently note, that as it is the duty of all magistrates, and of such as haue authoritie ouer others to chastice and to punish every malefactor, so likewise they must beware least vnder pretence of exercising iustice they fall into another kinde of iniustice through ouermuch rigor, which is as hurtfull or rather more than that vice wherof we discoursed euen now, namely, into Seuerity, which caused them to be misliked for cruelty, and belongeth rather to a beastly & sauage nature, than to the nature of man. Forclemency, and compassion neuer ought to be separated from a good and iust sentence, which is to hold small faults excused, or but lightly to punish them, provided alwaies that iustice be not violated. Clemency (saith the wise man) is the true preservation of the royall throne. And therefore one of the Ancients said, that it was ill to be subiect to a prince vnder whom nothing was tolerated, but worse when all things were left at random. We may alledge here for an example of ouer great seuerity the fact of Manlius Torquatus a Consul of Rome, who caused his sonnes head to be cut off, because hee fought against his enemy body to body contrary to the Edicts, & out of his ranke, albeit he came away victor. The act of Aufidius the Romane was more cruell & barbarous than iust, when he slue his sonne for withdrawing himselfe to take part with Catiline: vttering this speech vnto him: I did not, wretch as thou art, beget thee for Catiline, but for thy countrey. Such murders and cruelties defaced all the commendation of iustice, whose waies ought to be ordinary and vsuall, ruling rigour with gentlenes, as the rigour of discipline ought to be moderate gentlenes, that the one may be commended by the other. Seneca rehearseth a crueller fact than any of the former, committed by Piso the Proconsul, who seeing a soldier returne alone to the campe, condemned him to death, thinking that he had slaine his companion, notwithstanding he affirmed that his fellow came after him. At the very instant of the execution his companion came: whereupon the Captaine that had charge to see the condemned party executed, returned to the Proconsul with both the souldiers. But Piso being offended therewith, put them all three to death: the first, because he was condemned: the second, because he was the cause of the condemnation: and the Captaine, because he obeyed not: so that he put three to death for the innocency of one man, abusing his authority & power in most cruell manner, whatsoever rigour was vsed in those times in the ordinance of warlike discipline. Now to take from vs all taste of such barbarousnesse, let vs call to minde an act of Augustus Caesar worthy of eternall praise, who would not condemne one that was accused of seeking his death, because the arguments & profes were insufficient, but left him to the iudgment of God. Let vs learne therefore for the conclusion of our discourse to bate all kinde of Iniustice in such sort,

Hugues of Crecy.

Artaxerxes.

Alexander
Seuerus.

The punishment of one who sold his masters fa-
uour.

Of Seueritie.

Clemency
preserue prince his throne.
Prou. 20. 28.
M. Torquatus.
Aufidius.

Most cruell
seueritie of Piso.

Augustus
Caesar.

that every one of vs seeke to profite his neighbor, rating at an high price (as Euripides saith) the violating of right, which is holy and sacred. And thus through the good order of magistrats, and reformation of euery one by himselfe, the wicked shall haue no meansto rob, to spoile by force, to take bribes and to decieue others, when breakers of iust laws shall be punished. Then will the effect of those two sentences take place, which are taken out of the holy Scriptures, and written in a table in the great chamber of the palace belonging to the head cite of this kingdome, and which ought to bee well engrauen in the hearts of all iudges: the first sentence is contained in these words. Execute iudgement and righteousnesse: or otherwise I haue sworne by my selfe (saith the Lord) that this house shall be wast. The other sentence is this: O ye iudges, take heed what ye do: for ye execute not the iudgement of man, but of the Lord: & With what iudgement ye iudge, ye shall be iudged. For truly the crowne of praise & immortal glory is kept & prepared for them that walke in truth and righteousness, but thame and dishonor, with eternall fire for those that perseuere in ynrighteousnes.

Ier. 22. 3.

1. Cor. 2. 9. 6.

Mat. 17. 2.

Of Fidelitie, forswearing and of Treason. Chap. 39.

Of the corruption of our age. When vertue seemeth to be out of season.

A R A M. Such is the corruption of our age, wherein impietie and malice are come in the place of ancient innocency, that vertue seemeth very vnfit to be receiued and employed in affaires, seeing the gate is quite shut vp against her. So that a man might aptly say, that whosoever should thinke to bring backe againe, amidst the peruerseliues and corrupt manners of this present time, the vprightness and integritie of ancient behauiour, he did as much as if he offered fruits out of season, which being faire in sight, were notwithstanding vnfit to be vsed. Neuerthelesse wee must not doubt to bring her in sight, and to maintaine her with all our power, who knoweth how to cause her enemy Vice, both to reuerence and feare her, and in the end also to triumph ouer him, mauger all the power and vnderpropping, which he receiueth from the wicked. In the midst therefore of so many trecheries and treasons, wherof men glory now adades, let vs not be afraid to paint them out in their colours, thereby giuing honour to fidelity, which is a part of iustice, or rather Iustice it selfe: which I leaue to you my copanions to make plain vnto vs.

A C H I T O B. It is the impietie to violate faith. For God who is truth, I detesteth all lying: and is a terrible reuenger of the contempt of his name. To loue or to hate openly (saith Cicero doth better be-seeme a noble heart, than for a man to hide and to dissemble his will and affection.

A S E R. Guile and fraud (saith Seneca) are meete weapons for a cowardly and base minded man. Therefore we must take good heed (as Pittacus said) That same speake not euill of vs to them vnto whom we haue giuen our faith. But it belongeth to thee A M A N A to handle this matter.

What faith & fidelity is.

A M A N A. Amongst the famous and great personages of old time, no vertue was more commended, or straightlier kept and obserued than Faith and Fidelity, which they affirmed to be the foundation of iustice, the indissoluble bond of friendship, & the sure supporter of humane society. Of this faith we mind now to speake, not touching at all that religious & sacred faith, concerning the holy misteries of true piety, which is a singular gift of God his Spirit, and peculiar to those that appertaineto his eternall election. This therefore which respecteth the mutuall conuersation and promises of men, hath bin alwaies kept vniuolable of honorable men, and ought to be so amongst vs: because he that giueth his faith, laieth to pawne whatsoeuer is most pretious & diuine in his soule. So that if he forget himself so much as to break & violate the same, he committeth manifest impiety, shewing that he careh not, to offend God by abusing his name to colour his lying. It were a great deale better neuer to take God to witnes, than to forswear him in mockery, seeing the Scripture so oftē forbiddeth vs to take his name in vain, to sweare falsely by it, or in any sort to defile the same. It is true that this question hath alwaies bin, & is at this day more thā ever in cotrouersie: namely, whether a man is bound to performe that which he hath promised and sworne to by compulsion, or no? And this sentence is receiued & approued of many, that nothing but our wil bindeth vs to performe those things, which necessity forceth vs to promise. But to speake according to truth, & without any particular passion, we say, that true & perfect magnanimity suffereth vs not to promise any thing, & to pawn our faith therunto, except we were willing to performe it, because no vertuous & wise mā ought to forget himselfe so far, as to do or to promise any thing contrary to his duty for any necessity, no not for death it self. Neither is there any thing wherby a foole is soner discerned frō a wise mā, thā by promises: forasmuch as an vndiscret man lightly promiseth whatsoeuer you wil, & oftētimes more than is required of him: but a man of good iudgmēt weigheth his spech with sēce & reason, before he gage it to any body, and hauing once giue his word, he reuoketh it not, what losse or dāmage soeuer may insue therof; as he that esteemeth a great deale more of the honor of truth & fidelity, thā of his own life beeing touched with vntruth & periury. If it were lawfull for euery one to alleadge necessity or constraint,

Of the violating of faith.
Leuit. 19. 12.
Deut. 5. 11.
Mat. 5. 34.

Whether a forced promise is to be kept.

A wise man must neuer promise any thing against duty.

Psal. 15. 4.

thereby

thereby to cloake the breach of faith, to whom might a man trust in any matter? Who doubteth but that all agreements made betweene men, whether in time of warre or of peace, or in any particular affaires betweene party and party, are grounded vpon a benefite, which euery one supposeth to bee necessary and profitable for himselfe; and so consequently that they ought not to be kept? Who doubteth but that the breach of them may easily bee coloured with the like necessity, and so vnder this goodly pretence of falleright and equity, should be allowed? But what? May we be iudges of our selues, and in our owne cause? First our aduerser parties, to whom we are bound must be called, and must agree of iudges to determine of our promises, whether they were lawfull or vnlawfull, forced and necessary or no: according to the law, which releaseth a man of his promise if it be vniust or vnrasonable, or if it bee too burthen some vnto him, or if hee were circumvented by deceit, fraud, error, force, iust feare, or grievous hurt. But when we are both iudge and party and in steade of iustice seeke after force and violence, it is soone seene, that all shew of excusing the breach of faith giuen, is onely grounded vpon malice and subtilty. This did Lyfander Admirall of the Lacedæmonians usually practise, who made no reckoning of iustice but when it was profitable accounting onely profite to be honesty, and saying, that children must be deceived with the play of cocke all, and men with oathes. Which kind of dealing argueth a man to bee in truth, woorse in behauiour towards God than towards his enemies: because he that beguileth his enemy through the meanes of fidelity sworn vnto him, doth sufficiently testifie, that he feareth him, and dares not discouer vnto him that which lieth hid in his heart: and in the meane time he hath no reuerence or feare of the diuine Maiesty from which nothing is hid, but vseth that for a covering and maske of his wickednesse. Wee must (saith Cicero) keepe that promise inuolable, which we haue made to our enemy, albeit the mischances of war haue constrained vs to yeeld vnto it. How much lesse therefore ought we to breake our faith giuen to our friends, and to those of whom we neuer receiued any thing but profite and pleasure? Through this neglect of faith we fill our soules with lying, nourishing and delighting them therein, and separating them far from the truth (the fountaine of all goodnes) to lie vnto our neighbours, to deceive and beguile them in those things which we are able to performe, thereby destroying the bond of humane society, yea of nature it selfe, which bindeth vs both to will and to procure their good. This is that which Epenetus the Lacedæmonian would teach vs, when hee said, that liars were the cause of all the siones and crimes in the world. And therefore Plutarke also saith, *That to lie is a seruile vice worthy to be hated of all, and not to be pardoned in any, no not in slanes themselves. All they (saith Cicero) that speake one thing, and meane another, ought to be taken for faithlesse, wicked and malicious men: whereas a good man will neither faine nor dissemble in any sort, either to buy better cheape or to sell dearer. It is not the point of a plaine, open, and sincere man or of him that is iust and vertuous, to conceale from the buyer the fault of that thing which he selleth, but rather of a malicious, deceitfull, crafty, subtle, and wicked man. And if this bee a vice & sin, not to declare the fault of that thing which is sold, how shall they be termed, who vse a thousand words and lies to set forth their merchandice? Whereas good men haue alwaies bin very scrupulous & precise in keeping the truth from all kind of pollution, as that which ought to be as well in the heart as in the mouth, in the works as in the words of euery honest man. But if lying procure blame and dishonor to all men, it doth much more to kings & princes. For seeing they are placed in such authority, that they may do what pleaseth them, what need they to lie? If Machiauell and his followers fauourers of tyranny, had well weighed that which we read in infinite places of Scripture, that God wil overthrow dissemblers & liars with al their lies & subtilties, hardly could they commend dissimulatione, deceits, trecheries, and suchlike pranks, wherewith they seeke to poison the noble minds of good princes, to cause them to degenerate both from their naturall disposition, & from the steps of such vertuous men as haue gone before them. And to this purpose I remember a decision of right concerning princes, which deserueth to be grauen in letters of gold within their lodgings & palaces: namely, That if the prince go against his promise, it ought to be reckoned amongst the cases that fall out by chance, neither may any man suppose the contrary. For the obligation is double: the one in respect of naturall equity, which will haue couenants & promises kept: the other in regard of the Prince his faith, which he must obserue inuolable, although he receiue losse thereby, because he is the formal Warranty vnto all his subiects, of that fidelitie which is amongst them selues: so that no fault is more detestable in a prince then periury. For if he that is debtor and pledge for iustice be disloiall, there is no more trust to be giuen to him in all his othes: but if he be vpriight, his bare word ought to be vnto him for a law, & his faith for an oracle, God him*

*Lyfander a forsworne &
deceitful man*

We must keep promise with our enemy.

*Of the neglect of fidelity
cometh a custom of lying*

*It is wickednesse to conceale
the fault of that which a man selleth.*

Lying in a prince is most odious.

The promise of a nutrice is tyed with a double hand.

Of the word & faith of a prince.

Of Treason.

Notable examples.

A. Regulus.

Demaratus.

Augustus.

Ca.

selfe (saith the master of the Sentences) is bound by his promise. Gather together, (saith hee) all the nations of the earth, that they may iudge betweene me and my people, if there be any thing which I ought to haue done, and haue not performed it. What is he then that will call into question, whether a prince is bound to that which he hath sworne to and promised, seeing all soueraigne power is no lesse bound to the lawes of God & of nature, than the simplest that is subiect thereunto? If faith ought not to be kept with enemies, it is not to be given vnto them: and if it be lawfull to capitulate with them, it is as necessary to keepe promise. Yea we may furt her adde, that periury is not to be reuenged or called in question, after that peace and agreement together is made: otherwise there would neuer bee any assurance of peace or end of periury. From the selfe same fountaine of the profanation of faith, & custome in lying, (it being the property of vice to ingender another vice for a punishment of it selfe) proceedeth that pernicious plague of kingdomes and common wealths, I meane Treason, hated of God and men, wherewith periured persons being bewitched, feare not to betray themselues, so they may betray others also, and their countrey. Whereupon they become odious to every one, euen to those who vsed them to serue their own turnes in disloyall and wicked actions, and in the end they receiue the reward due to their execrable impieties. For this is the common affection that men beare towards such people, to seeke them out (which notwithstanding is not the property of a noble heart) when they stand in neede of them, as they that want gall, or the poyson of some venomous beast: afterward to giue them over and reiect them because of their wickednesse. If a man be called slothfull he may become diligent: If talkatiue holde his peace: if a glutton temperate himselfe: if an adulterer, abstaine: if furious, dissemble, if ambitious, stay himselfe: if a sinner, amend: but he that is once called a traytor, there is no water to wash him cleane, nor meane to excuse himselfe. Now let vs come to the examples of the auncients, and know what zeale they bare to fidelity, and hatred to periurie and treason, as also what recompence commonly followed and accompanied such things, and with what reward noble minded men did requite those that were disloyall and traiterous. Attilius Regulus a Romane of great credite, being taken prisoner in the Carthaginian warre, and sent to Rome vpon his faith to intreat about a peace and the exchange of captives, so soone as he arriued, gaue cleane contrary aduice in the Senate: shewing that it was not for the profit of the Common wealth to make such an agreement. Afterward, hauing resolved with himselfe to keepe faith with the enemy, hee returned to Carthage, where hee was put to death very cruelly. For his eie lids being cut off, and himselfe bound to an engine, hee died with the force of waking. Demaratus king of Sparta, being in Persia with the king, against whom a great man of Persia had rebelled, was the meanes of their reconciliation. Afterward this barbarian king hauing his saide vassall in his power, would haue bene reuenged of him, thinking to put him to death. But the vertuous Lacedemonian turned him from it, declaring vnto him that it would redound to his great shame, not to know, how to punish him for his rebellion when he was his enemy, and now to put him to death being his seruant and friend. A reason truly well worthy to be marked, but very slenderly put in vre at this day. Augustus hauing made proclamation by sound of trumpet, that hee would giue 25000 Crownes to him that should take Crocosas, ringleader of the theeues in Spaine, hee offered himselfe to the Emperour, and required the sum promised by him, which hee caused to bee paid him, and pardoned him withall, to the end no man should thinke that hee would take his life from him, thereby to frustrate him of the promised recompence: as also because hee would haue publike faith and safety kept to every one that came according to order of Iustice: although in truth he might haue proceeded and given out processe against him, Cato the elder being in war against the Spaniards, was in great danger by reason of the multitude of enemies who sought to inclose him round about. And not being then in possibility to bee succoured of any but of the Celtiberians, who demanded of him 200. Talents (which are 120000. crownes) in hand for their wages, the Councell tolde him, that it was not by any means to be gotten presently, but yet promised to furnish them with such a sum, & that within any time which they would appoint: otherwise that it was more expedient not to meddle with them. But this wise and well aduised captaine vsed this occasion to very good purpose, by resolving with himselfe and with his souldiess, either to overcome their enemies, or else to die (after they had agreed with the Celtiberians) that the Romane glory should not be stained by the fallhood of their promises. For (quoth he to his souldiers) if we get the battle wee will pay them, not of our owne, but at the charges of our enemies: but if wee loose the victory, none will bee left alive either to pay, or to demand any payment. There was no talk among the councel of these noble Romanes

Romanes, how they might deceiue their enemies, or those whose seruice they were vrged to vse, but they determined rather to die, than to be wanting in their promise. Likewise we may note, that as their enterprises thus grounded had good successe, so periurie and violating of right were through the vengeance of God pursued for the most part with vnhappy effects, contrary to the platformes and desires of periured and faithlesse men: or at the leastwise that themselues were speedily punished for their wickednesse. And therefore when Tissaphernes, lieutenant to the king of Persia had broken a truce, which he had made with the Grecians, they gaue him thanks by his owne Herald, because he had placed the Gods, in whose name the truce was sworne, on their side. And indeed he smally prospered after that in his enterprises. Cleomenes king of Lacedemonia, hauing taken a truce for seauen daies with the Argians, assaulted them the third night after, knowing that they were in a sound sleepe, and discomfited them: which he did vnder this crafty subtletie, because (forsooth) in the foresaid truce mention was made of the day only, and not of the night. Whereupon the Grecians noted this as a iust iudgement of his periurie and breach of faith, in that he was myraculouly frustrated of his principall intent, which was, by the meanes of that overthrow to haue suddenly taken the citie of Argos. For the women being full of wrath and iust griefe for the losse of their husbands, by the cowardly treacherie of this Lacedemonian, tooke those weapons that were in the said Towne, & droue him from the wals, not without great murder & losse of the greatest part of his armie. Whereupon within a while after he became furious, and taking a knife he ript his body in smiling manner, and so died. Carcalla the Emperor traueling with his armie towards the Parthians, vnder pretence of marrying the daughter of Artabanus their King, who came for the same purpose to meete him, he set vpon him contrary to his faith, and put him to flight with an incredible murder of his men. But within a while after being come downe from his horse to make water, he was slaine of his owne men: which was noted as a iust punishment sent from God for his vnfaithfulnessse. The Corinthians saw before their eyes their cities rased to the ground, because they had offered violence to the Roman Embassadors, contrary to the law of nations. The Emperor Iustinian receiued infinite losses and dammages for breaking his faith with the Barbarians, and for violating the peace which he had made with the Bulgarians. Which thing procured him so great hatred of his owne subiects, by reason of the vnluckie exploits of warre which followed after, that being returned to Constantinople, Leontius vsurped the kingdome vpon him, sending him into banishment after he had cut off his nosethrills. Rastrix Duke of Cleueland, hauing falsified his faith with Lewes king of Germanie, was put to the worst and vanquished: and being prisoner, his eies were put out for a marke of his faithlesse dealing. But what neede wee search in antiquitie for testimonies of the fruites which commonly proceede from the breach of faith, seeing examples are dayly before our eies to our cost? What doe wee behold at this day but a doubling, yea a heape of all miseries, because faith, which is so precious and exquisite a thing that it admitteth no comparison, hath so often beene valued at so small a price? The history hereof is but to common, and the truth too apparant (to the great hurt of euery one) to stand vpon the prooffe thereof, whereas it ought rather to bee buried from all memorie, if it were possible, as well to deface all spots of infamy, for which we are blamed of nations farthest off, as to take away the distrust that one hath of another, which is so great amongst vs, that it hath beene one principall cause of kindling the fire of diuision so often in this desolate kingdome. But to leaue such a pittifull matter subiect, let vs consider what honour and entertainment men in oldetime gaue to traitors, who are now adaies so welcometo the greatest. Lasthenes hauing holpen Philip king of Macedonia to become master of the citie of Olynthum, whereof hee was an inhabitant, and complaining to the king that certaine called him traitor, he receiued this onely answer, that the Macedonians were naturally rude and grosse, calling a spade a spade, and all things else by their proper name. When Caesar Augustus heard Rymetalces king of Thracia (who had forsaken Antonius to ioine with him) boast of his fact, the monarch drinking to others, said with a loud voice: I loue treason well, but I loue no traitors. And in truth what man of any good iudgement will trust him? Hee that betraierth his Prince, his benefactor, his citie, his country, his kinsfolke and friends into their hands to whom he is nothing so much bound, how may not he betray them also another time? This did Agis, sonne of Archdamus king of Sparta very well signifie to the Ephories, who had commanded him to take the yong men of the citie with him, and to goe to the countrey of one whom they would make knowne vnto him, who had promised to guide & bring them within the castel of his city. What (quoth he vnto them) is it a reasonable

Periured and faithlesse persons haue alwaies had ill successe.
Tissaphernes.

Cleomenes.

Carcalla.

The Corinthians.

Iustinianus
the Emperor.

Rastrix Duke of Cleue-
land.

The cause of the present
miserie of France.

Examples of the entertainment which the Ancients
gaue to traitors.

Lasthenes.

Rymetalces.

Agis.

Pausanias.

Ariobarzanes.

Iustinian of Genua cause of the taking of Constantinople.

A famous & heroicall fact of Sultan Solymán.

Cato commended for his truth.

Eph. 4. 25.
Luk. 10. 37.

matter to commit the safety and life of so many valiant yong men to one that betraieth his country? Pausanias, captaine of the Lacedæmonians, having receiued five hundred talents of gold of king Xerxes, promised to betray the city of Sparta vnto him. But his enterprise being discovered, Agésilas his father pursued him into a temple where hee thought to haue saued himselfe, and causing the gates thereof to bee walled vp, suffered him to die there of hunger: and afterward his mother cast his body to the dogs, and would not bury it. The like befell to Cassius Brutus, who would haue sold Rome: his father handling him after the same sort. Darius king of Persia, caused the head of his sonne Ariobarzanes to be cut off because he sought to betray his army to Alexander. Brutus did the like to his children, who had conspired against their country, that king Tarquinius might reenter into Rome. Mahomet having taken Constantinople through the cowardinesse and treason of Iohn Iustinian of Genua, after he had made him king according to promise, he cut off his head within three daies. A meete recompence for such a wretch, who was the cause of so great a plague to christendome, whereby the Emperor Constantinus, the Patriarke, and all the Christians were slaine. The Empres with her daughters, and with the noblest damfels she had, were led before Mahomet, and after a thousand villanies offered vnto them, their bodies were cut in peeces. True it is that histories are diuerse touching this fact of Iustinian. For some say, that perceiuing himselfe to be hurt in fight, he fled: whereupon most of all the men of war were discouraged: and that after he had saued himselfe in the Ile of Chios he died, either of his wound, or for grieffe and sorrow, because he was the chiefe cause of so great a mischief to Christendome. Neither may we passe ouer in silence the heroicall fact of Sultan Solymán the last that died, but propound it to princes as a patterne of the hatred and punishment of periury and treason. For sending a Bascha of his into Valona to passe into Italy both by sea and land, this Generall landed at the hauen of Castro, whereat the inhabitants being astonished, yeelded themselves vnto him vnder his oath and fidelitie, whereby hee promised that they should depart, their liues saued, with bag and baggage. Neuerthelesse this Barbarian slue them all, except those whom he saw were fit to serue for slaues. But after his returne to Constantinople, the great Seignior being aduertised of his disloyaltie, caused him to be strangled, and sent backe all his prisoners with their goods into Italy. Truly an act worthy such a Prince, who, if he had beene endued with the true knowledge of God and of his Church, deserued the first place amongst the great ones of his time. Now to end our discourse, let vs learne to know the excellency of faith, which is such a thing, that whosoever laieth it in pawne, bindeth his safety, his honour, and his soule to him, vnto whom he giueth it, and committeth manifest impiety against God, when he breaketh and violateth the same: vnlesse he had vowed it for the performance of some wicked deede, with which both diuine and humane law dispence. Let vs know also, that it is the beginning and foundation of a great and notable vertue to bee giuen to truth, that it was of such credit amongst the Ancients, that in Cato his time, when any man rehearsed a strange thing and hard to beleueed, this prouerbe went of him, (because he was knowne throughout the whole course of his life to be a louer of truth) This is not credible, although Cato himselfe should speake it. And thus by the examples of so many famous men, let vs in such sort be stirred to hate lying, whereof Satan is the father and author, that following the counsell of Saint Paul, we speake the truth every one to his neighbour, who is every one that needeth our helpe, and let all faining and dissimulation be banished from vs, and all roundnesse and integrity of heart and manners appeare in all our actions: let vs hate periurie and treason, perjured and traiterous persons, knowing that faith being taken away, the whole foundation of Iustice is ouerthrowne, all bonds of friendship broken, and all humane society confounded.

Of Ingratitude. Chap. 40.

The memory of euill things is fruitfull, but of good things barren.

A M A N A S the remembrance of an euill is kept a long time, because that which offendeth is very hardly forgotten: so we commonly see, that the memorie of benefits receiued is as suddenly vanished and lost, as the fruite of the good turne is perceiued. Which thing doth so ill beleeue a man well brought vp and instructed in vertue, that there is no kinde of Iniustice, which he ought more to eschue. And therefore my companions, I thinke that according to the order of our discourse we are now to speake of the vice of Ingratitude, that knowing the ignominie thereof, and the pernicious effects which flow from it, we may beware of spotting our life therewithall.

A R A M.

ARAM. An vngratefull person cannot be of a noble minde, nor yet iust. And therefore (as Sophocles said) a man is to remember him often of whom he hath receiued courtesie and pleasure. For one good turne begetteth another, and euery gentle heart easily pardoneth all iniuries, except vnthankfulnesse, which it hardly forgetteth.

ACHITOB. Ingratitude maketh men impudent, so that they dare ioyue together to hurt those that haue bene their friends, and them to whom they are bound both by blood and nature. Let vs then heare A SER discourse more amply of this pernicious vice.

A SER. If man had not shewed himselfe vnthankfull for the vnspeakeable benefits which he had receiued of his Creator, by eating of the fruite of the tree of life, at the perswasion of Satan, contrary to his expresse commandement to whom he owed all obedience, it is certaine that neither sinne nor death, neither through them any kinde of miserie and calamity should haue had any power ouer him. But as by his Ingratitude hee neglected his obedience to his Lord and Creator, so it seemeth also that his punishment was according to the manner of his offence. For his owne members, which before were in subiection to the will of his spirit, rebelled against it, and that with such force, that they led him often captiue into the bondage of sin. Now although we are necessarily and iustly made inheritors of the same curse both of sinne and death, yet how become we so dull of vnderstanding, as to desire with cheerefulnesse of heart, and without constraint, to succede him in the cause thereof, I meane Ingratitude, which we ought to hate in greater measure, and to flie from it more than from death it selfe, by reason of the euils which it hath brought vpon vs? Notwithstanding if we looke narrowly into the iustest mans life that is, it will be a hard matter, yea altogether vnpossible, to finde it purged and exempted from this detestable vice, as well towards God as towards his neighbours. But this is farre woofse, to behold the greatest part of men to nourish and feede their soules with Ingratitude, as if they tooke singular delight therein, by accustoming their minds to keepe very diligently the memory of the aduersities and iniuries which they suffer, and to let the remembrance of those graces and benefits which they receiue, slip away incontinently, euen as soone as the pleasure of them is past. Whereas dutie bindeth all persons to esteeme as a great benefite, all fauour, how little soeuer it be, which the heavens or men impart vnto them, and to preferue it in perpetuall memory as in a most safe treasure, wherein they may keepe and lay vp those good things which they receiue. But contrariwise vnthankfull men suffer the remembrance of their greatest felicities to slide away suddenly: which is the cause that they are alwaies voide of happinesse, of rest, and tranquillity, and full of vnquietnes and vncertaine desires, which is an argument of the imperfection of their reason, and of their ignorance of that which is good. This is that which Seneca saith, that the life of the ignorant is vnthankfull, wauering, and vnstaied in things present, through the desire of things to come. And as it is the property of an ignorant man to be alwaies troublesome to himselfe, so from Ingratitude and the forgetfulnesse of our prosperitie, proceede cares and melancholy passions to no purpose, which consume men, and pull on age vpon them more than yeares. For it is vnthankfulnesse that causeth vs to bee neuer contented with our present estate, but to complaine and murmure, in stead of giuing praise (as it becommeth vs) to him that sendeth vs farre better things than we desire. Vpon the least touch of affliction, the Ingratitude for a million of graces receiued before, causeth vs to cry out that wee had neuer any thing but mishap: whereas rather we ought to take aduersity for a blessing and testimonie of the loue of God towards vs, being assured that by iustice rightly ordained, he dispenseth pouerty and riches, health and sicknesse, honour and contempt, according as he seeth it expedient for euery one of vs. Yea, it is necessary by reason of the intemperancy of our flesh, which is ready to cast off the yoke of the Lord when he handleth vs ouer gently, that hee should reaine vs in hard with the bridle, and keepe vs within the compasse of some discipline, least we wholly giue ouer that seruice and obedience which we owe vnto him. But to vex our selues vpon euery occasion, and as often as things fall out contrary to our inconstant and rebellious will, which for the most part is ignorant of that which belongeth vnto it, is that which Pythagoras said, To eate our heart, or to offend and wound our soule and spirit, by consuming them with cares and griefes: as also not to know that one cause which most of all troubleth this miserable life, is the suddaine entrance of sorrowes and irkesomnesse in the heart, which afterward will not depart out of it but by little and little. These are melancholy passions voide of reason, which (as Plato saith) proceede from naughty fumes and bitter vapours gathered together within vs, and which ascend and mingle themselves amidst the passages of the soule. Euen as our strange and vnwoonted dreames testifie and signifie, that there is within vs

Ingratitude
the cause of the sinne and death of man.

No mans life
voide of Ingratitude.

The life of the ignorant
is vnthankful.

God dispos-
eth al things
by iustice.

The vapours
wherewith
the eyes of the minde are dimmed.

Of the ingratitude of great
men.

Reward and honor nourisheth vertue
and Artes.
Impudencie
and Ingrati-
tude are companions.
The description of Impu-dencie.

Dutie and profit are two distinct
things.

A law against vnthankfull
persons.

The Storke a gratefull bird.

repletion of grosse and gluish humors, and perturbations of the vitall spirits: so are those euill vapors which darken our senses, and dimme the eyes of our soule: namely, ignorance, rebellion, arrogancie, murmuring, vnassatiable desires, and other inward corruptions which ingratitude stirreth vp and nourisheth, and which hinder vs from acknowledging the benefits that God bestoweth vpon vs, either towards him by thanksgiuing, or towards his creatures by good deedes, which he accepteth as done to himselfe. For onely God needeth nothing, neither asketh any thing for himselfe, but onely willet vs not to be vnthankfull for that which it pleaseth him to giue vs. And through the selfe same fountaine of the corruptions of our soule we are bewitched with vnthankfull forgetfulness of those good turnes which we receiue from our like: yea vpon the least dislike of them, which either with, or without reason wee forge in our braines, we say, That neuer did any of vs good. The vnsatfull, for the least deniall or hard countenance which hee receiueth of his Lord, forgetteth all the good turnes, furtherances and fauours, which before that time he had done vnto him. The son complaineth of the father, the brother of the brother, the friend of the friend, the seruant of the master. Alas we see but too many such vngratefull wretches in France, who euen betray & sell daily them, of whom they hold all their aduancement and greatnes. And if vnthankfulness be familiar with the meane sort, let vs not thinke that it is farther off from those of high calling. For vpon euery light occasion, especially if a man frame not himselfe to that vice which they haue in greatest recommendation, they easily forget all the seruice that hath bin done vnto them, by reason of some new come guest, who will shew himselfe a seruiceable minister of their pleasures. This cometh to passe soonest, when they grow vp and encrease in calling and greatnesse, because commonly as they mount vp in calling (not beeing well instructed in vertue) they waxe worse and worse in behauiour. But let them boldly take this for an infallible rule, that an vnthankfull prince cannot long retaine a good man in his seruice. For the hope of reward (saith Plutarke) is one of the elements and grounds of vertue, and of that honour, bounty, and humanity, wherewith the prince recompenceth vertuous men, thereby prouoking and alluring them to seeke the welfare of his estate. This also is that which procureth the proceeding of Arts and Sciences, and that which bringeth forth notable wits: as contrariwise, all those things languish that are extinguished by little and little through the ingratitude and couetousnes of those that rule. The Ancients said not without cause, that impudency was the companion of ingratitude. For if no beast (as they say) is so shamelesse as an impudent, who is he that may be said to haue lesse shame, than an vnthankfull body? Impudencie (saith Theophrastus) is a contempt of glory, wrought in a man through the desire of vile and filthy gaine: and that man is impudent that borroweth some thing of him whom hee purposeth to deceiue. Are not these the proper effects of the vice of Ingratitude, which seeketh nothing else but to draw away the commodity and profit of euery one, being vnwilling to do good to any, or to requite a pleasure receiued, neither caring for true glory and immortall honor, which followeth euery vertuous action grounded vpon duty and honesty? And truly it is a very hard matter for them to be answerable to their honor, who seeke their owne profit as much as may be. For we must know that in equity and reason there is a difference betweene duty, and that which we commonly call profit: yea they are distinct things, and separated one from the other, as honesty is from such earthly commodity. This latter maketh men voide of feare to breake asunder and to dissolue whatsoever was ordained and ioyned together both by the law of God, and man, so that they may gaine thereby. But the other cleane contrary, causeth them to imploy liberally their goods, trauell, industry, and whatsoever else is in their power, that they may profit euery one, and that without hope of recompence: albeit they that receiue good turnes are bound to returne againe the like to their benefactors according to their ability, and to acknowledge their kindnesse. For this cause amongst the lawes of Draco established among the Athenians, there was a commandement, that if any man had receiued a benefit of his neighbour, and it were prooued against him long time after, that he had bin vnthankfull for it, and had ill acknowledged the good turne receiued, I say, that such a one should be put to death. And although no histories are able to shew vnto vs any kings or princes which surmounted, yea which matched Alexander the Great in munificence and liberality, or Iulius Caesar in pardoning iniuries; yet wee reade of them, that when they had knowledge of an vngratefull person, Alexander neuer gaue vnto him, nor Caesar euer forgave him: so greatly haue vertuous men alwaies hated ingratitude. It is reported of the Storke, that as often as shee hath yong shee casteth one out of her nest for the hire of the house, and reward of him that lodged her. O barbarous ingratitude, to behold him that hath bene lodged, serued, and brought

vp

vp in a house, and that with the sweate and labour of another, to seeke and to in deauour the spoile of all that is therein, even to the honour, and oftentimes the life of his host! Is it not the same vice of vnthankfulnesse that soweth dissentions and quarels, betweene the children and the father, betweene brethren, kinsfolks, and friends, and all for want of acknowledging one towards another, that bond of nature wherewith we ought to be tyed, and that secondary supply of good turnes, which knit vs vnseparably, and make vs daily beholding vnto them, if we consider exactly the nature of our estate, which cannot stand without the succour and aide of many, how great soeuer wee be? But what? Wee see by daily experience that which one of the Auncients said, That all humane things grow to bee olde, and come to the ende of their time, except Ingratitude. For the greater the increase of mortall men is, the more doth vnthankfulnesse augment. And yet we may note many examples in histories against this vice, which ought to awaken vs in our duty. Pyrrhus is exceedingly commended by Historiographers, because he was gentle, and familiar with his friends, ready to pardon them when they had angered him, and very earnest and forward in requiting and recompencing those good turnes which he had receiued. Which caused him to be grieved aboue measure at the death of a friend of his: not (as he said) because he saw that befall which is common and necessarily incident to the nature of man, but because he had lost all meanes of acknowledging vnto him those benefits which he had receiued: whereupon he reprooued and blamed himselfe for delaying and deferring it overlong. For truly money lent may well be restored to his heires that did lend it: but it goeth to the heart of a man that is of a good, noble, and excellent nature, if he cannot make the selfe same man that benefited him, to feele the recompence of those pleasures which he receiued. This caused the Ancients not onely to feare the note of Ingratitude towards their friends, but also to contend with their enemies, which of them should doe most good, and shew greatest curtesie to his companion, as the same Pyrrhus did behaue himselfe towards the Romanes, who had giuen him intelligence of a treason that was in hand against him. For he to acknowledge this good turne, sent backe vnto them a great number of prisoners taken in warre, which were then in his custody, and would not let them pay any ranfome. But the Romanes being vnwilling that he should excell them in any kind of beneficence, as also because they would not giue occasion that any should thinke they meant to receiue a reward for not consenting vnto a wicked act, sent him as many prisoners of his for a counter change. Cicerius who had beene Secretarie to the Great Scipio, when he perceiued that he was a competitor, and ioint-suitor for the Pretorship with the sonne of the same Scipio, he feared so greatly least he should be noted with ingratitude towards his sonne, vnto whom he was so greatly bound, and of whom he had receiued his advancement, that putting off the white garment which they vsed to weare that sued for offices, he became a solicitor for Scipio, and procured him that honourable estate wherewith himselfe might haue beene furnished, preferring immortal renowne before that, as one that would not shew himselfe vnthankfull towards them vnto whom hee was beholding. Wee reade of a barbarous Turke, by countrey an Arabian, and Admirall of the Infidels in their war against Baldwin king of Ierusalem, who not willing to suffer himselfe to be overcome in beneficence, much lesse to beare the name of an vnthankfull body towards the said Prince, who had once set him & his wife at liberty when they were his prisoners, went by night vnto him into a towne whither he was retired after the losse of a battell, and declared vnto him the purpose of his companions: whereupon he led him out of the towne, and conducted him vntill he had brought him out of all danger. Moreouer as concerning that which we haue already touched, that great men ought to haue speciall regard to this, that they be not vnthankfull, but reward liberally men of desert, forasmuch as this point belongeth principally to the vertue of liberality, which subiect is sufficient for a feuerall discourse, we will content our selues without any further addition, with the propounding of a notable example of Baiazer, Emperour of the Turkes touching this matter. This man being aduertised at the taking of the towne of Modona from the Venetians, of the valure of a yong lanitsarie of the age of 22. yeares, who was the first that mounted vpon the wall, whereupon 30000. lanitsaries moe being moued therewith were imboldened to doe the like, gaue him presently an office of Sargeant, which is one of the greatest and richest estates next to the Baschas, and is valued at 10000. duckats in yearly reuenues. Now if wee desire to follow to the vttermost of our power, the noble courage of those famous personages, that so we may not fall into the shameful vice of ingratitude, this will helpe vs greatly, if we alwaies esteeme the benefite which we receiue of another, greater then it is: and contrariwise repute that lesse than it is which we giue. For thereby

The fruits of
ingratitude.

Examples against Ingratitude.
Pyrrhus.

Cicerius.

A notable historie of an Arabian Turke.

Baiazer.

A meane to keepe vs from ingratitude.

we

Another
meane for the same.

Artaxerxes
thankfully accepted a little water.

Vertue is a sufficient recompence to it selfe.

The sleepe of the spirit is worse than death.

we shall feele our selues vrged, and as it were bound voluntarily to continue to doe good to our like, and so preserve the bond of humane societie inuiolable. Neither let vs (as proud and vaine-glorious men doe, who vaunt that they stand in need of none) disdain to receive a pleasure of our friends, although they be of lesse calling than we, when they desire our friendship. For if it be an honest thing to do good to all, it cannot be dishonest to receive likewise of all, because a receiver is as needfull as a giver for the accomplishing of a good turne. Furthermore, this will be another great occasion of preserving the common and mutuall bond, whereby we stand bound one to another, and of banishing all ingratitude from amongst men, if we observe this point alwaies, to requite double if we can, that good turne which we receive of another. Artaxerxes king of Persia disdained not the water which a poore handicrafts-man, as he saw him passe by, brought from a river in his hands and gave him, but received it with a smiling and cheerefull countenance, measuring the grace of the gift, not according to the value of the present, but according to his good wil that offered it. He thought it no lesse an act of magnanimitie and kingly bountie to take small presents in good part, and to receive them with a good countenance, than to give greater. Againe, we are to know, that a good man must neuer give over to do good to all, notwithstanding any pretence of Ingratitude wherewith they may be noted, whom he hath already bound unto him. For (as Plato saith) that is true vertue, which setteth it selfe on worke, in respect of no other end than of it selfe: yea, vertue is a very sufficient recompence unto it selfe. So although a man have occasion to bee grieved at an vnthankfull person, yet hee hath no libertie to repent him of the good turne which hee hath done him. Yea, the vnworthier hee is that receiveth a benefite, the more is hee to bee commended from whom it cometh. And wee may assure our selues that that thing only is given, which is given without any respect. For if there be hope of recompence, the benefactor deserueth not at all the name of a liberall man, but of one that giueth out to vsurie. Therefore Cicero misliketh the rehearsing of duties done one to another, saying: that those men are odious which vpbraide the good turnes they haue done, the remembrance of which the receiver ought to retaine, and the giver must passe them over in silence: seeing the greatest contentation, which an excellent and noble minded man can take in his glorious deeds and actions, is to see himselfe adorned with that vertue which is profitable to others, but to it selfe is fruitlesse, painefull, and perillous. To the end therefore that we may reape profit by all that hath beene heere discoursed, seeing wee know by ouer-many experiences unto what mischief Ingratitude hath made vs subiect, let vs awaken our spirits out of the deepe sleepe of ignorance, which hath so long time possessed them, considering that (as Pythagoras said) the sleepe of the spirit is worse than death. Therefore let vs watch in spirit, that both with heart and voice we may sing and set forth the unspeakable benefites that are daily offered unto vs by the goodnesse of God, wherof we shall be made partakers through his grace, if our frowardnesse be no let unto vs. Let our ioy, contentation and pleasure be in them that destroy and drive farre from vs all irksomnesse and sad melancholy, and let vs take singular delight in profiting one another by good turnes and benefites: yea let vs shew that we haue such noble mindes, that no Ingratitude can turne vs aside from the desire of doing good to all. Lastly, let vs recompence double, and reward without reckoning those good turnes, which wee receive of others, rather fearing least wee should bee overcome in beneficence, than in worldly reputation and glorie.

The end of the tenth daies worke.

The eleuenth daies worke.

Of Liberalitie, and of the vse of Riches. Chap. 41.

A SER.

Luine Plato handling good and euill things, saith: That Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and Iustice, are good things; and that their contraries are euill, namely, want of Prudence: Intemperance, Cowardlines, and iniustice. As for the goods of Fortune, & of the body, as riches, glory, friends, and honour, beauty, health, strength, and dexteritie, he calleth them meane or indifferent things, which of themselves are neither good nor bad, but become either the one or the other

other, as they are vsed with Prudence, or abused by Imprudence and want of discretion. Now seeing we entred yesterday into these points that depend of Iustice, I thinke the sequell of our matter requireth vs the handling of Liberalitie, which is nothing else but an excellent vse of those means which God putteth into our hands for the succoring of many: which vertue (as Cicero saith) is altogether ioyned to iustice, and ought to be guided by moderation and reason. Now my Companions, I leaue the discourse of this matter to you.

What Liberalitie is.

A M A N A. The vnsstable riches of earthly treasure (as Agapetus wrote to Iustinianus) imitate the course of the floating water. They abound for a little while to such as thinke they haue them, and suddenly they returne back againe and goe to others: but the treasure of Liberalitie and largesse, only abideth still with him that possesseth it.

Riches resemble the waters

A R A M. The habit of Liberalitie is a garment that neuer waxeth old, and charitie towards the poore is an incorruptible ornament. Diligence is sufficient to make a man rich when meanes are offered, but nobilitie of minde is requisite in the bestowing of great riches vpon commendable things. To this purpose Plato saith, that a niggard sometime is not wicked, but neuer good. Now then A C H I T O B. instruct vs sufficiently in this goodly matter.

A C H I T O B. Seeing Liberalitie is a vertue betweene these two vices, Conetousnesse and Prodigality, and seeing the iudgement of reason ought to be the director and master of giuing, and of free Libertie, that it be not abused in delights, or fauour of the wicked, but vsed with a prudent and ripe deliberation; Where, When, and As much as ought to be: I am of opinion that we may not vnjustly appropriate the effects of this vertue of Liberalitie, to the good vse of Riches, which of themselves are not able to make a man better, or more happy, as we were before sufficiently taught: but if they be ioyned with the knowledge of true honestie, and perfect goodnesse, they offer meanes vnto him whereby he may the better execute his good and honest inclinations, to the profit and releefe of all them that stand in neede. Hereupon we must bestow only whatsoeuer we haue more than necessary: first vpon them that are of our blood and kindred, then vpon all indifferently that want our helpe. And this is such an excellent and commendable deed, that Aristotle and all the Peripatetians maintained this opinion, that a happy life which consisteth in the perfect vse of vertue, could not be in all respects absolute, if it wanted the assistance of bodily and external goods, which are as instruments to further a man in the good and vertuous execution of his honest desires. But we shewed heretofore by good reason, and according to the opinion of the Academicks and Stoicks, that vertue only is sufficient of it selfe to make a man liue happily, and that his vertue cannot be either more honoured, or disgraced through the abundant hauiing or not hauiing of the goods of fortune, and of the body, seeing all other things receiue their glory from vertue, and are not able to adde any thereunto. And therefore a poore vertuous man is not kept from any perfect vse of vertue, nor of Liberalitie, which consisteth not in wasting much wealth, but in succoring the afflicted willingly, and in helping euery one according to abilitie. For this cause the poore womans mite was esteemed of God for a greater gift, then were all the presents of the rich, because they gaue of their abundance, and shee of that little which shee had. In this manner then euery good man may iustly deserue the name of liberall, neither may any man excuse himselfe for not practising liberalitie according to his abilitie. But chiefly rich and mighty men are bound thereunto by that commandement giuen vnto them in the Scripture, to make them friends with the riches of iniquity.

How riches may be well vsed.

Aristotles opinion concerning a happy life destitute of bodily and outward goods.

A poore man may be liberal.

Luke 16.9.

They must take good heede that they passe not the bounds of this vertue of Liberalitie, but strictly obserue those three points already touched by me, namely: that they bee liberall, Where, When, and As much as is requisite: For when Princes bestow estates, offices, or money, vpon vnworthy persons, they giue where, and more than they ought. And if in time of war, or calamities of their people, they giue to flatterers, dancers, and ministers of their pleasures, and consume much vpon feasts, Plaies, Turneis, and Maskes, they spend Where and When they ought not, deseruing thereby the name of prodigall men, and louers of riot and superfluity, howsoeuer flattering Courtiers labour to disguise such wastfull spendings with the name of Largesse and Liberality. But such superfluous expences bring forth effects contrary to the vertue and duty of a king, causing princes to leuie extraordinary taxes and tributes vpon no iust necessity, which is wholly to overthrow the vse of Liberality. And this is done also by men of meaner calling, when in their actions and expences they propound to themselves another end than good workes grounded vpon the loue of their neighbours according to charity. Cicero giueth vs a very good precept against the opinion of many in our

How princes passe the limits of liberalitie.

When the inferior sort passe the bounds of liberalitie.

time;

About what we are to bestow the ouer-
plus of our
wealth.

A notable law
amongst the Romanes.

How Epami-
nondas compelled a rich man to be liberall.

Cimon a notable patterne
of the true
vse of riches.

Liberality
most necessary for princes & great men.

time, who giue out in speech, that they are borne to doe great things, namely, to practise Liberalitie, and being poore of worldly goods, seeke to enrich themselues by vnlawfull and vniust meanes, that they may bring to passe their lofty desires: thinking afterwards through good deedes and great Liberality to make amends for that fault which they haue committed. But (as that father of Philosophy saith) our goods and patrimony must be iustly gotten, not by dishonest and hatefull gaine: secondly, wee must profite as many as wee can, so that they be worthy thereof. Moreover, a man may and ought to increase it by reason, diligence, and sparing, but to maintaine Liberality rather then to minister vnto lust, voluptuousnesse, or heaping vp of treasures. And yet now adaies these are the principall occasions for which riches are desired, which as they encrease, so we will haue our traine augmented, and our table to be answerable thereunto. Then although ouer great abundance remaine, yet we exercise very coldly the true workes of Liberality, which are to succour the needy. But this is to be farre separated from the commendable end, and good vse of riches, wherof all that we haue ouer and aboue our necessity ought to be imployed in the seruice of the common wealth, in releeuing the poore, diseased, afflicted, and prisoners, in procuring the good bringing vp of youth, and generally in exercising all other deedes of piety: accounting it great gaine to helpe the poore, seeing God is the rewarder thereof. Amongst the ancient Romanes there was a law kept inuolably, That no man should presume to make a publike feast, except before he had provided for all the poore of his quarter. And they accounted it a great shame and offence to the common wealth to see any man begge in the streetes. Therefore Plato saide that where there are beggers in a towne, there are also theeues and church robbers. Now if wee that beare the name of Christians, and acknowledge the poore to be the members of Iesus Christ, are not ashamed to banquet and feast, when in the meane time the needy cry at our gates, and almost die of hunger, doe wee not thinke that these Heathen men shall rise in iudgement before that great and iust iudge, to accuse and condemne vs as theeues and church robbers, and chiefly them that maintaine their delights and pleasure with the goods of the poore, towards whom the liberall distribution of our owne wealth especially ought to be extended both by the law of God and man? Wee must feede the poore, and not kill them: but to deny them nourishment, or to driue them from vs, is to kill them. For this cause Epaminondas capitaine generall of the Thebans, hauing knowledge of a very rich man that had no care of the poore in the towne, sent a poore needy fellow vnto him, and commaunded him vnder a great penalty to giue presently without faile 600. crownes to that poore man. The citizen hearing this commandement, came vnto him to know the occasion and cause thereof: It is (quoth Epaminondas) because this man being honest is poore, and thou which hast robbed greatly the Common wealth, art rich: compelling him thereupon to be liberall in despite of his teeth. So carefull were the Ancients to helpe them that had neede, and to shew themselves enemies vnto them that made no account of the poore. But if wee should diligently search all histories and deedes of famous men, yet could we not find a more notable example or worthy to be followed than that of Cimon the Athenian, who hauing gotten great wealth honourably, both for himselfe and his country, by the taking and ouerthrow of manie Barbarians and townes belonging vnto them, knew neuerthelesse how to bestow it liberally with greater glory and honor, by releeuing all his poore country men to whom his house was as an hospitall, wherein they were all nourished and fedde at an ordinary that was common to so many as would come thither; which was furnished not with dainty and delicate fare, thereby to occasion rich folkes to seeke it out, but with many common sorts of victuals in all plenty and abundance, and that for a great number of persons. This he did chiefly, as he said, to the end that poore honest men might haue the more leisure to imploy themselves about the affaires and seruice of the common wealth, and not be diuerted from that through trauell and care to get their liuing by the exercise of handicrafts. Besides, he caused all the inclosures, hedges and ditches of his lands and inheritance to bee taken away, that strangers which passed by, and his owne country men that wanted, might take of the fruits that were there according to their necessity. Now if this vertue of Liberality bee prayse-worthy in all persons that vse it well according to their ability, it is most of all necessarie, honourable and profitable for kings and princes, heads and capitaines of armies, gouenours of estates and common wealths, as that which procureth vnto them more then any other thing, the good will of euery one, wherein the chiefe strength and stay of their greatnesse consisteth. But withall they haue great neede of prudence and iustice, especially soveraigne princes, to distribute liberally and according to harmonically proportion their giftes, graces, and

and good turnes, whether they be estates, offices, benefices, knight-hoods, exemptions, freedoms, and other recompences due as rewards to their subiects, according as every one deserueth. It belongeth principally to them to keepe religiously and from point to point the lawes of Liberality, marking well to whome they giue, how much is giuen, at what time, in what place, to what end, and their owne ability that giue. Moreover, a Soueraigne must looke that recompence goe before gift, by rewarding first those that haue deserued, before he giue to them that haue deserued nothing: and aboue all things he must measure his largesse at the foote of his power. But when the iust rewards of subiects and honest men are distributed among the vicious, strangers, and vnworthy persons, this is that which oftentimes setteth flourishing estates on fire. There is neuer any want of flatterers and of impudent crauers about kings, whose onely drift is to suppe vp the blood, gnaw the bones, and sucke the marrow of princes and their subiects, to latisfie their foolish and vnprofitable expences; which are such and so great, that a man is well at ease to giue them any thing, they are alwaies so needy and money lesse, and sticke not to say that they neuer receiue good of their masters. In the mean while, they that haue deserued of the common wealth, are commonly remooued furthest from their maiesties: which cometh to passe both by the ignorance of the greater sort, who make but a bad choice of seruants worthy their fauor, as also because the honor and credite of good men forbiddeth them by flattery and begging to seeke after the rewards of vertue, which should be offered vnto them. But not to wander from our matter subiect, let us now consider of some notable examples of the Ancients concerning this whereof wee haue here discoursed. It was by his magnificall and incomparable Liberality, that Alexander the Great made a way for his noble platforms, whereby he became Monarch of the three parts of the world, distributing liberally all his deamins amongst the Macedonians, as before we mentioned. But what a notable testimony of this his Liberality did he giue a fresh, when during the war he caused this to be published in his army, That all they that were indebted vpon any occasion whatsoeuer, should bring their creditors vnto him, and he would discharge all their debts? Which thing he likewise performed. Moreover, who wil not admire the Liberality which al his life time he exercised towards the learned men of his time? Wee readeth that he gaue at one time to his master Aristotle, 800. Talents, which amount to 480000. crowns, as a reward for his pains, trauelles, and expence which he had bin at in describing the nature and property of liuing creatures. He sent to Anaxarchus the Philosopher 50. Talents, which are 30000. crowns, but he refused them, saying: that he knew not what to do with so great a sum. What (said Alexander then) hath he no friends to pleasure, seeing all king Darius wealth will not suffice mee to distribute amongst mine owne? Perillus besought him to giue him some mony towards the marriage of his daughters, wherupon he gaue to him also 50. Talents. And when he told him that it was too much by halfe, he replied thus: If halfe be enough for thee to take, yet it is not enough for me to giue. Likewise he gaue to a poore Egyptian asking his alms, a rich & populous citie, & when the other all astonished supposed that he mocked him: Take (quoth he to him) that which I giue thee: for if thou art Biaz that demandest, I am Alexander that giueth. The first Monarch of the Cassars, is hee not also exceedingly praised of Historiographers for the liberallest Prince of his time, & for such a one as shewed indeed, that he loved not riches in warre, that afterward he might at his pleasure liue in delight, or abuse them about his owne pleasures, but that they were the common price & reward of vertue, which he laid vp to recompence valiant and honest men withall? Of which reward, he said, he would haue no part, but onely distribute it to every one according to his desert. Antonius one of his succellours, sought to imitate him in his bountifull Liberality. For prooffe hereof may serue that commandement, which he gaue to his Treasorer to double the halfe of 2500. crownes, which hee had giuen to one of his favorites, whereas his Treasorer that brought him the saide summe, when he beheld it, thought that he should haue diminished the gift. But he staine this vertue with a perpetuall blot and infamy, which caused his destruction, in that he applied it to the seruice, and maintenance of his delights and pleasures, and abused it in the fauor and behalfe of the wicked, which is all one in great men as if they themselues were authors of vice and iniquity, Archelaus king of Macedonia, may serue vnto them for a notable example, whereby they may learn to keepe themselues in their estates from such a pernicious euil. This king being requested by a Minion of his Court to giue him a cup of gold wherein hee dranke, deliuered it to his Page, commanding him to beare and giue the same to Enripides, who was there present, and the said to the other: As for thee, thou art worthy to aske, & to be denied also: but Enripides is worthy

The lawes of liberality.

A common mischief which followeth the greater sort.

The liberality of Alexander.

To the Macedonians.

To all debtors in his army.

To Aristotle.

To Anaxarchus.

To Perillus.

To an Egyptian.

Cesar a liberal Prince.

Antonius a magnificent Prince, but voluptuous.

Archelaus gaue not to the unworthy.

How Antigonus denied one that was importunate.

Titus a good and liberall prince.

A notable precept of Phocylides.

Ptolemæus the Theban.

Denys the elder.

Cyrus.

Pertinax.

Math. 25.

worthy of gifts, although he aske not. Antigonus the elder being importunately desired by one that was good for nothing, and that counterfeited the Cynicke Philosopher, to give him a drachma, which might be in value about foure pence halfe penny, made answer: that it was no meete gift for a king. And when the other replied, that hee should then give him a Talent, he answered: It is no present for a Cynick. Titus the Emperour was so greatly in loue with Liberalitie all his life time, that remembring one euening with himselfe, that hee had given nothing the same day, he cried out: O my friends, we haue lost this day! He vsed to blesse those daies wherein the poore came vnto him; or when he sought after them to doe them good, putting in practise that precept of Phocylides, which saith: Sleepe not at night before thou hast thrise called to minde thy workes that day, and repent thee of the euill, but reioyce in that which was well done. For this great good nature Titus was loued whilest he liued, and bewailed after his death, and vpon his Tombe, was written this Epitaph: The delights of mankind are ended. Ptolemæus the Theban, captaine ouer a great army, had so acquainted himselfe not to denie any that stood in neede of his Liberality, that when a poore souldier demanded his almes of him, he hauing at that present nothing to bestow vpon him, gaue him his shooes, saying: My friend, make thy profit of this, seeing I haue no better thing to give thee. For I had rather goe bare-foot, than see thee suffer so much. Denys the elder, entring into his sonnes lodging, and beholding there great store of richiewels of gold and siluer, and of incredible treasure, said vnto him: My sonne, I did not give thee these riches to vse in this sort, but to impart of them vnto thy friends. For thou must know, that no man in all the world is so rich as he that is liberall, who with his liberality preserveth his friends, and mollifieth his enemies. This is that which Cyrus by experience shewed vnto Craesus, and how smally those gifts which he had bestowed vpon worthy persons had impouerished him. For sending to euery one of them to succour him with money, they sent him altogether as much as they had receiued by gift from him, bestowing moreouer great rewards vpon the bearer of his message. So that the wealth which proceedeth from liberalitie is vnconsumable, as that which is gotten by giving, and by scattering abroad, is gathered together. Pertinax, who succeeded Commodus in the Empire, surpassed all the Emperours that euer were for exceeding liberality, which hee vsed to the benefit and profit of all his subiects. For first hee gaue freely all the waste and desolate ground in Italy, and in other his prouinces, to them that could and would till them, and to the labourers thereof he gaue freedome and exemption from all taxes and subsidies for ten yeares, with perpetuall assurance that they should not be troubled in their possession. Hee forbade also that his name should be set in any castell or place within his dominion, saying: That his lands were not proper to him onely, but common to all the people of Rome. He abolished all customes, tributes, and tolles laid vpon the hauens of riuers, at the entries into townes, waies and passages; which hee called inuentions of tyranny to get money, and placed all such things in their ancient liberties. Which actions befeemed rather a father of the countrey, than a lord and master: and there are few princes that vse to doe so, but many to whom their owne will seemeth to be a most iust law. But contrariwise let them know, that they ought to be subiect to the eternall Law, namely, to right, reason, truth, and iustice, which are the proper will of God onely, whose people they must rule with right and equity, by comforting them through beneficence, and continuall good turnes. Let vs learne then by our present discourse to decke our selues with this vertue of Liberality, euery one according to those meanes that are given vnto him from aboue, and are iustly gotten by him: taking good heede, that we abuse it not in any kinde of voluptuousnesse or vice, neither yet vpon the wicked, as though we purposed to nourish and maintaine their impieties. For this is vtterly to destroy iustice, and consequently the bond and preseruatiue of humane society. But if we, being well instructed by the Spirit of wisdom, feede the hungry, give drinke to the thirstie, lodge them that want harbour, and clothe the naked, sowing in this manner by the workes of pietie that talent which is committed to our keeping, we shall reape abundantly in heauen the permanent riches and treasures of eternall life.

Of Conetousnesse, and of Prodigalitie. Chap. 42.

No wicked thing ought to be iudged profitable.

A CHI-TOB.

IF that diuine rule of Cicero were as well written in our heart, as hee desired to haue it setled in his sonne, That onely that thing is to bee iudged profitable which is not wicked, and that nothing of that nature should seeme profitable, we should not behold amongst vs so many cursed acts, as are daily committed through the vnbrideled desire of the goods goods of this world. For that which most of all troubleth men, is when they thinke that the sin which they purpose to practise is but small in respect of the gaine, thereby craftily separating profit from honesty, & so suffering themselves to be overcome of couetousnes, which is the defect of liberality, whereof we discoursed euen now, whose excess also is Prodigality, of which two vices we are now to intreate.

A SER. Every one that coueteth treasures (said Anacharsis, one of the wise men of Græcia) is hardly capable of good counsell and instruction. For the couetous man commonly murmureth at that which God permitteth and nature doth, so that he will sooner take vpon him to correct God, than to amend his life.

AMANA It is a hard matter (said Socrates) for a man to bridle his desire, but he that addeth riches thereunto, is mad. For couetousnes neither for shame of the world, nor feare of death, will not repress or moderate it selfe. But it belongeth to thee, ARAM, to instruct vs in that which is here pronounced.

ARAM. Since the greedie desire of heaping vp golde and siluer entred in amongst men, with the possession of riches, couetousnesse followed, and with the vse of them pleasures and delights: whereupon they began to faile in a dangerous sea of all vices, which hath so ouerflowne in this age of ours, that there are very few towers how high soeuer seated, but it hath gone vp a great deale about them. For this cause I see no reason why men should esteeme so much, or iudge it such a happy thing to haue much goodly land, many great houses, and huge summes of ready money, seeing all this doth not teach them, not to be carried away with passions for riches, and seeing the possession of them in that manner procureth not a contentation voide of the desire of them, but rather inflameth vs to desire them more through an insatiable couetousnes, which is such a pouerty of the soule, that no worldly goods can remedy the same. For it is the nature of this vice to make a man poore all his life time that he may finde himselfe rich onely at his death. Moreover it is a desire that hath this thing proper and peculiar to it selfe, to resist and to refuse to be satisfied, whereas all other desires helpe forward the same, and seeke to content those that serue them. Couetousnes (saith Aristotle) is a vice of the soule, whereby a man desireth to haue from all parts without reason, and vniustly with holdeth that which belongeth to another. It is sparing and skanty in giuing, but excessive in receiuing. The Poet Lucretius calleth it a blinde desire of goods. And it mightily hindreth the light of the soule, causing the couetous man to be neuer contented, but the more hee hath, the more to desire and wish for. The medicine which he seeketh, namely, golde and siluer, increaseth his disease, as water doth the dropsie: and the obtaining thereof is alwaies vnto him the beginning of the desire of hauing. He is a Tantalus in hell, who betweene water and meate dieth of hunger. Now it is very sure, that to such as are wise and sound of iudgement, nature hath limited certaine bounds of wealth, which are traced out vpon a certaine Center, and vpon the circumference of their necessity. But couetousnes working cleane contrary effects in the spirits of fooles, carrieth away the naturall desire of necessary things, to a disordinate appetite of such things as are full of danger, rare, and hard to be gotten. And which is woofse, compelling the auaritious to procure them with great paine and trauell, it forbiddeth him to enioy them, and stirreth vp his desire, depriueth him of the pleasure. Stratonicus mocked in old time the superfluity of the Rhodians, saying, that they builded as if they were immortal, and rushed into the kitchen as if they had but a little while to liue. But couetous men scrape together like great and mighty men, and spend like mechanickall and handicrafts men. They endure labour in procuring, but want the pleasure of enioying. They are like Mules that carry great burthens of golde and siluer on their backs, and yet eate but hay. They enioy neither rest nor liberty which are most precious, and most desired of a wiseman, but liue alwaies in disquietnes, being seruants and slaues to their riches. Their greatest miserie is, that to encrease and keepe their wealth, they care neither for equity or iustice, they contemne all lawes both diuine and humane, and all threatnings and punishments annexed vnto them: they liue without friendship and charitie, and lay holde of nothing but gaine. When they are placed in authority and power aboue others, they condemne the innocent, iustifie the guilty, and finde alwaies some cleanly cloke and colour of taking, and of excusing (as they thinke) their corruption & libertie, making no difference between duty and profite. Wherefore we may well say in a word, That couetousnes is the root of all euil. For, what mischiefs are not procured through this vice? From whence proceede quarrels, strifes, suites, hatred and enuie, thefts, pollings, sackings, warres, murders and poisonings, but from hence God is forgotten, our neighbour hated, & many times the son forgueth not his father, neither the Couetousnes hath ouerflowne all.

Couetousnes will neuer be satisfied.

Couetousnes like to a dropsie.

Stratonicus derided the superfluity of the Rhodians

Couetous men compared to mules.

The miserable life of couetous men.

1 Tim. 6. 10. The fruits of couetousnes.

How prodigality & couetousnes may in some sort be linked together in one subject.

Couetous men compared to hogs.

Couetous men compared to rats & cundit pipes.

It is better to be the sheepe than the son of a couetous man.

brother his brother. nor the subject his Lord, for the desire of gaine. In a word, there is no kinde of cruelty that couetousnesse putteth not in practise. It causeth hired and wilfull murders (O execrable impietie) to be well thought of amongst vs, It causeth men to breake their faith giuen, to violate all friendship, to betray their countrey. It causeth subjects to rebell against their princes, gouernours, and magistrates, when, not able to beare their insatiable desires, nor their exactions and intollerable subsidies, they breake forth into publike and open sedition, which troubleth common tranquillitie, whereupon the body politike is changed, or for the most part vtterly ouerthrowne. Moreover, the excesse of the vertue of liberalitie, which is prodigality, may bee ioyned to couetousnes, and then there is no kinde of vice but reigneth with all licence in that soule that hath these two guests lodged together. And because it is a thing that may seeme hard to conceiue, how two vices so disagreeing by nature, may bee found to agree in the same subject, we will soone beleue it, if we say with the Ancients, that is is the point of couetousnes, to gripe, and to take Where & When it ought not: and that this dealing is put in practise necessarily vpon one of these two occasions, either of niggardlines and sparing, or for prodigality, as they doe that vniustly seeke for meanes to satisfie their fond desires, and their vnprofitable and superfluous expences. The common opinion is, that they who put to no vse the riches that they get so couetously, are more miserable than those that abuse them after they haue obtained them by ill meanes: because many may reape profite by these, but of the other none, no not their onely heires receive more benefite than they doe of hogges, which is after their death. But it falleth not so out altogether with Kings and Princes, whose couetousnesse ioyned with prodigality is more hurtfull to their subjects than that which is ioyned with sparing. For this latter, although it maketh them commit much iniustice, and polling of their people to fill their treasuries, yet when any neede happeneth to the Common wealth, either of forraine warre, or any other calamity, a good ground worke is laide in the bottome of their cofers for to redresse the same. But the other maintained with the like iniustice, leaueth nothing behinde for prodigall princes, wherewith to helpe themselves in time of necessity. Whereupon oftentimes proceedeth the finall subersion of their estate, weakened by exactions, to the ouerthrowe and vndoing of many who would haue beene the sinewes of their strength: and all to enrich a few who then will stand them in small steade; or else because they wasted it vpon riot and superfluities, whereby the warlike vertues both of themselves and of other subjects become degenerate and bastardlike. Of this we note, that after a prince groweth to bee prodigall and desirous of superfluity and foolish expences, no riches he hath will euer suffice him: so that to satisfie his spending, hee must needs become couetous and vniust. The like happeneth many times to the meaner sort, and to men of all estates, that they are couetous and prodigall both together, namely, when they gather wealth by vnlawfull meanes, and spare to spend it in the workes of pietie, that they may sowe it plentifully vpon delights and pleasures. But the humour niggardlinesse and neerenes, is most common in couetous wen, whom Plutarke compareth to rats and mice that are in gold mines, which eate the golden oare, and yet nothing can bee gotten from them but after their death. Likewise he compareth them to pipes through which, water beeing conueied into a cesterne, nothing remaineth for them. So couetous men heape vp treasures to leaue them to their heires, that they also may afterward leaue them to their heires as their predecessors did: and so neither one nor the other reape any good or benefite by them, vntill in the end either some tyrant take all away by violence from that hold fast, or else some one that is the worst of the race succeedeth, spending all dissolutely vpon pleasure. This caused Diogenes, iesting at couetous men, to say that he had rather bee their sheepe than their sonne, because they were very carefull to giue their cattell meete pasture, but in steade of feeding their youth with conuenient and profitable nourishment, through good and vertuous education, they marre, spill, and corrupt them, by grafting couetousnes in the soules of their children, as if they meant to build within them a strong fort wherein to keepe their succession safely. Whereas contrariwise they should learne of Cicero, that the glory of vertue, and of praise woorthy and honorable deeds, is the greatest riches which fathers can leaue to their children, and more excellent then any other patrimony whatsoever. Socrates called a young man brought vp in ignorance, and rich withall, a golden slave. And that seruant answered not vnfitly, when, being demanded what his maister did (who was a couetous man, and one that hauing great quantity of good wine, sold it to others, and sought for fowre wine in Tanerns for his owne drinking) he said: Albeit hee hath great store of good, yet he seeketh for euill. But let vs now consider of some notable examples:

shewing

shewing forth the pernicious effects, which, as we said, proceede from these two vices, Couetousnesse, and Prodigalitie. Muleasses king of Thunes, had his eies put out by his sonne, that hee might seaze vpon his treasures. Priamus king of Troy, fearing the taking of his citie, sent Polydorus his yongest sonne to his sonne in law Polymnestor, with a great quantity of gold and siluer: but he being desirous to possesse the same, slue the childe his brother in law, for which afterward he receiued his deserued hire. For Queene Hecuba comming vnto him, and taking him aside into a chamber, not shewing countenance of any discontentment, with the helpe of her woman put out his eies. The Emperour Caligula was so much touched with couetousnesse, that there was no kinde of lucre: or meane to get money by, how vnlawfull and wicked soeuer it were, which he sought not out: insomuch that he laid a tribute vpon vrine, and sold his sisters gownes, whom he had violated and sent into banishment. And yet in one yeare of his reigne he spent prodigally 67. Millions of gold, which Tiberius his predeceffor had gathered together. Nero vsing great cruelty, polling, exaction, and confiscation towards his subiects, gaue to the ministers of his tyranny in those fiftene yeares wherein he reigned, the value of 55. Millions of Crownes. He caused a very stately guilt pallace to be built, which tooke in compasse a great part of Rome, but it was ouerthrowne after his death, that the memory of such a cruell tyrant might bee rooted out of the earth. A notable example for such as thinke to get a vaine glory by buildings that are more stately than necessary, and yet leave behind them a notorious marke of their tyranny, and perpetuall testimony to posterity, that they haue raised their houses with the blood of their subiects. Henrie the seauenth Emperour, a Prince indued with most excellent vertues, was poisoned with an Host, which an Italian Monke corrupted with money caused him to take. But what neede wee seeke for such examples of auncient men to know the fruits of couetousnesse, when as the unhappines of our age daily affoordeth vs new before our eies, wherein we heare nothing almost spoken of, but poisonings and murders hired with money, and all committed to this ende, that the authors of them may haue their goods whom they kill, for the satisfying of their insatiable couetousnesse? Amongst many other, who hath not heard of the cruell wilfull murder of a Gentlewoman of a good house, and of her men and maides, by her owne brethren in law, done a few daies past? A cruelty exceeding that of the Cannibals, who yet spare domesticall blood. But God the iust iudge would not that such an execrable wickednesse should belong concealed and vnpunished. For when it could not be found out by any inquiry of man, one of the murderers touched with the hand of God, and taken with an extreame sicknesse, being as it were mad, and as Caine was in times past, disclosed his sinne of himselfe, the hainousnesse whereof so troubled him, that hee could hope for no mercy. Afterward recovering his health, hee was taken vpon his owne confession, and being convicted of the fact, accused all the authors thereof, of whom some are executed, and the rest expect no better event. That couetousnesse causeth subiects to rebell against their couetous Princes, and that oftentimes to their overthrow: we haue an example in Mauritius the Emperour, who was depriued of the Empire, and had his head cut off, besides the death of his five children, and of his wife, by reason of the ill will of his people and men of warre, which hee had purchased, who could beare no longer his couetousnesse, whereby hee was moued to winke at spoiles, and murders, and to keepe backe the pay of his souldiers. In the time of S. Lewes the king, the people of five cities and five villages of high Almaine, which at this day we call Switserland, raised such a great tumult and sedition, that they put to the edge of the sword all their Princes, Lords, and Noble men; the chiefe cause thereof was their couetousnesse, which made them oppresse their subiects with vniust exactions. The niggardly sparing of king Lewes the eleuenth, moued strangers greatly to contemne him, and was in part the cause of the rebellion of his subiects. For hauing put away in a manner all the Gentlemen of his household, hee vsed his Tailor alwaies for his Herald of Armes, his Barber for Embassadour, and his Physitian for his Chancellor: and in derision of other kings, hee wore a greasie hat of the coursell wooll. We finde in the chamber of accounts a bill of his expences, wherein is set downe 20. soules for two new sleeues to his old doublet, and another claufe of 15. deniers for grease to grease his boots. And yet he increased the charges of his people three millions more than his predeceffors had done, and alienated a great part of his Demaine. Sparing may well be vsed (which at this day is more necessary than euer) and yet the maiesty of a King nothing diminished, neither the dignity of his house, and without the abusing of his greatnesse. Likewise those men, who after ther they haue hoorded much treasure, and are so besotted and blinded with a couetous loue of their wealth, that they will not vpon any necessity employ

Examples of the fruits of couetousnesse and of prodigalitie. Muleasses. Polymnestor.

Caligula.

Nero.

Against the superfluitie of sumptuous buildings.

An Italian Monke.

A cruell murder of a Gentlewoman and of her household.

Mauritius depriued of the Empire for his couetousnesse.

The Nobility of Switserland destroyed for the same cause. Lewes. 11.

Calipha.

How Dionysius punished a couetous wretch.

How Darius his couetousnesse was beguiled.

Cassius Licinius strangled himselfe to leaue his goods to his children.

Hermocrates bequeathed his goods to himselfe. A Ratte sold for 200. pence. Couetousnesse caused Crassus to play on both sides.

it, can no more auoide their destruction, than the other before mentioned. This doth the history of Calipha king of Persia teach vs, who hauing filled a Tower with gold, silver, iewels, and pretious stones, and being in warre against Allan king of the Tartarians, was so ill succored of his owne people, because he would not giue them their pay, that he was taken in his towne, and by Allan committed prisoner in the said Tower, with these words: If thou hadst not kept this treasure so couetously, but distributed it amongst thy soldiers, thou mightest haue preferred thy selfe, and thy city. Now therefore enioy it at thine ease, and eate and drinke thereof, seeing thou hast loued it so much. And so he suffered him to die there of hunger, in the midst of his riches. The punishment which Dionysius the elder, king of Syracuse, laide vpon a rich couetous subiect of his, was more gentle, but worthy to be well noted, being full of instruction. For being aduertised that he had hid great store of treasure in the ground, hee commanded him vpon paine of life to bring it vnto him: which hee did, although not all of it, but retained part, which hee tooke with him, and went to dwell in another city, where he bestowed his money vpon inheritance: When Dionysius vnderstood thereof, hee sent for him, and restored all his golde and silver: saying vnto him: Forasmuch as thou knowest now how to vse riches, not making that vnprofitable, which was appointed for the vse of man, take that, which before thou wast vnworthy to enioy. And to speake the truth, there is no reason wherewith the couetousnesse of such men may be coloured. For if they say, that they spend not because they care nor for spending, it is a point of great folly in them to labour to gather more wealth than they want. But if they desire to spend, and yet dare not for niggardlinesse doe so, nor enioy the fruite of their labour, they are a great deale more miserable. Whereby it appeareth vnto vs what a goodly and commendable thing it is to be content and satisfied with a little, which freeth vs from the desire of vnnecessarie things. Now if wee are to take those things for superfluous, which we will not vse, we ought, for the reasons already set downe, to make no lesse account of those which wee would abuse in riot and superfluity. The couetousnesse of Darius, king of the Persians, was beguiled and laughed to scorne through the subtil inuention of Nitocris Queene of Babylon (some attribute it to Semiramis) who being desirous to welcome her successors that were touched with auarice, which shee abhorred aboue all things, caused a high sepulcher to be erected ouer those gates of the city through which there was most passage, with these words ingrauen therein: If any king of Babylon that shall come after me finde want in his treasure, let him open this tombe, and take as much as he will. Otherwise let him not open it, for it will not be best for him. After many ages were past, and none of the kings of Babylon had touched the said sepulcher, Darius conquering the kingdome causing the coffin to be opened, thinking to finde there that which was promised. Neuerthelesse he found there nothing but a dead body, with this writing: If thou wert not insatiable and very couetous, thou wouldest not haue opened the tombe of the dead. Moreover that couetousnesse oftentimes blindeth men so far, as that it causeth them to take away their owne life without feare of condemning their soules, many examples thereof are left in memory: of whom some through griefe for some great losse of goods, others to leaue their children rich, haue voluntarily procured their owne death. Cassius Licinius was of this number, who being accused, attainted, and convicted of many thefts and briberies, and beholding Cicero President at that time, about to put on the purple gowne to pronounce sentence of confiscation of goods, and of banishment, hee sent word to Cicero that he was dead during the processe and before condemnation: and presently in the field he smothered himselfe with a napkin, hauing no other meaning therein but to saue his goods for his children: For then the lawes concerning the punishment of such as had robbed the common-wealth, or such as being prevented slue themselves, were not made: so that they that were accused might saue their liues by forsaking their goods, yea by paying so much onely as their accusers demanded. But there are some of a cleane contrary disposition to Licinius, who being ready to giue vp the ghost, would gladly carry their wealth with them, as wee reade of Hermocrates, who by his will made himselfe heire of his owne goods. Athenens maketh mention of another, who at the houre of his death deuoured many peeces of his gold, & sewed the rest in his coate, commanding that they should be all buried with him. Valerius Maximus telleth of one, who being besieged within the towne of Cassilina by Hannibal, preferred the hope of gaine before his owne life. For he chose rather to sell a Ratte, which he had taken, for 200. Romane pence, than to satisfie his hunger, whereof hee died quickly after: and the buier being the wiser man, saued his life by that deare meate. Crassus Consul of Rome is likewise noted by Historiographers to be extreme couetous, which caused him to swimme betweene two factions divided for Cesar and Pompey, seruing his owne turne by them both, and changing many times from one side to another in the administration of the Common wealth. Hee shewed himselfe neither a constant friend, nor a dangerous enemy, but soone forsooke both amity and enmity, when hee saw it would bee profitable to him, whereof the encrease of his substance gaue great prooffe. For when he first began to intermeddle in affaires, his riches amounted but to 300. Talents, which according to our money came to about 180000. crownes: but after when he purposed to go from Rome to war with the Parthians, he would needes know how much all his wealth came to. And first hee offered to Hercules the tenth of all his goods: secondly, he made a publike feast for al the people of Rome of a thousand tables: and thirdly, he gaue to euery citizen as much wheate as would finde him three moneths. Notwithstanding all this, he found that he was woorth 7100 talents, which amounted to foure millions, two hundred and threescore thousand crownes. He vsed to say, that he accounted no man rich, except he were able of his own charges to hire and maintaine an army: because as no man can set downe a ready reckoning of the expences of warre: as king Archidamus said, so the riches that is to sustaine it, may not be limited. But in the end his couetousnes and ambition, which commonly are not farre separated one from another, led him to a violent death, as we declared else where. Now as Craesus was blamed for couetousnes, so Pompey was as much commended & wel thought of, because he abhorred and condemned it. Whereof hee gaue good prooffe, as also of great piety at the taking of the city of Ierusalem from the Iewes. For when he entred into the temple, and beheld the great riches thereof, the table of gold, the golden candlesticke, a great number of vessels of gold, with great abundance of good and exquisite spice for smels, and knew moreouer that there was in the treasure about two thousand talents of sacred siluer, yet he would not touch it in any wise, nor suffer any thing to be taken from it. Wee that say we are Christians, follow a farre off the piety of these heathen men, when as both great and small watch for nothing more than how to intrappe the goods of the Church, to make them serue our delights and pleasures. Moreouer wee see that this cursed plant of couetousnes groweth as much in the house of praier, as in the courts of kings and princes. The corruption also that hath followed the same, is knowne sufficiently in those men, who to satisfie their vnstatiable desires call themselves protectors of this Hydra Ignorance, to the destruction and perdition of their owne soules, and of tenne thousand mo for whom they are to answer. Ionian Pontanus rehearseth a pleasant historie of a cardinal named Angelot, who was well punished for his couetousnes. This cardinal vsed when his horse keepers had in the evening giuen oates to his horses, to come downe all alone without a light by a trap dore into the stable, and so steale their oates, and carry it into his garner whereof he kept the key himselfe. He continued his goings and commings so often, that one one of his horse keepers not knowing who was this theefe, hid himselfe in the stable, and taking him at the deed doing (being ignorant who it was) bestowed so many blows on him with a pitchfork, that he left himself dead so that he was faine to be caried by foure men into his chāber. John Maria Duke of Millan, chastised very iustly, but ouer seuerely, the couetousnes of a Curat, who denied the seruice of his office in the burying of a dead body, because his widow had not wherewith to pay him the charges of the buriall. For the Duke himselfe going to the funerals of the dead, caused the priest to be taken and bound to the coarfe, & so cast the both into one pit. A cruelty no lesse detestable thā the vice of those wretches that sel the gifts of God, & make merchandise of that, which they ought to giue freely to the people. Now to end our matter, we maintaine this, that couetousnes and vnlawfull desire of riches, is the root of all euill, misery and calamity. Moreouer it is more to bee misliked in great men when it followeth riot and prodigality, than if it bee ioyned with niggardlines, as well for the reason before touched, as also because niggardly and couetous princes vse more carefully in their estates and dignities to provide such men as are prudent & staied, for the preferuation of their subiects, knowing that their owne ruine dependeth of their vndoing. Which thing voluptuous princes neglect, because they dreame of nothing but of their pleasures, and so provide none but such as will serpe their numortherein, and flatterers, or else such as wil giue them most money wherewith to maintaine their delights. And let vs further know, that all couetous men go astray from the right way of truth, & in fold themselves in many griefes & miseries, & become odious to euery one. Besides, not being content with their dayly bread, when contrariwise their desire is infinite, they evidently mocke God as often as they make that petition: because they labor to conceale and to dissemble before him that knoweth all things

Wonderfull
riches.

Pompey abhorred coue-
tousnes.

The great couetousnes of a cardinall.

The cruel punishment of a couetous ca-
rate.

1. Tim. 6. 10.

What magistrates are best liked of coue-
tous princes.

1. Tim. 6. 6.
Matth. 6. 19.
We must renounce vniust riches.

things, their covetous and greedie affection, whereas true praier ought to declare and to open the inward meaning of the heart. Let vs therefore that are better instructed learne, that godlineſſe with contentation is great gaine: and let vs not wearie our ſelues in the heaping vp of treaſure, which the ruſt and moth may conſume and eate, and the theefe ſteale, but let vs renounce riches and the world, ouer which Satan beareth rule, leaſt in that terrible day hee accuſe vs before the great Iudge, and conuince vs of taking ſomething of his; and then the Iudge being vpriſt and iuſt, deliuer vs into his hands to throw vs into darkneſſe, where there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth for euermore.

Of Enuie, Hatred, and Backbiting. Chap. 43.

Nothing
more vnworthie the ſpirit
of man than enuie.

The nature
of Enuie.

Hatred and ill will are the companions of en-
uie.

What execrable fruits
enuie hath brought forth

What enuie
is.
Malignitie is defined of ſome to be the effect of that malice
which one man beareth
to another.
The difference between hatred and
enuie.

A R A M. THe minde of man, which of it owne nature is created ſociable, gracious, and ready to helpe every one, yea, which by the force of charitie working together, with it, feeleth it ſelfe as it were conſtrained to mourne with thoſe that weepe, and to reioyce with them that laugh, is able to ſhew nothing more vnworthy it ſelfe, than to be overcome of Enuie, which is a wilde plant in the ſoule, bringing forth cleane contrary effects to that good will which we owe to our neighbour, and comprehending in it all iniuſtice generally, and all wickedneſſe of men: as we may ſee if you thinke good (my companions) to ſearch more narrowly into the nature of this vice.

A C H I T O B. Enuie proceedeth of a naughty diſpoſition, and prouoketh light braines (as Pindarus ſaith) to reioyce in beholding the aduerſity of ſome, and to be vexed at the happy ſucceſſe of others: cauſing men alſo to delight in backbiting honeſt men, eſpecially ſuch as are praiſed. But take heede (ſaith Putacius) leaſt, ſeeking to auoide enuie, thou becommelt miſerable.

A S E R. Glory and vertue (ſaith Virgil) are alwaies enuied: which vice is commonly accompanied with hatred and ill will, whereby men are drinen forward to detract and ſlander others. But he that keepeth his mouth (ſaith the wiſe man) keepeth his ſoule. Let vs then heare A M A N A, who will inſtruct vs more at large in this which is here propounded vnto vs.

A M A N A. That wicked and ſubtle enemy of mankind, not being able to abide the glory whereunto God hath called men, of which he deſtroyed himſelfe through his pride, was drinen with enuie to tempt our firſt parents: whoſe ingratitude conceiuing ſinne in the ſoule of man, the firſt fruit brought forth by this curſed plant, ſeemeth likewiſe to haue bene enuie, with which Adams eldeſt ſonne being moued, ſlew his onely brother. O curſed and furious enuie, oh ſlothfull branch of execrable euils, ſeeing by thee man was firſt beguiled, and induced afterward to admit murder into his heart, and to water the earth, being yet virgine-like, with his brothers blood: whereby hee began his chiefe worke vpon innocency, to the end that wicked men might from father to ſonne haue this prerogative to oppreſſe the good! Is there any vice then amongſt vs which wee ought to hate and ſie from more than from enuy, which hauing nothing of her firſt euill nature diminiſhed, leadeth men to moſt vniuſt and deteſtable actions? Neuertheleſſe to what paſſion are wee more inclined, or doe we nourish more willingly than this? Let every one enter into himſelfe and vndoubtedly he ſhall finde there a thouſand enuies, which are neuer without hatred and rancor, grafted in the ſecretteſt place of his ſoule. True it is, that enuie according to the ſubjects which it meeteth withall, bringeth forth more pernitiouſ effects in ſome, and leſſe hurtfull in others. But howſoeuer it be, this paſſion is alwaies blame-worthy, and ought to be eſchued of every good and vertuous man, whoſe deſire is, not to wander out of the path of duty, and honeſty. We ſay therefore that Enuie is a grieſe ariſing of another mans proſperitie, and that malignity is commonly ioyned with it, whether it bee the fountaine thereof, as ſome ſay, or one part thereof, as others will haue it. This malignity is a delight and pleaſure taken in another mans harme, although wee receiue no profite thereby: and it ſeemeth to bee accidentall, that is, procured by hatred or ill will, ariſing of ſome euill affection that one man beareth to another. For this cauſe Plutarke diſtinguiſheth hatred from enuy, ſaying: that hatred is bred in our hearts through an imagination and conceite which we haue, that hee whom wee hate behaue himſelfe wickedly, either towards all men generally, or particularly towards vs: but that men enuie onely thoſe whom they know to bee in proſperity. And ſo it ſeemeth, that enuie is indefinite and not limited, much like to ſore eies, that are offended at every cleareneſſe and light, but that hatred is limited, being alwaies grounded and ſtaied vpon ſome some certaine objects in regard of it selfe. Moreover, no man hath iust cause to enuie another mans prosperity. For he doth no man wrong, because he is happy: whereas one the contrary side many are iustly hated for their vices and impieties, and ought to be shunned of good men: which hatred of the wicked is a property that belongeth to good men. But the hatred that is borne towards good men, is a passion not much separated from enuie. And thus may these two passions resembling two plants, be said to be nourished, preserved, and increased by the selfe same meanes, albeit they succede one another. The same Plutark being desirous to teach vs, how wee ought to abhorre enuie: calleth it forcery: because through the poison thereof, it doth not onely fill the enuious body with a naughty and hurtfull disposition, but the infection disperseth it selfe also through the eies, euen vpon them that behold it, so that they are touched therewith, as it were by some poisonfull influence. Likewise hee compareth it to the flies called Cantharides. For as they alight especially vpon the fairest wheate, and most blown roses: so enuie commonly setteth it selfe against the honestest men, and such as haue most glorie and vertue. Power, honour, strength, riches, are but brands to kindle the fire thereof. Therefore Thucydides saith, that a wise man desireth to be enuied, to the end hee may doe great things. Bias said, that enuie and an old house oftentimes light vpon a man, and neuer knocke at his gates. But if enuie be hurtfull to others, it is much more noisome to him that possesseth her, tormenting him within continually with a thousand turbulent passions, which shorten his daies, diminish the powers of his bodie, and are a great deale more pernicious to his soule. For it will not suffer him to taste or conceiue any good speech, or sound instruction, from whomsoever it commeth: but causeth him to reiect and speake against it, as if he were iealous and enuious of his owne good. The occasion whereof is the ill will which naturally hee beareth against all them that deserue more than himselfe, whereupon hee striueth rather to blame, or to wrest in ill part whatsoever was well meant, than to reape any profite thereby. And if he heare a man commend other mens deuices, or any of his owne doings contrarie to his minde, hee thinketh that hee had so many blowes given him with a cudgell. Thus we see, that enuie wishing well to none, doth no lesse torment and hurt the soule that is infected therewith. And to speake in a word, it comprehendeth the generall iniustice, which is all kinde of wickednesse, and destroyeth all duties of humanity, causing men to hurt those whom they ought to loue and succour. Of this wilde plant of enuie, backbiting is a branch, which delighteth and feedeth it selfe with slandering and lying, whereupon good men commonly receiue great plagues, when they ouerlightly giue credit to backbiters. Therefore Diogenes the Cynicke being demanded what biting of beasts was most dangerous, answered: Of furious and wilde beasts, the backbiters: and of tame beasts, the flatterers. To the same purpose Themistocles the Thebane said, that It was the greatest grieve in the world, to see the honour of a good man in the mercy of a venomous tongue, and wronged with slanderous speeches. For seeing good fame and credite is more precious than any treasure, a man hath no lesse iniurie offered him when his good name is taken away, than when he is spoiled of his substance. But backbiting and slandering doe then bring forth most pernicious effects, when princes are readie to heare slanderers, of whom they themselues are in the end corrupted. For the enuious and backbiting person doth as a naughty painter did, who hauing ill-fauoredly painted certaine cocks, commanded his boy to driue the naturall cocks farre from his picture: so he laboureth as much as may be to withdraw good men from those whom he would governe. But because he cannot doe it openly, fearing their vertue whom he hateth from his heart, hee will seeme to welcome, to honour, and to admire them, and yet vnder hand, and behind their backs he will cast abroad and sow his slanders. And if so be that his priue and secrets reports, which pricke behinde, doe not presently bring forth the end of his intent, yet he keepeth in memorie that which Medius vttered long since, who was as it were the master and captaine of the whole flocke of flatterers, banded together about Alexander against all the honest men in the court. This fellow taught, that they should not spare to nip boldly, and to bite with store of slanders. For (quoth he) although he that is bitten should be cured of the wound, yet the skar as the least will still remaine. And by such skars of lies and false accusations, or rather to giue them a better name with Plutarke, by such fistuloes and cankers Alexander being gnawen, vniustly put to death Calisthenes, Parmenion and Philotas, giuing himselfe ouer to the will and possession of three or foure flatterers, of whom hee was clothed, decked, set forth and adored as it were a barbarian image. Such is the force and efficacy, of lying ioyned with flatterie, ouer that soule which hath no sound iudgement of reason to discern truth from falshood, or a good nature from a malicious. True it is, that this com-

To hate the wicked is a property of good men.

Enuie compared to forcery.

To Cantharides.

The fire-brands of enuie. Enuie most of all hurtfull to the enuious.

Of backbiting.

What biting of beasts is most dangerous.

When backbiting hurteth most.

A pestilent precept of Medius giuen to backbiters.

fort

The comfort
which cannot be taken away from good men.

Good counsell for princes against flatterers.
We must not lend our eares
to slanderers.

Who delight
most in reading of fables.

A subtil practise of enui-
ous men.

A meane to resist enuy
and hatred.

Equitie and Iustice are the onely bounds
of a good
mans hatred.

What scoffing
is and how it is to be auoi-ded.

fort cannot bee taken away from good men, namely, to bee perswaded that the sleights of backbiters and slanderers are able to preuaile but little against the inuincible tower of sacred vertue, and of an assured hope well grounded, which, whatsoeuer commeth to passe, triumph alwaies, and victoriously hold enuy and backbiting vnder their feete. And although these vices by reason of their force cause them to suffer sometimes, yet patience keepeth them from being overcome, so that they neuer sinke downe vnder aduersities, but even then lay hands vpon the haue of their deliuerance. So that if princes would not fall into those inconueniences, nor be deceiued as this great Macedonian Monarch was, they must, vpon the reports of backbiters, throughly and with reason weigh all things, and not suffer themselves to bee perswaded by slanderers, but discern their words with a sound iudgement. Further let vs note, that they which lend their eares to their lies and detractions, are no lesse to be blamed and reprehended, than the slanderers themselves, because they are both touched with the same imperfection, I meane, of taking delight in the euill report of another. And as the slanderer hurteth by accusing those that are not present, so doth he that suffereth himselfe to bee perswaded before he hath learned the truth of things. Moreouer, they that accustomethem- selves to heare willingly reports and lies, commonly also take more pleasure in reading and learning fables and dreames, faults and vices noted in peoples and nations, than in true narra- tions and goodly sentences made and written with good iudgement and diligent study, or in perusing the honours, heroicall facts, and commendations giuen to vertuous & famous men, which doth touch and grieue them no lesse than it doth the enuious and backbiter: whereas they ought to accept of those things as of spurres to driue them forward vnto ver- tue. Therefore who soeuer considereth well all those pernicious effects that are procured tho- rough backbiting, he shall know that it is a great point of modestie, and most necessary for him that hath profited well in Morall Philosophie, not to suffer any man to be blamed, and euill spoken of in his presence, although hee were his capitall enemy. Wee see also that this craftie and subtil kinde of wickednesse is vsually practised of backbiters and enuious per- sons, when they perceiue that they cannot cause themselves to bee accounted as honest men as they are whom they purpose to slander, then they labour to prooue that these men are not so honest, as some others whom they commend and preferre, seeking by that meanes to co- uer their hatred and ill-will, and to get credit to their slander by that praise, which they giue indirectly to others. They spare not the dead many times, neither is there any let in them why through their enuie they draw them not out of that rest wherein they are, which is dete- stable impietie. Now seeing we know what euill proceedeth from these wilde and naughty plants of enuy, hatred and backbiting, and that naturally, as inheritors of the vice and sinne of our first parents, we carry in our hearts, I know not what enuie, ielousie, and emulation a- gainst some one or other, let vs beware that we nourish not such vicious passions, but weaken their force, and make them altogether vnable to cause vs to depart from dutie: let vs accu- stome our selues not to enuy the prosperitie of our enemies, neither to backbite them in any sort. And if it be possible, let vs not be sparing in giuing vnto them their praise and honour, whensoever they doe any thing that deserueth iustly to bee commended: because that also bringeth greater praise to him that giueth it. For then if it fall out so that he reprocueth some- what in his enemy, his accusation carrieth more credite and force with it, as that which pro- ceedeth not from the hatred of his person, but from a dislike of his doings, thereby declaring that equity and iustice onely are the bounds of his hatred. Besides, we shall reape a greater be- nefite than is hitherto rehearsed. For when wee accustom our selues to praise our enemies for well doing, and are not grieued when any prosperity befalleth them, we shall vtterly driue from vs the vice of enuy, and ielousie ouer the good successe of our friends and acquain- tance, when they attaine to honour. Whereas on the contrary side if we acquaint our selues and take delight in enuying the welfare of our enemies, we shall doe the like many times to our friends: as we see the experience therof in many at this day, who are so touched with this vice, that they reioyce at the euill which happeneth to their well willers, and to such as are the occasion of their good and preferment. But if wee bee desirous to discharge our dutie to- wards our neighbours for whose profite we are borne, let vs seeke to practise that sentence of Cicero, That an honest man and good citizen neuer ought to be moued with hatred or enuie vpon supposed crimes, no not towards his enemy, wishing to die rather then to offend against iustice, which is an utter enemy to that vice. This also will be a good helpe and meane to keepe vs from backbiting, if we eschue all kinde of scoffing, which (as Theophrastus saith) is nothing else but a close and colou- red reproofe of some fault, which by little and little inureth him that mocketh, to backbite another another openly and vntreuly. This great imperfection of gybing is very familiar amongst vs, although it be as vnseemly for an honourable personage as some other more infamous vice. But to the end wee may haue better occasion to keepe vs from it, let vs know that many times a man is more moued with a gybing gird, than with an iniurie: because this latter proceedeth commonly from the vehemencie of sudden choler, euen against his will that vttereth it, but the other is more taken to heart, as that which seemeth to come from a settled will and purpose to offer wrong, and from a voluntarie maliciousnes without any necessitie. If we be disposed to be merrie, as sometimes opportunity, place, and persons inuite vs thereunto, let it be done with a good grace, and without offence to any. Now although enuy and backbiting, by reason of their pernicious effects are so odious to all honorable and vertuous personages, yet no other reuenge is to be sought or desired, than that punishment which followeth and groweth with the vice it selfe, which neuer suffereth him that is touched therewith, to enioy any rest in his soule, as wee haue already learned. Neither is there any great care to be had for the matter, seeing enuious persons and backbiters are no waies able to bite the deserts of good men. But if we would haue their punishment augmented and doubled, there is no better way, than to study so much the more to do well, as we see them labour more earnestly to enuie and to condemne our dealings. For as the Sun being directly ouer the top of any thing whatsoever, if it leaue any shadow at all, yet it is but short and little, because the light therof is disperfed round about the same: so the excellency of vertue, glory & honour, in the end constraineth the venemous tongue to drinke and to swallow downe her owne poison, not daring to bring it againe in sight, whereby enuy and blame are as it were wholly extinguished, and vnable to hurt good men any more. This reason caused Philip king of Macedonia to make this answer to certain, who told him, that the Græcians spake ill of him behind his backe, notwithstanding hee did them much good, and therefore willed him to chastise them: What would they doe then (quoth this noble and gentle Prince) if we should doe them any harime? But they make me become a better man. For I strue daily both by my wordes and deedes to prooue them liars. And another time, as his friendes counselled him to put to death: or to banish a Gentleman of Macedonia, who continued in slandering him, hee would not do either of both, saying: that it was no sufficient cause to condemne him to death: and as for banishing him, he saide: that it was a great deale better if he stirred not out of Macedonia, where all men knew that he lied, than if he went amongst strangers to speake ill of him, who because they knew him not well, might peradventure admit his slander as true. Whereby this vertuous Prince at one time shewed forth the effects of three excellent vertues: first, of Clemency, in that he would not put him to death, of whom he had receiued great iniurie: then of Magnanimittie, in contemning iniurie: and lastly, of wonderfull Prudence, in that he did not banish him. And indeede he was of such a gentle nature, that hee would neuer punish them that gaue him an euill report, but rather tooke away the occasion thereof, as heretofore we haue in part mentioned it. And for a greater testimony of the goodnesse of this Monarch, the answer he made to them that counselled him to destroy the citie of Athens, deserueth well to be heere set downe, I doe all things (quoth he to them) for glorie, how then should I destroy Athens, which by reason of learning, is the Theater of glory? The examples of Demetrius Phalerius, a Prince of immortall renowne, serueth fitly to teach vs what small account we are to make of the dealings of enuious men; so farre ought we to be from caring either for their doings or sayings. When word was brought to this Prince, that the Athenians: moued with enuy against him, had broken downe those three hundred images, which were before erected in their streete of Areopagus to his honour, and thereupon was prouoked by his Councell to be reuenged of them, hee saide: The Athenians way well throw downe my images, but they are not able to abase my vertues, for whose sake my images were heretofore erected for a publike spectacle. And truly those acts of Princes, which, being done in their life time, are worthy of memory, may serue them for an euerlasting monument, and not Images and Tombes made with mens hands, which length of time, besides a thousand other accidents may bring to powder. Neither are they deprived of the same glory that liue vnder the gouernment of great men, when, according to their places and callings, they direct their actions to the benefit and safety of the common wealth. For whensoever enuy laboreth to hurt them with supposed crimes, their innocency (as Horace saith) will be vnto them in place of an inexpugnable tower of brasle: so that being assured of that, they need not stand in any feare of the cruel teeth of slāderers. Therefore Socrates being reprooued by Hermogenes, because he did not once dreame of defending

A scoffe is many times worse ken than any other suspicious speech.

How mirth is comendable.

A notable way how to be reuenged vpon the enuious.

Philip tooke occasion through backbiting to do better.

Athen the Theater of glory.

The best monument for a prince.

Innocency is a tower of brasle against slanderers.

fending himselfe when he was accused, made this answer: I haue dreamed of that all my life time, by strining to liue well. To conclude then our present discourse, let vs learne to vnclouth our hearts of all enuie and hatred, which procure so many turbulent and hurtfull passions in the soule, and ouerthrow all that charity and loue, which we ought to beare towards every one. Let vs feare this sentence pronounced by the holy Spirit. That whosoener hateth his brother is a man slaier. And if wee see that vice and imperfections reigne in our life, let vs hate their euill manners, and loue the welfare of their soules, by endeououring to bring them backe againe into the path way of vertue, vntill we see that all hope of remedy is taken away, by reason of their long settled habite and continuance in vice: for then wee are to shunne altogether the hurtfull conuersation of such forlorne men. Let vs take heede that we please not our selues in detracting and backbiting, or in speaking rashly of any without aduise ment taken, of whom, to whom, and what we speake. Let vs not be giuen to lying, or to harken to slanderers, but following the counsell of the Scripture, let vs lay aside all maliciousnesse, and all guile, and dissimulation, and enuy, and all euill speaking, and as new borne babes desire the milke of vnderstanding, which we may as it were boast that wee haue in the true and right knowledge of iustice, which is to render to God that which is due to him, according to piety, and to our neighbours whatsoever belongeth to them, according to the duty of charity, which is gentle, not easily prouoked to anger, nor enuious, nor reioycing in iniquitie, but alwaies in the truth.

1. Ioh. 3. 15.

1. Pet. 2. 11.

1. Cor. 13. 4.

Of Fortune. Chap. 44.

A M A. IF I bee not deceiued (my companions) we haue hitherto sufficiently discoursed of the foure Morall vertues, beeing riuers that flow from the fountaine of duty and honesty, as also of all the parts that belong vnto them, and of their contrary vices. Therefore from henceforth wee are to make choise of some other matter, and to apply that which we might haue learned in the discourses of our Morall Philosophie, vnto estates, charges, and conditions of life, wherunto euery one of vs may be called during this life: yea, let vs allsaie to giue aduice and counsell to superiours, according to the measure of our iudgement. But because, as I thinke, the entry to so high a matter, requireth some leisure to thinke vpon it, I am of opinion, that we were best to deferre this point vntill the next daies worke: and in the meane time, for the spending of the rest of this afternoone, looke out some matter subiect, apt, and fit to recreate our spirits withall: which, because naturally they delight in variety and diuersitie of things, cannot haue a more conuenient matter, than to make sport with the diuers and sundry effects of Fortune, which according to the saying of the Ancients, is very constant in her inconstancie. Further, let vs consider how we may vse this word of Fortune, which is so common amongst vs, and not abuse it.

Fortune is constant in her inconstancie.

A R A M. To him (saith Cicero) whose helpe, reason, and cogitation dependeth of Fortune, nothing can be so certaine or assured vnto him, that he may perswade himselfe it will abide by him, no not one day. But he is most happie that is of himselfe sufficient in euery respect, and that placeth the hope of all his affaires in himselfe, in regard of men.

A C H I T O B. I am she (saith Vertue, speaking in Mantuan) that surmounteth Fortune, and the scourge that punisheth sinnes. Vice and Vertue (saith Plutarke) haue no masters, to rule ouer them: and they are very blinde, who, calling Fortune blinde, suffer themselves to be guided and led by her. But we must learne of thee (A S E R) what we are to thinke of this counterfeite Goddesse.

Psal. 107. 40.
41.

What Fortune is.
God ordereth
casuall things necessarily.

A S E R. If we are perswaded, that he who is Iustice it selfe, and the essentiall truth, maketh Princes contemptible (as it is said in the Scripture) and causeth them to erre in desert places out of the way, raising vp the poore out of miserie, and making him families like a flocke of sheepe, there is no doubt but that Fortune, being an Epicurian word, rather than an Heathenish, is nothing else but a fained deuce of mans spirit, and an imagination without truth: vpon which (as Plutarke saith) a man cannot settle his iudgement, nor yet comprehend it by the discourse of reason. So that wee must confesse, that all things are guided and governed by the providence of God, who knoweth and ordereth casuall things necessarily. Which albeit we easily confesse with the mouth, as also that prosperity and aduersity depend onely of the will of God, yet wee may daily note in many of vs, effects cleane contrary to the word, in that, when wee deliberate about our affaires, we presently cast our eye vpon humane meanes, to

Humane means are but second causes.

to come to the ende of them, although they are but second causes, casting behinde our backes that helpe, which is from aboue. And when wee want the blessings of God, through his anger and iust indignation, (which wee care not to appeale) and so for the most part stumble vpon the cleane contrary of all our platformes and goodly enterprises; then wee accuse, not our ignorance und ingratitude towards his Maiesty, but the vnfortunat mishap and chance of humane things, which through the common error of men, we attribute to Fortune. Now, knowing that we liue, and mooue, and haue our being in God one-ly, that his mysteries are great and wonderfull, and such, that if we should go about to found the bottome of them, it were all one as if wee sought to pearce the heauens, after the manner of the Giants, set forth vnto vs by the Poets: that our way is not in our power, and that of our selues we cannot direct our steppes: that it is the Lord that offereth a man into his handes, who vvwittingly killeth him with the head of his axe slipt from the helue: that lottes cast at aduenture, fall out according to his iudgement, and that generally all things are done by the ordinance of God: I say, knowing all these things, yet because the order, reason, end, and necessity of those things which are so strange, vncertaine, and mutable in the world, are for the most part hidden in the counsell of God, and cannot bee comprehended by the opinion and reach of man, we may well call them casuall & changing, in respect of our selues. The like we may both conceiue of all future euent, holding them in suspence, because they may fall out either of the one or the other side, (and yet being resolued of this, that nothing shall come to passe which God hath not ordained,) and also note them out by this word Fortune, not attributing thereunto any power ouer their inconstancy and continuall alteration of humane things: especially seeing they are so changeable, that it would bee
a very hard matter speaking after the manner of men) to comprehend them vnder a more proper and fit word. The definition also, which the Auncients gaue of Fortune, is verie agreable to the effect of the thing signified, and of that whereof we haue daily experience:
namely, that there is no other finall end of change, and alteration in man, than that of his being. Plato saith, that Fortune is an accidentall cause, and a consequence in those things which proceed from the counsell of man. Aristotle saith, that Fortune is a casuall & accidentall cause in things, which being purposely done for some certaine end, haue no apparant cause of their falling out otherwise: so that a man may well say, that such a thing came to him by Fortune, which falleth out besides his thought, when he vndertaketh any worke with deliberation.
Epicurus said, that Fortune was such a cause, as agreed neither to persons, times, or manners.
Theophrastus speaking of Fortune, saith that shee looketh not whereat shee shooteth; that oftentimes shee delighteth in taking away that which is gotten with very great paine, but especially in ouerturning those felicities, which, as men thinke, are best staied and assured.
Iuuenal saith, that when it pleaseth her, she maketh a Consul of a Rhetoritian: and likewise cleane contrary, hauing this property in her to reioyce greatly in the variety of chances, and to deride all the deuices of men, oftener lifting vp into the place of soueraigne authority such as are unworthy thereof, than those that deserue the same. Amongst the Ancients, the Romanes honoured Fortune more than all the rest, esteeming of her (saith Pindarus) as of the patron, nurse, and vpholder of the city of Rome. They builded for her many sumptuous Temples, wherein shee was adored vnder sundry names, and honorable titles for a Goddesse of singular power: insomuch that they thought themselves more beholding to her for the greatnes and prosperity of their Empire than to vertue. Sylla hauing attained to the soueraigne authority of a Monarch, and of Dictator, yeelded himselfe and all his actions to the fauor of Fortune, saying, that he reputed himselfe to be Fortunes child, and there-vpon tooke vnto him the surname of Happy. Which opinion seemeth to haue preuailed greatly with him, in causing him, after he had committed infinite proscriptions, murders, and cruelties, voluntarily and without feare to giue ouer the Dictatorship, to leade the rest of his yeeres in all assurance and quietnes, and as a priuate man to passe and repasse through all Italy without any gard, even in the midst of them whom he had so much offended. We read also, that when Mithridates king of Pontus wrot vnto him concerning the war which he had vndertaken against him, saying, that he marvelled how Sylla durst buckle with his great fortun, especially knowing that she had not deceiued him at any time, wheras she neuer knew Sylla Consul, he returned this answer: For this selfe same reason thou shalt now see, how Fortune doing her duty, will take her leaue of thee to come to mee. Iulius Caesar gaue a certaine argument of the assurance he had in Fortune, when, entring vpon the sea in a little Fregate in a very tempestuous weather, and the Pilot making some doubt of waighing vp the Anchor,

Act. 17. 28.
Rom. 11. 33.

Ier. 10. 13.
Exod. 21. 13.
Deut. 19. 4. 5.
Prou. 16. 33.

How we may vse these words of Fortune & chace

The opinion
of ancient Philosophers
touching Fortune.

The Romanes
gaue great honor to Fortune.

Sylla surna-
med him-
selfe happy.

I. Caesar.

*Augustus.*A true foresight of a soothsayer.*P. A. Emilius.*The description of Fortune.What is meant by Fortunes wheele.Examples of the contrary
effects of Fortune.
*Hannibal.Flaminius oration against Hannibal.*What speech Hannibal vled
before he poisoned
himselfe.Eumenes.

Anchor, hee said thus vnto him: Bee not afraide my friend, for thou carriest Cesar and his Fortune. Augustus his successor sending his nephew to the warre, wished that he might bee as valiant as Scipio, as well beloued as Pompey, and as fortunate as himselfe: attributing to Fortune, as a principall worke, the honour of making him so great as hee was. To this purpose also it is reported, that great acquaintance and familiarity growing betweene Augustus and Antonius his Companion in the Empire, they often passed away the time together with sundry sorts of plaies and pastimes, wherein Antonius alwaies went away vanquished. Whereupon one of his familiar friends well seene in the art of Diuination, tooke occasion many times to vtter his minde vnto him in these or the like speeches: Sir, what doe you so neare this young man? Separate your selfe farre from him. Your fame is greater than his, you are elder than hee, you command more men than hee, you are better exercised in feates of Armes, you haue greater experience: but your familiar spirit faileth his, and your Fortune, which of it selfe is great, flattereth his, and if you sequester not your selfe farre from him, shee will forsake you and goe to him. Thus we see what great estimation the Romans had of Fortune, yea they stood in so great awe of her power, that Paulus Aemilius that great Captaine said, that amongst humane things, hee neuer feared any one of them, but amongst diuine things hee alwaies stood in great feare of Fortune, as of her in whom there was small trust to bee placed, because of her inconstancie and mutable variety, whereby shee neuer vseth to gratifie men so liberally, or to bestow such absolute prosperitie vpon them, but that some enuie is mingled withall. O deceitfull Fortune (said Demetrius) thou art easily found, but hardly auoided. They that haue laboured most in painting out this fained Goddesse, say, that shee hath a swift pace, a loftie minde, and a hawtie hope. They giue her light wings, a globe vnder her feete, and in her hand a horne of abundance, full of all such heavenly and earthly things as are exquisite and pretious, which shee powreth forth liberally, when and where shee pleaseth. Some put a wheele into her hands, which shee turneth about continually, whereby that part which is aboue is presently turned downward: thereby giuing vs to vnderstand, that from the highest preferment shee throweth downe in one instant such as are most happie, into the gulfie of misery. In a word, wee may well compare her to glasse, which, the brighter it is, the sooner it is broken and dasht in peeces. Histories the treasure of antiquitie, set before our eyes innumerable examples of common and contrary effects, which are wrought by this vnconstant Fortune, and those oftentimes practised vpon the same persons, whom of small shee hath made very great, and after taken them downe lower, yea made them more miserable (if I may so speake) than they were at the beginning. Hannibal, that renowned Capraine of the Carthaginians, that redoubted enemy of the Romans, after notable victories obtained sundry times against them, was in the ende vtterly ouerthrowne and compelled to flie hither and thither, and to haue recourse to forraigne princes, into whose armes hee cast himselfe for the safety of his person: and after long wandring, beeing olde and spent, hee settled himselfe with the king of Bythinia. But Titus Flaminius whom the Romans had sent Embassadour to that king, required to haue him, that he might put him to death. For (quoth hee) as long as hee liueth hee will bee a fire for the Roman Empire, which wanteth but some one or other to kindle it. When hee was in the vigour and strength of his age, neither his hand nor his body had procured so great dammage to the Romans, as his good vnderstanding and sufficiencie in the art of warre had done, being ioyned with the hatred hee bare them. Which is nothing diminished through olde age, neither yet through the alteration of his estate and fortune: because the nature and quality of manners continueth alwaies. Hannibal being aduertised of this request of Titus, stieped poison in a cup of drinke which he had kept a long time against an extremity. But before he dranke therof, he vttered these words. Go to, let vs deliuer the people of Rome from this great care, seeing it lieth so heavy vpon them, and the time seemeth vnto them ouerlong to stay for the naturall death of this poore old man, whom they hate so extremely. And yet Titus shall not obtaine a victory greatly honourable, or worthy the praise of the auncient Romans, who, euen then when Pyrrhus their enemy warred against them, and had won battels of them, sent him word to beware of poison that was prepared for him. Thus did this great and vertuous captaine finish his daies, being vtterly ouerthrowne, and trode vnder foote by Fortune, which for a time had placed him in the highest degree of honour that could bee. Eumenes a Thracian, one of Alexanders lieutenants, and one that after Alexanders death had great warres, and made his partie good against Antigonus king of Macedonia, came to that greatnesse and authority from a poore Potters sonne: and afterwards being overcome and taken prisoner, he died of hunger. But such preferments of Fortune will not seeme very strange vnto vs if wee consider how Pertinax came to the Empire, ascending from a simple souldier to the degree of a Captaine, and afterward of Gouvernour of Rome, being borne of a poore countrey woman. And hauing reigned onely two moneths, he was slaine by the souldiers of his guard; Aurelianus from the same place obtained the selfe same dignitie. Probus was the sonne of a Gardiner, and Maximianus of a backsmith. Iustinus, for his vertue surnamed the Great, from a hogheard in Thracia, attained to the Empire. Will you haue a worthy example agreeable to that saying of Iuvenall which welledged euen now? Gregory the 7. from a poore monke was lift vp to the dignity of chiefe bishop of Rome: and Henry the 4. Emperor, was brought to that extreame miserie by war, that he asked the said Gregory forgiuenes, and cast himselfe downe at his feete. And yet before this miserable Monarch could speake with him, he stode three daies fasting and barefoot at the Popes palace gate; as a poore suppliant waiting when he might haue entrance and access to his Holines. Lewes the mecke Emperour, and king of France, was constrained to giue ouer his estate, and to shut himselfe vp in a monasterie, through the conspiracie of his owne children. Valerianus had a harder change of his estate, ending his daies whilest he was prisoner in the hands of Sapor king of the Parthians, who vsed the throat of this miserable Emperour whensoever he mounted vpon his horse. But was not that a wonderfull effect of Fortune, which happened not long since in Munster, principall towne in the countrey of Westphalia, wherein a silly botcher of Holland, beeing retired as a poore banished man from his countrey, called John of Leiden, was proclaimed king, was serued and obeyed of all the people a long time, euen vntill the taking and subuersion of the said towne after he had borne out the siege for the space of three yeares. Mahomet the first of that name, of a very small and abiect place, being enriched by marrying his mistres, and seruing his owne turne very fitly with a mutiny raised by the Saracins against Heracless the Emperour, made himselfe their captaine, tooke Damascus, spoiled Egypt, and finally subdued Arabia, discomfited the Persians, and became both a Monarch and a Prophet. Will you see a most wonderfull effect of Fortune? Looke vpon the proceedings of that great Tamburlane, who being a peasants son and keeping cattell, corrupted 500. hundred shepherds his companions. These men selling their cattell, betooke them to armes, robbed the merchants of that countrey, and watched the high waies. Which when the king of Persia vnderstood of, hee sent a captaine with a 1000. horse to discomfit them. But Tamburlane delt so with them, that ioyning both together they wrought many incredible feates of armes. And when ciuill war grew betwixt the king and his brother, Tamburlane entred into the brothers pay, who obtained the victory by his meanes, and thereupon made him his lieutenant generall. But he not long after spoiled the new king, weakened and subdued the whole kingdome of Persia. And when he saw himselfe captaine of an army of 400000. horsemen, and 600000. footemen, he made warre with Baiazet Emperour of the Turkes, overcame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. He obtained also a great victory against the Souldan of Egypt, and the king of Arabia. This good successe (which is most to be maruelled at and very rare) accompanied him alwaies vntill his death, in so much that he ended his daies amongst his children, as a peaceable gouernor of innumerable countries. From him descended the great Sophy who reigneth at this day, and is greatly feared and redoubted of the Turke. But that miserable Baiazet who had conquered before so many peoples, and subdued innumerable cities, ended his daies in an iron cage, wherein being prisoner, and overcome with griefe to see his wife shamefully handled, in waiting at Tamburlanes table with her gowne cut downe to her Nauell, so that her secret parts were seene, this vnforgotten Turke beate his head so often against the Cage, that he ended his life. But what need we draw out this discourse further to shew the strange dealings, and marvellous changes of Fortune in the particular estates and conditions of men, which are to be seene daily amongst vs, seeing the soueraigne Empire of Babylon, of Persia, of Græcia, and of Rome, which in mans iudgement seemed immutable and inexpugnable, are fallen from all their glittering shew and greatnes, into vtter ruine and subuersion, so that of the last of them, which surpassed the rest in power, there remaineth onely a commandement limited and restrained within the confines of Almaigne, which then was not the tenth part of the rich provinces subiect to this Empire? Is there any cause then why we should be astonished, if little kingdomes, common-wealths, and other ciuill governments end, when they are come to the vtmost, and full point of their greatnes? And much lesse if it fall out so with men, who by nature are subiect to change, and of themselues desire and seeke for nothing else but alteration. Being assured therefore, that there is such vncertainty in all humane things, let vs wisely prepare our selues, and apply our Pertinax.

Aurelianus.

Probus.

Maximianus.

Iustinus.

Gregory 7.

Henry 4.

Lewes the

mecke.

Valerianus.

John of Lei-

den.

Mahomet.

Tamburlane.

Baiazet.

Of the foure

soueraigne

Empires.

Wee must prepare our

selues for all

euents.

Who taketh greatest ioy
in outward
goods.

Of the power of Fortune.

Whither we must looke
in the change
and successe
of things.

The proper
end of all things.

will to all euents, whose causes are altogether incomprehensible in respect of our vnderstandings, and quite out of our power. For he that is able to say, I haue preuented thee O Fortune, I haue stopped all thy passages, and closed vp all thy waies of entrance, that man putteth not all his assurance in barres or locked gates, nor yet in high walles, but staieth himselfe vpon Philosophicall sentences and discourses of reason, whereof all they are capable that imploye their wils, travell and studie thereupon. Neither may we doubt of them or distrust our selues, but rather admire and greatly esteeme of them, being rauished with an affectionate spirit. He that taketh least care for to morrow (saith Epicurus) commeth thereunto with greatest ioy. And (as Plutarke saith) riches, glory, authority and credit, repyce them most, that stand least in feare of their contraries. For when a man seeketh after any of them with an ouerburning desire, whereby also too great a feare of loosing them is imprinted in him, the pleasure which he hath by enioying the same, is very weake and vnstable, much like to a flame blowne vp and downe with the winde. But as for the power of Fortune (saith the same Philosopher) it bringeth downe those men that of their owne nature are cowards, fearefull and of small courage. Neither must we attribute cowardlinesse to misfortune, nor valure and prudence to Fortune, who is not able to make a man great without vertue. For what good will weapons doe a man without experience, riches without liberalitie, victory without bounty and clemency, fighting without valure and boldnesse; briefly, all fortunes goods without knowledge how to vse them well? Let vs learne also that it is too great blockishnesse to attribute the cause of the change of Monarchies, common wealths, estates, of battels lost, and generally of all casuall mishaps, both generall and particular, to certaine second cause: one while accusing the ambition of some, the ignorance or negligence of others, the small courage, want of money, of men, or of munitions. But we must looke higher, and turne towards him who vseth such meanes in the execution of his wonderfull counsell, when he mindeth to chastise and punish men for their offences. Examples hereof we haue in those great monarchies of Babylon, of Persia, and of Græcia, whose markes are no more to be seene, than the path of a ship in the water, or way of a bird flying in the aire. And yet they were ouerthrowne and vanquished by such as had a thousand times lesse humane force and chiefe sinewes of warre, as treasure, men, munition and other furniture, than their monarches and Emperours had, who abounded euery way. But God purposed to punish their pride and iniquity. Let vs therefore stand in awe, not of the goddesse Fortune, which is but the dreame of man, and cannot (as Cicero saith) greatly hurt him, that iudgeth hope grounded vpon vertue more firme, than that which is built vpon her forces; but let vs feare him who directeth and disposeth in wisdom all things created to their proper end, which is the glory of his name, and saluation of his elect: albeit the order which he obserueth, the cause, reason, and necessitie of them, are for the most part hid in his secret counsell, and cannot be comprehended by the sense of man. And yet not so hid, but that we ought prudently to consider of these meanes which he offereth vnto vs for our vse, after we haue endeououred to mitigate and to appease his wrath and anger through the amendment of our life, and haue called for aide and helpe of him in all our enterprises grounded by reason vpon duty.

The end of the eleuenth daies worke.

The twelfth daies worke.

of Mariage. Chap. 45.

A wife man is not desirous of many things.

A SER.

It is great perfection (as Seneca writeth) for a man to take in hand and desire to obtaine but one only thing. But no man is one and the same, except a wise man: all other men are of diuers formes. Who knoweth not with how great disquietnes the minde of man is set on fire, with what lightnesse it is carried hither and thither, and with what ambition and desire it is stirred vp to take hold of many sundry things at once? Notwithstanding we must diligently marke, how the heavenly Wisedome hath made a distinction of estates and kindes of life amongst men from the beginning of estates and kinds of life among men from the beginning, appointing that of Adam's two first children, the one should be a husbandman, the other a shepherd. Since that the selfe same providence hath alwaies commanded, that every one of vs should looke vnto his calling in all the actions of his life, accounting thereof as of a station assigned vnto vs by his Maiestie, and as of a perpetuall rre whereby wee must direct the ende of our intents, and following the will of God, strue to continue such men to the end of our daies, as wee once purposed with our selues to be. For we may assure our selues, that there is no worke so small and contemptible, which doth not shine and appeare precious before the heavenly throne, if wee doe it in faith according to our calling, and give glory to the Eternall for our whole condition and state of life. Now we know that after God had created man by his almighty power and vspeakable goodnes to make him partaker of his glory, and to rule over the earth, the sea, and all things contained in them, hee gaue him presently the woman for a faithfull companion, and sweete solace to his life, and for the preservation of his kinde, instituting and sanctifying marriage from that time forward. Therefore I thinke my companions, that wee ought to handle this first, because it is the first calling of man, most common, and most honorable: to the end that we may, as we said yesterday, begin to apply the actions and practise of the vertues, of which wee haue hitherto intreated, to estates and conditions of life, whereunto each of vs may be call'd.

A M A N A. If we could (saith Plato) behold with bodily eies the beauty that honestly hath in her, we would be far in love with her: but she is to be seene onely with the eies of the mind. And truly with the same eies wee may behold it in marriage, if wee consider narrowly the honesty of the coupled lie, when it is in every respect absolute, than the holy bond whereof, the earth hath nothing more beautifull or honest.

A R A M. Marriage (as the Scripture saith) is honourable among all, and the bed undefiled. He that findeth a wife, findeth a good thing, and receiues fauour of the Lord. Therefore of thee (*ACHITO*B) we desire to vnderstand more at large what thou hast learned concerning this matter discus'd with so many contrary opinions both old and new.

ACHITOB. Nature having brought vs forth to live in societie, and not alone, like to brute beasts, it must needs be (saith Aristotle) that hee which liueth solitarily is either a very beast, or more than a man. Now a societie is an assemblie and agreement of many in one, seeking after some good thing that is profitable, pleasant and honest, at least that seemeth to be so: or else labouring to shie from and to eschue some euill. Every societie respecteth the maintenance and preservation of Monarchies, kingdomes, and common wealth. But because no one whole and generall thing can be knowne (as the Philosophers say) except the parts thereof be first knowne, it agreeth very fitly with the cause of our meeting together, and is also very necessary for vs, to learne what the societie of wedlocke is, which beeing the seminary and preservation of all societies, is nothing else but a communion between the husband and the wife, extending it selfe to all the parts that belong to their house, of which we are to consider hereafter. The originall and antiquity of this societie, called Marriage, is especially worthy of memory, because God himselfe was the author thereof. For hee had no sooner created the first man, but hee purposed to give him a wife, for a faithfull companion, a comfortresse of his life, and a helpe like vnto himselfe. Which hee performed, alsoone as hee thought vpon it: forasmuch as with him to will is to be able, and to doe: as likewise to be able and to doe, is to will. Furthermore, hee instituted this diuine misterie for the generall increase of mankind, and lawfull propagation of nature, even in the time of innocencie before man had sinned, sanctifying it at the same time, with his blessing. Vnto which necessity of Marriage, man had made himselfe a great deale more subiect through the curse of sinne, which hath giuen place in his soule to the concupiscences of the flesh. Whereby it appeareth that we haue need of this remedy in two respects, namely: in regard of the end and condition of our first nature, as also by reason of sinne, which came in afterward, except in those to whom God hath granted the speciall grace and gift of continencie, which is as rare a thing as any other whatsoever. Notwithstanding there hath alwaies beene a thousand contrary opinions as touching this matter, namely: whether marriage is to be desired and sought after, or rather to be hated and eschued, neither part wanting reasons, oftentimes more glorious in shew than forceable to conclude for the defence of their saying. Among the Philosophers, Pythagoras the first of them, was one of the greatest enemies of marriage, as may be prooued by that which is written of him. For beeing requested to be at the marriage of a friend of his, he excused himselfe, saying: That he was neuer desirous to goe to such a feast, or to be Distinctions of callings appointed from the beginning.

Gen. 4. 2.
Every one must abide in his calling.
1. Cor. 7. 20.
All things done in faith are precious in Gods sight
Gen. 2. 24.

Honesty is alwaies beautifull.

Marriage is honourable among all.
Heb. 13. 4.
Prou. 18. 22.
Man borne to live in societie
The definition of societie.
The end of societie.

The definition of wedlocke.

The author & antiquitie of marriage.
The end thereof.
Another end

The necessity and third end of marriage.

Continency a rare gift.

The varietie of opinions touching marriage.

Pythagoras
opinion of marriage.

Secundus opinion of a wife.

Thales iudge-
ment of ma-riage.

Metellus
would not give away
himself to a wife.

Reasons against mariage.

Women compared to ships.

How hard
a matter it is to marrie
well.

An unruly woman is full of all euill.

Examples of miserable euents procured by women.
Two good
dayes in ma-
riage.

at such a fauerall: iudging that it was all on for a man to mary a wife, and to wed a coffin, and to put himselfe into a tombe, or to take a sheete for the beginning of his buriall. Many other Philosophers were of his opinion, yea they said, that natur appointing a contrary to every living creature, hath also giuen to man (to whom all other things are subiect) the woman for his contrary, whose malice is a sworne enemy to the reyn of man. Secundus was of this sect, who being demanded what a wife was, The contrary (quoth he) of a husband. Moreouer they said, that a womans nature was such, that although she had continued 30. yeares with her husband, yet he should daily finde in her new fancies, and surlly sorts of behaviour: so that nature seemed a stepmother to men rather than to beasts, because these know and shun their contraries, but man is naturally led to loue and to seeke after his enemy. His misery therefore is very great, in that so weak flesh is able to force a heart that is liberty, causing a man oftentimes to procure to himselfe that which doth him hurt, and to make great account of that which he contemneth, as experience sheweth the same in regard of women. Thales one of the Sages of Grecia, minding to shew that it was not good for a man to marry, when one asked him why he married not, being in the flower of his age, said, that it was not yet time. Afterward, being growne to further age, and demanded the same question, he answered, that the time was past. Marius the Romane asked Metellus, being a man also of great credite, why hee would not take his daughter to wife, seeing she was beautifull in bdy staid in countenance, eloquent in speech, noble by race, rich in dowry, happy in good name, & adorned with vertues? To whom he replied, That he knew all this to be true, yet (quoth he) I had rather be mine owne than hers. They that follow this opinion now touched, and abhorre marriage, alledge commonly these or the like reasons: that although the name of husband be swete and honourable, yet whosoever will well consider of it, shall find it full of great and intolerable burthens: and that the time is yet to come, wherein many thornes are not found amidst the roses of marriage, and wherein great store of haile falleth not together with that sweet raine. Who is able (say they) patiently to abide the charges of marriage, the care of children, the want which is sometimes in the house, the imperfections of seruants, but especially the insolencie and arrogancie of Wiues, and the yoke of so vnperfect a sexe? Who is able fully to satisfie, either their fleshly lust, or their insatiable pompe? Doth not the old prouerbe say, that women and shippes are neuer so well rigged, but that still there remaineth something to bee amended? Whereupon I would conclude willingly, that if a married man neuer loathe his estate, yet hee tireth himselfe at the least. Riches breed care, pouertie grieue, sailing terrifieth, eating hindereth, walking wearieth. All these troubles are (we see) dispersed or diuided amongst many, but married men haue them altogether. For if we marke a married man, wee shall seldome see him, but either pensieue or sad, or wearie or hindered, or sometime amazed or afraide of that which may befall him, or may peraduenture be committed by his wife. Concerning good aduice, and choice for the obtaining of a good marriage: If thou takest a poore wife, shee will bee contemned and thy selfe lesse esteemed: if thou takest her rich, shee will looke to command thee, and of a free man to make thee a slave. So that when thou thinkest to take an equall companion to wife, thou shalt wed an intollerable mistresse, I know not whether I should say a he diuell: If thou marriest a faire woman, thou puttest thy selfe in great danger, least thy round head become forked, which would bee a fearefull metamorphosis and alteration, if it were visible and apparant. Euery castle is hard to keepe, how well foecer it be watched, when it is assaulted by many: and his victorie is in a desperate case, who being alone, is compelled to fight against many. What shall I say more? Wealth maketh a woman proude, beautie suspected, and hardnesse of fauor loathsome. Is there any thing (as Plutarke saith) more light than the tongue of an vnbrideled woman? more nipping than her iniuries? more rash than her boldnesse? more execrable than her naughtie disposition? more dangerous than her furie? These euill speakers of women further enrich their saying with a thousand histories and examples, as tellimonies of the infinite miseries and inconueniences which haue beene procured by them. For they alledge the deceiuing of the first man by his wife, whereupon sinned and death, and through them all miseries entred into the world. Sampson betrayed by Dalila, Salomon became brutish through his concubines, Achab rooted out through Iesabel, Marcus Antonius slue himselfe for the loue of Cleopatra, the destruction of Troy because of Helena, the Pandora of Hesiodus, the pitifull death of Hercules by Deianira, and many other miserable euents procured chiefly by women, and plentifully declared in histories. Neither doe they forget the saying of Hippocratus, That of one marriage, onely two good daies are to bee hoped for, namely, the marriage day, and the day of the wifes death. They say that the wedding day (according to Alexanderides speech) is the beginning of many euills, that in no estate Fortune sheweth her selfe more inconstant, and lesse faithfull in performing her promise than in marriage, as Polyhistor saith: because there is not one to be found, wherein there is not some decoite, or some occasion of complaint giuen to the man, They say as Philemon said: That a wife is necessary and perpetuall euill to her husband: that (as Diphilus said) nothing is harder found in all the world then a good wife. Whereunto that olde proverbe agreeth, that a good wife, a good mule, and a good goate, are three naughty beafts. The answer alwaies made by a noble Romane, Three euill beafts. is not forgotten of these seuerer Censurers of women, to whom when some of his acquaint- taince and friends said, that he had great cause to hold himselfe happy and contented, because he had a wife that was faire, rich, and come of noble parentage, hee shewed them his foote, saying: My friends, you see that my shoe is very new, faire and well made, but none of you can tell whereabout it pincheth me. Likewise the saying of Alphonfus king of Arragon is alledged by them that blame marriage, namely, that if a man would see a perfect and well agreeing marriage, the husband must bee deafe, and the wife blind, that hee may not heare his wines brawling, nor shee see her husbands fautes. He that trusteth to a woman (said Hesiodus) is as safe as he that hangeth by the leaues of a tree in the end of Autumne when the leaues begin to fall. I remember yet three things which I haue heard vttered in contempt of mariage: the saying of a merry conceited mā, the deed of another, & the answer of a good fellow that was in talk of a certain mariage. They haue reason (quoth the first) who say, that whē a yong man is to be married, he must be arrested. For truly I thinke we should flie vp to heauen, if this arrest kept vs not backe. The second hearing this preached, that whosoever will be saued, must beare his crosse, ran to his wife and laid her vpon his necke. Thirdly, when one said to a good fellow that hee should tary vntill his son were wise before he married him: Be not deceiued my friend (quoth hee to him) for if he once grow to be wise he will neuer marrie. These & such like reasons are commonly alledged by them that mislike mariage. But now marke what we say to the contrary. First we haue to consider the beginning and antiquitie of mariage, the place where it was instituted, & who was the author therof, & that in the time of innocency, of which things we haue already spoken. Moreouer we must remember, that the heauenly word honored with his presēce, & set forth a wedding feast with a miracle, euen with the first which he wrought in this world. Can any thing then be found more holy, than that which the holy of holies. the Father & creator of all things hath established, honored & consecrated with his presēce? But what greater equity can we vse than to leaue to our successors that which we hold of our predecessors? By wedlocke copulation we came into the world, and by the same wee must leaue others behinde vs, to continue that propagation which hath endured from our ancestors vnto vs. Can there be any greater want of consideration than to seeke to flie from that as prophane, which God hath taken for holy? as euill, which he hath reputed good? as detestable, which hee esteemeth holy? Is there any greater inhumanity, than to reiect the fountaine of humanity? Is there any greater ingratitude than to deny to those that are to come, that which wee holde of them that are past? When God created woman, not of the slime of the earth, as he did man, but of his bone, did he not shew thereby that he would haue nothing faster cleauing, neerer ioyning, or surer glued to him than his wife, especially when hee added these words, That it was not good for man to bee alone? as though hee had saide, that his life would be miserable, irkefome & vnpleasant, if he had not giuen him a wife for a faithful companion. How dare we say, that we know better what is meete for vs than hee that made vs, and knew all our life before we came out of the bowels of our mother? then he that honored the bond of matrimony so far as to say, that a man shall leave his father and mother, & cleaue to his wife? Is there any thing more holy than that honor which we owe to them that haue begotten vs? & yet the fidelity of wedlocke is preferred before fatherly and motherly honor, that it should be kept & preferred euen to the last gaspe of life. Further wee see how the Spirit of God speaking by his Prophet honoreth mariage so far, as to vse it for a similitude and representation of that holy & sacred vnity, which he hath with his Church. What could any man say more to extoll the dignity thereof? That which God hath begun, onely death endeth: what God hath conioined, death onely separateth: what God hath made sure, man cannot shake of: what he hath established, man cannot abolish. Oh what and how great is the dignity, preheminance, and prerogative of mariage? Again, do we not see how it hath bin continued throughout all ages past vntill this present, receiued and approved of all nations, both Hebrews, Greeks, Latins, and Barbarians, so that there is no nation vnder the cope of heauen, how barbarous soeuer it be, and far frō civility, which sheweth not great ioy

Three euill beafts.

Alphonfus opinion of a perfect marriage.

Three merry conceits.

Notable reasons in the defence of marriage.

Christ honored wedding with his presence & with a miracle.

Wherefore the woman was created of the rib of man.

Gen. 2. 18.

The great preheminance of marriage.

Psalm 45.

Marriage euer used & receiued of all nations.

The Romans
had laws in fa-
uor of marriage

Augustus his care to re-presse the vn-cleannes of his subiects.

Why the dowries of womē
haue alwaies
had great pri-
ledges.

The priuiledges of them
that had children.

A comparisō
betwē a good gardiner
& a citizen.

The happines
pleasure and contentation
in marriage.

The nececoniunction
of married couples.

Marriage increaseth
friends and kinsfolks.

and delight at wedding feasts? Besides, who shall defend commonwealths without armour and weapons, and who shall weare armour if men be wanting? If that be not supplied by generation which through death necessarily endeth, how can the linage & race of mankind endure? The lawes of the Romans (who were the pattern of vertue to all nations) with rigor punished such as would not marry, forbidding them all publike dignities, and depriving the of those which they had obtained. And to invite them the rather to marry, they appointed priuiledges for them that had children, so that he was most benefited and preferred to publike honours that had most children. When Augustus Caesar was Censor, inquiry was made by his authoritie of a Romane knight that had broken the law and would not marry, whereupon he should haue bene punished, but that hee prooued that he had bene father of three children. The same Augustus being come to the Empire, and desirous to correct the detestable vncleannes of his subiects, and to compell them to contract matrimony, leuied an impost by way of a fine, vpon their legacies and windfalls comming by the death of others that did not marry after 25. yeares of age, or that had no children. Whereby he greatly chastised whordoms, adulteries and sodomitry: and furnished Rome with good citzens which then was greatly destitute of them by reason of ciuill wars. What is the cause (saith Vlpianus the Lawyer) that womens dowries had such great priuiledges? It was for no other reason, than because of the profit that commeth to all common wealths by mariages. He that had three children amongst the Romans could not be cōpelled to cary a message, or publik embassage: he that had five was exempted from personall charge: & he that had thirteen from al charge. And in our time in the common wealth of Florence (as Raphael Volateranus rehearseth in his philology Euery citizen that is a father of five children either males or females, is exempted, freed, & discharged of all publike tax, loane, or subsidy. If nothing be more blessed, nor happines more to be desired than immortality, line all propogation maketh vs immortal through the continuing of kind. Wherevpon we may inferre by way of conclusion, that no greater happines can come to a man and wife in this world than to leaue issue as a testimony to posterity, that oncethey were in the world, and haue left behind them a token of their life. It was enacted by Lycurgus lawes, that no citizen preferring the estate of continency before that of marriage, should bee at publike plaies: which at that time was a note of great ignominy. We account not him a good gardiner that painfully dresseth those fruite full trees which he hath in his garden or orchard, if he haue no care to plant and graft new thereby to substitute others in their place, which by succession of time waxe old and dy. And how shall we take him for a good citizen, and such a one as zealously seeketh the good of the common wealth, that contenteth himselfe with those citizens that are alieue, and neglecteth the ingenerating of new in good and lawfull matrimony, whereby to supply the want of such as daily decay? Further, if I should goe about to rehearse here the happines, pleasure and contentation which man and wife living holily together, and according to the duty of their vocation, do mutually receiue one of another, who doubteth that a whole day would not suffice me? What greater solace in the whole world can be found than for a man to liue with her vnto whom he is coupled, not by good wil only, but also by a mutuall communication of bodies? If we take great delight to confer with our friends and familiar acquaintaunce about our secret affaires, shal we not receiue greater ioy without comparison to disclose our thoughts to her vnto whom we speake as safely as to our selues, who is also partaker as well of our aduersity as prosperity, & accounteth our weale or woe to bee her own? We are ioyned to our friends by good wil & liking only, but to our wife we are conioined and linked by soveraign charity, by bodily commixtion, by sacred confederacy, & by an inseparable fellowship & society in all weathers. If the mā abound in temporal goods, the wife will keepe them faithfully for him, and increase them by her industry & labor. If he be poore & persecuted by Fortune, she will comfort him. If through feare, sicknes, or any other mishap he be constrained to shut vp himself in his house his wife will take away that irksomnes from him, which otherwise would seaze vpon him being solitary. If he go abroad, he is glad that he hath left that party in his house which he most trusteth. In youth shee is a sweet and amiable companion, and in old age a very conuenient comforter and solace. Moreover, by marriage a man increaseth his friends, allies, kinsfolks, and neighbours. which is a very great benefite and inuincible strength. Brethren and sisters, nephewes and nieces are doubled. Peace is many times procured betweene monarches and princes by mariages, and infinite quarrels and dissensions appeased. But what vnspokeable pleasure doth the very father take to see his lively picture ingrauen in the face of his children, and that so neere the quicke, as neither Lyssippus, Mentor, Bolycretus, Phidias, Praxiteles, Zeuxis, Appelles, nor Parrhasius had euer the skill to graue or paint so well? Againe, what ioy receiueth he by hoping, that when his children children shal waxe great, they wil be the staffe of his age, the stay of his weakenes, the pillar of his house, and that ouerliuing him according to the course of nature, they shall close vp his eies, and cause such funerals and ceremonies to be done for him, as are requisite in that case? For the conclusion therefore of this present matter we say, that no man can iustly blame marriage, vnto which all laws both diuine & humane exhort vs, nature prouokes vs, honestly draweth vs, infinite commodities inuite vs, all nations shew vs the way thither, & lastly necessity of continuing our kinde constraineth vs. And briefly to answer the grounds alledged to the contrary, they may be ouerthrowne by one onely distinction, which is; that most of them that dispraised marriage were heathens, and blinded in their vaine wisdom, or to speake better, in their folly, wanting then that knowledge of the truth, which God of his grace hath since revealed vnto vs. And no manuell if they erred in dispraising marriage, seeing they could neuer attaine to the knowledge of the true and soueraigne good of man, as we haue handled already. But yet it can neuer be found that Socrates, Plato, and such as were most excellent among the Philosophers, blamed it, but rather honored and commended it, the most of them also being married, as namely, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, Plutarke, & others. As for their strongest reason that mislike marriage, namely, the deceiuing of men by women the fault ought to be imputed rather to the men, than to the women, because men according to the perfection of their sexe, ought to be wiser than women, who are by nature more changeable by will, and more fraile in counsell, although all are not so. So that if there bee any imperfection, it ought not to be objected to them, by way of reproch, but rather to nature than to them. And they that vpbraide them therewith, shew that they wander out of the path of reason, are destitute of all good sense, and are vnworthy that women should haue conceived them, brought them into the world, giuen them suck and nourished them.

Motives to marriage.

The best Philosophers praised and vsed marriage.

Of a House and Familie, and of the kinds of Marriage: of certaine ancient customes obserued in Marriage. Chap. 46.

ACHITOB. IN the beginning of my present speech of mariage, I noted this, that the communion of the husband and wife extendeth it selfe vnto all the parts that depēd of their house. Therefore I suppose (my Companions) that for the sequēle and vnderstanding of this matter which we haue propounded to our selues to intreat of, I mean Oeconomy or gouernment of a familie, we must seeke after a more ample and large declaration of a house, which consisteth not in many stones, and long peeces of timber ioyned together with great cunning, but in stones that haue life, and are partakers of reason, tending to the benefit and profit of the house, as to their end. Also if you thinke it good, & our houre giue vs leisure, we may enter into the consideration of the sundry sorts of marriages, and of certaine ancient customes obserued therein, which I touched not in my discourse, because I would not be ouer long.

A house consisteth in liuing stones.

ARAM. First, it is necessary (saith Aristotle) to ioine those together, which cannot be the one without the other, as the male and female for generation. Next, he that is able to execute the commandments of his master by the strength of his body, is a subiect and slaue by nature. And of these two assemblies a house or familie is first instituted.

What assemblies are most necessary for the institution of a familie.

A MANA. A familie or house is an assembly framed by nature, to communicate daily together: and they are called of the Grecians οικογενεια, such as liue of the same prouision, συνοικιστοι, such as vse the same chimney. But we shall vnderstand of thee ARAM the whole discourse of that which is here propounded vnto vs,

The definition of a house.

ARAM. When I consider of the excellency & greatnes of Plato his skil, who was grealy admired of the Grecians, as he that for vertue & honesty of life, for eloquence of speech, and perswasion by true & learned Philosophy, went far beyond all other Philosophers, I cannot sufficiently wonder, how, amidst so many good laws & profitable statutes for a cōmonwealth which we haue receiued frō him, he imagined to establish therein the communie of goods, wiues, & children, amongst his Citizens, not suffering them to haue any thing proper & peculiar: to the end (as he said) to banish from his citie these two words, Thine and Mine, which in his opinion were the cause of all euils and desolations that befall Common wealths. The Nicholaites reuiued the same error in the primitiue Church, and many others haue labored by friuolous reasons to defend and maintaine it, chiefly to root out (as they say) vtterly from within the soule, those humane affections, which commonly carry men rather towards Plato established a communie of all things in his Commonwealth.

The Nicholaites reuiued Plato's communie.

thei

The confutation of this error.

The definition of a house.

The diuision
thereof.

Four kinds
of marriage.
The mariage
of honour is of three sorts.

2. The ma-
riage of loue.

Eccles. 25. 1.

their wiues, children, and goods, than to other things. Which affections so long as they beare sway amongst the citizens, cause them oftentimes to turne aside from their duty towards the common-wealth, whereby it is made weaker, and of lesse continuance. Now among many grounds confuting this error, (which being receiued, would fill al with disorder & confusion, to the ouerthrow of humane society) that is most certaine and cannot be impugned, that forasmuch as the lawfull distribution of goods, & manner of mariages, are the ordinance of God, (as it is manifest) & seeing the ordinance of God may not be altered by any counsell of man, it followeth, that as well the diuision of goods, as of wiues and children, are immutable; and consequently, that the community of goods, wiues, and children, is a thing flatly gain saying the institution of God, and therefore to bee reprooued. Moreover, if goods were common, an infinite multitude of do-littles, of idle and negligent persons, borne (as Horace saith) onely to deuoure and to consume the benefits of the earth, being ywilling to labour, and resembling waspes that eate the hony of the Bees, would feede and cloath themselves with their goods, who get their living with great sweat of their bodies, and vexation of their mindes. Which is against the expresse commandement of God, who will haue vs eate our bread in the sweat of our face. But what greater shame and offence, vtterly defacing all honesty of life, can there be amongst men, than the community of wiues, whereby all fornications and adulteries would be maintained by authoritie? This shewes plainly, that we are not to loose time in confuting such an opinion of theirs, who seeke to take away from amongst men all marks of a common-wealth. For there would not bee any publike thing, if nothing were priuate, nor common, if nothing were peculiar. Yea Plato afterward did wisely leaue that opinion, and quietly renounced his first Commonwealth, to giue place to a second. And the Heraldes of Gods word condemned this error, when it was raised vp in the Apostles time by an arch-heretike called Nicholas of Antioch, who maintained this opinion, that goods, wiues, and children, ought to be common amongst Christians, and for example to others, communicated his wife to whomsoever would, albeit shee was yong and very beautifull. Thus following the order establisht of God, and continued alwaies through so many ages, vntill our time, and hauing seene the first institution of marriage, we must also containe it within the house, which is a society and communion of life betweene the husband and the wife, the master and the seruant, for daily profite. Hesiodus putteth the Oxe in stead of the seruant, so farre foorth (saith Aristotle) as the Oxe being sit to labour, is to poore men in the place of a slaue. This house thus described is simple, but when children are contained therein, it is absolute and compleate. Therefore a house that is perfect and accomplished, may be diuided, according to the saying of Philosophers, into these foure parts: into Matrimoniall, Parentall, Lordly or Masterly, and Possessorie part. The Matrimoniall part comprehendeth the husband and the wife: the Parentall containeth the father, mother, and children: the Lordly hath vnder it the master, men seruants, and maid seruants: the Possessorie part includeth within it moouables, immoouables, and chattels. Now to follow our matter already begun, and to discourse of things in order, we haue here to handle and to obserue diligently this first part of a house, called the coniugall or wedlock part, and the sequele of our discourses shall instruct vs in the other parts. He that hath tasted of learning, and beene well instructed in the study of wisdome, shall finde that there are foure kinds of coninnctions and mariages, namely, the marriage of honour, the marriage of loue, the marriage of labour, and the marriage of grieve. The marriage of honour is deuided into the highest, middlemost, and lowest degree. The highest is that supernaturall mariage, whereby God and mans nature meete together, euen by a mystery, which overpasseth the vnderstanding of all humane capacity. We saw the effect and truth thereof in the incarnation and natiuity of the eternall Sonne of God. The middlemost mariage of honour is, when God and the soule meete, and are ioyned together by grace and glory. The lowest degree of the mariage of honour, is when God and the Church are coupled together, and are made one mysticall body. These three sorts of mariages are supernaturall, and appointed of God after an vnspeakeable manner: but the cause of our assembly requireth not that we should speake any more of them. Now to come to the other kinds of coninnctions, which respect only the estate of mankinde: the mariage of loue, is that which is betweene an honest man and a vertuous woman, linked together by God, for the preseruati-
on of the linage of man. It may bee called a charitable coninnction, vnity, and society of them that are good, being made by grace, peace and concord. Of this mariage spake that wise Jew, saying: That three things among others, were approoued of God and men, The concord of brethren, the loue of our neighbour, and the husband and wife that agree well together. And to say truth, truth, it is one of the greatest benefits, yea one of the rarest felicities in the world, when a marriage is well and duly kept, when both the husband and wife feare God, and keepe their promise one to another according to that saying of the wise man: Blessed is the man that hath a virtuous wife: the wife also being no lesse happy that hath a good husband. The other kinde of marriage, namely of labour, is that which is commonly practised in our daies, wherein many, yea almost all marry for couetousnesse, not for the vertue, chastity, or good report, which they heare of women and maidens. Plautus the comickall poet said, that in marriage a man must take his wife by the eares, and not by the fingers: that is to say, for her good report, not for her dowrie, which is told with hands. Lycurgus being desirous that his Citizens should put the same in practise, established a law, which forbade giuing of dowries with maidens in marriage, to the end that every maide should labour to endow her selfe with vertue: for loue whereof, and not of riches, they should be demanded in marriage. The same reason mooued Themistocles, when two men required his daughter in marriage, to prefer the honest man before the wealthy: saying, That he had rather haue a man to his sonne in law without goods, then goods without a man. We read that Olympias the mother of Alex. hearing of one had married a very faire woman, but scarce chaste, being rauished with her loue, said, that he was a brainles man, otherwise he would not haue married by hear say, nor by the lust of his eies. We may say as much of them that marrie by the report of their fingers, counting vpon them how much their wiues bring to them by marriage, not considering before whether they be so qualified, that they may liue with them. But let vs know, that every marriage made through couetousnesse, especially where there is inequality of riches, as namely when the husband is poore, and the wife rich, will be alwaies riotous, and very hardly will there be any peace betweene them. Which thing Menander desirous to teach vs, said, that when a poore man marieth a rich wife, he giueth himselfe in marriage to the woman which he weddeth, and not the woman to him. And the Satyricall Poet saith, that nothing is more intollerable than a rich wife. This caused a yong man to goe to Pittacus, one of the Sages of Græcia, and to aske his counsell, saying: I haue two wiues offered me, the one is equal to me in goods and parentage, the other goeth farre beyond me, which of them shall I take? Marke (said this wise man) where children are ready to play at fence, go to them, and they will counsell thee. He did so, and as he drew neere, they began to set themselves one against another to skirmish. And when they saw this yong man comming, who exceeding them in strength and bignesse, and supposed that hee would make one among them, they said aloud, let every one goe to his match. Whereby he learned what he was to doe concerning his marriage. Martia a noble widow, being demanded why she married not againe, seeing shee was rich, and as yet in the floure of her youth, made this answer I can finde none (said she) that loveth not my goods more than my person. The same reason mooued Venda Queene of Ruscia to throw her selfe into the water thereby to reuenge her selfe of them that made warre with her, to haue her in marriage, seeing they could not win her by gentlenesse. For shee knew well, that they desired her for her kingdome, and not of any good will they bare vnto her: as it is the custome of princes to respect onely their aliance and profit, marrying oftentimes by substitutes and proxies those whom they neuer saw but by picture. But I finde that Elizabeth that wife Queene of Eng. land, was of a better iudgement, when she wrote to Henrie Prince, and since king of Sweathland, who demanded her in marriage, That he was the onely prince in the world, whom shee ought to loue most, because he required her when shee was a prisoner: but shee was resolved neuer to marrie any man before shee had seene him. The like answer she sent to the Archduke of Austria, which was in part the cause why neither of them would come vnto her, fearing belike, that if they were not wel liked, they should bee sent backe againe into their countrey. Of this that hath beene hitherto discoursed, together with the experience which is daily seene, we may inferre, that marriages made through couetousnesse, are indeede marriages of labour. And of this number may those bereckoned, wherein bodily beautie, and other outward graces are onely regarded. For it seldome falleth out but that the spirit of dissention troubleth all those houses, and that all loue and liking vanisheth together with age, which causeth the lively hue of colour to wither away. Likewise among these marriages of labour, wee place those wherein there is disparitie of age, and especially of manners. Therefore Dionysius the elder said to his mother, who being very olde, would needs marry a yong man, that it was in her power to violate the lawes of Syracusa, but not the law of nature. Aristotle saith, that men and women ought to marry together in such an age, that both of them should leave off to beget and to conceiue children at the same time. According to this rule the husband must be twenty

Eccles. 26. 1.
The marriage
of labour.

Plautus would haue a man
chuse his wife
by the eares,
not by the fingers.
Lycurgus for-bad all dowries.

Themistocles.

We must not marry by the lust of our eies nor by the report of our fingers.

Menander.

Pittacus answer to a yong
man that asked his aduise
in marriage.

Every one must marry
his equall.
Martia.

Venda Queene
of Ruscia.

Against marriage by substitutes and proxies, Elizbeth Queene
of England.

Of mariages
made onely
for beautie.

Of the disparity of age & manners betweene mari-
ed couples.

yeares,

At what age men and women ought to marrie.

Why a man ought to haue ten yeares more then his wife.

Of the marriage of widowes.
Timothens.

Chilons opinion of second marriages.

1. Cor. 7. 39

The discommodities of second marriages.
Valeria.

Of a woman that had bin married to 22. husbands.

The notorious loosenesse of a widow.

Of the marriage of griefe.

Commendable ornaments of mariages.
Wedding songs vsed in old time.
Diuerse customes vsed at the celebration of mariages.
The Assyrians customes.

yeares, or thereabouts, elder then his wife: because naturally women conceiue and beare children vntill fiftie yeares, and men may beget children vntill 70. Licurgus also forbade that any man should marrie before he were 37. yeares old, and a woman before 17. Whereof this reason may rather be rendred, that the wife may more easily acquaint her selfe with her husbands manners, he being then of ripe iudgement, and shee comming into his power from her tender yeares. For (as the same Aristotle saith) diuersitie of manners and callings hindereth friendship and true loue. But because of the shortnesse of mans daies, I thinke it were good for him to marry at thirtie yeares of age, taking a wife of twentie yeares old, to the end that her age may not bee too much vnlike his: that so liuing according to the common course of nature, they may leaue their children provided at the same yeares, and such as might bee well able to liue without them. A maiden also of that age is able to iudge a great deale better what is meete for her, and what duty shee oweth to her husband, and of his commandments, than if she were yonger. Now, seeing we are about this matter, I thinke I shall not digresse from the same, if I speake of the marriage of widowes. It is certaine that those women that haue already learned the disposition of their former husbands, are oftentimes very hardly altered. Whereupon some alledge the example of Timothens, the best plaier on the flute of his time, who, when he tooke a scholler, vsed to demand of him whether he had made any entrance in that play: Which if he had, he tooke a greater reward by half than he did of them that knew nothing: saying, that his paines were greater in taking away from his schollers that which was naught and vnskillfull, than in teaching that which was good to such as vnderstood nothing at all thereof. Chilon one of the wise men of Gracia, said, that he accounted him a very foole, who hauing saued himselfe from a perillous shipwracke by painfull swimming, would returne to sea againe, as though a tempest had not power ouer all barks. Platoes Androgyne teacheth, that second marriages can neuer fitly be made. Concerning this matter, we can haue no better counsell than that of S. Paul, whither I referre the resolution of this matter. But experience daily teacheth vs what infinite miseries, quarrels, suits, & ouerthrow of houses, proceede from such marriages, through the donations and profits which yong men craue that marrie widowes, who forgetting all naturall dutie, doubt not to enrich strangers with the goods of their owne children. Valeria of Rome may serue for a notable example to women, who said, that her husband died for other, but liued to her for ever. Saint Hierome rehearseth a history quite contrary to this here spoken of, auouching that he saw at Rome a woman that had beene married to 22. husbands, who afterwards marrying one that had 20. wiues, died in his life time. Whereupon the Romans crowned him with Lawrell, in victorie, and caused him to carry a branch of Palme in his hand at his wiues funerall. He maketh mention also of another widow, who of almes brought vp a little childe and abused it at the age of ten yeares, by whom shee became great with childe, contrarie to the order of nature, God so permitting it, to discover the vile filthinesse of that woman. Second marriages were a great deale more honourable for such widowes. The fourth kinde of marriage remaineth yet, which we called the marriage of griefe, which is nothing else but the assembly and coniunction of the wicked and reprobate, of whom that common proverbe is spoken, that It is better one house be troubled with them than twaine. Their life cannot be but full of wretchednesse and miserie, the griefe whereof will abide by them for ever. But to returne to our first speech of the marriage of loue, which is holy and lawfull, guided by good reason, and according to the ordinance of God; mortall men beholding the holinesse and necessity of this mysterie, haue enriched and set forth the same with all kinde of ioy and delight, with the assembly of kinsfolkes, and calling together of friends and ghests, with bankets, feasts, ornaments, iewels, Tragedies, Comedies, and such like pastimes, vttering ioy: and not to bee misliked; so that all dissolutenesse and ouer-great superfluitie beset aside, and honesty and comelinesse obserued. But especially the wedding songs, vsed by the Ancients both Greekes and Latines, and made to beautifie and enrich their weddings, are worthy of eternall praise. Moreover, they had amongst them infinite and sundry customes kept at the knitting vp and celebration of marriages, some being good, others bad, of which we will here alleadge certaine, because wee may finde instruction in them. The Assyrians had certaine Magistrates called Triumirs, and Presidents of weddings, approoued and graue men, whose office was once a yeare in euery Towne and Village to bring all the yong maidens that were to be married, into one publike place, and to cause them to be proclaimed one after another, beginning with the fairest, who were giuen to them that offered most, & bad last. With this money that came by them, they married those that were hard-fauoured, as good cheape as they could: and otherwise than after after this sort, it was not lawfull for any body to contract matrimony. Wherein they shewed a marvellous care in providing equally for all their daughters. The ancient Græcians had a custome to burne before the doore of the new married wife, the Axletree of that chariot wherein she was brought to her husbands house: giving her to vnderstand thereby, that shee was to dwell there with him, whether shee were willing or no, and neuer to depart from thence. Lycurgus would not haue the husband and wife to lie together in the beginning of their marriage, nor to see one another, but by stealth and secretly: To the end (said he) that amitie and loue might bee the better preserved betwene them, that they might be healthy, and that their children which should come of them, might be stronger. The Romanes passed all other nations in pompe, ceremonies, and comelinesse of marriage. They obserued this inuolably, that their maidens and widdowes should not bee constrained to marry. On the wedding day they vsed that fashion, which at this day is very common. The new married wife was richly apparelled, with her haire hanging about her shoulders, and her head crowned with a garland of flowers. The mother of the Bride went before her daughter bearing a cofer of trinkets, iewels, rings, and other litle ornaments belonging to women. The maidens that came of wealthie houses, had a chariot prepared for them, drawne with two white horses, to declare the puritie of body, and innocency of miade, which the yong women ought to haue. The new married wife was led from her fathers house to her husbands house, along the broadest streetes in the citie, to note thereby, that a wife ought alwaies to passe by the greatest way, and not to be found at any time in suspected and secret places, whereupon some suspicion of euill may arise. When shee was come to the entrie of her husbands house, before shee went ouer the threashold of the doore, hee tooke her with both his armes by the wings, and lift her aloft in such sort, that hee strooke her head and the doore post together, and so set her within the doore before euer her feete touched the ground. This was done, that the married wife should remember through the griefe of the blow, not to goe often forth out of her husbands house, if shee would haue the report and name of an honest woman. Her garments, behauiour, gesture and gate, were correspondent to all modestie, honestie, and shamefastnesse. Shee wore a iewell hanging by a ribben about her necke, to signifie, that shee was bound and put in subiection to her husband. Shee presented also to her husband water in one hand, and fire in the other. Which some interpret thus, that as the communication of mans life consisteth chiefly in the vse of these two elements, of fire and water, so there cannot be any fellowship more familiar or neerer linked together, than that of the husband and the wife. Now, because fire and water signifie communication, others haue thus vnderstood it that as fire and water are cleane contraries as well in the first as in the second qualities, so are man and wife, the one being hot and drie, of the nature of fire, and the other colde and moist, of the nature of water: which contraries beeing ioyned together, make a harmonie and temperature of loue. Againe, some would haue the dissensions, murmurings, and complaints that are often in marriages, signified thereby: wherein laughter is not without weeping, nor rest without labour, nor sweet without sowre, according to the nature of all earthly things, in which wee cannot taste hony without gall, nor sugar without Aloes. Many other ceremonies were vsed of the Ancients, which for breuitie sake, as also because there is small instruction in them, I omit for this present. Therefore to conclude our discourse, we learne, that the name of a house doth not onely signifie the walles and roofof a building, but that it ought to be taken for a familie gathered together to communicate one with another in all necessities. Wee learne also that in euery marriage we ought to haue regard to the ordinance and institution of God, and to those politike lawes vnder which we liue, to the end we trouble not common tranquillitie: that wee must auoide all disparitie of goods, of houses, of age, and especially of nature and manners. Let vs not suffer our selues to be carried away with any foolish passion, but looke chiefly to this, that vnder a gracious and honest behauiour may shine forth cleare and euident steps of an vpriight and sincere soule, void of dissimulation: saying with the Wise man, Fauour is deceitfull, and beauty is vanitie, but a woman that feareth the Lord, shee shall be praised. We must also rid our wedding assemblies of all dissolutenesse, of all kinde of allurements to voluptuousnesse and nicenesse, that they may rather seeme to be schooles of honour and chastitie, than of intemperance and loosenesse. If we lay such foundations in marriages, no doubt but God will blesse them, and make them happy and prosperous, to the glory of his name, and to the quietnesse and contentation of vs all.

The custome
of the Greci-ans.

The customs of the Ro-
manes.

The Romane
brides vsed to present fire
and water to their husbands.

What is signified by the name of a house.

Pron. 31.30

Of the particular dutie of a husband towards his wife. Chap. 47.

A R. A. M.

Small iarres
must be avoided in a house

AS Physicians stand more in feare of feauers engendred of hid causes gathered together by little and little of a long time, than of those which proceede of very apparant causes: so the small iarres and daily quarrellings of married folkes, being vnkowne to strangers, and drawing by little and little to an incurable hardnesse, doe more separate them one from another, than any other cause whatsoever. Therefore it is necessary that all the rootes of such naughty sprigs should bee cut off, and all occasions escheued, which might prouoke one another to the least and lightest anger that may bee. The industrie of the man ought to aime especially at this, being called to the honourable estate of Head of a family, looking diligently that hee performe such duty towards her, who is so straighly linked vnto him, that such dissentions neuer take their beginning through his default. Let vs then (my Companions) take occasion of this subiect to bee better instructed in the dutie of a husband towards his wife.

Prou. 5. 18, 19, 20, 21.
Euerie man must content himselfe with his owne wife
Eph. 5. 25, 26.
How husbands ought to loue their wiues.

A C H I T O B. Reioice (saith the wise man) with the wife of thy youth. Let her bee as the louing Hinde, and pleasant Roe: let her breasts satisfie thee all times, and delight in her loue continually. For why shouldst thou delight in a strange woman, or embrace the bosome of a stranger? For the waies of a man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his paths.

A S E R. Husbands (saith S. Paul) loue your wiues euen as Christ loued the Church, and gave himselfe for it. So ought men to loue their wiues as their owne bodies: hee that loneth his wife, loneth himselfe But it belongeth to thee (A M A N A) to handle vs this point at large.

Let the household God of the Heathen.

Themistocles
saued by flying to the harth of his enemy.

What place
the wife hath next to the man.

Loue the first foundation of euery holy marriage.

A M A N A. Gorgias an excellent Orator, commended of Cicero in many places, exhorted the Græcians long since to peace and concord, by an oration of wonderfull art. Which when hee had ended, one Melanthus stood vp before all the company that was present, and said: My Lords, behold Gorgias, who by his eloquent oration exhorteth vs that are in number infinite to concord, and yet hee cannot play the Orator so well as to cause his wife and his chambermaide to liue quietly with him in his house, wherein there are but they three. For ye shall daily see them at strife and continuall dissention. Therefore, my Lords, I thinke it great rashnesse in him to exhort vs to concord, when hee cannot haue it himselfe in his priuate house. And truly, besides the vspeakeable torment that is ioyned with such riots, ianglings, and controuersies in a house, it is a shamefull offence when they are knowne to strangers. The Ancients had a priuate and household God, whom they called the God Lar, which wee may translate into our language, the God of the Harth. Hee was had in such veneration, that if any man withdrew himselfe to the Harth and house of his deadly enemy, his enemy durst not offer him any violence as long as hee was there, the Harth beeing vnto him a sanctuary and place of immunity. For so wee reade of Themistocles, that beeing banished from Athens, and pursued by some that would haue laid violent hand vpon him, hee fled to the Harth of his deadly enemy, who for that cause durst not strike him, nor offer him any iniurie. This Harth was dedicated and consecrated to the Goddesse Vesta, and was placed where the chiefe fire of the house was made. Now I pray you, if it were prohibited, and accounted an vniust thing for a man to quarrell, to iniurie, or to offer violence, euen to his vtter enemy, beeing fledde to his Harth, how infamous an act (thinke you) and vnworthy the nature of man, did these men iudge it to bee, to offer any violence to them that were of the same Harth, but chiefly to the Wife, who is a principall person belonging to the bedde, table, Harth, yea to the whole house of the Husband, and is called by the law, a companion both of the diuine and humane house? At this day wee commonly obserue this, not to offend in any sort those that come to see vs: and if wee haue any occasion of quarrelling, it shall not bee shewed as long as they are in our house, if wee haue any care not to bee accounted vnciuill, and voide of discretion. And how shall wee not vse the same reason towards them that are vnto vs a second selfe, with whom wee are to liue and die? Let vs then haue regard to those principall points that are to bee desired for the establishment and continuance of loue, vpon which euery holy marriage ought first to bee grounded, as wee haue already said. Secondly, it must bee grounded vpon the conformitie and agreement of good and honest conditions: and lastly, it must hold and depend of prudence, which breedeth a continuall, liuely, and mutuall affection of one towards another, the true testimony whereof is a reuerend behauiour of each to other. It is a Maxime and principle graunted by wife men, men, that no man is woorthy and meete to commaund, vlesse hee bee better than they ouer whom he commaundeth. Therefore it seemeth that nature commonly giueth more vigor, strength, authority, gravity, and prudence, in deedes and wordes to men than to women. The effects of which graces hee cannot better shew forth, than by gouerning himselfe with reason, and according to duty towards his Wife: first, in louing her, then in gouerning her graciously, as beeing a free person, (as Aristotle saith), perswading her more by reason than authority. Hee must not offer her any iniury, either in deed or word, but honor and make much of her. For the Husband that honoureth his Wife, honoureth himselfe. The Lawyer saith, that married women are and ought to be set forth with the beams of their Husbands, and that the Husband ought to giue example to others to honour his wife: whereby also hee shall prouoke his wife to honour him. But on the other side, by offering her wrong, he shall incense her, and giue her occasion to reply vpon him with bitter speeches, which in the end will prouoke him to wrath, and to behaue himselfe worse towards his wife, thereby constrainning her, as it falleth out oftentimes, to inuent some mischief against him and his honour. There are a thousand examples hereof in good authors, and experience affoordeth too many proofes of the same. We reade of Clytemnestra the wife of Agamemnon, that, to reuenge an iniury receiued from her husband, she committed adulterie, and afterward consented to his death. It is true that this is but a simple reuenge of women, and such a one as lighteth vpon themselves. But what? This sexe is fraile, spitefull, and giuen to reuenge: and therefore men are to vse the greater prudence in the gouerning and managing of them. The prouerbe is that a man is bitten of his dogge, by prouoking him ouermuch, and that an Eele is oftentimes lost, when it is strained ouer hard. Therefore let a wife husband know this, that hee must neuer deale iniuriously with his wife: especially before other: and that hee must abstaine most of all from laying violent handes vpon her. If the Ancients would haue their slaues corrected, rather with wordes, than blowes, much more ought the wife to be dealt withall, whom God calleth a helpe like to vs. To this effect Marcus Aurelius said, that a wife husband and one that mindeth to to liue peaceably with his wife, ought aboue all things to obserue this rule, namely: To admonish her often, to reprehend her seldom, but neuer to lay hands vpon her. Homer bringeth in Iupiter reproouing his wife, and threatening her when shee is rebellious, but neuer maketh him goe farther. Wee reade in the life of Cato, of whom it was giuen out that hee was a sworne enemy to women, that he neuer strooke his wife, accounting that sacriledge, and yet hee knew well how to vse the place and dignity of a husband, which keepeth his wife in obedience. But aboue all that hath beene hitherto spoken, a husband must obserue this as an inuiolable law, that hee abstaine from touching any other woman but his owne, as well in respect of the feare of God, who excludeth all whoremongers and adulterers from his heauenly mansion, as also because his wife should haue no knowledge or suspition thereof. For otherwise he will cast himselfe into a more dangerous Labyrinth, than was that of king Perseus or of Dedalus: yea, hee shall hardly haue a good countenance of his wife at any time, except shee dissemble the matter, that shee may the better be reuenged of him, either by rendring like for like, thinking that she hath iust occasion to breake her faith made to her husband, seeing he hath broken his to her, or else by some other mean vpon his person. Of this suspition which the wife hath of her husband incontinency, or the husband of the wifes, is bred a great passion, or to say better, a furie and rage, which wee call lealouise. Crysippus calleth it a disease of the minde, proceeding from a feare which a man hath, that that thing is communicated to another, which hee would not haue common but private to himselfe. Or otherwise wee may say, that lealouise is bred of that loue, which will not suffer a partner in the things beloued. Some write (saith Plutarke) that Cattes are troubled with the smell of perfumes and sweet fauours, in so much that they waxe madde withall. Likewise if it should so fall out that a woman should be offended and haue her braine troubled with the perfumes of her husband, hee were of a very strange nature if hee would not abstaine from it, but for the enioying of a little pleasure would suffer her to fall into so great an inconuenience. Now seeing it is so that such accidents come vpon them, not when their husbands are perfumed, but when they giue ouer themselves to the loue of harlots, it is great iniustice in them to griene, offend, and trouble their wives in such hainous sort. At least wifely they should behaue themselves as they doe that draw neere to Bees, who abstaine from touching euen their owne wifes. For it is reported of Bees, that they hate and make war more against them than against others, because they haue such false hearts, as lie neere their wifes, beeing defiled and polluted with the company of

The best must command.

The husband must command ouer his wife as ouer a free person.

The fruits of hard dealing.

Clytemnestra.

A husband must neuer beat his wife.

Marcus Aurelius precept to husbands.

Iupiter.

Cato.

A husband must especially auoid adultery.

What lealouise is.

Whoredome is great iniustice

The cruel revenge of Ariadna.

Women are capable of Philosophy.

A tale of the fun and the wind.

Women must be led more by reason, & gentlenes than
by force.

The best way
to bring an vn-ruly wife into good order is to make her more honest.

No man must chide or fawn
vpon his wife
before others.

Socrates patience in sustaining the infirmities of his wife.

Husbands
must be care-full in looking to their families.

any other women. The wilde Boare (saith one of the Poets) pursued of dogges, the Lionesse bitten with hunger, the Tyger robbed of her young ones, or the Viper whose taile is trod vpon, are not more terrible than a woman that is offended: but nothing will sooner cast her into a frensie and furie, than Iealousie. Ariadna buried aline Zeno Isauricus the Emperor, that shee might bee reuenged of him. Hee that taketh to himselfe those pleasures which he forbiddeth his wife, doth as much as if hee commanded her to fight against enemies. to whom he had already yeelded himselfe. And if vice, who ordome, curiosity, superfluity, choler, and other imperfections reigne amongst men, how should they driue them away from women? So a husband must correct himselfe first, and after vse learned instructions towards his wife. Let him (as Bees do) gather together and carry to his wife, so much of his studies as may serue for her profit. For seeing women (as Plato saith) haue a soule as well as wee, and as quicke a spirit, yea oftentimes a more excellent spirit than we, wee must not thinke them vncapable of the goodly reasons of Philosophy, wherein many of them haue gone beyond many Philosophers. Knowledge and skill will keepe a woman from other vncleete exercises, and being rauished with her husbands braue discourses, she will contemne the losse of time in vnprofitable matters. Shee will neuer fall into that danger which oftentimes befalleth women, who conceiue and bring forth by themselves strange counsels, & extravagant passions, when they receiue not from else where the seedes of good speeches, and when their husbands impart not vnto them any sound doctrine. The sun (as fables faine) preuayled more than the Northernewinde. For the more the wind laboured to get away a mans gown, and to that end blewe more violently, the harder did hee girde vp and restraine his garment. But when the Sunne waxed hotte after the winde, the man feeling himselfe heated, cast off his gowne, and afterward burning with heate, hee put off his coate and all. So if husbands goe about to order their wiues with their bare authority and by force, they will strue against it, and be offended: but contrariwise, being admonished with reason they yeeld of themselves and take it patiently. The fooles of this world commonly girde and mocke that man, who peradventure seemeth to be ledde a little too much by his lawfull wife, and loyall spouse vsing more gentlenesse and curtesie towards her, than rigor and commanding and yet you shall see themselves so strangely bewitched by some strumpet, that they feare not to hazard their life and honor in her seruice. But it becometh a man a great deale better to bee well liking, gentle and acceptable to an honest and vertuous wife, than to abase himselfe to a common harlot. And those men deceiue themselves, who, hauing married rich wiues and of noble houses, studie not to make them more honest and better qualified, but to pull them downe, perswading themselves that they will come to better order when they haue abased and brought them low. Whereas euery one ought to maintaine the dignity of his wife as hee would doe the iust height of a horse, and be skilfull both in the one and the other to vse the bridle well as becommeth him. Besides, a husband is not to rule his wife as a Lord or master doth his slaue, but, as the soule doth a wise mans body, through a mutuall loue and ioint affection, whereby hee is bound vnto her. And as the soule may well be carefull ouer the body, although it become not a slaue to the pleasures and inordinate affections thereof, so a wise husband will behaue himselfe by pleasing and gratifying his wife in honest things, and by shewing that he loueth honour and vertue aboue all things. This will bee a mean to make her as wife, vertuous, and honest, as otherwise: if himselfe be giuen to volupuousnes, hee shall cause her to like of curtisans conditions, and to become slippery and lasciuious. No man (saith Cleobulus) ought to chide or to fawne vpon his wife before others: for the one is the point of a foole, the other of a mad man. Socrates, practised one of these points very well: when Xantippa his wife, reuiled & chiding him, in the end being caried headlog with wrath, ouerthrew table & cal. Whereupon Eurhydemus whom he had brought home to sup with him, rose vp to depart. But Socrates not shewing himselfe greatly moued, or angry with his wife, staied him, and said: What? do you not remember my friend, that as wee were at dinner with you the other day, a henne lept vpon the table and did as much to vs, and yet we were not angry therefore? Solon ordained that the husband should goe see his wife thrice a moneth at the least, not for pleasure, but to yeelde vnto her, as it were by obligation, the pledges and gages of friendship through honor, grace and loyaltie, which ought to increase daily. And as cities at sundry times renew these alliances, which they haue one with another, so this law maker would haue the alliance of marriage, that I may so speake, renewed by the speeches vsed at such gretings and visitations. We see daily what miseries and offences light vpon houses, when the head of the familie hath no care to rule and guide. Whereupon also the women

women thinke that they are despised and smally beloued. And in truth they haue occasion giuen them so to thinke, when their husbands seldome keepe them company. The Pilot that giueth ouer his shippe to the mercy of the waues, declareth evidently that hee careth not for loosing that which is in it. A Wife without her husband is exposed to many ambushes and assaults that are hardly sustained. To this purpose I remember a notable historie written in the Chronicles of Ruscia, namely, that the inhabitants of Nouogradum, which at this day is the chiefe and principall seate of that countrey, being gone into Grecia to besiege the towne of Corfun, where they continued for the space of seauen yeares, their wiues in meane while wearied with their long abode there, married their seruants. The husbands after ward returning conquerors, found their slaues in the field, who gaue them battell, and had the better of them. Neuerthelesse in the end the slaues were vanquished, and the most part of the women moued with indignation for that ouerthrow, hung themselves. Now as touching that other point mentioned by that wise man Cleobulus, namely, that a man must not dally with his Wife in the presence of others: Cato deprived a Senator of Rome from the Senatoriall dignity, because he kissed his Wife in his daughters presence. This was somewhat too extreme. But howsoeuer it bee, as Plato admonisheth men growen in yeares to shewe themselves shamefast before the yoonger sort, to the end that they also should learne to behaue themselves reuerently and warily, so surely this precept is specially to be kept betweene Wan and Wife, that they may bee an example of honour and chastity vnto all. Likewise the man must diuide the offices and affaires of the house with his wife, giuing her authority ouer all things in his absence: and in his presence also ouer household matters, & such things as are more proper and agreeable to that sexe, causing her to be feared, reuerenced, and obedied of the children, men seruants and maid seruants, as himselfe. But as if we take two sounds that agree well, the base is alwaies more heard: so in a well ruled and ordered house, all things are done by the consent of both parties, but yet so, that it is alwaies apparent, that things are done by the direction, counsell and inuention of the husband. For a family will suffer but one head, one master, and one lord: otherwise if there be many heads, the commandements would be contrary, and the familie in continuall trouble. Now the foundation of all duties here mentioned by vs of the husband towards the wife, and of all others which daily communication may require, is that true and vnfaigned loue that ought to be the vnseparable bond of euery good marriage. Wee haue handled heretofore the great effects of friendship, which if they be required among common friends, no doubt but they are much more betweene those, whom God, nature, the lawes, and loue, haue so straightly ioined together. Also let husbands know, that they ought to reuerence their wiues more than any other person, and perceiuing them to be wise and vertuous, (as they may make them if they be not altogether forlorne and corrupted) let them neuer seeme to distrust them in any respect. The Romans when they returned from a voiage, or from a far country, or onely out of the country, into the city, if their wiues were at home, they sent word before to giue them intelligence of their comming, to the end they should not conceiue this opinion, that they meant to deale craftily or maliciously with them. Forasmuch therefore as loue and friendship is the fountain of euery good duty of the husband towards his wife, and that which as it were stealeth away, and maketh the will of his halfe partner to be wholly his owne, let vs consider for the conclusion of our speech, of some notable examples of great loue in the behalfe of men, to the end we may be drawne on to loue and to honour them that are in the same place towards vs that the Church is towards God, which he so loued, that he sent his onely Sonne to die for the redemption thereof. Tiberius Gracchus, a noble man of Rome, finding two serpents in the chamber where he slept, inquired for the meaning thereof by sooth saying, whereunto hee gaue absolute credit. Answer was made him, that if he slue the male first, he should die before his wife, but if the female, his wife before him. As soone as he vnderstood thereof he slue the male, and within a little while after he died. Whereupon Historiographers doubt whether his wife Cornelia were more happy in finding a husband that loued her so well, than miserable in loosing him. Baptista Fregos maketh mention of a Neapolitan, whose wife being taken on the sea coast by the Moores, he presently cast himselfe after her into the sea, and following their foist, besought them to take him also. Which they did, so that both of them were brought before the king of Thunis to whom the vessell belonged: who hearing the discourse of the fact, and being moued with compassion ouer such perfect friendship, deliue-
 red them both. Orpheus (as the poets write) loued his wife so entirely, that she dying on the wedding day, he kept his loue inuiolable, and would neuer set vpon any other. Nynus king

Women mari-
ed their ser-uants in the absence of their husbands

Men must not dally with their wiues in the presence
of others.

What household affaires
are to be deu-ided betweene
the man and the wife.

There must be but one head in a family.

Loue the bad
of marriage.

A husband
must not distrust his wife.

Examples of
the loue of husbands towards their wiues.

T. Gracchus.

The great
loue of a Neapolitan towards his wife.

Orpheus.

of Menon.

Periander.

M. Lepidus.

P. Numidius.

Sylanus.

Dominicus Catalusius.

Roderigo Sarmiento.

All things
must be common between the husband and the wife.

of the Assyrians, falling in loue with Semiramis the wife of Menon a vassall of his, besought him to let him haue her to wife, in recompence whereof he offered him his daughter in marriage. But Menon bare such great loue towards her, that hee would not yeeld thereunto. Whereupon the king being moued with wrath, and threatning to plucke out his eies, and to take her away by force, as hee did indeede, Menon for very grieffe and sorrow hung himselfe. Periander king of Corinth loued his wife so tenderly, that after she was dead, he caused her to be laid by him certaine daies. Marcus Lepidus being driuen into banishment, heard that his wife was married to another, whereupon he died for sorrow. When word was brought to Plantius Numidius a Romane Senator, that his wife, whom he loued as himselfe, was dead: hee thrust himselfe into the bosome with a dagger, whereof hee died. Sylanus a Roman slue himselfe after his wife, whom he singularly loued, was taken from him, and giuen to Nero the Emperor. Dominicus Catalusius Prince of Lesbos loued his wife so well, that although shee grew very leproous, yet hee neuer deprived her therefore of his boord or bed. We reade of a great Lord of Spaine, called Roderigo Sarmiento, that through grieffe which he receiued for the losse of his wife, he slept for a yeares space in his clothes, did neuer eate vpon a table cloth, nor late him downe in any chaire, but afflicted himselfe diuersly. Therefore let vs learne by our present discourse to loue our wiues perfectly, yeelding due beneuolence vnto them, and behauing our selues discreetly towards them, without offending them, or going beyond the bounds of our duty. And as nature minglet vs together by our bodies, to the end that taking part of the one and part of the other, and putting all together, shee may make that which commeth thereof common to both, and that in such sort, that neither party can discerne or distinguish that which is proper to it selfe from that which belongeth to the other: so let vs haue all things common together, even our will, affection and authority. Neuerthelesse this must be done in such sort, that as in one cup, although there be as much or more water than wine, yet we call it wine, so in the authority of the wife the husbands name must bee written, as hee that directeth the same. But in the meane while let these words Mine and Thine bee banished farre from them, vnlesse it bee in this respect, that, according to the opinion of the Physitions, as blowes given on the left side are felt on the right, so the wife must through compassion feele the harmes of her husband, and the husband much more those of his wife: to the end that as knots haue their strength by interlacing the endes one within another, so the society of marriage is preserved and strengthened when both the parties doe afford a mutuall affection of good will, beeing assured that both together shall bee made heires of grace and life.

Of the dutie of a Wife towards her Husband. Chap. 48.

The naturall
gifts of women.

NATURE having honoured woman with a gracious alluring of the eies, with a sweet speech, with a beautifull countenance and modest behauiour, hath giuen her great meanes to winne the good liking and loue of her husband, if shee bee honest and shamefast: as likewise shee may easily deceiue man by offering him pleasure, if shee bee wickedly minded. This did Olympias wife to king Philip, know full well, when shee tooke the Thessalonian woman by the hand whom her husband loued so well, and by whom (as they said) he was charmed and bewitched. But the Queene seeing her so faire, and of so good a grace, and as her speech declared, a woman of a good house and well brought vp: Away (quoth she) with all slander, for I see well that your charmes are in your selfe. And let vs not thinke that the power of a lawfull wedded wife is lesse, if by taking all things vnto her, her wealth, her nobility, her charmes, and the whole web of Venus, shee study by meekenesse, good behauiour and vertue to obtaine her husbands loue. Go to then, let vs see if wee can giue the wife some instructions touching this matter, how shee may keepe her selfe within the limits of her duty towards her husband.

Eph 5.23.24.

A R A M. As the Church is in subiection to Christ, even so (saith the Scripture) let the wiues bee to their husbands in euerie thing. For the husband is the wiues head, even as Christ is the head of the Church.

Wiues must be subiect to their husbands.

A C H I T O B. Wiues must bee modest, wise, chaste, keepers at home, louers of their husbands, and subiect vnto them. But it belongeth to thee A S E R, to be now vnto them in stead of a schoole-master.

A S E R. When Kings and Princes honour Philosophers and learned men, it is certaine that that they honour themselves? but philosophers that court it, and become servants to riches, are not thereby honoured. Wee may say as much of wives. For when they submit themselves to their husbands, they are praised: but if they will become mistresses over them, it becometh them as ill, as it doth such as yeelde to that subiection: and both of them reape more shame than honour thereby. Therefore those women that make choice of effeminate husbands, and delight in commanding them, are like to such as had rather guide the blind than follow the wise and cleere sighted. So that if a wife loue, esteeme, and honour her husband, I thinke that all honest duty will flow from thence, to their common contentation and comfort, and to the benefit, quietnes, and honour of the whole familie: I meane if shee loue him as her selfe, and esteeme and honor him, as her nerest Lord. A wife woman ought to thinke that her husbands manners are the lawes of her life, which (if they be good) she is wholly to follow, but if they be bad, she must patiently beare with them. For as a looking glasse serueth to no purpose, although it be guilt and decked with pretious stones, if it doth not lively represent his face that looketh into it, so a woman is not to beliked albeit shee haue store of goods, if her life be not thereafter, and her behauiour and conditions be not conformable to her husband. If a looking glasse represent a sadde and mourning countenance to one that is ioyfull and merrie, or contrariwise a smiling face to him that is sorrowfull, it is a false glasse and woorth nothing. So is she a bad wife and vreasonable, which frowneth when her husband is desirous to be merry with her, and to take some honest recreation, or contrariwise, which laugheth and sporteth her selfe when shee seeth him full of businesse and greatly troubled. For the one is a token of her froward disposition: and the other, that shee despiseth the affections of her husband. And as lines and superficial parts, as the Geometricians say, moue not of themselves, but as the bodies moue wherein they are: so a wife must haue no proper and peculiar passion or affection to her selfe, but must be partaker of the past times, affaires, thoughts and laughters of her husband. The further the Moone is from the sunne, the clearer it is, and shineth so much the more: and contrariwise it hath lesse light, and is obscured the more, as it commeth neerer thereunto, so euill women deale with their husbands when they loue not their presence. For in their absence you shal see them as iocund and frolicke as may bee, but when they are with their husbands and at home, then are they sorrowfull and pensive. Moreover a wife must not trust too much either to her wealth or to the nobility of her race, or to her beauty, but to that which sitteth nearest her husbands heart, that is, to her behauiour, manners and conuersation, taking order that these things be not heard, troublesome, or irksome to her husband every day, but such as please him & agree with his conditions. For the troublesome conuersation of a Wife that alwaies iarreteth, in the end maketh even her honest behauiour odious, as her over great pinching and niggardinesse causeth her sparing and good huswiferie to become hatefull. As this custome was obserued amongst the Persians, that when their enemies came rushing vpon them with great clamors, they receiued them with silence, and contrariwise, if they were set vpon with silence, they made head against them with open mouth: so discrete women holde their peace when their husbands cry out with choler, and contrariwise if they vtter not a word, they labor to appease and pacifie them with their comfortable speeches. A wife woman that loueth her husband as becommeth her, sometime tolerateth and dissembleth an euill intreaty, trusting so much to her constancy and vertue, that by continuing in her duty shee is able to bring him backe againe to his. Shee must gouerne her selfe so discretely, that neither her neighbours, nor other of her familiar friends be made acquainted in any sort with her complaints and greuances. For by discovering them, either she shall make her selfe a laughing stocke to others, or else giue occasion to the enemies of her honor, to prouoke and solicit her to baughtines. And if any one knowing the imperfections of her husband, vnder this pretence of seeing her hardly dealt withall, perswade her to decline from her duty, she must answer him after the example of king Philip, who being wronged by the Grecians intreated them curteously. What then would my husband do vnto me, if I begin to hate him, and to offer him iniurie? If shee perceiue that any woman of her acquaintance laboreth by her talk either to sow or to increase some domesticall dissention, she may wisely say with her selfe: In what case would this woman that seeketh to make me iealous, desire rather to see me, than maliciously to play the ill huswife with my husband, and so forsake my house & marriage bed, whereupon it may be she would gladly take my place? Thus a discreet woman wil giue smal care, & much lesse giue place to the light speeches and fained promises of such disturbers of domesticall peace. Neither will she admit and nourish those vain and foolish opinions which commonly busie the miads of such women as are ruled and governed

It is an honor
to a woman to obey her husband.

A wife compared to a looking glasse.

Notable
similitudes.

Euill wines resembled to the Moone.

An ouerth-warting wife
maketh her selfe odious.

How a wife
must deale
with her cholericke husband.

A wife must not disclose her husbands
imperfection
to any body.

Married couples must not make two beds for any iar betweene them.

When is the best time and place to pacifie strife betweene man and wife.

A woman must be free from all suspicion of incontinency.

She must not loue to gad abroad or to be seene.

She must be modest in her attire.

The true ornaments of a woman.

Certaine tokens of an adulterous heart.

Samefastnes is the best dowie of a woman.

An excellent vse of looking glasse.

A woman must be silent and seeret.

A woman must auoide filthie speeches & iestes.

onely by passions, but containing her desires through reason within a conuenient compasse, the confidence which shee hath in her husbands vertue will breede perfect ease to her soule, by taking from her all doubting and occasion of complaining. Now vpon this discourse wee giue this note by the way, that when any displeasure falleth out betweene married folkes, they must haue a speciall regard then that they make not two beds. For by this meane the anger will endure the lesser while. Also they must shun all occasions of quarrelling in bed. For as a great bellied woman ready to lie downe, and euen feeling the pangs of her trauell, said to those that willed her to lie downe vpon the bed, How can the bed cure me of this euill which came vnto me vpon the bed: so those quarrels, iniuries, wrath and choler that are bred within the bed, can hardly bee appeased and healed at any other time or place. But to continue our matter of the duty of a Wife, she must neuer suffer any to enter into her husbands house without his expresse commaundement or licence. For euery honest wife ought to feare that which is commonly spoken of the loosenesse of women, and labour as much as may bee to conuince those slanderers of lying, who know no other song than to speake of their incontinency. Cesar said, that A woman must not onely bee free from the fault, but also from all suspicion thereof, which was the cause why hee put away his owne wife. And seeing it is the duty of an honest woman to take vpon her the care and oversight of household affaires, shee must keepe at home and not loue to gad abroad, or be desirous of meetings, but so farre forth as her husband would haue her doe so. The greatest vertue of a woman (said Enboides) is not to bee knowne but of her husband: and her praise (said Argemir) in a strange mouth is nothing else but a secret blame. A Wife ought to bee modest in her garments and ornaments of her body, and not vse such sumptuous apparell as the law or custome of the countrey permitteth: because neither rich workes of gold, nor precious attire, nor bodily beauty make not a woman so praiseworthy as her modesty doth, which consisteth in deedes, words, countenance and apparell. That is an ornament (said the Philosopher Crates) that adorneth, and that thing adorneth a woman, which maketh her more honourable. And this is not done by iewels of gold, emeralds, precious stones, or purple garments, but by euery thing that causeth her to be accounted honest, wise, humble and chaste. Those women that curiously pricke vp themselves, and enrich their bodies with ornaments full of pompe, make men more dissolute and inclined to loosenesse, especially when they make great window workes before their dugs, and giue licence to their eyes to wander and gaze about. Whereas contrariwise a wife woman through her honest behauiour, together with her lowly and setled looke, leadeth so many as cast their eyes vpon her to continencie and chastity. But a discovered dug, a naked brest, frizled locks, paintings, perfumes, and especially a rowling eye, and a lasciuious and vnchaste looke, are the forerunners of adultery. He that will not credite me, let him reade Tibullus, Propertius, and Ouid, who are of the same opinion. It may well bee said of such women, whose number is too great amongst vs, that they haue lost all shame: albeit the best dowie, the best inheritance and most precious iewel which a woman can haue, is to be shamefast. Yea the fortresse and defence that nature hath giuen to a woman for the preservation of her reputation, chastitie, and honour, is shame, whereof whensoever she maketh no account, she is vndone for euer. Socrates vsed to counsell those young men that beheld themselves in looking glasse, if they were hard fauoured to correct their deformitie with vertue, by making themselves vertuous: and if they were faire, not to blot their beauty with vice. In like manner it were very good, that when the married wife holdeth her looking glasse in her hand, she would speake thus to herselfe if she be foule: What then should become of me if I were also wicked? and if she be faire, How shall this be accounted of, if I continue honest and wise? For if a hard fauoured woman bee loued for her good behauiour and honest conditions, it is farre greater honour vnto her than if it were for beautie. Moreouer, a woman must haue a speciall care to bee silent, and to speake as seldome, as shee may, vnlesse it bee to her husband, or at his bidding: refering household wants affaires secret to her selfe, and not publish them abroad. Thus doing, if any euill, any reproach or dishonour come to the house through any of them that are within it, the fault will bee her husbands and not hers. Likewise a woman that respecteth her honour, ought to be ashamed to vtter any dishonest speeches, flouts, and iests, and no lesse ashamed to giue eare vnto them. For if she once giue herselfe to giuing, they that laughed at some little word of hers will after ward mocke the author thereof: seeing the honor of women is such a nice and chary thing, that it is not lawful for them so much as to thinke, much lesse to speake of many things, which men may freely both talke of and put in practise. Therefore those dames that minde to preserve their grauity, must bee silent not onely in vnlawfull but euen in necessary matters, vnlesse

vlesse it be very requisite that they should speake of them. To bee short, that woman that is borne to vertue, and purposeth to performe her dutie towards her husband, must please him in all honest things, and in such as draw neere to his inclination, she must loue him intirely, and esteeme of him aboue all others, shee must bee patient and know how to winkeat, and to beare with many things done by him, shee must be prudent to gouerne her house, skilfull in hufwifery to preferue her goods, carefull to bring vp her children, faire spoken and cur-teous to her neighbours, plentifull in honorable workes, a friend to honest companie, and a very great enemy to the lightnesse of youth. Moreover she must bestow as much time as she can steale from domesticall affaires, in the study of notable sayings, and of the morall sentences of ancient Sages and good men. And it were a seemely and honourable thing to heare a woman speake to her husband in this sort: Husband, you are my teacher, my gouernour and master in Philosophie, and in the knowledge of most excellent and heauenly sciences.
 For by such honest occupations women are withdrawne and turned aside from other vnworthy exercises, whereunto wee see them so apt and inclined nowadaies, which maketh them very offense, as plaies, dancing, masking, hunting, and discharging of harquebuzes, with such other dealings very vnmeet for their sexe. Whereas if in lieu of all these things a wife would imbrace the loue of knowledge, so farre forth as her wit and leasure require, and as her husband shall like of, she should be partaker not onely of the flowers and songs, but also of the fruits, which the Muses bring forth and bestow vpon them that loue letters and Philosophie: which will greatly helpe her towards the leading of a happy life with her husband. Now considering that loue is alwaies the well-spring of euery good duty, especially betweene those that are linked together by marriage, (which ought to be so great in regard of the wife, that the Ciuill law, and law of nations, will haue a woman follow her husband, although he haue neither fire nor place to resort vnto, or be banished and driuen from place to place) let vs here call to remembrance some notable examples of the great loue that hath beene in vertuous women towards their husbands, as well when they were aliue, as after their death, by refusing to ouer liue them. Queene Hipsicrates the wife of king Mitridates commeth first to minde, who bare such loue towards her husband, that polling her selfe for his sake (although shee was yong and very faire) shee acquainted her selfe with the wearing of armour, and rode with him to the warre. And when he was overcome by Pompey, she accompanied him in his flight through all Asia, whereby she mollified the griefe and sorrow which he receiued by his losse. Triara wife to Lucius Vitellus, brother to the Emperour Vitellus, seeing her husband in a dangerous battell, thrust her selfe amongst the soldiers to beare him com-panie, and to helpe him both in death and life, and fought as well as the valiantest amongst them. When king Admetus his wife saw her husband very sicke, and heard the answer of the Oracle, which was, that He could not recover except one of his best friends died for him, shee slue her selfe. When the wife of Ferdinando Goncales a prince of Italie, knew that her husband was prisoner, and in danger of death, she went to visite him, and putting on his apparell, abode in his place, whilest he being clothed in her garments saued himselfe. Zenobia Queene of Armenia, seeing her husband Radamis flie from a battell, and not being able to follow him because shee was great with childe, besought him to kill her. Which when he thought to haue done, she was stricken downe with the blow of a sword: but being taken of the enemy and thoroughly healed, Tyridates the king, who had vanquished her husband, married her afterward for the great loue that was in her. The princeesse Panthea loued her husband Abradatus so well, that when hee died in Cyrus campe, shee slue her selfe vpon his bodie. Artemisia Queene of Caria, for the great loue she bare to her husband that was dead, dranke all the ashes of his bodie, meaning thereby to bee his sepulcher. When Iulia the wife of Pompey sawe a gowne of her husbands all bloodie, wherewith he had offered some sacrifice, shee imagined that he was slaine, and so died presently after. When Porcia the wife of Brutus heard of her husbands death, and perceiued that her kinsfolks tooke away all meanes of killing her selfe, she drew hot burning coles out of the fire, and threw them into her mouth, which she closed
 so fast, that she was choked thereby. Sulpitia being carefully restrained by her mother Iulia from seeking her husband Lentulus in Sicilia, whither he was banished, she went thither being apparelled like a slave, banishing her selfe voluntarily rather than shee would forsake her husband. Ostania sister to Augustus, and wife to Antonius, notwithstanding the iniurie that her husband offered vnto her in preferring before her a Queene that was nothing so yong or faire as shee, bare such great loue towards him, that setting aside all intreatie of her brother, shee would neuer leave her husbands house, but still brought vp his children by his first marriage

A short sum of the dutie
of a wife.

A woman
must be desirous of knowledge.

Exercise vnseemely for women.

What great loue the law
of nations requireth in a wife towards her husband.
Examples of the great loue
of woman
towards their husbands.
Hipsicrates.

Triara.

The wife of Ferdinando.
Goncales.

Zenobia.

Panthea.

Artemisia.

Iulia.

Porcia.

Sulpitia.

Ostania.

marriage as carefully as if they had beene her owne. Moreover shee sought by all meanes to reconcile those two Emperours, saying, that it was an vnworthy thing, that two so mightie princes, the one for the euill intreaty of his sister, the other because hee was bewitched by a wicked woman, should warre one against another. As this vertuous princeesse had taken her journey as farre as Athens, where shee meant to take shipping, and to seeke out her husband being then in war with the Parthians, bringing with her souldiers, money, furniture and other munitions, he sent her word that shee should passe no farther, but stay for him at Rome. This shee performed, and sent him all the aboue named things, not seeming at all to be offended with him. Whereas he in the meane while skorned her, sporting himselfe with Cleopatra in the sight and knowledge of all men, and afterward dealt worse with her when the warre was begun betweene him and Augustus. For he sent a commandement to Othavia at Rome to go out of his house, which shee presently obeyed, albeit shee would not therefore forsake any of her husbands children, but wept and bewailed her mishap, which had brought her to bee a principall cause of that ciuill warre. Aria, the wife of Cecinna, followed in a little boate vnto Rome her husband, who was taken prisoner because he had borne armes against the Emperour Claudius. Being there condemned to die, shee would haue borne him company, but that her sonne in law and her daughter staied her. When shee saw that, shee strooke her head so hard against the wall, that shee fell downe amazed: and being come to her selfe againe, said vnto them: You see that you cannot hinder me from dying cruelly, if ye stay me from a more gentle death. They being astonished at the fact, and at her words, suffered her to do what she would: who then ran to the place where her husband was, and slue her selfe first, after shee had spoken thus couragiously vnto him: I am not, Cecinna, sorie for that which is done, but because the race of thy life must ende. When Seneca was condemned to die by Nero, and had libertie to choose what kind of death he would, he caused his veines to be opened in a bath: his wife Paulina of her owne accord did the like to her selfe in the same bath, mingling together their blood for a greater vnion and coronation of their long and perfect loue. Whereof Nero heeing aduertised, presently commanded that her veines should be stopt, constraining her thereby to liue a little longer in continuall griefe. Hipparchia, a very faire and rich woman, was so far in loue with the Philosopher Crates, who was hard fauoured and poore, that she married him against all her kinsfolkes mind, & followed him throughout all the countrie, being poorely apparelled and bare-foote, after the Cynicke fashion. Pisca seeing her husband pine away dayly through a great and strange disease, which he had concealed from her of long time, hauing at the length knowledge thereof, and perceiuing it to be incurable, she was moued with pitie for the euill which he suffered, whom shee loued better than her selfe: and thereupon counselled him with great courage to allwage his griefe by death, and the better to stir him vp thereunto, she offered to beare him company. Whereunto her husband agreeing, they embraced each other, and cast themselues headlong into the Sea from the top of a rock. The king of Persia taking prisoner the wife of Pandoerus, whom he had vanquished and slaine, would haue married her. But shee slue her selfe after she had vttered these words: God forbid, that to be a Queene, I should euer wed him that hath beene the murther of my deere husband Pandoerus. Camma, a Greekish woman of the countrie of Galatia, bare such loue to her husband, euen after his death, that to be reuenged of a great Lord called Synorix, who had put her husband to death, that he might marry her, shee gently denied him at the first when hee became a suter vnto her, but after, in processe of time shee consented thereunto. When they were come to the Temple of Diana to solemnize the marriage, before the altar shee powred forth a little of that drinke, which shee had prepared in a cup, and drinking part thereof, shee gaue the residue to Synorix to drinke. The liquor was made of water, honie, and poyson, mingled together. When shee saw that he had drunke all, shee fetched a great and lowd grone, and vling reuerence towards the Goddesse, said vnto her: I call thee to witnesse, that I haue not ouerliued Sinatus my husband, for any other intent than to see this day: neither haue I enioyed any good or pleasure in all this time, wherein I haue since liued, but onely in hope that one day I should be able to reuenge his death, which being now performed by me, I go cheerefully and with ioy vnto my husband. But as for thee most wicked man (quoth shee to Synorix) take order now, that thy friends and kinsfolkes, in stead of a wedding bed, prepare a buriall for thee. And so within a little while after, both of them ended their daies. Macrina, the wife of Torquatus, loued her husband so feruently, and was so sorrowfull for his absence, that for one yeares space, wherein hee was gone vpon a voyage, shee neuer went out of her house, nor looked out of her window. Wee may read that many women of Lacedæmonia, when their husbands were condemned to die for conspiring against their countrey, came one evening clothed in blacke to the prison, vnder colour to take their finall farewell of them: and changing their apparell, they couered their husbands with their veiles, who went out and left their wifes in their place, which sustaining the punishment due to others, were beheaded, contrary to humanity, not without great patience shewed on their behalfe. Histories are plentiful in shewing the great loue of women towards their husbands. Yea, I will not be afraid to speake it, men are farre inferiour vnto them in perfection of loue. Wherefore we will conclude that it is easier for them to be dutifull to their husbands, whom, as we haue already said, if they loue, esteeme, and honour, no doubt but they are the chiefe cause of all peace and concord in their families, and of the prosperous successe of their household affaires, to the quietnesse and contentation of their happie life, and to the immortall praise and honour of their good name.

Men are inferior to women in perfection of loue.

The end of the twelfth daies worke.

The thirteenth daies worke.

Of the dutie of the Head of a familie in other parts of the house, namely, in the Parentall, Masterly, and Possessorie part. Chap. 49.

A SER.

It is not without great shew of reason which many Philosophers maintaine, that the Oeconomical science, that is to say, the art of ruling a house well, is one of the chiefest parts of pollicy, which is the art of skilfull gouerning a great multitude of men. The reason is, because a Towne or Citie is nothing else but an assembly of many families and houses together, which will be very hard for one onely man to order well and iustly, if hee know not how to set that order in his family, which is necessary, and to guide it with sound reason and true prudence. Moreover, when families are well gouerned, no doubt but it goeth wel with the common-wealth, as we see, that the whole body is in good health, when euery seuerall member doth his duty. Now that we haue considered particularly of that which concerneth the first and principall part of a house, and of the mutuall duty of the husband and wife, I thinke (my Companions) we are to begin this daies worke with instructing our selues in that which the Head of a family ought to keepe and obserue in other parts of his house, mentioned before by vs, namely, his children, seruants, and possessions, seeing we are taught by the Apostle, that hee which prouideth not for his owne, and namely for them of his household, denieth the faith, and is worse than an Infidell.

The definition of Oeconomic and of Policie.

Euery head of a family must prouide for his household. 1. Tim. 5. 8.

AMANA. Euery house must bee ruled by the eldest, as by a king, who by nature commandeth ouer euery part of the house, and they obey him for the good preservation thereof.

ARAM. Euery man by right (saith Homer) hath rule ouer his wife and children; hee is not worthy to haue any, that wanteth sufficient vertue and prudence to gouerne them well. Goeto then (ACHITO B) let vs learne of thee what belongeth to the parts of a house now mentioned by vs.

AHCITO B. Anacharsis, one of the wisemen of Græcia, said, that a house is not to bee called good, because it is well built, and of good stufte, but men must iudge thereof by that which is within, and which belongeth to the house, as namely, by the children, wife, and seruants: with whom, beeing wise and well qualified, if the father of a family communicateth and imparteth of that which hee hath, whether it bee in the bottome of a caue, or vnder the shade of a bough, he may be said to dwell in a good and happy house. Therefore it is no small happinesse and felicitie for them that are called to the government of a family, when they see it wise and well nurtured in euery part. But as nerues and sinewes, being the instruments of sense and motion, proceede and are arriued from the head, which by them infuseth into all parts

What maketh a house to bee called good.

A good order
in a house proceedeth from the head of the familie.
Where a housholder must begin to rule
his house well

The progresse
of a family
before it come to perfection.

What a hous-
holder must first looke
vnto.
Goods are instruments tending to the maintenance
of life.
Two sorts of
goods.
What interest
a Father of a family hath in his goods.

Two sorts of getting goods

The end of
arts, sciences,
and trafficke.

Biting vsury a detestable
gaine.
Why mony
was first in-uented and vted.

parts of the body, the Animal spirit, without which the body could not exercise any naturall function of the sense and moouing: so the parts of a house commonly receiue the habite of manners and conditions from the father of a family, as from the head thereof: but then especially, when hee is prudent and wise, and imploiet his care, diligence and industrie thereupon. Therefore a good housholder must begin the right government of his house at himselfe, by letting his household see, that hee is prudent, chaste, sober, peaceable, but chiefly religious and godly: as also by bringing forth plentifull fruites of his duty towards those that are vnder his charge. For as the anger and threatnings of the head of a family astonisheth his children and seruants, so his good workes hearteneth them on to doe well. Now, because there is variety of houses, whose difference is commonly taken from the goods and ability of men, which abound to some, and are wanting to others, I will propound heere, as my purpose and meaning was before, a meane house, in all points perfect and as we vse to say, neither poor: nor rich, from which notwithstanding both great and small may draw instruction for their government. Wee haue already seene, that a house is diuided into foure part, whereof the coniugall or wedlocke part hath bene already handled by vs. Now wee must consider of the other three, and I meane of the Parentall, Masterly, and Possessory parts. And I thinke it will bee best to follow that order which is most vsuall in the perfection and progresse of marriage, and in the accomplishment of a house, which both before and after the consummation of marriage, is first compounded of the goods and wealth of men: next of men seruants and maide seruants: and lastly, it is made absolute and perfect by those children which God sendeth. The Possessory part then is that which we call immoveable goods, immoveables, and such goods as moue of themselves. This part of a house (as Aristotle saith) belongeth so to Oeconomie, that it should goe before it, and serue it, to the ende that victuals, and other necessarie goods, might not bee wanting in the house: wherein otherwise (saith the same Philosopher) a man cannot liue, much lesse liue well. For as in arts that haue their limits determined, it is necessary that conuenient and proper instruments bee had to finish their worke: so must it be in Oeconomie, in which goods are instruments seruing to maintaine life: and to possesse goods, is nothing else but to haue a multitude of instruments seruing that action wherein life consisteth. Wee may diuide all these goods into two principall kindes: namely, into those that come from the father to the sonne by succession, which wee call Patrimony, and those that are gotten by industry and labour. It is the duty of the father of a familie to preferue that for his, which his predecessors left him, to haue the vse therof onely as they had, and to vse them well, as a faithfull guardian and disposer of those goods which God giueth for the succour and profit of his creatures. Yea, from that day wherein he taketh a Wife, and much more when hee hath children, hee must thinke that hee is no more Lord of his goods, but onely a Tutor: and that if they should be wasted or lost through his negligence, he were no lesse faulty than hee that should steale them. Secondly, hee must increase his Patrimony by trauell, care, and good husbandry: hee must get goods for his family, by iust and ciuill meanes, obseruing decency and honesty in all things. After the first functions of a holy and Christian duty, which are to goe before, and to be ioyned inseparably to all the actions of life, as elsewhere wee haue handled, and shall see more hereafter: wee finde two sorts of getting, the one naturall, the other artificiall. The naturall way consisteth in pasturing, or feeding of cattell, in tillage, in hunting and fishing, vnto which we may say, that an honest prey and booty, agreeable to nature, is ioyned, if it bee practised in iust and lawfull warres. Hereunto also is referred the vent and sale of his increase, that those things which are sold, and whereof wee haue abundance, may procure vs from elsewhere such other things as we want. The artificiall kinde of getting, consisteth in workes, arts, handicrafts, trafficke, and merchandize, exercised for gaine. The ende of which kinde of getting ought to bee as well publike profit as priuate. Therefore whatsoever is grounded vpon domesticall profit onely in this second sort of acquisition, is to bee auoided and misliked. For whereas it was first brought in of necessity to helpe men to liue, this were craftily to turne it to another ende, and to apply it onely to one private mans gaine, not without the oppressing and detriment of our neighbour, for whose benefit a man must labour no lesse than for his owne. Amongst filthy gaines, Vsury is most to be misliked and most detestable, which the Hebrewes call biting, and which doth not onely gnaw the debtor to the bones, but also sucketh out all the blood and marrow from the bones, engendring money of money, contrary to nature, and to that intent for which money was first brought in: namely, that exchange might bee made of such things as are vnealie to be transported, and that the commodity of trafficke might bee continued for publike profit. Now

adaies

adaies there is no trade so common, as that of vsury: although it bee altogether reprooued by the lawes of God and men. And surely wee haue a goodly cloake to couer the shame thereof, I meane the name of ^{*} interest, or profite of money, when as it hath beene alwaies vnpleasant in the sight of God who forbiddeh al kind of Vsury whatsoever it be, and therefore it ought not to haue any place amongst men that liue vprightly. There was a law amongst the auncient Grecians and Romanes, which forbadde all vsury surmounting one penny for a hundred in the yeare, and they called it Vnciary Vsury. If any Vsurer tooke greater profite, he was condemned to restore fourefold: because (as Cato saith) they iudged, that a Vsurer was a more wicked and vile man than a theefe, who was condemned but in double as much. Againe, this law was since that brought to a halfe penny a yeare among the Romanes, and not long after, Vsury was cleane taken away by the law of Genutia, because of vsuall seditions which arose through the contempt of lawes concerning Vsurie. Whereupon, wee may note, that what moderation soeuer is appointed in Vsury, if men bee suffered to take neuer so little, they will ascend to the highest degree of all. Therefore we must conforme our selues to the law of God, which taketh away all liberty herein so plainly from vs, that it cannot be called in question. Concerning arts exercised for gaine, although there are some of them very vile and contemptible, yet those also after a sort respect publike profite. But those arts wherein there is more prudence, or no small commodity, as Physicke, Architecture, and other points of knowledge in liberall arts and sciences, are honest and seemely for them that exercise them according to their estate. Now in all these diuers sorts of getting, and in many others about which men are but too diligent, husbandry is very commendable. yea, nothing is more fruitfull, nothing more pleasant, nothing more woorthy and becoming a free man, and nothing more agreeable to nature. Wee will not therefore touching this part of a house, called Possessory, that it belongeth to the duty of a father of a familie to attend diligently to his house, carefully to provide for his familie whatsoever is needfull and necessary for it, and to preserve for the same that which is already gotten onley by well vsing the possession thereof. This is that which is signified by the Greeke word γεννατικός, or good husbandry: which is as much to say, as industry in getting goods, and discreete gouernment in spending them to good purpose. And truly he that hath no care ouer his goods and household, will bee easily perswaded to liue vniustly, and to take that which belongeth to another. For sloth and vnwillingnes to doe any thing, is the beginning and wellspring of all iniustice. And so, whilest a good father of a familie laboureth to profite euery one, hee must also bee carefull for himselfe and his. Let vs now come to the second part of a house, called the masterly part, which comprehendeth vnder it men seruants and maid seruants. If prudence and reason are most necessary in all parts of house keeping, their effects are well woorth the noting, and to be desired in this part, of which we will now intreat. For power and authority are of themselves too surly and imperious in him that knoweth not how to repressse them wisely, yea, they are easily turned into intolerable arrogancy, if the bridle of reason restrain them not. Therefore seeing we liue in a free country, wherein the auncient absolute power of life and death ouer slaues hath no place, they, to whom God hath graunted this fauour to excell and to goe before others, whether it bee in gifts of nature, or in graces of the soule, or otherwise in the goods of fortune, they, I say, must in no wise contemne those that seeme to haue beene forgotten and stripped of all these good things. Besides, a father of a familie must consider, that he ruleth not slaues but free persons. Therefore he must vse their seruice, although not frankly for nothing, yet as that which cometh from a willing and free mind, not dealing roughly with them vpon euery occasion, but rather handling them gently, as the creatures of God made after his image, seeing the poorest man is created for the selfe same principall end that the mightiest and richest is. Aristotle graunteth this, that although a Master is not bound in any respect to his Vassall, so farre foorth as he is a Vassall, yet because slaues are men, he is of opinion, that all lawes of humanity ought to be kept with them. What then ought we to doe such as submit themselves freely vnto vs, to whom also we are vnited and linked by Christian charity, as as to brethren, and inheritors of the same goods and promises? And yet wee see that masters fall into bitter anger, cry out, offer outrage, vse violence, and lay hands on their seruants vpon small or no occasion at all, as if they were vnreasonable creatures, yea handling them woorse then they doe their brute beasts. That this is true, wee see not one of them but he hath great care that his horses bee well fedde, dailie looked vnto, harnessed and decked. Besides, hee taketh great heede that they bee not tired, nor overlaboured, but as for their seruants they

The question of Interest hath weighry reason on both sides. An ancient law against vsurie.

The law Genutia fobad all vsurie.

Exod. 22. 25.
Deut. 23. 19.

The praise of husbandry.

What good husbandry is.

Of the Masterly part of a house.

Instructions touching the duty of a master towards her seruants.

The poore & rich are both created to one end.

Against rigorous masters.

Two properties requisite
in a master.

Servants
must not be defrauded of their pay.

Of the Pa-
rentall part of a house.
The difference betweene commanding over a wife & over
children.
The word Father is a kingly and sacred title.

Youth is the seede of the common
wealth.

they neither spare nor comfort them one whit, nor haue any respect to their ease and rest. For mine owne part, I thinke that such masters deserue rather to be seized vpon, as mad men, than admonished as sociable persons. I wish therefore, that every master of a house had these two properties in him: namely, that with all clemencie and meekenesse hee would vse the seruice and obedience of them that are vnder him, by considering of them with reason, and by looking rather to the good affection and desert of his seruant, than to the great and profitable seruice, which he draweth from him. The other point is, that the master vsing the sweate and seruice of his, should not seeme to be displeased, testie, or hard content, but rather alwaies shew forth a gentle kinde of fauour and curtesie, or at least a seuerer familiaritie, seasoned with a cheerefull and merrie countenance. Whosoever shew themselves to bee such men, besides the glory which they shall obtaine by being taken generally for gentle and curteous men, their household seruants will loue them the more, and will reuerence them as their fathers, not standing in such awe and feare of them, as men commonly doe of intollerable tyrants. Moreover, as this assembly of a master and of seruants tendeth, as euery other societie also, vnto some good end, the master hauing regard to that which concerneth him and his house, and his seruants to the hope of profit and commoditie; order must be taken, that they, which haue with all carefulnesse discharged their dutie, and yeelded that fidelitie and diligence that is requisite to their superiour, be not defrauded of the price, reward, hire, and desert of their trauels. For if wee thinke it great villanie to rob another man, let vs esteeme it nothing lesse to keepe backe the fruit of life, and to defraude the labours, perils, watchings, and excessive cares of our seruants, in not recompencing them. Therefore concerning this part of a house, called the masterly part, wee will note this, that as the Ancients made their slaues free, thereby to draw from them voluntarie and vnconstrained seruice, and to deliuer themselves of that feare and distrust, which they alwaies had of their slaues, accounting that prouerbe true: As many enemies as slaues: so ought we to bring vp and to nourish our hired and mercinarie seruants which serue vs in these daies, with a free and liberall kind of loue, by dealing gratiouly with them, by perswading them with reason, and by rewarding them liberally: and this will induce them to serue, honour, and esteeme vs, as if our weale and wo were wholly common with them. The last part of the house remaineth now to be intreated of, which is the perfection thereof, and is called the Parentall part, comprehending vnder it, the Father and Mother, or one of them, with the children. The head of a familie (saith Aristotle) commandeth ouer wife and children, but ouer both, as free persons, and yet not after one and the same maner of commanding, but ouer the wife, according to gouernment vsed in a popular state, and ouer the children, royally or prince like. This commandement ouer the children, is called royall, because he that begetteth, commandeth by loue, and by the prerogative of age, which is a kind of kingly commanding. Therefore Homer called Iupiter the father of men and of the gods, that is, king of all. For a king must excell by nature, and must be of the same kind, as it is with the aged in respect of the yonger sort, and with him that begetteth in regard of his childe, ouer whom he ought to be as carefull, as a king is ouer his subiects. Vnto this part of the house a father of a family must haue a carefull eie, because hereupon chiefly dependeth the honour and quietnesse of his house, & the discharge of his dutie towards God and his countrie: namely, by making his children honest and of good conditions. As the desire and pricke of nature (saith Dion) driueth vs forward to beget children: so is it a testimonie of true loue and charitie, to bring them vp, and to intreate them after a free maner, and to instruct them well. Therefore a Father of a family shall satisfie his duty concerning this part of a house, by the good education and instruction of his children, and by exercising them in vertue. For manners and conditions are qualities imprinted in vs by long tract of time, and vertues are gotten by custome, care, and diligence. Hereafter wee are to consider more amply and particularly of the instruction of youth, and therefore at this time wee shall content our selues with the giuing of certaine generall precepts, worthy to bee diligently obserued of euery good Father of a family towards his children. For in vaine (saith Plato) doth hee hope for a haruest, that hath beene negligent in sowing. I say, he must bee passing carefull, and imploy all possible labour, that his children and youth may bee well instructed, because they are the seede corne of the citie: in somuch that carefull heede is to bee had euen of their words, gestures, sports, and other actions, that nothing may leadethem vnto vice. For otherwise if no reckoning be made of this age, a man shall labour no lesse in vaine to prescribe good lawes for them after ward, than the Physitian doth that ministreth plenty of medicines to a diseased partie that that keepeth no diet at all. The best gifts of nature, if they bee not well trimmed and looked vnto, become naught at the first, and afterward passing euill. Therefore a father of a familie ought not to bee more carefull of any thing than of the bringing vp of his children according to whose good or euill education, the whole house will bee gouerned. This first institution of their life from the first age, is called discipline, which by little and little leadeth the spirit of the childe to the loue of vertue, even of that vertue, whereby beeing come to mans estate, hee knoweth both how to commaund, and how to obey, and to follow after nothing but that which the law commaundeth and affirmeth to be good. The vices of children are swords which passeth through the hearts of their fathers, who are for the most part the cause of them through their negligence in correcting them, & ouer great liberty which they grant to this age that needeth a stay and bridle, yea spurres, whereby to be broken and made tractable, as men vse to deale with young Colts. Therefore Plato said, that it is not in our owne power to cause our children to be borne such as we would haue them, but yet that it lieth in vs to make them good. Whereunto this will be a good meane, if from their young yeares we imprint in their hearts a loue, feare, and reuerence of vs. For if these things concur not together in the childe's heart, he will neuer yeeld due obedience to his father. Pythagoras said that a prudent father was better to beliked than a cholerick, because prudence serueth to procure loue and good will in those that ought to obey: whereas choler maketh them odious that commaund, and causeth their admonitions to profite but little. For this cause Aristotle requireth perfection of morall vertue in a father of a familie, saying: that his office is a kinde of building, and that reason is as it were the builder, by whome hee guideth and bringeth that Oeconomical worke to his perfection. And indeede the Ancients tooke great pains in teaching their children themselves, not suffering them to be far from their presence during their youth, because they iugded (and that vpon good reason) that sonne like respect and loue were good prickcs to driue them forward to the study of vertue. And no doubt but if a skilfull Father would execute this duty of instructing his childe in knowledge and learning, hee would conceiue and take it a great deale better of him than of any other. Therefore Marcus, Portius, Cato, would needs beschoole master to his owne children, which institution did greatly auaille them, not so much because he was Cato, as because he was their father, whose vertue they imitated. Iulius Caesar adopted his nephew Octavian, and brought him vp himselfe. Which did him so much good, that beeing come to the Empire, hee was called Augustus for his goodnes. He also performed as much afterward to his nephews Lucius and Caius, whom in like manner, he had adopted. Noah, Lot, Iacob, and all the fathers, instructed their children themselves: and God commaunded the Israelites in the wilderness to teach their children the Law, which themselves had receiued from their fathers. To this purpose an ancient man saide, that it was the greatest sloth that could be, for a man to be negligent towards his children, and to teach them nothing. Great heed therefore must be taken, that they be not left to the gouernment of their owne fantasie, considering that youth is very tender to resist vice, and of it self vn capable of counsel. Withhold not (saith the wise man) correction from the childe: for in smiting with the rodde, thou shalt deliuer his soule from hell. He that spareth his rodde hateth his son, but he that loueth him, chasteneth him betime. As an vntamed horse becometh fierce: so a child suffered to doe what hee list, waxeth rebellious. If thou bring vp thy sonne delicately, hee shall make thee afraid, and if thou play with him, hee shall bring thee to heauines. Giue him no libertie in his youth and wink not at his folly. Bow downe his necke while he is yong, & beate him on the sides while he is a child, least he waxe stubborne, and be disobedient vnto thee, & so bring sorrow to thy hart. And yet I would not that fathers should be ouer sharpe and hard to their children, not bearing with any fault in them. But as phisitions mingling and steeping their bitter drugs with some sweete iuice, haue found the meanes to make a passage for profite through the middest of pleasure: so must fathers intermingle the sharpenes of their reprehensions and corrections with the facility of clemency, and sometime let loose a little the bridle to the desires of their children, so that they wander not farre from that which becommeth them. Againe they must by and by let downe the button, and holde them harde in with the bridle, but yet supporting gently and patiently their faults committed through youth, and not of malice. And if it be so that they cannot but be angry, at the least let their anger be presently appeased, For it is better that a father should be quickly angry (although that it be an imperfection) so that he be soone pacified, than to be slow to anger and hardly brought to forgiue. But if a father be so seuer that he will forget nothing, & be neuer reconciled, it is a great argument that he hateth his children. And then he maketh

The gifts of vertue are soone corrupted.

A father must be loued, feared, and reuerenced of his children.

The office of a father resembled to buildings.

A child will learne better of this father than of any other.

M. Caro.
I. Caesar.

Augustus.
Noah, Lot, Iacob, &c.
God commaunded fathersto instruct their children.

Prou. 23. 13.
14. & 13. 24.
Correction necessary for children.
Ecclus. 30. 8.
9. 11. 12.

Seuerity must be mingled with clemency in the correcting of children.

The fathers life must be a mirror of ver-
tue to the childe.

When fathers
may be iustly charged with their childrens faults.

1. Sam. 2. 13.
The storie of a father appointed to execute his own
childe.
A father must bring vp his children in mutuall loue.

Ælius Tubero

Eph. 6. 9.

himselfe vnworthy of so excellent and diuine a name, shewing forth effects cleane contrary thereunto whereas parents commonly loue their children too much, and vse towards them rather too much lenitie, than iust seuerity. Oh how the father (saith Seneca, speaking of one that thrust his sonne out of his house) cutteth off his limmes with great grieve, how many sighs he fetcheth in cutting them off, and how earnestly he wisheth to haue them againe in their place? Moreover, fathers must haue a speciall care, that they commit no fault, nor omit any thing appertaining to their duty, to the ende they may be liuely examples to their children, that looking into their life, as into a cleare glasse, they may abstaine after their example from speaking any thing that bringeth shame. Again we know, that all those fathers which leade an euill life, leaue not to themselves any courage so much as to reprove their slaues onely, so farre off are they, that they can frankly chide their children. And which is woorst of all, by their naughty life they are vnto them in stead of Masters and counsellors of ill doing. For where old men are shamelesse, there it must needes be, that young men become impudent and graceles. Fathers therefore must strue to doe whatsoever their duty requireth, that their children may waxe wise and well quallified. This wee may comprehend in few words: namely, if they bring them vp well in their infancie, and let them haue due correction in their youth. Which two things being neglected of fathers, the faults of their children are for the most part iustly imputed vnto them. Hely the Priest was not punished for any sinne which himselfe had committed, but because hee winked at the sinnes of his children. Wee reade in the storie of the Heluitians or Switzers, of the iudgement of a tyrant condemned to death, where order was taken that the execution thereof should bee done by the father, who was the cause of his euill education: that hee might come to his death by the author of his life, and that the father might in some sort bee punished for his negligence used towards his child. Moreover, they that haue many children must bee passing carefull to bring them vp in mutuall friendship, causing them to giue each to other that honour and duty, vnto which nature bindeth them, and sharply chaffising those that in any respect offend therein. The Ephories of Lacedæmonia long since condemned a notable citizen in a very great summe, when they vnder stood that he suffered two of his children to quarrell together. The best meane which I find to auoide so great an euill, is to loue and intreate them all alike, and to accustome them to giue honour, dutie, and obedience one to another according to their degrees of age. They must remooue from them all partialities and not suffer them to haue any thing seuerall or deuided one from another, that as it were in one heart and will all things may bee common amongst them. Example hereof was that good father of a familie Ælius Tubero, who had sixteene children of his owne body, all of them married, and dwelling all in one house with their children, and liuing with him in all peace and concord. For the conclusion therefore of our present discourse, we learne, that a father of a family must begin the gouernment of his house with himselfe, and become an example to his of all honestie and vertue. That he must not neglect the care of providing goods, and necessary meanes for the maintenance of his family, remembring alwaies that in nothing he go beyond the bounds of that seemlines & decency, which duty hath limited, and prescribed vnto him. That he ought to loue and to intreate his seruants curteously, putting away threatnings, (as it is said in the Scripture) and knowing that both their and his master is in heaven, with whom there is no respect of persons. And for the last point, that it belongeth to his duty to bring vp his children in the holy instruction and information of the Lord, not prouoking them to wrath, that God may be glorified, and he their father may reioyce in the presence of his friends, and that his countrey generally may receiue benefit, profit, and commoditie.

Of the dutie of children towards their parents: of the mutuall loue that ought to be among brethren: of the dutie of seruants towards their masters. Chap. 50.

ACHIL-
TOB.

Vpon a day when one said in the hearing of Theopompus king of Sparta, that the estate of that city was preserued in such flourishing manner, because the kings knew how to commaund well, the Prince replied that it was not so much for that cause, as because the citizens knew how to obey well. And to speake the truth, to obey Obedience is well (as also the vertue of commanding) is a great vertue, and proceedeth from a nature, which a great vertue. beeing noble of it selfe is holpen by good education. Therefore Aristotle said, that it was necessary that he which obeieth should be vertuous as well as he that commandeth. Now seeing we haue intreated of the duty of a father and head of a familie, exercising his office vpon all the parts of his house, let vs now consider of the duty and obedience that is requisite in seruants and children, and of the mutuall & reciprocall amity which ought to be between brethren, desirous to preferue the bond of Oeconomical society in a happy estate.

A SER. Children (saith the Scripture) obey your parents in all things: for that is well pleasing vnto the Lord. Honour thy father and mother (which is the first commandment with promise) that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest live long on earth.

A MAN A. Who so honoreth his father, his sinnes shall bee forgiven him, and he shall abstaine from them, & shall haue his daily desires. And he that honoreth his mother, is like one that gathereth treasure. And you seruants be subiect to your masters with all feare, not onely to the good and courteous, but also to the forward. Let vs then heare ARAM discourse more at large of that which is here propounded vnto vs.

ARAM. Nature (saith Plutarke) and the law which preserveth nature, hath giuen the first place of reuerence and honour after God, vnto the father and mother: and men cannot doe any seruice more acceptable to God, than graciously and louingly to pay to their parents that begotte them, and to them that brought them vp, the vsury of new and olde graces which they haue lent them: as contrariwise, there is no signe of an Atheist more certaine, than for a man to set light by, and to offend his parents. The father is the true image of the great and soueraign God, the vniuersall Father of all things, as Proclus the Academicke saide. Yea the child holdeth his life of the Father next after God, and whatsoever else he hath in this world. Therefore a man is forbidden to hurt others, but it is accounted great impiety and sacriledge for a man not to shew himselfe ready to doe and to speake all things, I will not say, whereby they can receiue no displeasure, but whereby they may not receiue pleasure. And indeed one of the greatest good turnes that wee can doe to those of whom wee are descended, is not to make them sad. Which cannot possibly be done, if God the leader & guid to all knowledge, disposeth not the mind to all honest things. The children of wisdom are the Church of the righteous, and their offspring is obedience and loue. Children beare the iudgement of your father, and doe thereafter, that you may bee safe. For the Lord will haue the father honoured of the children, and hath confirmed the authority of a mother ouer the children. Hee that honoureth his father shall haue ioy of his owne children, and when hee maketh his prayer hee shall bee heard. Hee that honoureth his father shall haue long life, and hee that is obedient to the Lord, shall comfort his mother. Hee that feareth the Lord, honoureth his parents, and doth seruice vnto his parents, as vnto Lords. Honour thy father and mother indeede and in word, and in all patience, that thou mayest haue the blessing of God, and that his blessing may abide with thee in the ende. For the blessing of the father establisheth the house of the children, and the mothers curse rooteth out the foundations. Helpe thy father in his age, and grieue him not as long as he liueth. And if his vnderstanding faile, haue patience with him, and despise him not when thou art in thy full strength. For the good intreatie of thy father shall not bee forgotten, but it shall bee a fortresse for thee against sinnes. In the day of trouble thou shalt bee remembered, thy sinnes also shall melt away, as the ice in faire weather. He that forsaketh his father shall come to shame, and hee that angreth his mother is cursed of God. By these holy speeches wee see how we ought to loue, honor, reuerence, and feare our parents. This is comprehended vnder the first commandment of the second table, and this onely of all the tenne articles of the Decalogue beareth his reward with him, albeit no recompence is due to him that is bound to doe any thing, namely, by so straight a bond as this whereof all lawes both diuine and humane are full, and the law of nature also doth plentifully instruct vs therein, as it hath beene diligently obserued of very Infidels, Ethnikes, and Pagans. Amongst the Lacedemonians this custom took place, that the younger sort rose vp from their seats before the aged. Whereof when one asked the cause of Teleucus. It is (quoth he) to the end that in doing this honor to whom it belongeth not, they should learne to yeeld great honor to their parents. The arrogancy of a child was the cause that one of the Ephorians published the Law of Testaments, whereby it was permitted to euery one from that time forward to appoint who he would his heire. This law serued well to make children obedient & seruiceable to their parents, & to cause them to be afraid of displeasing them. Among the Romanes the childe was not admitted to pleade his fathers will after his death by way of action, but only by waie of request, vsing very humble, honorable, & reuerent spech of his dead father, and leauing his whole matter to the discretion and religion of the iudges. Contend not with thy father (saide Pittacus the wise) although thou halt in cause of complaint: And therefore Teleucus answered aptly to on, who complained vnto him, that his father

Col. 3. 20.

Eph. 6. 2.

Obedience to parenta commanded of

God. ambr

Eccles. 3. 45.

1. Pet. 2. 18.

Obedience to masters commanded of

God.

Reuerence to parents placed

next to the honor due to

God. ambr

A token of an Atheist.

A father is

the image of

God.

The fifth co-

mandement

only hath a

speciall promise annexed

vnto it.

Eph. 6. 2.

The law of Testaments to keep children

in awe.

Children

might not sue

out their liue-

ries by way of

action but of request.

alwaies

The duty of children towards their parents.

Humilitie towards parents most commendable. The description of a disobedient child.

The mother is no lesse to be honoured than the father.

The blessings and cursings of parents towards their children is of great waight. Torquatus.

An example of great loue in a childe towards his father.

Another of a daughter towards her father.

Children can not please their parents better than to loue one another.

alwaies speake ill of him : If (quoth hee) there were no cause to speake ill of thee he would not doe it. So that it belongeth to the duty of a child to beleue that his father hath alwaies right, and that age and experience hath endued him with greater knowledge of that which is good, than they that are of yonger yeares. Philelpbus said, that although wee could not possibly render the like good turnes to our parents, nor satisfie those obligations by which wee stand bound vnto them, yet wee must do the best we can vnto them : wee must intreate them curteously and louingly, and not goe farre from them : wee must hearken vnto their instructions, and bee obedient to their commandements : wee must not gaine-say their deliberations and wils, no more than the will of God, whether it bee that wee are to depart from them, or to tarry still, or to enter into some calling agreeable to the will of God : wee must not stand in contention with them when they are angry, but suffer and beare patiently, if they threaten or correct vs. And if they bee offended with vs when wee thinke there is no cause why, yet wee must not lay vs downe to rest before wee haue by all kinde of honest submissions appeased them. Humilitie is alwaies commendable, but especially towards our parents. The more wee abase our selues before them, the more wee increase in glory and honour, before God and men. This is very badly put in vre at this day, when the sonne doth not onely not honour his father, but euen dishonoureth him, and is ashamed of him. Hee is so farre from louing him, that hee rather hateth him, so farre from fearing him, that contrariwise hee mocketh and contemneth him : and in stead of seruing and obeying him, hee riseth vp and conspireth against him. If hee bee angry, hee laboureth to anger him more : briefly, scarce any duty of a childe towards his father is seene now adayes. And if some priot thereof be found in any towards his father, yet it is cleane put out in regard of the mother : as if hee that commanded vs to honour our father did not presently say, and thy mother, vnto whom in truth wee owe no lesse honour, respect, and obedience, than to our father, as well in regard of the commandement of God, as of the vnspeakeable paines and travell which shee suffered in bearing and bringing vs into the world, in giuing vs sucke, and in nourishing vs. But alas, what shall wee say of those that spoile their parents of their goods, houses and commodities, and desire nothing more than their death, that they may freely-enioy, euen that which oftentimes their parents haue purchased for them ? O execrable impiety ! It is vnworthy to bee once thought vpon amongst vs, & the iudgement of God doth of it selfe sufficiently appeare vpon such cursed children. Whose behaviour that it may bee more odious vnto vs, let vs learne of Pittacus, that our children will bee such towards vs as wee haue beene towards our parents. But let vs bee more afraid to prouoke our fathers in such sort through our default vnto wrath, that in stead of blessing vs, they fall to curse vs. For (as Plato saith) there is no praier which God heareth more willingly than that of the father for the children. And therefore speciall regard is to bee had vnto the cursings and blessings, which fathers lay vpon their children. Which was the cause (as the Scripture teacheth vs) that children in old time were so iealous one of another who should carrie away the fathers blessing, and that they stood in greater feare of their curse, than of death it selfe. Torquatus the younger beeing banished from his fathers house, flue himselfe for griefe thereof. And to alleadge another example out of the writings of ancient men, of the loue which they bare to their fathers, that of Antigonus the second sonne of Demetrius, is most worthy to bee noted. For when his father beeing prisoner sent him word by one of his acquaintance to giue no credite, nor to make account of any letters from him, if it so fell out that Seleucus, whose prisoner hee was, should compell him thereunto, and therefore that hee should not deliuer vp any of those Townes which hee held : Antigonus contrariwise wrote to Seleucus, that hee would yeeld vp vnto him all the lands hee had vnder his obedience, and would also himselfe become his pledge, if hee would deliuer his father. Wee may not heere passe over with silence the rare example of daughter-like piety, with which all the painters in the world haue set forth their science, I meane of the daughter that gaue sucke to her father who was condemned to die of that ancient and vsuall punishment of famine, which neuer suffereth a sound man to passe the seauenth day. The iailour espying this act of piety gaue notice thereof to the magistrates, which beeing knowne to the people, the daughter obtained pardon for her fathers life. Moreover, seeing wee must labour to obey and to please our parents in all things, it is certaine that no action, gift or disposition in vs is more acceptable, or contenteth them better than to see good will, and an assured and certaine friendship among brethren. Which may easily bee knowne by these contrarie signes. For if parents are offended when their children offer wrong to a seruant whom they loue, and if hearty olde men are grieved when no account is made of a dogge or horſe bredde in their houſe, and are vexed when they ſee their children mocke and deſpiſe thoſe paſtimes, ſtories, and other ſuch like things which they ſometime loued, is it likely that they could patiently abide to ſee their children whom they loue beſt of all, to hate one another, to be alwaies quarrelling one with another, to ſpeak ill one of another, and in all their enterpriſes and actions to bee diuided, and ſet one againſt another, and to ſeek to ſupplant and deſeate each other? I thinke no man will affirme it. Therefore contrariwiſe we may iudge, that thoſe brethren which loue and cheriſh one another, which ioine together in one bond of ſelfe ſame wiſe, ſtudies and affections, that which nature had diſioyned and ſeparated in bodies, and laſtly, which haue all their talke, exerciſes, plaies, and paſtimes common amongſt them, they I ſay vndoubtedly giue occaſion to their parents of a ſweete and happy contentation in their old age for this brotherly friendſhip. For no father (ſaith Plutarke) euer loued learning, honour or ſiluer ſo much as he did his children. And therefore they neuer tooke ſo great pleaſure to ſee their children good orators, rich, or placed in great office, and dignities, as to ſee them loue one another. To this purpoſe one rehearſeth that Apollonida mother to king Eumenes and to three other of his brethren, accounted her ſelfe happy as ſhee ſaid, and gaue great thanks to God, not for her riches or principality, but becauſe ſhee ſaw her three yonger ſonnes, as it were a gard to their elder brother, who liued freely and moſt ſafely in the middeſt of them with their ſwords by their ſides, and and their iauelins in their hands. Contrariwiſe, when king Xerxes perceiued, that his ſonne Ochus lay in waite for his brethren to put them to death, hee died for diſpleaſure thereof. Therefore Enripides ſaid, that warres betweene brethren are grieuous, but moſt of all to their parents: becauſe he that hateth his brother and cannot abide to looke vpon him, muſt needs alſo be offended with him that begat him, and her that bare him. Whereas good children that loue one another for the loue of their parents, are ſo much the more prouoked to loue and honour them, ſaying and thinking alwaies with themſelues, that they are bound vnto them for many cauſes, but chiefly in regard of their brethren, who are vnto them as precious, pleaſant and gracious an inheritance as any they could receiue from them. This meant Homer to teach vs when he brought in Telemachus reckoning this amongſt his calamities, that Iupiter had ended the race of his father in him, and had not giuen him a brother. Let vs not then doubt, but that this is a certaine demonſtration to the parents that their childe loveth them, when he loveth his brethren. And this alſo ſerueth for as great an example and inſtruction to his children to loue one another, as any can be. Therefore let vs vnterly baniſh away all hatred of our brethren, which is both condemned by God who commendeth aboue all things conſcorde vnto vs, and alſo a naughty nurſe for the olde age of fathers and mothers, and a worſe for the yong yeares of children. And ſeeing wee are about this matter of brotherly loue, ſo precious and excellent, whereunto now adaiies men haue ſo ſmall regard, I thinke we ought to inſiſt and ſtand longer vpon it, and alledge ſome precepts and examples of ancient men, whereby to confirme vs in it more and more. Firſt, nature hath bred from from our birth in regard of vs the beginning and occaſion of this amity, and hath taken away from our iudgement all former motions, to procure loue. Therefore wee muſt beware that we ſeek not too exactly after the faults and imperfections one of another, but couer and beare with them, becauſe they are of our owne blood: knowing that no mans life can be ſincere and cleane from all vice, ſo that we were better to ſupport the domeſticall imperfections of our brethren, than to make triall of thoſe that are in ſtrangers. That brother (ſaith Plutarke) that warreth with his brother, and ſeeketh to procure a ſtranger to friend, ſeemeth to me to cut off voluntarily a member of his owne fleſh belonging to him, that hee may applie and faſten to that place one taken from another mans body. Wee note alſo that nothing more preſerueth the loue of brethren, than to haue the ſame common friends. For ſeueral familiarity, conuerſation and company keeping turneth aſide and alienateth them one from another, becauſe thereby they acquaint themſelues with diuers natures, and take pleaſure in things that are contrary. But there is a further matter in it. For as tin doth ſoder and ioine together broken copper, by touching both ends of the broken peeces, becauſe it agreeth as well with the one as with the other: ſo a common friend ſerueth to confirme, to preſerue, to increaſe and to reunite their mutuall friendſhip and good will, when vpon light occaſion ſometimes it is as it were in danger of breaking. Which is ſo much the more to bee feared, as it is certaine, that all enmitie breedeth within our ſoules a thouſand paſſions that torment vs, but eſpecially that enmitie which a man beareth towards his brother, as that which is moſt prodigious and againſt nature. And as bodies

Xerxes, when he ſaw his ſonne Ochus lay in waite for his brethren to put them to death, hee died for diſpleaſure thereof.

Telemachus.

The beginning of brotherly loue is in our naturall.

The benefice that cometh to brethren by having common friends.

Enmitie betweene brethren is prodigious and againſt nature.

It is a hard matter to reconcile brethren once fallen at variance.

How brethren
must behaue
themselves in the partition
of lands and goods.

Examples of brotherly loue.

Ariamenes.

Xerxes.

Antiochus.

Athenodorus.

that were once ioyned together, if the glew or band waxe loose, may bee ioyned and glewed againe; but if a naturall body breake or rent asunder, it is hard to finde any soder that is able to reunite and knit them well together againe: so those mutuall friendships, which wee contract voluntarily with such as are not of kin or allied vnto vs, if peradventure they fall asunder sometimes, may easily be ouertaken againe; but when brethren are once estranged and fallen from that loue whereby nature doth necessarily linke them one with another, they are hardly reconciled againe together. And if they be friends againe, yet it is alwaies with some distrust and suspition. Questionlesse it is impossible but that affaires should breed in these times wherein we liue, many occasions of dissention and debate betweene brethren, namely, for goods and successions, as this word of Parting importeth, and bringeth with it diuision, every one being desirous to haue his owne. But herein also they must suffer their matters to fight by themselves, without adding any headstrong passion, couetousnesse, or choler, which are as a hooke that taketh hold of them, and seeketh to set them together by the eares. They must, as it were in a balance consider ioynly together on which side right and equity declineth, and as soone as they can possible, let them remit the iudgement and deciding of their controuersies to the arbitrement of some good men. Yea, a good brother ought rather to reioyce and boast that he hath overcome and gone beyond his brother, in gracious behauiour, in curtesie, in voluntary giuing of place, and in euery good duty towards him, than in the diuision of some goods. Now let vs vs consider of some notable examples amongst the Ancients, of great brotherly loue. Although we had searched all histories, yet could we not finde a more memorable act, or worthy to be set forth at this day, and to be rather followed especially of the greater sort, who quartell for their possessions and reuenues, than that which fell out betweene the children of Darius monarch of the Persians. Ariamenes the eldest, and Xerxes the younger, being in great strife together for the succession of the Empire, the eldest alleadged, his birth right; the younger, that he was the sonne of Atossa, daughter to Cyrus the Great, and that he was borne since his father was crowned king, and so next inheritor of the kingdom now that Cambyses was dead. Each of them had great confederates, and many Persian lords were diuided into factions about this matter. But Ariamenes came out of Media, not in armes to make warre, although he had great meanes thereunto, but onely with his ordinarie traine, as one that purposed to pursue his right by way of iustice. Xerxes before his brothers comming, exercised in Persia all duties belonging to a king: but as soone as his brother was arriued, hee willingly put off his kingly diademe and hat, and went out to meete him and to imbrace him. After that he sent presents vnto him, with commandement giuen to those that bare them, to say vnto him in this manner: Xerxes thy brother honoreth thee now with these presents, but if by the sentence and iudgement of the princes and lords of Persia he be declared king, his will is that thou shouldest be the second person in Persia after him. Ariamenes returned this answer, I receiue my brothers gifts with all my heart, and thinke that the kingdom of Persia belongeth to me: but as concerning my brethren, I will giue them that dignitie and honour that is due vnto them next to my selfe, and to Xerxes first of all. Now after that by their common consent Artabanus their vncle had decided and brought to an end their controuersie, and adiudged the kingdom to Xerxes; Ariamenes presently arose from his seate and went to doe homage to his brother, and taking him by the right hand, led him to his royall and kingly throne. From that time forward he was alwaies the greatest next vnto him, and shewed himselfe so well affected towards his right, that in the Salamine battell by Sea hee died, fighting valiantly in his seruice. Antiochus surnamed the Holy, making warre with his elder brother for his part in the kingdom of Macedonia, declared euen in his ambition, that all brotherly loue was not quite extinguished and cleane put out in him. For in the hottest time of their warre, when his brother Seleucus had lost the battell with great destruction of his men, and was supposed to haue bene dead because no newes was heard of him: Antiochus put off his purple robe, and clothed him selfe in blacke, and shutting vp his pallace royall, mourned and lamented very much for his brother. But beeing afterward aduertised that hee was safe and sound and preparing another armie, hee went in open shew from his lodging, and sacrificed to the gods by way of thanksgiuing, commanding the Townes that were vnder his iurisdiction to offer the like sacrifices, and to weare hattes of flowers in token of publicke ioy. Athenodorus the Grecian hauing a brother elder than himselfe, called Zeno, who beeing conuicted of a certaine crime, had lost all his goods by confiscation, parted againe with him all his owne goods, and gaue vnto him the iust halfe. When the king of Lydia demaunded of Pittacus whether hee had any goods, yea (quoth hee) twice so much more than I would I had, being heire to my brother that is dead. The loue of that Persian woman, of whom Plutarke maketh mention, was very great, who being asked why she had rather saue the life of her brother than of her owne sonne, because (quoth she) I may well haue more children, but no more bretheren, seeing my father and mother are both dead. How much more then ought wee to preferre our brethren before all other our friends and acquaintaunce. For many may be gotten of this kind, and others if these fail: but it is no more possible to get a new brother, than to get an hand again that is cut off, or an eie that is plucked out. Agrippa, brother in law to the Emperor Augustus, vsed to say that hee was greatly beholding to that sentence of Salust, Small things increase by concord, but perish through discord: because it procured vnto him all his wealth, by seeking to liue in peace and friendship with his brother, and with euery one. This is that which Scilurus leauing behinde him foure score male children, meant to teach them, and how they should be invincible being ioyned and vnited together, by offering to each of them a bundle of darts to breake, which when they could not doe, he brake them one after another before their eies, I would further enlarge this discourse with examples of the loue of brethren, shining greatly in ages past, were it not that wee must heere speake somewhat of the duty and obedience of seruants towards their masters, according to that order which was propounded vnto vs. This wee will briefly comprehend in foure generall points. The first is, that they must be preest and alwaies ready, to put in execution their masters will and commaundement, and to doe their businesse most diligently, not being slothfull, slacke and negligent, nor doing any thing grutchingly. The second point is, that they must be faithfull vnto them, not beguiling nor defrauding them of any thing, not affirming that before their faces to flatter them, which they will vsaie behinde their backes. The third thing is, that they must seeke their masters profite and commoditie more then there owne, and take good heed that no harme, losse, or trouble come vnto them. And if any goe about to procure any such thing they must vndertake the defence thereof diligently, even to the hazzarding of their liues if neede bee. The last point which good seruants are to keepe, is to vse a double silence: the first, that they reply not againe to their masters commaundements, although sometimes they suppose that they know better what is to bee done than they that commaund them. The second, that they reueale not to others their masters secrets, nor shew them out of his house. To bee short, wee cannot giue them better instruction than that of Saint Col. 3. 22. 23. Paul, saying, Seruants bee obedient vnto them that are your masters according to the flesh in all things, 24. not with eie seruice as men pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God. And what soeuer yee do, doe it hartlie, as to the Lord, and not vnto men, knowing that of the Lord yee shall receiue the reward of inheritance for ye serue the Lord Iesus Christ. And else where he exhorteth them againe to be subiect to their masters, and to please them in all things, not answering againe, neither pickers, but that they may shew all good faithfulness, that they may adorne the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. Now for examples to all seruants that are desirous to effect their duty towards their masters, wee will propound two, the one old, the other of late yeeres, which giue sufficient testimony of a sonnelike rather then of a seruite affection. Antonius being overcome of Augustus, and despairing of his safety, vrged the promise of Eros his seruant in whom he trusted, because he had giuen his faith long before that hee would kill him when he required the same at his hands. But the seruant drawing his sword, and holding it out as though he would haue killed him, turned his face on the one side, and thrust it into himselfe cleane through his body. Maurice duke of Saxonic being in Hungarie against the Turke, and walking out of the campe only with his seruant, was set vpon by certaine Turkes, and his horse being slaine, he was throwen to the ground. But his seruant cast himselfe vpon him, covered and defended him with his body, instained and kept backe the enemies vntill certaine horsemen came and saued the Prince, but died himselfe not long after being wounded on euery side. Therefore to end our present discourse, let vs learne, that it is a great and commendable vertue, and be seeming euery good and gentle nature, to know how to obey well, and to giue honour and service to those that occupy the degree of fathers, Lords, and masters ouer vs, as also to loue our brethren with an indissoluble loue, to reverence one an other, the younger honouring the elder, and the elder yeelding all duties of sincere loue to the younger. Let vs not be lesse afraid of the curse repeated so often in the Scripture against disobedient children than the Ancients were of that law which condemned them to be stoned to death when they would not obey the voice of their parents, nor harken vnto them when they instructed them, but

king

Pittacus.

Great loue of a Persian woman towards her brother.

Agrippa.

Scilurus left 80. sons behinde him.

The duty of seruants comprehended in foure parts.

Tit. 2. 9. 10.

Examples of the loue of seruants towards their masters.

Eros the seruant of Antonius.

The seruant of Maurice duke of Saxonic.

let

let vs much more feare that punishment which will continue for ever, where there will bee weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Of the education and instruction of Children. Chap. 51.

A R A M. VVhen weintreated of the dutie of a father of a family towards his children, we said, that the chiefe marke whereat hee ought to aime, was to make them honest and good of condition, which was to be performed by instruction and good bringing vp in the knowledge and exercise of vertue. Now because the chiefe foundation of a happie life, is good instruction begun in youth, so that if the infancy of any be well brought vp (as Plato saith) the rest of his life can not but bee good, wee ought as I thinke (my Companions) to take this matter againe in hand to follow and handle it more at large, to the end to prouoke fathers and all such as haue authoritie ouer the yonger sort, to be carefull and diligent in the well ordering of the seede of youth, which is the spring and roote of all prosperitie both publike and priuate.

the chiefe
foundation of a happie life.

A father of a familie must be most care-full to bring vp his youth.

A fit comparison.

The spring of corruption in commonwealths.

Lawes that constrained fathers to see their children
instructed.
The law.
Falcidia.

A worthy act
of Traian
and Adrian.

Crates proclamation
most necessary for these times.

Buill education corrupteth
a good nature

A C H I T O B. Wee must not (saith Plato) bee more carefull of any thing whatsoever, than of the good education of children. For if vpon their good bringing vp they become moderate and staied men, they will easily discerne every thing that is good. And if good wits haue like education they will grow from better to better every day.

A S E R. The beginning, middle, and ending of a happie life (saith Plutarke) consisteth in good education and bringing vp. But it belongeth to thee A M A N A to instruct vs in this so excellent a matter.

A M A N A. As a man cannot reape good wheat if hee hath not sowne good seede, nor gather good fruit of his trees, if he had no care at the beginning to dresse them well, nor to graft them with good sciences after wrrd: so the corruption of mans nature, which of it selfe is more enclined to euill than to good, hindreth vertue from taking sure footing and roote in the soules of men, if they be not from their very youth well and diligently instructed, stirred vp, and pricked forward to that which is honest and decent. And truly that common-wealth is most miserable, wherein this tillage of infancy is neglected. For from this fountaine proceede rebellions, seditions, open murders, contempt of lawes and commandements of Princes, pollings, briberies, heresies, and Atheisme. Therefore nothing was more esteemed from time to time among the Ancients, than the institution of youth, which Plato calleth Discipline, whereby children are led to this reason, not to follow any thing but that which the law commandeth and alloweth for good. The Monarchie of the Persians, the common-wealth of the Lacedæmonians, and since, that also of the Romanes had certaine lawes compelling fathers to provide that their children might be instructed, not suffering them to be cast away and corrupted to the detriment of the common-wealth. Amongst other lawes there was one called Falcidia, whereby it was enacted, that the childe should bee admonished for the first offence, chastised for the second, and for the third hanged, and his father banished, as if hee had beene partaker in the fault, for want of good education and instruction of his sonne. Heretofore wee heard many testimonies of the care and trauell which famous and worthy men tooke to instruct their children themselves. Traian the Emperour, and after him Adrian at their owne costes and charges caused five thousand noble mens children of Rome to bee brought vp in learning, vertue and feates of armes. Our ancient kings, knowing how necessary this education of youth was, builded long agoe and caused to be framed so many goodly Colledges as we see in the Vniuersities of France: yea, the monasteries were partly founded to this end. But how carefull are we at this day to imitate those Ancients in this earnestnes of good bringing vp of children in the studie of sciences and good discipline? Haue we not very good occasion to say with Crates the Philosopher, that it is most necessary that one should ascend vp into the highest place of this kingdome, and crie aloud: Oh ye men, whither doe ye throw your selues headlong, in taking all the paines that may beeto heape vp goods and treasures that perish, and in the meane while make no reckoning of your children, but suffer them to continue long, and to grow old in ignorance, which destroy them both body and soule, and turneth to the confusion and ouerthrow of your Countrey? For it is most certaine, that a good nature ill brought vp, waxeth very pernicious, and that the minds and hearts of men that are corruptly instructed, become most wicked. Doe you thinke (saith Plato) that execrable villanies and horrible vices proceede rather of a naughtie nature than than of a noble nature corrupted with euill education? In like manner a good nature well tilled will attaine to the top of vertue, but if it be negligently looked vnto, it will be nothing but vice. But let vs see what goodly instructions the Ancients haue given concerning this matter. The same Plato was so carefull, and searched out so exactly the good education of children, as that which is as precious and necessary a thing as any can bee in the life of man, that he taketh them euen from their mothers wombe yea before they are begotten. First, hee willeth that the husband and wife that are desirous of children, should keep themselves from drunkenness, and from entring into the bed when they are cholerike and full of trouble, because that many times is the cause of vices in children. Next, he requireth that great belled women should giue themselves to walking, and beware of liuing either too delicately, or to sparingly: that they should haue quiet mindes, with many other things, which hee alleadgeth to that purpose. He saith also, that children being in their mothers wombe, receiue good and ill, as the fruites of the earth doe. After they are borne, hee carefully recommendeth their education. Wee will not here stand vpon many points to be obserued therein, as namely vpon the choice of Nurses, whereof few are ignorant, seeing it belongeth to the true and naturall office of euery mother to nourish that with her teate, which shee hath brought into the world, except there be some great and lawfull impediment. But let vs goe on with the saying of Plato. He chargeth nurses to leade their children oftentimes on their feete vntill they be three yeares old, because this moouing is very profitable for them. Hee forbiddeth much crying in children, because it breedeth in them a habite and custome of sadnesse. From three yeares to sixe, he would haue them moderately corrected when they commit a fault, and forbiddeth aboue all things to accustome them from that time forward vnto daintinesse, or to ouer great severity, saying, that delicatenesse maketh them froward, hard to please, cholericke, and soone moued: and that severity maketh them hard-hearted, cruell, abiect, base-minded, very blockes and fooles, and haters of men. At sixe yeares of age hee would haue them put apart from the daughters, and begin to learne to ride a horse, to shoote, to practise all kinde of feates of Armes, both with the right hand and with the left: to put in vnto all other exercises of moderate labour, that they may waxe strong, and acquainted with labour, and therefore to vse such laborious pastimes. But he expressly forbiddeth to change euery day for new, this age beeing very apt thereunto: saying, that nothing is more pernicious than to acquaint youth to despise antiquitie. But aboue all things, he commandeth that children should be so brought vp, that they be not constrained to any thing whatsoever they shall take in hand, but as it were in sport, that so euery ones nature may be knowne. Neither would hee haue them beaten without great discretion, because it is not seemely that a free man should learne liberall sciences by seruitude and compulsion. And in truth no science forced vpon a man, will continue stedfast with him. Moreouer, hee would haue them apply themselves to Musicke, both to sing hymns and songs to the praise of God, to laude and magnifie him, and to hope for all good successe from him, as also to recreate their spirits. Hee greatly misliketh in them sloth and too much sleepe, saying, that much sound sleepe is good neither for the bodie nor for the soule: that it is nothing profitable for him that desireth to bring any good thing to passe, because as long as a man sleepeth, he doth nothing more than if he liued not. Therefore whosoever desireth to liue, and to come to knowledge, let him watch as much as he may, hauing regard notwithstanding to his health, which is contented with a little, when a man is once acquainted therewith. Now, because a childe (as he saith) is more vnruely than a sauage beast, hee would neuer haue him left without a wise and vertuous master. It is no lesse necessary (saith he) to consider what teachers a man hath, than what parents. For as children do in a manner carrie away the spirits of their forefathers: so the vices of teachers are deriued vnto their schollers. Therefore let such bee chosen as teach vs their vertue by their workes, and not such as onely vtter and speake many goodly words studied out of it. At ten yeares this diuine Philosopher would haue children to learne letters vntill fifteene. But because we are to learne languages that differ from ours, it were good to begin sooner, and to end a little after. I thinke it were very profitable for youth to begin at the aboue named age of sixe yeares, to teach him his mother tongue perfectly, that hee may reade, pronounce, and write it well. After, at eight yeares, to teach him the rudiments of the Latine tongue, and to let him follow that vntill it be as a familiar vnto him, or little lesse, than his naturall speech. At fourteene yeares, the same Plato would haue children learne Arithmetike, saying that it is very necessary both for a soldier, and for a Philosopher: next Geometrie, and that part of Astronomie that is necessarie for Cosmographie, which he would haue likewise

Of the excellent education of children required by Plato.

Women with childe must walke much.

Euery mother ought to nurse her owne childe.

Of the bringing vp of infants.

From 3. yeers

From sixe yeares.

youth must be taught as it were in sport, and not by compulsion.

A commendable ende of musicke.

Great care is to be taken in the choice of scholl masters From the tenth yeere.

From the fourteenth yeere.

Hunting, an image of war.

Of the education of daughters.

Reasons why women may intermeddle
with publike
affaires.

Against ignorance in women.

Women must be able to giue a reason of their being

Examples of learned women.

Aretia.
Zenobia.
Cornelia.

Of the institution of youth according to Aristotle.

Two things
to be respected in the institution of youth.

The end of
all studies.

Aristotle appointed that children
should learne
four things.
Of Grammar
The commodi-
tie thereof.

A notable law
for the common instruction of children.

likewise learned. He commaundeth also that youth should practise hunting, because it is as it were an image of warre, and an exercise that maketh men apt to sustaine all labour and trauell. This institution of youth is surely worthy of that diuine spirit of Plato, and that party were very vnhappy, and of a froward and corrupt nature, who being thus diligently brought vp, would not grow to be a vertuous and good man. He putteth small difference betweene the education and bringing vp of daughters, and that of sonnes, not depriving women from publike administrations and charges, but onely that hee would haue them imployed about such things as require least labour, and not to begin to meddle with publike affaires, before they be fortie yeares of age. He alleadgeth these reasons, because oftentimes many women haue bene more excellent than all the men of their countrey, and such are daily to be seene. And seeing they haue a soule as well as we, as quicke a spirit, and oftentimes more quicke than wee whereof those women are witnesse, who hauing giuen themselves wholly to any thing whatsoever, were not inferiour, but rather went beyond many men. It were great folly in men, seeing God hath created man and woman with the like spirit, to cut off as it were the one halfe of their strength, and to helpe themselves but with a part thereof. Now, albeit these reasons are of great weight, yet sure it is that men and women, both by diuine and humane policie, haue their distinct and seuerall offices. It is very true, that I like not the opinion of many, who say, that women ought to know nothing, but to spinne and sowe: which saying cometh nere to that of the Emperour, who would not haue a woman to haue more wit than is needefull for her to discerne her husbands shirt from his doublet. Such opinions are fit for ignorant persons, and proceede from a darke braine. For it cannot but bee very seemely and profitable for a woman to be able to render a reason of her being, as well by the knowledge of holy Scriptures, as by the precepts of good life, which we haue from the Ancients. This ought parents to teach their daughters, that they may be withdrawne from all other foolish loue, through the loue of vertue, and be desirous of all honesty and chastitie: as also, that when they are mothers in good and holy marriage, they may be a principall cause of the good bringing vp of their children. Yea histories reckon vp vnto vs a great many, that haue bene in stead of Schoole-masters in excellent sciences. Aretia taught her sonne Aristippus Philosophie. Zenobia Queene of the Palmyrians, being very well learned in the Greeke, Latine, and AEgyptian tongues, taught them to her two sonnes, and wrote an Epitomie of the Easterne histories. Cornelia taught the Gracchies her two sonnes, the Latine eloquence. But let vs follow our discourse of the generall instruction of children. Aristotle seemeth vnto me to be a good teacher and master, where he saith, that there are two ages, in which it is necessary to diuide the institution of those disciplines, which we would haue our children learne: namely, from seuen yeares vntill fourteene, which hee calleth the age of puberty: and againe from this age vntill the one and twentieth yeare. He saith, that in the institution of youth, two things must be looked vnto; the one, wherein children are to be instructed, the other, how they ought to be instructed. For all men are not agreed of this, what things children are to learne, neither yet is it decided, or resolued vpon, to what end their institution ought to be directed, whether to profite, or to manners, or to vnderstanding and contemplation; which proceedeth from the variable opinions of men, who place their end in diuerse things. But howsoever it is, we must, as we said before, referre all our studies to the glory of God, and to the seruice of our neighbours, in living well according to those charges and vocations whereunto we may be called. We haue already seene the diuision of sciences and arts, and spoken of those that are most necessary for a happy life. Aristotle following the custome then vsed in Gracia, appointed that children should learne foure things, Grammar, bodily exercise, Musicke, and painting, for certaine commodities meete for the life of man. Grammar is the entrie to all sciences, whereby we learne to speake exactly, also to reade and to write. And this is necessary for all estates of life, whether publike or priuate, in peace or in warre, in a quiet life, or in multitude of businesse, for merchandise, for the guiding of a house, for the obtaining of knowledge, for the continuance and perpetuity of the memorie of man. Briefly, as nature is the cause of our being, so the knowledge of letters, which Grammar teacheth vs, worketh in vs the knowledge how to liue well. For this cause Charondas the law-maker, as Diodorus the Sicilian writeth, preferred Grammer before all other sciences, as that which is most necessary for mans life, appointing that all the children of his citie should learne their letters at the charge of the common-wealth, which was to maintaine publike masters to teach both poore and rich. Truly this law ought to be put in practise in all the towns of this kingdome, to resist that pernicious Hydra of ignorance, which the richer sort defend,

making

making no account of knowledge, to the treading downe and oppression of the poore, who would gladly haue the meanes whereby they might be instructed. The Gymnasticall part was that art, which, as the ancients affirmed, did serue for health and strength, preparing the bodies of children by honest and moderate exercises, as fencing, shooting, throwing of a stone, riding, wrestling, running, leaping, swimming, and such like. These according to Aristotles opinion, are to be moderately practised by children, vntill they be foureteene yeares old, exercising them lightly, and not with forced labors, that their growth be not hindered thereby. This age being past, after they haue bestowed three yeares in other Morall disciplines, and followed their studies in deeper sciences, vntill the one ond twentieth yeare, then may they be exercised with more sharpe and hard labors of the body. They must also bee taught Musicke, for the solacing and recreation of their mindes after trauels: and painting, that they may the better consider of the beauty of the body, and vnderstand the symmetrie and apt composition of all things, to the end that they may be the better aduised either in buying or selling them. Let them also know how to drawe platforms of publike and priuate buildings, to set forth Countries, Townes, and Castles, their height, bredth, and length for the war, liuing creatures of all sorts, with their parts, herbs, trees, roots, leaues, flowers, fruits for medicine, and for the knowledge of simples. In this institution of children, Aristotle had respect to that which was conuenient, and drewe neere to the forme of a happy Commonwealth established by him, and to that which was necessary for the preferuation and maintenance thereof. Now, let vs applie to our vse that which we may learne both of him, and of the rest of the Ancients, for the framing of young men to honesty and vertue, leauing to the liberty of Fathers to make choice of those arts & sciences wherein they purpose to bring vp their children, hauing regard to that whereunto nature maketh them most apt and pliable. Wee shall take a good way in the institution of youth, if wee obserue and vse these fise things, Instruction, Admonition, Promise, Praises, and Threatnings. We will comprehend all Instruction vnder sixe precepts. The first shall be to shew vnto children, that they must worship God and honor him chieflie and aboue all things, referring all their thoughts and deedes to the glory of his name: that it is hee that hath created and preserueth all things, that hee suffereth no wickednesse to passe unpunished, nor good worke unrewarded, but giueth eternall happinessse to good men, and euermlasting paine and punishment to them that are euill. Let them know that without his grace and fauour they can doe nothing, no not so much as liue one moment: and therefore that they must continually and before euery worke call vpon him, and beware that they offend him not by neglecting his commandements which for this cause they must diligently learne. The second instruction which I finde most necessary for youth, is to teach them not to glory in earthly and worldly goods, but to learne rather to despise them, and to transport the loue of the body and of carnall goods, which it desireth, to the loue of the soule and eternall goods, which properly belong vnto them. They must not make great account of the beauty of the bodie, which hauing inclosed within it the soule that is defiled with vice and sinne, is nothing else but a precious and proud sepulcher, vnder which is contained a stinking and putrified carrion. They must not put their hope and confidence in riches, but bee perswaded that they are rich and happy, if they bee wise, learned, and vertuous. And whilest their vnderstanding is good and in vigour, and themselves haue time, they must put all their strength to the obtaining of that which will bee profitable vnto them in their oldeage: namely, of knowledge and vertue, which will procure vnto them, honour, safety, praise, happinessse, rest, and tranquillitie in their life time, and will in the ende guide them to eternall life, to bee made coheires of the kingdome of heauen with Iesus Christ. Thirdly, they must bee taught to eschue and flie from all such things which they see are hurtfull to others, and learne to bee wise by their dangers and perils. Now that which marreth and hurteth others, is disobedience, lying, pride, infidelitie, naughtinesse, hazarding games, whooredome, drunkennesse, prodigalitie, idlenesse, and euill companie. Against the contagion of which vices, no better preferuative can bee had, than to imagine modestie in their hearts, by the rule and measure whereof they may easily bee directed to behaue themselves vertuously. For this cause Plutarke saith very elegantly, that the foolish opinion and presumption, which young men commonly conceiue of themselves, ought rather to bee emptied, than the aire wherewith bottels and Kiddes skinnies are puffed vp when any good thing is to bee put into them. Otherwise, being full of the winde of ouerweening, they receiue none of that good instruction which men thinke to powre in to them. For the fourth precept of their instruction, wee will set downe these foure things

Of Gymnasticke, or bodily exercise.

The end of Musicke. The vse of painting.

Four things to be vsed in the institution of youth.

Instruction, which consisteth in sixe precepts.

1. The first precept. The first thing that youth must learne, is to worship God. We can do nothing without the grace of God.

2. The second precept.

Youth must not glory in transitory goods.

Not in bodily vertue.

The fruits of true knowledge and verue.

3. The third precept.

The common diseases of youth.

Modesty is the best remedy for them.

4. The fourth precept hath

4. branches.

which will stand them in great stead towards the attaining of a happy life. *Let them not be delicate or superfluous in any thing: Let them bridle their tongue, and not be full of words, nor utter filthie and dishonest talke at any time, but be gracious and courteous in speaking to all men, saluting every one gladly, and willingly giving place in those things wherein the truth is not hurt. Let them master their choler by cutting off impatiencie as much as may bee, which is a singular vertue. Lastly, let them haue pure hands, seeing many great men by taking money vnjustly haue spilled all that honour which they had gathered together all the former time of their life. Fiftly, the examples of good and bad men, are to be laid before their eies through the reading and vnderstanding of histories, that they may know that vertuous men haue beene well rewarded, and the vicious received an euill and miserable end. For this cause we reade that the old men of Rome vsed at feasts to sing the famous Actes of their Ancestours before their youth. For the sixth and last precept, wee say, that it is needfull for youth to be vsed to labour and wearisomnesse, to keepe them from idlenesse, and from falling into any dishonest pleasure. Wee haue seene what exercises and pastimes are meete for them, according to the opinion of the Ancients: and at this day wee know how to make choice of them, as shall bee meetest for the nobility. Now, to speake briefly of the other three generall precepts given by vs for the institution of youth: Admonition is very necessary for that age. For although youth be well borne and brought vp, yet hath it such active and vehemēt prouocations, that it is easily brought to stumble. Wherefore yong men must be often admonished of their duty, and spoken vnto of honesty, and of vertuous men; because words moue their minds. The steps of their honest predecessors are to be laid before their eies, to induce them to follow their pathes. Aboue all things, the promise of that life, which is eternally happy for those that perseuere in vprightnesse and iustice, is to be propounded vnto them. O man well affected (saith Horace) go ioyfully whither thy vertue leadeth thee, and thou shalt reape great rewards for thy deserts! O ye yong men (saith Plautus) walke on in that way wherein vertue will direct you, and ye shall be very well recompenced! For he that hath vertue, hath all things necessary for him, and wanteth nothing. These are the promises which ought to be beaten into the hearts of children: adding further to them that are very yong a promise to giue them what they will, so that they learne well that which is taught them. Last of all, praises and threatnings must be added, by commending children when we see them profite in vertue and honesty, to encourage them to goe forward, and to be better and better. Glory (saith Onid) giueth no small strength to the minde, and the desire and loue of praise, causeth the heart to be resolute and ready to vnder take all things. Quintilian would haue yong men praised, when they profit, and are willing to learne; as likewise they are to be threatned, if they be sloathfull and negligent in the obtaining of vertue and honesty, and will neither heare nor vnderstand, nor yet put in practise those good admonitions that are given them. And if they amend not with threatnings, they must haue good discipline and correction vsed towards them, and be chastised with discretion. To this purpose Plutarke saith, that the hope of reward, and feare of punishment, are as it were the two elements and foundation of vertue. For hope maketh yong men prompt and ready to vnder take all good and commendable things, and feare maketh them slowe in presuming to commit such things as are vile and full of reproch. So that if wee practise diligently these precepts in the education and instruction of our children: there is no doubt, but as seales and signets doe easily make a print in soft waxe, so wee may quickly cast in the minds of little children, as it were in a mould, whatsoeuer we would haue them learne for the leading of a good and happy life, to the Glory of God, the profit of their neighbours, and discharge of our consciences which are bound thereunto.*

Of the diuision of the ages of man, and of the offices and duties that are to be obserued in them. Chap. 52.

A M A-N A.

Adolescencie
is the age betweene 14.
and 28.

AMongst the most common and notorious faults, which fathers now adaies commit in the education and bringing vp of their children, this deserueth great blame and reprehension, that in their first age they vsually provide teachers for them, sending them to Colledges, wherethey are kept in awe, when they cannot commit any greater euill than that which commeth from the yong yeares of their infancy, not very hurtfull to any, beeing light faults, and soone amended: but when the vehemencie of adolescencie beginneth to tickle them with foule and infamous desires, and

and when they have greatest need of a bridle, then they let loose the raines, and withdrawe them from the subiection of their guides, giving them liberty to make choice of their estate of life, when their perturbations are most violent, and in danger to bring forth most pernicious effects. Whereas on the contrary side then ought they most diligently to looke vnto them, and to set a most carefull watch ouer them, that their first discipline and instruction may be framed in vertue, and in the perfection of a most happy life. For this cause my companions I thinke that by continuing our former discourse (seeing al men enioy not commonly this benefit of the forenamed education and instruction from their infancy vnto the end) we ought to search out some way wherby to amend the first faults, by handling the diuision of the ages of man, according to the ancient writers, and by setting down a brieue instruction of that which is most necessarily required, and to be obserued in euery of them, especially in adolescence, for the obtaining of true fecilicity through good behauiour and instructions, which are the meanes thereof.

A R A M. It is true (as Plato saith) that vertue must be learned from the first infancy. Yea, there is no part of our age, which ought to be employed in any other study. But adolescence especially must not onely inquire and seeke after the decrees of honesty and vertue, but also haue them already imprinted and ingrauen in his heart.

A C H I T O B. As no man euer saw a Bee become a Beetle through age: so no part of our life ought to leaue the first election grounded vpon vertue, if the end thereof be to liue well. But let vs heare A S E R discourse of this present matter.

A S E R. It cannot be denied, that place and time are a great helpe to honesty and vertue: insomuch, that if wee consider not of them, the knowledge and practise of that which belongeth to our duty, cannot greatly profite vs. For all things are to bee applied in time and place, some things are decent and lawfull vpon one occasion, which would bee very vnseemely in another. The prouerbe saith, That the way to handle a sound man is diuers from the guiding of him, to whom the diet is inioyned. Euen so, although vertue and honesty are alwaies requisite in a man, because it is the onely ornament of his life: yet in diuers ages diuersity of honest behauiour is required, and the selfe same things are not decent in them, but some kinde of behauiour is proper to the age of childehoode, some to youth, and another to olde age, because as nature altereth with age, so it behooueth that manners should change. Now, among them that haue most diligently obserued the secrets of mans nature, there haue bene two sundry opinions concerning the diuision of the ages of man. Some haue made seauen parts, adding decrepite or bed red age after old age & they would ground their principall reason of this diuision vpon this, that the number of 7. is an vniuersall and absolute number. So wee reckon 7. planets, whose motion worketh all generations and corruptions in the earth. By a stronger reason therefore this number of 7. will bee applied to the continuance of time. Moreover, the growth of men according to age, increaseth at the seventh number. For teeth are bred in the seventh moneth, and in the seauen yeare they change and alter. Besides, in the same yeare doubled, that is, in the foureteenth yeare, man receiueith ability of seede, that is to say of engendring. True it is, that the number of sixe worketh alteration in femals. Yet the number of 7. in other things worketh augmentation, or else the rest and quietnesse of men, and sheweth the difference or iudgement of diseases, The whole time of the creation of the world is comprehended therein, and likewise the rest and ceasing of the workemaster thereof. All the auncient writers haue also noted, that the number of 63. which is the multiplication of seuen by nine, carrieth with it commonly the end of old men: because that in the whole course of our life we liue vnder one onely climate, which is either from seuen or from nine yeares, except in the yeare of 63. wherein two terminations or climates end, that is to say, nine seuen times seuen, or seuen nine times nine: and therefore this yeare is called climactericall, wherein we may note out of histories the death of many great men, and the change of estates and kingdomes. As touching the other the diuision of the age of man into sixe parts onely, of which opinion Isidorus is, wee will now enter into the particular handling thereof. The parts are these, Infancie, Childhood, Youth, Adolescence, Virility, and olde age. Infancie is the first age of man, beginning after his natiuitie: and it is so called, because at that time hee hath no vse of speach, and therefore cannot then learne manners and vertue, hauing no fence or vnderstanding to comprehend them. Childehoode is when children begin to speake; albeit as yet they haue not the full vse of reason, in which estate a man may say they are vntill the age of seuen yeares, during which time fathers and mothers ought to nourish and bring them vp in the feare of God, and reuerence of their parents, and frame them gently, Place & time are to be considered in all things.

All kinde of behauiour not conuenient in all ages.

Of the diuision of the ages of man. The number of seuen accounted a perfect number.

Of the climacterical yeare 63.

The whole age of man diuided into sixe parts.

Of infancy.

Of Childehoode.

He meaneth
not common & natural infirmities, but malicious offences.

Two things requisite in a schol-master,
skill, & honesty of life.
The benefite
that cometh
by good schol
masters.

A strange cu-
stome vsed by the children
of Rome.

The reason of the word Iuuentus.

Of adolescency.

The fruits of adolescence
being left to
it selfe.

Aurelius ex-hortati on to his sons
gouernors.

Concupiscence
reigneth most in Adolescence
Who are to be accounted free.

gently, vnto all good manners, as wee haue already declared. This age is called of the Latines Pueritia, as it were pure and neate from * sinne: forasmuch as children haue then no vse of discretion, so that iudgement cannot bee attributed to their workes, whereby they may bee called good or euill. Youth is reckoned from seuen yeares of age vntill fourteene, at which time children ought to bee delivered vnto skilful and honest masters and teachers to bee instructed. Then must parents looke well whether these two things are in them, to whose direction they committe the keeping of such a pretious pledge: least that befall them, which Hyperides an Orator of Grecia saide to him that tolde him that hee had sent a slave with his sonne to gouerne him you haue (quoth hee) done very well: for in steade of one slave, you shall receive twaine, Therefore it is very necessary that such masters should be chosen for them as are learned, and of good life and conversation, that, as good Gardiners sticke down certaine props hard by young plants to keepe them vpright: so wise teachers may plant good instructions and precepts about yong men, that their manners may bee according to vertue.
Let fathers beware least being moued with countousnes, they make choice of masters vnworthy their charge, that they may pay the lesse stipend, seeking for good cheape ignorance, seeing that (as Plato saith) as children beare away as it were the minds of their progenitors, so the vices of the schoolemaster flow vpon their schollers. At this age of youth the children of Rome, did hang in the Temple a little collar or iewell which they wore about their necks, during the time of their infancy, declaring therby that they renounced all childishnes and that they were to change their maners for the time to come. In token wherof one gaue them a white robe, and a purple coat, to teach them by the white color to shun vices, which made the soule blacke, and by the purple to strue to make their life glister and shine with good manners and vertue. And it seemeth that the Latins called this age Iuuentus, because of the aide & helpe which men promised to themselves through the vertuous inclination that appeared in yong children. We saw sufficiently before what is further required of this age, in regard of their instruction. Adolescence is the fourth age of man, beginning at the fourteeneeth yeare, and continuing vntill the 28. and it is deriued of this verbe Adolesco, which signifieth to grow. For then doe men grow in body, in strength, and reason, in vice, and ver-
tue. And at that age the nature of man is knowne, and whereunto hee bendeth his minde, which before could not be discerned by reason of the ignorance of his age. This is that which Cicero saith, that the studies vnto which we addict our selues in the time of our adolescencie, like to hearbes and fruites that are come to their fashion, declare what vertue there will bee in time of ripenesse, and what manner of haruest will follow. Therefore young men (saith this Father of eloquence) must make choice of one certaine kinde of life, whereunto they are to giue themselves all their life time, without any manner of contradiction, and beeing constant therein, they must draw all their actions to that onely end, as an arrow is drawne towards a white. But forasmuch as in the corruption of our time wee see poore fruits of this age when it is left to it it selfe, wee may well say, that in this season of adolescence, children haue greatest neede to be gouerned, ruled, and kept in great awe. For the inclination to pleasures, and the eschoing of labour, which are naturall in man, commonly beginne then to assault him with such violence, that if young men bee not well followed, they quickly turne to vice, hate those that giue them good instruction, become presumptuous, and ready to leaue that which before they loved: and taking no care for the time to come, like beasts seeke for nothing but to satisfie their lustfull desires. For this cause that good Emperor Marcus Aurelius saide to those vnto whom he recommended his son after his death. Beware that hee bathe not himselfe in slipperie pleasures and desires, seeing it is a hard matter to moderate and to stay the burning affections of a young man, especially when hee seeth in his owne hand a licence not limited, which offereth vnto him all kind of contentation. And truly this vnbriiled licence of not being in subiection to any, which yong men desire and seeke after so earnestly, and for want of right vnderstanding falsly call and imagine it to be libertie bringing them in bondage to seuerer and sharper masters, than were those teachers and scholmasters, which they had in their infancie: namely, to their lusts and disordered desires, which are then as it were vnchained and let loose. But he which knoweth that to follow God, and to obey right reason, are reciprocally and necessarily following each other, must thinke that to leaue his infancy and first youth, and to enter into the ranke of men, is no freedome from subiection, but onely change of commaundement, because our life in lieu of a hired master, who gouerned vs before, hath then a heavenly guide, that is, reason, to whom they onely that obey, are to bee reputed and taken for freemen. For after they haue learned

learned to will that which they ought, they live as they will, whereas the freedome of the will in disordered actions and affections is small, feeble and weake, and mingled with much repentance. These are those good reasons, which ought to sound often in the eares of yong men, and bee supplied by little and little through the studie of good letters, and Morall Philosophie of auncient men, vntill they haue wholly in possession that place of manners, which is soonest moued and most easily led, and are lodged therein by knowledge and iudgement, which will be as a guard to preserve and defend that age from corruption. Vnto which things the ancients looked very diligently, both to repress boldnes which commonly is the companion of adolescencie, and also to chastise their faults seuerely. Wee read that one of Cato's sonnes of the age of 15. yeares, was banished for breaking a pot of earth in a maids hand that went for water: so was Cinna his soone, because hee entred into a garden, and gathered fruit without leaue. Therefore if a yong man bee well guided with reason, he will choose and propound to himselfe that kind of life, which he purposeth to keepe vntill death, and begin some commendable life that is had in commendation among vertuous men. The ancient Romans minding to make declaration hereof, when their children were come to that age, they brought them to the common market place clothed with a mans gowne, and caused them to scatter nuts here and there, and after that to forsake all play: signifying thereby that they must leaue the follies of their first age, to imbrace more graue and serious matters. It belongeth to their dutie (saith Cicero) to honour their elders, and to marke who are the honestest men, and of best report, that by their counsell they may learne to live according to vertue and good manners, and haue honour alwaies before their eies. And as in calme weather when a man is vpon the sea, hee must provide such things as are necessary against a storme: so in time of adolescencie, men must furnish themselves with temperance, sobriety, and continency, laying vp store of prouision in due time, whereby to sustaine olde age the better. This is that which Plato saith, that a moderate youth maketh an easie old age: but that which is immoderate maketh it grievous and irksome. The defect of our strength (saith Cicero) commeth rather of the vices of our youth, than of old age. Now, because youth is at this day more than euer, given ouer to all kind of dissolutenes, so that their greatest glory consisteth in going one beyond another in vice, let vs here propound to those that will make their profit thereof, some examples drawne from the Ancients of rare vertue that shined in yong men. Ioseph, Daniel, Salomon, deserue the first place, who being very yong men, executed deeds of wonderfull prudence. The holy Scriptures afford vs a sufficient number of testimonies, but we haue some also amongst the heathens and Pagans, that ought to stir vp youth vnto vertue. That great monarch Alexander in his youth despised all kind of pleasure and delight, eschued women, contemned money, and all plaies and pastimes that were vnprofitable, and to no good vse, louing nothing but vertue and glory gotten thereby. This was the cause why, being demanded whether hee would not be present at the Olympian games, to trie whether he could win the prize of running, seeing he was well made, and wonderfull light of foote, he answered: Yes, if they were kings that ranne. Whensoever he heard newes that his father had taken any famous Towne, or wonne some great battell, he shewed no token of ioy, but said to his equals in yeares: My father, Sirs, will take all, and leaue no goodly or great matter for me to doe, and to conquer with you. Among other his commendable gifts of nature which men admired in him at that age, he was greatly praised for a good horseman, which he shewed full well when Bucephalus the horse was brought to his father, and was to bee sold for thirty Talents, that is in value, 7800. crownes: which the yeomen of the kings horse perceived to bee so skittish and wilde, that they durst not vndertake to breake him. But Alexander mounted on him, and handled him so cunningly, that all those that were present, cried out by way of admiration: and Philip kissing him, said: Oh my sonne, thou must seeke out a kingdome that is meete for thee, for Macedonia is not able to containe thee! This horse alwaies serued Alexander after that, and died in a battell against the Barbarians, when hee was thirty yeares olde. Pompey from his very youth shewed in his countenance (as Historiographers write) a pleasant mildnesse, ioyned with a manly grauity, and in his conditions and behauiour, a reuerend excellency of kingly maiesty. When hee was yet very yong, he committed an act of a wife and aduised captaine, being in the Roman army whereof Strabo his father was captaine against Cinna. For when the souldiers began to rebell and to conspire the death of their captaine, Pompey discovered the same, and tooke order for his fathers safetie. After, perceiuing that the souldiers trusted vp bag and baggage, to goe yeeld themselves to Cinna, hee thrust himselfe into the middelt of them, beseeching them most humbly with teares in his eyes not to

Knowledge
and iudgment
are of the guard of ad-
lescency.

Cato's
sonne banished for breaking an earthen por.

And Cinnes
sonne for gathering fruit
without leaue
How the Ro-manes taught their yong men to forsake the follies of their youth.

The durie of yong men.

A moderate
youth maketh
a happy old age.

Examples of vertuous
yong men.

Alexander a patterne of vertue in his youth.

Bucephalus Alexanders
horse.

Pompey.

deale so grossely with their captaine. In the end when hee saw that they persisted in their opinion, hee threw him prostrate all along ouerthwart the gate of the campe, saying vnto them, that if they were so desirous to depart, both they and their horse should goe ouer his body. Whereupon they were so ashamed, that changing their minds, euery one betooke him againe to his quarter, and reconciled themselves vnto their generall. The prudence of Papyrius deserueth to be alleadged here, who according to the custome of the yong gentlemen of Rome, was brought into the Senate, after hee had put on the gowne woven about with purple, which they vsed to giue to yong men, to the end to frame them by little & little to the managing of affaires. In his returne from the Senate, which was longer in breaking vp than vsually they were wont to doe, his mother asked him the cause thereof. And after many threatnings and compulsiōs, Papyrius not willing to reueale the secret of the councell, as it had bene expressely forbidden him, bethought himselfe of a subtil lie, saying, that the Senators were in great contention whether it were more expedient to agree that one man should haue two wiues, or one woman two husbands: which (quoth he) shall be determined to morrow. His mother beleeuing it, told the same to the Romane ladies her companions, who met all the next day at the entrie of the Senate, beseeching the iudges to giue a fauourable sentence for them. The matter being knowne, procured a great laughter, and made the prudence of this yong man to be greatly esteemed. But let vs speake of the other two ages of man, Mans estate beginneth when a man is euen now ripe, and setled, & groweth no more in body. This onely age is most apt and fit to attaine to vertue and honesty. For then is reason strong and powerfull in him, then is his iudgement sound, and his bodily vigor of force and strength to labour and trauell. Of the name of this age, I meane of this Latine word Vir, did vertue first take her name, which in Latine is Virtus: because this word Vir, signifieth him that is in the age of virilitie, or mans estate, as if you would say, apt to be a minister and practitioner of vertue. It is true that Isidorus confoundeth Youth (which he placeth after Adolescence) and Virilitie together: saying, that this word Vir, is a word of sexe & not of age. But herein he agreeth with vs, that the perfection of mans strength beginneth at 29. yeares, where we said that adolescence ended. In this strength a man continueth vntill 50. yeares, and then beginneth to grow weake, & to decline continually vntill death. The whole age of virilitie ought to be full of honestie and vertue, and to bring forth the effects of prudence, temperance, fortitude and iustice, whereof we haue discoursed at large. And if any man before he came to this age, had not that education and instruction which was necessarie for him (whereof wee haue already discoursed) by reason of his fathers negligence, or through the licentiousnesse of adolescence, then especially is he to take the bridle betweene his teeth in good earnest; because yet there is good time and season, yea opportunitie of great fruit, to profit in learning & vertue, so that he cannot alleadg this excuse, that he was not instructed in youth. Clitomachus of Carthage when hee was aboue 40. yeares of age, came to Athens to learne vnder Carneades, with whom he profited so well, that after his death he succeeded in his place & taught others.

M. Aurelius. Lucius being at Rome, and meeting with the Emperor Marcus Aurelius in the street with one man after him, demanded of him whither hee went. It becommeth euen an olde man (quoth he) to learne. I am going (said he) to Sextus the Philos. to learne that which I know not. Then Lucius lifting vp his hands towards heauē, cried out, O good God, I see an emperor euen gray headed carrying his booke as if he were a child to heare a lecture and to be instructed thereby: & yet most kings of the earth will not vouchsafe to looke vpon a booke at eightene yeares of age. Solon had this sentence commonly in his mouth, that he waxed old as he learned. The same day and houre that he died, being aboue 80. yeares old, and hearing some of his friends disputing of a certaine point of Philosophie, he lift vp himselfe vpon his bed after his manner as well as hee could. And being asked why he did so, To the end (quoth he) that when I haue learned that whereof you dispute, I might end my daies: and so indeede he did. For the disputation was no sooner ended but he died. Socrates learned musick when hee was very old. Terentius Varro, and Marcus Portius Cato learned Greeke when they were old. Iulianus the great lawyer vsed to say when he was very old, that although he had one foote in the graue, yet hee was desirous to learne.

Alphonsus king of Arragon, when he was 50. yeares old, learned the Latin tongue and translated Titus Livius out of Latine into Spanishe. The sixt and last age of man is called Old age, which according to Marcus Varro, and other authors, beginneth at 50. yeares, because at this age the naturall power and strength of man beginneth to decline & fade away. Isidorus calleth this time Granny, which he maketh to last vnto 70. yeares, & termeth the ouerplus of age beyond that, old age. But as neither the diuision of ages here set down, nor the terms wherein Papyrius.

Of virilitie, or mans estate.

The duty of a man at the perfection of his age.

Clitomachus.

M. Aurelius.

Solon learned to the houre
of his death.

Socrates learned musicke
being old.
T. Varro, and
M. Cato learned Greeke
when they were old.
Iulianus.
Alphonsus.
Of old age.

we haue inclosed them, could agree to the ages of our first fathers, either in the first or second age, wherein they liued commonly as many yeares as wee doe moneths; so considering the shortnes of our daies, which the Psalmist limiteth within 80. yeares at the most, I thinke wee are to follow the opinion of Varro, who calleth olde age whatsoever is aboue fifty yeares. In which age prudence is a very meete and necessary ornament, which those ancient men might attaine vnto through long vse of life, through knowledge, and through experience. Therefore it is their office to succour and helpe the yonger sort, their friends and the common wealth, by their prudence and counsell. For this cause Romulus the first founder of the citie of Rome, chose an hundred of the eldest in the city, by whose counsell hee willed that it should bee gouerned. And of these old men called in Latine Senes, came that word Senatus, which is as much to say, as an assembly or gathering together of old men, whom we now call counsellors or Senators. And albeit that men now adaeis greatly abuse those charges, yet surely they properly belong to old men, to whom it appertaineth to gouerne townes, to administer iustice, and to be a patterne and example of honesty to the yonger sort. For then haue they no time to take their ease, but (as Cicero saith) they must increafe the exercises of the soule, as they diminish the labours of the body. Let them remember that saying of the Lacedaemonian, who being asked why hee suffered his beard to grow so long: To the ende (quoth hee) that by looking vpon my white haire, I should bee put in minde not to doe any act vnbecoming this hoary whiteness. In this age that sentence of Plato ought especially to bee well thought vpon, That yong men die very soone, but that old men cannot liue long. To which effect Epaminondas said, that vntill 30. yeares it may bee thus said to men, Ye are welcome: for vntill that time they seeme still to bee comming into the world. From 30. vntill 50. yeares, they must bee saluted in this manner, Ye are in a good houre, because they are then to know what the world is. And from 50. to the end a man must say vnto them, Go in a good houre, because then they goe faire and softly, taking their leaue of the world. Old age (saith Cato to an old man that liued ill) hath sufficient deformities of it selfe, do not thou adde such as proceede from vice. For it is not grissled haire, nor a wrinkled visage that bringeth authority, but a life that is honestly led and guided according to the best end of our being, whereunto euery age is to be referred. To such old men (saith Sophocles) as haue their soules nourished with heauenly light, olde age is not grievous, and in such the desire of contemplation and knowledge increaseth as much as the pleasures of their body decreafe. Therefore when we haue passed ouer the greatest part of our daies to the profit of many, if then through weakenesse of extreame age we are constrained to leaue the managing of publike affaires, it will be very great honor, comfort, and contentation of minde vnto vs, to run the rest of our race quietly and peaceably in the study of letters, wherein delight is ioyned with honest contemplation.

Psal. 90. 10.

Prudence is the ornament of olde age.

What Senate is, and from whence it came.

What vse is to be made of a white beard. Epaminondas salutation vnto men according to their ages.

Cato. What breedeth authority in a man. Sophocles. To whom old age is not grievous.

The end of the thirteenth daies worke.

The fourteenth daies worke.

Of Policie, and of the sundry sorts of Gouvernement. Chap. 53.

A SER.

IF we are able to discerne betweene the body and the soule, betweene this present transitory life and the life to come which is eternall; we will not thinke it strange, that one part of mans building should bee created to remaine free for ever, and to bee exempted from the yoke of humane power, acknowledging onely the spirituall iurisdiction; and the other part to be in seruitude, and to receiue commandement from those humane and ciuill offices, which are to be kept amongst men. In the kingdomes of God, (saith Paul) there is neither Iew nor Gracian, neither bond nor free, neither Barbarian nor Scythian, but Iesus Christ is al in al. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith you are made free. And by and by after he addeth: Onely vse not your libertie as an occasion to the flesh, but by loue serue one another. And elsewhere he saith; Let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers: for there is no power but of God. Who soeuer therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. Whereby it appeareth that they which thinke that the maintenance of ciuill policies are the worke of

The soule is not subiect to mans iurisdiction.

Gal. 3. 18.

Col. 3. 11.

Gal. 5. 1. 13.

Rom. 13. 1. 2.

All power is of God.

The beginning and preseruation of policy is from God.

man only, are greatly deceived. For we must of necessity beleue, that it proceedeth from the counsell of God, and from his eternall providence, without which neither the round frame of the world, nor cities and townes could in any sort abide stedfast: and so that it is very necessary for their preservation, that certaine lawes should bee appointed, according vnto which men may liue honestly and iustly one with another. As there are then two chiefe regiments and governments in man, of which one respecteth the soule, and acknowledgeth no temporall king or master, but holdeth of one onely Iesus Christ according to the ministry of his word; and the other is to ordaine a ciuill iustice onely, and to reforme outward manners, whereunto the body during this life is wholly subiect; reseruing the first estate of man in his freedome according to the diuine rule and piety, we are all diligently to looke to this second estate of subiection and seruitude, which is most necessary for the maintenance of common peace and tranquillity amongst men. Now forasmuch (my Companions) as wee haue hitherto according to our weake iudgement noted the morall vertues of the soule, for the better framing of mens actions to that which is decent, and honest in this life; and following the same order haue also given rules and instructions for the government of a family, we are now to enter into this large field of humane policy, and to consider of the parts that belong vnto it, referring the chiefe scope of the handling of this matter, which otherwise would be infinite, to the ruling and preserving of our French Monarchy, for the instruction of all estates that are therein. And first we will see what ciuill policy is, and intreate briefly of the diuers kinds of governments among the ancients, that we may so much the better attaine to the knowledge of that vnder which we liue.

Of commanding and obeying.

A R A M. To commaund and to obey (saith Aristotle) are not onely necessary but also profitable: yea some things are borne to obey, and others to command, whose common end is publike benefit and ciuill iustice, which are preserved by a well established policy, and right government according to the lawes of nature.

Policie is the bond of all society.

A M A N A. Every ciuill society must bee kept in order by some policy, which is a necessarie helpe to cause a man to walke in his vocation. But as the elements cannot bee intermingled one with another, except it bee by an vnequall proportion and temperature: so I thinke that ciuill policies cannot well be preserved but by a certaine inequality, which is to be seene in all countries by diuers sorts of governments. But let vs heare A C H I T O B discourse to this effect.

There is a shew of commanding and obeying in all things.

As in harmony.

The superior
part of the world ruleth
the inferior.

The Sunne is king and the Moone

Queene among the starres.

The Moone
ruleth over al
noistures.

The Fire and Aire chiefe amongst the elements.

The Eagle,
Lion, Whale
and Pike ouer their kinds.

No people without all policie.

A C H I T O B. In all things compounded of matter and forme, commanding and obeying are so naturall, that there is some shew thereof even in all things without life: as wee see in that harmony which consisteth in voice, and in soundes; wherein the contra-tenor seemeth to commaund ouer the base. This whole inferiour world obeyeth the superiour, and is governed thereby, through a certaine vertue accompanied with light and heate, called of many Philosophers the spirit of the world, or as Plato saith, the soule of the world, which descending from the celestiall nature, and intermingling it selfe throughout the whole masse of this great body, penetrateth, quickeneth, nourisheth and moderateth all changeable things vnder the Moone. The chiefe minister and disposer of this vertue is the Sunne, whom wee acknowledge as king amongst the starres, lightning the vniuersall frame with his beames. The Moone is as it were the Queene, ruling over all moistures, and among other maruels, shewing her manifest power over the flowing and ebbing of the Ocean seas. Wee see among the Elements that the Fire and Aire through their first qualities are Actiue, and that the water and earth are Passiue, as beeing more materiall. Amongst all kindes of birdes the Eagle is president, amongst beasts the Lyon. In fresh and salt waters the mightiest fishes rule, as the Whale in the sea, and the Pike in pooles. Man ruleth over all living creatures, and in man compounded of bodie, soule, and vnderstanding the soule commaundeth over the bodie, and the vnderstanding over the desire. Wee haue also seene by proceeding from one particular man to a familie made of many persons, how the head commandeth diuersly over the parts of his house. Euen so it is necessary, that euery ciuill society, which is made one of many families tending to a generall good, should bee kept in by some policy consisting in commanding and obeying. In many places of the world there are countries where the cities are not inclosed, where there is no vse of learning, and where there are no kings. Other people there are that dwell in no houses, that vse no money, that liue with rawe flesh: in a word, that seeme to holde more of the nature of beastes than of men. And yet there are none that haue no kinde of policy established among them, or that vse no lawes or customes, whereunto they they willingly submit themselves. Neither are they without some apprehension and reverence of the diuine nature, vsing praier and sacrifices, although damnable: so straightly are these two things, Diuine Iustice and humane Politie ioyned together, that the one cannot in any sort remaine amongst men without the other. Therefore Plutarke saith, that a city will sooner stand without a foundation, than ciuill policy can bee framed and established without any religion and opinion of God, or without the preservation thereof after it is once receiued. Moreover the first agreement of people forsaking their barbarous and rusticall life, to ioine in ciuill society, was to this end, that they might haue a place of Religion to keepe them together. Religion surely is the foundation of all common-wealths, of the execution of lawes, of the obedience of subiects towards their Magistrates, of their feare towards Princes, of mutual loue amongst themselves, and of iustice towards others. Lycurgus reformed the estate of the Lacedemonians, Numa Pompilius of the Romanes, Solon of the Athenians, and Dionysius of all the Græcians generally, by making them deuout and affectionate towards the gods in praier, oathes, oracles, and prophesies, through the meanes of feare and hope of the diuine nature, which they imprinted in them. Polybius gouernour and lieutenant to Scipio Africanus, and taken for the wisest Politician of his time, saith, that the Romanes had neuer any greater meanes than religion to extend the borders of their Empire, and the glory of their famous acts ouer all the earth. Desiring therefore that religion, the truth and the law of God, all which are one, & published by the mouth of God, may continue and dwell amongst vs, let vs see what Policy is, whereunto it ought chiefly to tend, and what sundry sorts there are of establishing it, by the contrary kinds of government vsed amongst the Ancients. Policy is a word deriued of this Greeke word πολιτια, which signifieth the regiment of a citie or common wealth: and that which the Grecians call Politicall government, the Latines call the gouernment of a common-wealth, or of a ciuill societie. This word Politie hath bene taken in many significations amongst the ancients: sometime it signifieth a Burgesie, that is to say, the participation and enioying of the rights and priuiledges of a towne: sometime the manner of life vsed by some politicall person: as when one commendeth the policy of Pericles, or of Bias, that is, their kinde of gouernment: sometime also when they would note some worthy deede in the gouernment of the common-wealth, they said, That man hath wrought an act of politie this day. But the chiefe signification of this word, and that which answereth to our present discourse, is, The order and estate whereby one or many townes are gouerned, and publike affaires well managed & administrated. But before we begin to speake of the diuers sorts of Policies, that is to say, of governments of townes, of which all common wealths and Monarchies are compounded, let vs speake a word of the end of Policy, and of that marke whereat it ought especially to ayme. As all Cities and ciuill societies are appointed for the obtaining of some good, so all policie respecteth the same, and tendeth to no other thing, than to vnite & frame vs to the company of men so long as we liue amongst them: to conformance our manners to a ciuill iustice, to set vs at agreement one with another and to maintaine and preserve common peace and tranquillity, by procuring that euery one may haue his owne. It is the cause that men doe communicate together without fraud or hurt, that the insolencie of the wicked is bridled and punished: briefly, that not onely all duties of humanity are vsed amongst men, but also that some publike forme of religion appeareth, and that blasphemies against the diuine nature, and other offences which trouble common quietnesse, are not openly broched. For although it falleth not within the compasse of mans power, as we said, to prescribe and appoint by their authority any regiment and gouernment ouer soules, yet euery one is not to bee suffered to forge at his pleasure lawes concerning religion, and the manner of seruing God. But ciuill ordinance must carefully provide, that the true seruice of God be not publickly violated and polluted through an vncontrolled liberty, especially considering that the conuersation of euery well ordered policy dependeth thereupon. But we shall vnderstand this matter more at large hereafter in the particular handling of the parts of an estate, which we will diuide into three principall and generall heads, following therein the ancient Politiks, namely, into the Magistrate, the law, and the people. Now to goe on with that which was propounded vnto vs, let vs speake of those kinds of governments which were amongst the ancients. The ordinance of a city, or order amongst Magistrates, especially amongst them that had the soueraigne rule ouer all, was called of the ancients, Commonwealth, or as some others will haue it, Weale publike, which in her kinde of gouernment was named according to the quality of the chiefe rulers thereof. And those commonwealths that tended to common benefite, were said to be right, and simply iust: but if they respected the profit of the Diuine iustice and humane policie alwaies linked together.

Religion is the foundation of all estates.

The ancient lawmakers established their ordinances through the meanes of religion.

Religion the greatest meanes of enlarging the Romane Empire.

What Politie is, and from whence the word is deriued.

The diuers significations of this word Politie.

Of the end of policie.

Ciuill ordinance ought to maintaine the worship of God.

Euery estate consisteth of three parts, of the magistrate the law and the people.

When commonwealths are right and when corrupt,

superious

superiours onely, they were said to bee corrupt, and were called transgressions of right Common wealths, these beeing the cause of as much euill to the whole body of the city, as the others are of Good. For as the good or euill of an house dependeth of the father of the family; the safety or losse of a ship, of the Pilot or master; the good or ill successe of an army, of the Generall thereof: so the happinesse or unhappinesse of Townes and peoples dependeth of magistrates, and yet so that God ruleth ouer all. Common wealths then are either good or bad, right or corrupted. That is a good Common wealth, wherein the gouernours seeke the publike profit of the citizens, and the benefit of the whole ciuill society. It is called right and iust, because it hath such an ende, and seeketh after the same, taking no counsell about any thing, but onely about the preferuation of iustice. A corrupt common wealth is that which repugneth and is directly contrary to that which is good and iust, and chiefly to the ende thereof. For it seeketh onely the increase of priuate commodity, having no care of publike profit. There are three kinds of good common wealths, and three of bad, whose gouernment alwaies consisteth in the superiours of the estate, taking their appellation and name of them, as hath beene said. The first kinde of good common wealths is a Monarchy which taketh place when the soueraignty is in one alone: This respecting publike profit onely, and preferring common benefit alwaies before her owne priuate and particular commodity, taketh vpon her the name of a kingdome, or of kingly power. But if shee looke vnto his particular benefite that ruleth, seeking to reigne by an absolute will without any obseruation of iust lawes, then shee hath the name of tyranny, which is the first bad kinde of common wealth. Now forasmuch as wee liue in this kingdome, vnder the first kind of common wealth, called a kingly monarchy, we will dilate this matter, and consider thereof at large in a severall treatise, that we may the better know the excellency of it, when it is well and iustly ordained. The second kinde of a right and good common wealth is of a Greeke word called an Aristocracy, which in our language wee may interpret, the power of the best men, whom wee call in Latine Optimates, because they are accounted for the best and most vertuous men. This forme of gouernment taketh place, when a few tried and approoued men for manners and learning haue the soueraignty iointly together, and make lawes for the rest of the people, whether it bee generally or particularly, directing their thoughts to no other marke than to publike vtility and profit. This was seene most excellently among the Lacedæmonians, whose common wealth surpassed all others of her time, as well for her policie and establishment, whereof there was neuer the like, and wherein shee continued about 500. yeares, as also for the glory of her warlike acts, whereby shee held the Empire of Græcia a long time, vnder the lawes of that happy Aristocraticall gouernment, which Lycurgus established there. This man seeing their estate to incline one while to tyranny, when the kings had too much power, and another while to popular confusion, when the common people began to vsurpe too great authority, deuised with himselfe to giue them a counterpoize, that should bee healthfull for the whole body of the Common wealth, by establishing there a Senate, which was a strong barre, holding both the extremities in equall ballance, and giuing firme and steadfast footing to their estate. For the 28. Senators making the body of the Senate, sometimes tooke part with the two kings who were deprived of all soueraignty, so farre forth as was thought needfull to resist the rashnesse of the people: and contrariwise, sometimes they strengthened the peoples side against the kings, who had then but the voices of two Senators in the councell, thereby to keepe them from vsurping any tyrannicall power. True it is that their estate was not purely Aristocraticall, vntill one hundred yeares after the first establishment thereof by Lycurgus, because hee had left the confirmation and abrogation of the aduice and decrees of the Senate in the peoples power. But Polydorus and Theopompus beeing kings, and seeing how hard a matter it was to assemble all the people together, and how they ouerthrew many times the sacred decrees of the Senate, holpe themselues with an Oracle from Apollo, whereby it was signified that the Senate of thirty should from thence forth haue all power in matters of estate, in so much that of Senators they became soueraigne Lords. And to content the people, they appointed five Ephories who were chosen out of the people, as Tribunes to keepe away tyrannie. That policie then is truly Aristocraticall, wherein vertue onely is respected in the distribution of magistracies, and the benefite of the subiects is chiefly considered in the gouernment thereof. Oligarchie is opposite and contrary to this, and is the second kind of a corrupted common wealth. This is when a few noble or rich men occupie the authority and administration of the common wealth, reiecting the poorer and baser sort, and aiming at nothing but at their owne priuate and particular profit, without all care of publike commodity. These men

The good or euill estate of common wealths dependeth of the magistrates next vnder God.
The diuision of common wealths in generall.
The subdiuision of them.
Of a Monarchie.

Of a tyranny.

Of an Aristocracy, & what it signifieth.

The Lacedæmonian estate was an excellent pattern of this gouernment.

Why the Senate of Lacedæmonia was first instituted

What power the kings of Lacedæmonia had.

The policy of Polydorus & Theopompus to get the power out of the peoples hands.
Why the Ephories were appointed in Lacedæmonia
Of an Oligarchie.

men alwaies vse to take part with their like in nobility or riches, to the treading downe and oppression of the meane sort of people. Moreover, they rule all matters according to their affections, and through ambition and couetousnes take them into their owne handes, vntill some one that is mightiest among them, finde the meanes to rule absolutely, and to change the Oligarchy into a tyranny. Aristotle affirmeth that all the ancient gouernments in Sicilia were Oligarchies, among which that of the Leontines was translated into the tyranny of Panicus, that of Gela into the tyranny of Cleander, that of Rhegium into the tyranny of Anaxilas, and so of many others. The third kind of a good and right common wealth, is of a Greeke word called Timocracy, which wee may call The power of meane to indifferent wealth. This kinde of gouernment was after a peculiar sort called of the Ancients by the name of Common wealth: because this police tended most of all to publike profite, and was guided by laws and * compounded of an Oligarchy and a Democracy, which are two extreames, and of themselves vicious and corrupt. For of their mediocrities this forme of commonwealth was instituted after three sorts. First, by taking the lawes and institutions of both: secondly, by holding the mediocrity of things commanded by them: thirdly, by following the constitutions, partly of the one, and partly of the other. Aristotle speaketh of this kinde of commonwealth when he saith, That ciuill society consisting of meane persons is very good, and that those cities are well gouerned wherein there are many of the middle sort, who haue more power then both of the other parties, or at least than any one of them. For whereas many are passing rich, or extreme poore, there followeth either an extreme Democracy, or an intolerable Oligarchy, or else through their excessse, a tyranny. Now the last kind of corrupt commonwealths remaineth to be seene, which is called Democracy, where free and poore men being the greater number, are Lords of the estate. There were five sorts of them, the first, where the gouernment was equally communicated to all, the second where regard was had to wealth, although it was but small, the third, where all the citizens were partakers of the gouernment vnder the ruling of the law: the fourth, where euery one might attaine to the magistracy, so that he were a citizen, and the law ruled: the fifth, where other things being equall, the multitude commanded and not the law: and then the people onely gouerned, according to their fantasie by decrees and prouisoies, which they gaue out daily, oppressing the vertuous, rich and noble, that they might liue in all liberty. This kinde is not to be called a common wealth, seeing the lawes beare no sway, but being answerable to a tyranny, it is passing ill, and vnworthy to be numbred among Common wealths. Plato and Xenophon wrote that the Democratic of Athens was such a one, where the people was giuen ouer to all licentiousnes without either feare of Magistrates, or obseruation of lawes. Now of the three kinds of good Common wealths mentioned by vs, Aristotle, Polybius, Dionysius Halicarnassensis and Cicero, compound another, that is partaker of all three: saying, that euery kinde of Common wealth established simply, and alone by it selfe, soone degenerateth in to the next vice, if it be not moderated and kept backe by the rest. Therefore they say that a common wealth erected with a right gouernment to continue long, must haue the vertues and properties of the other Common wealths, ioyned together in her, to the ende that nothing grow out of proportion, which may cause her to degenerate into her next euill, and so consequently overthrow her. Likewise many ancient and late Politikes haue maintained, that the Commonwealths of the Lacedaemonians, Carthaginians, Romanes, and others that are famous, as that of the Venetians, were compound and mildly intermingled with the royall, Aristocraticall, and popular power. But this subiect deserueth well a seuerall discourse, which being needlesse for the vnderstanding of the matter here propounded vnto vs, wee will not stay any longer in the curious searching out of fundrie other kinds of estates and policies, which the Ancients haue drawne out of these already described. We will note therefore for the conclusion of our speech, that the reason why so many kinds of Common wealths are mentioned by the Ancients is this, because euery city is compounded of many parts, the diuersitie of which, according as they were in greater number and power, caused them to varie the names of gouernments. But to auoide confusion and obscuritie, we may say, that if the soueraignty consisteth in one only Prince, the Estate is Monarchicall: if all the people haue interest in it, the Estate is popular: and if onely the least part of them haue the chiefe power, the Estate is Aristocraticall. But if their forme of gouernment be contrarie to their nature, they take another qualitie, but change not their essence. Moreover wee say, that the preleruation of euery publike societie dependeth of the policie well ordained, without which there can be nothing but disorder and confusion among men. Wee say, that policie is the order of a city in the

How an Oligarchy is changed into a tyranny with examples thereof. Of a Timocracy. His meaning is, that it is ruled by some lawes taken from each of these.

Of a Democracy. Five kinds thereof, according to Aristotle in his 4. booke of Politic. cap. 4.

Athena a Democraticall Estate.

Of a mixt kinde of common-wealth.

Examples hereof.

The perfectest distinction of common-wealths. There is difference betwene the estate and the gouernment of a commonwealth.

Examples of the popular estate.
Of the Ari-
stocraticall.
Of the Mo-
narchie.

offices of Magistracie, namely, in the chiefe of all, in whose government the whole Common-wealth consisteth: which if it be in the peoples hands, is called Popular, as in the Cantons of Switzerland, and leagues of the Grisons, in many free townes in Germany, and in old time was in Athens: if in the hands of certaine persons, as of the gentlemen of Venice, and of some families in Genes, it is called Aristocraticall: if it dependeth of the will of one alone, it is called a Monarchy, as in France, Spaine, Portingale, England, Scotland, Sweathland, Polonia. Further we say, that the diuersitie of government among cities and peoples, dependeth of their end: if they tend to a good end, which is to publike benefite, they are good and iust: but if to an ill end, namely, to the particular profite of such as command, they are euill and vniust.

Of the soueraigne Magistrate, and of his authoritie and office. Chap. 54.

What right i.
T O B.

The foundation of euery
estate is the soueraignie
thereof.
Euery estate
consisteth of three parts.

The magistrate is the image of God

The wisest
must rule.

Why God di-stributeth his gifts diuersly
to diuers men.

A well gouer-
ned family
resembleth
the kingly
regiment.

Gen. 10. 10.
Of the origi-nall of king-
domes.

A C H I. V E commonly say that that thing is rightly done, which is done according to the order and institution of policy. Neither is right any other thing amongst vs, than the order of that estate vnder which we liue, the soueraignty whereof is the sure foundation, vnion and bond of all the particulars in one perfect body of a common-wealth. And when iudgements are exercised by the Magistrates, when the will of iustice is declared by the exposition of the lawes and of right, and when we direct our actions vnder iustice, then is the order of ciuill societie duly obserued. Hereupon in our last discourse we said, that the estate of a Common-wealth was compounded of three generall parts, of the Magistrate, of the Law, and of the People. Thus following our purpose, let vs intreate particularly of these parts, whereof euery Common-wealth consisteth: and first let vs consider of the chiefe Magistrate, and of his authority and office.

A S E R. All ciuill superioritie is a holy and lawfull vocation before God. And as iustice is the end of the law, and the law a worke of the Magistrate, so also the Magistrate is the image of God, who ruleth and gouerneth all, according to which mould and patterne hee must fashion himselfe through the meanes of vertue.

A M A N A. As in a man that is well disposed both in body and soule according to nature not corrupted, the soule ruleth and commandeth with reason, being the better part, and the body with the affections thereof serue and obey, as the worse part: so is it in euery humane assembly. It belongeth to the wisest to rule, and to such as are lesse aduised to obey. Therefore the Magistrate must aboue all things labour, that hee be not vnworthy of that person which he sustaineth. But let vs heare A R A M discourse of this matter which is here propounded vnto vs.

A R A M. God being carefull of all things, euen of the very least, and comprehending in himselfe the beginning, end, and midst of them, according to his good pleasure, and making all in all by his onely Spirit, respecting the common good of this whole frame, and preservation of humane societie, hath from time to time distributed to sundry persons distinct and different graces, that in exercising diuers estates, charges, administrations, offices, handicrafts, and occupations, they might through mutuall succour and interchangeable helpe preserve and maintaine themselves. This is that which wee see in cities amongst ciuill companies, which is as much to say, as a multitude of men vnlike in qualities and conditions, as rich, poore, free, bond, noble, vile, skilfull, ignorant, artificers, laborers: some obeying, others commanding, and all communicating together in one place their arts, handicrafts, occupations, and exercises, to this end that they may liue the better, and more commodiously. They obey also the same Magistrates, lawes, and soueraigne counsell, which Plato calleth the Anchor, head, and soule of the citie: which naturally tendeth to some order and rule of dominion, as that which tooke beginning and increase from persons acquainted with a government that resembleth the royall regiment, as appeareth in euery well ordered familie, and hath already beene touched of vs. The first soueraigne government was established either by the violence of the mightiest, as Thucydides, Cesar, Plutarke, and others write: and the holy historie testifieth the same vnto vs, and putteth this opinion out of doubt, where it is said, that Nimrod Chams nephew, was the first that brought men into subiection by force and violence, establishing his principalitie in the kingdome of Assyria: Or if any will beleuee

Demosthenes

Demosthenes, Aristotle, and Cicero, the first soueraigne was instituted vpon their will and good liking, who for their owne commodity, rest and securitie, submitted themselves to such as excelled most in vertue in those times, which they called heroicall. Who knoweth not (saith Cicero in his oration for Seftius) that the nature of men was sometimes such, that not hauing naturall equity as yet written, they wandred vp and downe beeing disperfed in the fields, and had nothing but that which they could catch and keepe forceably by murders and wounds? Wherefore some excellling in vertue and counsell, and knowing the docilitie and vnderstanding of man, gathered the disperfed together into one place, and brought them from the rudenesse wherein they were, vnto iustice and gentlenesse. Then they established those things that belonged to common profit, which wee call publike, and appointed assemblies, afterward called cities, and walled about, their buildings ioyned together, which wee call townes, hauing first found out both diuine and humane equitie. At the same time the authoritie of Magistrates tooke place, who were instituted by the consent of the people, for that excellent heroicall vertue, which they saw in those first Rectors and Ordainers of ciuill societie, to whom was committed the iurisdiction of lawes, or receiued customes, and the disposition of written equitie to rule and gouerne their people thereafter. But not to stay long about the diuersitie of those opinions, which wee haue here alleadged for the establishment of the soueraigntie, this is out of question, that the foundation of euery common wealth dependeth thereupon, and that it is the absolute and perpetuall power of the common wealth, and is not limited either in power, or charge, or for a certaine time. This soueraigntie is in him or them that are chiefe of the Estate: and a little king is as much a soueraigne as the greatest Monarch of the earth. For a great kingdome (saith Cassiodorus) is nothing else but a great common wealth, vnder the keeping of one chiefe soueraigne. But before wee intreate more amply of his authoritie and office, it behooueth vs to render a reason of the name of Magistrate, which is heere giuen vnto him. This word Magistrate, hath bene taken of the Ancients in diuers significations: and Plato maketh seuen teene sorts of them, calling some necessary Magistrates, others honorable. Aristotle said, that they ought chiefly to bee called Magistrates, that haue power to take counsell, to iudge, and to command, but especially to command. And this doth the Greeke word ἀρχαι and ἀρχοντες, sufficiently declare, as if hee would say, Commanders; and the Latine word Magistratus, being a word of commanding, signifieth to master, and to exercise dominion. Also the Dictator, who had the greatest power to command, was called of the Ancients, Magister populi. Therefore albeit the name of Magistrate hath bene heretofore, and is yet giuen to all that haue publike and ordinary charge in the Estate, yet wee will as it were abuse this name a little, by transferring it to the Soueraigne of all, of whom all Magistrates, lawes, and ordinances of the Common wealth depend. Now let vs see whether this vocation of the Magistrate bee lawfull and approoued of God. Wee haue not onely infinite testimonies in the Scripture, that the estate of Magistrates is acceptable before God, but which is more, it is adorned with honourable titles, that the dignitie thereof might bee singularly commended vnto vs. When wee see that all men placed in authoritie are called gods, wee must not esteeme this title to be of small importance, seeing it appeareth thereby, that they are authorized by him, and represent his Maiestie in the ruling and gouerning of vs. If the Scripture (as that heauenly Word saith) called them gods, vnto whom the word of God was giuen, what is that else but that they haue charge and commission from God to serue him in there office, and (as Moses and Iosaphat said to their Iudges, whom they appointed ouer euery city of Iudah) to exercise iustice, not in the name of men, but in the name of God? By mee (saith the wisdom of God) kings reigne, and princes decree iustice. By mee princes rule, and the nobles, and all the iudges of the earth. Moreouer wee see, that many holy men haue obtained kingdoms, as Dauid, Iosias, Ezechias: some governments and great estates vnder Kings, as Iosaphat and Daniel: others the guiding of a free people, as Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, whose calling and estate was acceptable to God, as hee hath declared by his Spirit. Wherefore no man ought to doubt of this, that ciuill superiority is not onely a holy and lawfull calling before God, but also the holiest and most honourable of all other, whereunto all the people is subiect, as well by the establishment of the right of the estate, as by the holy and heauenly ordinance of God. And if the Magistrate bee perswaded (as it is most certaine, that many Estates haue had that foundation) that the cause of his first institution, and voluntarie subiection whereunto the people submitted themselves for their common benefite, was that excellencie of vertue, which appeared in some about the rest, ought he not to thinke himselfe

Cicero his opinion therein.

What soueraigntie is.

A little king almost as much a Soueraigne as the greatest Monarch. Of the name of Magistrate.

The Dictator of Rome was called Magister populi.

The calling of Magistrates preued to be lawfull. Psalm 82.6.

Ioh 10.39.

2. Chron. 19.6.

Pro. 8.15.16.

The calling of the magistrate is most holy.

He is the minister of Gods justice.
Good counsellor for magistrates

The Magistrate compared to the heart of a living creature.

And to a carpenters rule.

The Magistrate is in the Common wealth that which reason is in the soule. The example of the magistrate is the best way to teach the people. Whereunto the prince is bound as well as his subiect.

The duty of the Magistrate consisteth in three things. The art roiall Philosophical and political is all one.

unworthy of so honorable a title, if hee want the cause of the beginning thereof? But further, if the magistrate know that hee is appointed the minister of Gods justice, unto what great integritie, prudence, clemencie, moderation, and innocency, ought hee to conforme and frame himselfe? With what confidence dare hee suffer any iniquitie to haue entrance into his seate, which hee vnderstandeth to bee the throne of the living God? With what boldnesse will hee pronounce any vniust sentence out of his mouth, which hee knoweth is appointed to bee an instrument of the truth of God? With what conscience will hee subscribe to, or seale any euill statute with his hand, which hee knoweth is ordained to write the decrees of God? To be short, if the Magistrate call to minde, that as God hath placed the Sun and Moone in the heauens as a token of his diuinitie, so he is also appointed in the earth for the like representation & light, will he not think that he is to imploy & bestow al his care and study, that he may represent unto men in all his doings: as it were an image of the providence, defence, goodnes, clemency, & iustice of God? It is certain that the Magistrate is the same thing in the Common wealth, which the heart is in the body of a living creature. If the heart be sound & pure, it giueth life vnto the whole body, because it is the fountain of the blood, and of the spirits: but being corrupted, it bringeth death and destruction to al the members. So fareth it with the Magistrate, who is the soule of the people, their glas, and the white whereat all his subiects aime. If he liue vnder right reason, truth, & iustice, which are the proper will of God onely, he is not vnlike to a line or rule, which being first right it self, afterward correcteth all other crooked things that are applyed vnto it. For nothing is more naturall, than that subiects should conforme themselves to the maners, deeds, & words of their prince. The wise Hebrew, Plato, Cicero, and Titus, Liuius, haue left this Maxime vnto posterity as an infallible rule of Estate. And Theodericus king of the Gothes, writing to the Senate of Rome goeth yet farther, vsing these words, as Cassiodorus rehearseth them: That the course of nature would sooner faile, than the people would leaue off to be like their prince. but further, as the heart in the bodies of living creatures is last corrupted, inso much that the last relicks of life seeme to abide therein, so it is meet, that, if any disease corrupt the people, the soueraigne Magistrate should continue pure and sound vnto the end from all that pollution. If there bee any euill in the soule, it proceedeth from the wickednes of the body, beeing subiect to peruerse affections, and looke what good thing soeuer is in the body, it floweth from the soule, as from the fountain therof. Now as it would be against nature, if the euils of the body should come from the soule, and the good gifts of the body should bee corrupted by the vices of the spirit, so would it be very absurd, that corrupt maners, euil laws, vice, and vngodlines should proceede from the Magistrate vnto the people, seeing (as Plato saith, hee holdeth the same place in the common wealth, that reason doth in the soule, which guideth the other parts by wisdom. And forasmuch as the whole Common wealth representeth but one certaine body compounded of diuers members, whereof the Magistrate is the Head and most excellent of all, he must also vse such equity, that he profite every one of them, and beware that he be not contagious to the whole publike body through his euil example. The people (saith Seneca) giue more credite to their eyes, than to their eares, that is to say, they beleue that which they see, sooner than that which they heare. And to instruct the people by precepts, is a long and difficult way; but to teach them by examples is very short, and of greater efficacy. I therefore the Magistrate must be more carefull of that which he doth, than of that which he speaketh. And that which he prescribeth his subiects for a rule, as it were by law, must be confirmed of him by his workes and deeds. For as he is chiefly bound to follow the lawes of God and nature, so he must make all those lawes and statutes, which he establisheth in his estate, according to that patterne. And therefore one of the Auncients saide very well, that the prince together with his subiects, had one and the same God to serue, one lawe to keepe, and one death to feare. We will then briefly comprehend the duty of the Magistrate in these three things, in ruling, in teaching, and in iudging his people: which are so neerely knitte and ioyned together, that the one cannot bee well exercised without the other, and he that faithfully dischargeth one, fulfilleth them all. For this cause Plato saith, that the art & science of the King, of the philosopher, and of the Politian, is one and the same, because they consist all three in knowing how to rule, to teach, and to iudge well. Hee saith also, that the onely way to procure true quietnesse and most happie felicitie in Common wealths is when by some diuine providence the soueraigne authority of Magistracy meeteth with the will of a wise Philosopher in one person, that vertue may bee superiour, and vice suppressed. And if such a gouernour ouer people is to be accounted very happy, they are

are no lesse happie that may heare the excellent discourses, and good instructions which proceed from his mouth. Besides, when they see vertue after a lively sort imprinted in a visible patterne, and that the Magistrates life is such an example, they become wise of their owne accord. Then is force, constraint, or threatening, needlesse to bring them to their duty, as they that conforme themselves to an upright and good life in friendship, charitie, and concord, one with another. So that we may boldly say, that hee is by nature most woorthie of soueraigne authoritie, who is able by his vertue to imprint in mens hearts the like disposition and affection to liue well and vertuously. But forasmuch as few vertuous men are found, and soueraigne Magistrates are not commonly chosen out of that small number, but come to that authoritie for the most part by succession: it is no maruell if there bee but few such Magistrates, as wee haue heere described: nay, it is rather greatly to bee wondered at, if any one among a great manie become very excellent. Notwithstanding, as their soueraignie is nothing lesse ouer their subiects, who owe fidelitie and obedience vnto them: so are they alwaies bound to doe their dutie and office toward them, which consisteth in ministring iustice, counsell, comfort, aide, and protection. Moreover, because insolencie and rebellious wickednesse is alwaies to bee found in some corrupt persons, who neither by teaching, nor by example of good life will bee brought to vertue, but perseuere in committing a thousand impious and vniust actions: for the punishment of such, the sword is put into the Magistrates hand, both by the law of God and man, that as the Minister of God hee should serue his wrath, and take vengeance of them that doe euill. This is that which is so expressly commanded to Magistrates in infinite places of the Scripture, vnder these words: Doe iudgement and iustice: iustice in deliuering him that is oppressed by force, from the hand of the oppressor, in not grieuing strangers, widowes, and orphants, in offering no iniurie to any, in shedding no innocent blood, and in dealing vprightly with euery one: and Iudgement in resisting the boldnesse of the wicked, in repressing their impudency and violence, and in punishing their faults. It is an abomination to kings (saith the wise man) to commit wickednes: for the throne is established by iustice. A king that sitteth in the throne of iudgement, chaseth away all euill with his eyes. A wise king scattereth the wicked, and canseth the wheele to turne over them. Take the drosse from the silver, and there shall proceede a vessell for the finer. Take away the wicked from the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness. As well he that iustifieth the wicked, as he that condemneth the iust, is an abomination vnto God. The people and nation curse him that saith to the wicked, thou art iust. Yea, an offence is to bee imputed as much or more to him that suffereth it to be done, when he may and is bound to slay it, than to him that committeth the same. And if it be a point of true iustice in Magistrates to persecute the wicked with drawne sword, let not them that wil needs (forsooth) abstaine from al severity, and keepe their hands pure from blood, whilest the swords of the wicked are drawne out to commit murder and violence: I say, let them not doubt but they themselves shall bee iudged guiltie of great iniustice before the diuine Maiestie. It is true, that gentlenesse and clemencie most of all becometh a great and excellent man, and is one principall vertue necessary for a Magistrate. Notwithstanding it must be so ruled, that for the benefit of the Commonwealth, severity and rigor bee ioined therewith: because it is vnpossible to rule and gouerne a multitude without this. And yet it is not the part either of a wise Physitian, or of a good gouernour of an estate, to set hand to the iron, except in great necessity, when there is no other remedy. For if they doe otherwise, as there is want of discretion in both, so most of all in the Magistrate, because iniustice also is ioined with crueltie. So that it is necessary both in clemency and rigor to keepe some honest meane by right reason, and prudence, to the end that the inconueniences of both may beeschued. This is that which Isoocrates, speaking of the manner of reigning well teacheth, when he saith, that man must be seuer in searching out of faults, and merciful in imposing punishments that are lesse then the faults, gouerning men more by clemencie and prudence than by rigor and cruelty. And seeing it falleth out so, that an ouerseuer Magistrate becometh odious, and that he is contemned and despised who is too gracious, a wise man must be both ciuill and graue: grauitie being comely in commanding, and ciuility necessary for him that conuerseth with men. For the conclusion therefore of our discourse, we learne, that both by the establishment of euery estate and policie, and by a holy and heauenly decree, we are subiect to the soueraigne Magistrate, who is lawfully ordayned to rule, to teach, and to iudge vs in all things that respect this present life, and the preservation of ciuill society. We learne that seeing he is the image of God vpon earth, he must conforme himselfe as much as hee is able to the perfection of all goodnes and iustice, that hee may bring on them that are committed to his charge, to godlinesse and vertue by his example

Who is most worthy of soueraigne authoritie. Why there are so few vertuous Princes.

Wherein the duty of the chiefe Magistrate consisteth.

Why the sword is put into the Magistrates hand Ier. 22. 3.

What is meant by this precept.

Doe Iudgement and Iustice.

Pro. 16. 12. & 20. 8, 16.

Pro. 23. 4, 5.

He that suffereth euill, is culpable as well as he that committeth it

Severity and clemency are to be linked together in a Magistrate.

Ciuility and grauity must be ioined both together in a Magistrate. The dutie of the Magistrate.

ample: and that it is his duty to honor the good, and to punish the euill, declaring thereby that he is the protector and preseruer of publike tranquility, honesty, innocency, and modestly, and appointed to maintaine the common safety, and peace of all men.

Of the Law. Chap. 55.

All motions contained vnder one, & all causes vnder the first.

ARAM.

AS wee note in the vniuersall frame of the world, that many vnlike motions are contained within one heavenly motion, which is alwaies to it self, and all causes by the first cause, as in every living creature many sundry members distinct in office, are comprised and brought into vnion and agreement by the soule & hart: so in every Common wealth compounded of many differing parts, necessary for the establishment thereof, the law is the blood that giueth vertue and life vnto it, the bond that reduceth all the parts thereof to vnitie, and the firme preseruer of ciuill society. Therefore seeing (my Companions) wee haue discoursed of the first part of every ciuill estate and government, which is the chiefe Magistrate, let vs consider now of the second, no lesse necessary therein, which is the law, wherby he is loyned and vnited to the rest of the publike body for the maintenance and preservation thereof.

The law is the blood and bond of the Common-wealth.

ACHITOB. The law is in the city, as the spirit is in the body. For as the body without the spirit vndoubtedly perisheth, in like manner every citie and Common wealth that hath no law, falleth into ruine and perdition. Therefore Cicero calleth lawes the soules of Common wealths.

The law is the spirit and soule of the common-wealth.

ASER. As the soule guideth the body, and induceth it with ability to worke: so the Law is the direction and maintenance of every estate. By the Law is the Magistrate obeyed, and the subiects kept in peace and quietnesse. Bus let vs heare AMANA handle this matter.

All creatures are sociable by nature.

AMANA. Wee see that naturally all living creatures, whether earthly, aery, or flying tame, or wilde, seeke after the companies and assemblies of their kindes, to liue with them, as Sheepe by flockes, Kine Oxen, Harts, and Hindes, feeding by heards, Horses, Asses, and Mules by companies: Choughs, Srares, Cranes, & other birds by Flights, Fishes both in fresh and salt waters following one another in shoales, Bees dwelling in hives, Pigeons in dove houses, Ants in little hollow places. No maruell therefore if men singularly adorned with an immortall soule, with reason and speech, and by these prerogatiues more communicable than other creatures, as borne to honour God, to loue one another, to liue together in a ciuill policy with laws, Magistrates, and iudgements, hauing proper to themselves only the knowledge of good and euill, of honesty, and of dishonesty, of iustice and iniustice, knowing the beginnings and causes of things, their proceedings, antecedents, and consequents, their similitudes and contrarieties, no maruell I say, if they liue more commodiously and happily together, and do that by right and equity, which other living creatures doe onely by a naturall instinct, seeing also they may be assured (as Cicero saith) that nothing here below is more acceptable to God the gouernour of all the world, than the congregations and assemblies of men linked together by right and equitie, which we call cities. Now we are to note, that all those which obey the same laws & Magistrates, make iointly together but one city, which (as Aristotle saith) is every company assembly together for some benefit. If a city be assembled in a Monarch wise, it is to be defended against strangers, and to liue peaceably among themselves, according to law: if Aristocratically vnder certain chiefe lords, it is to be respected according to their riches, nobility & vertue, if in a popalar community, it is to enioy libertie & equality, & the better that the city is guided by policy, the greater benefit they hope for thereby. Therefore as the Venetians make but one citie, liuing vnder an Aristocraticall gouernment: the Bernians another, liuing vnder a Democracy, whether they liue within or without the wals, or far from the chief towne: so all the naturall subiects of this Monarchy, acknowledging one king for their souerain lord, and obeying his commandements, and the decrees of his counsell, represent one city & political communion, compounded of many villages, townes, and provinces, prouostshippes, baliweekes, Seneshalships, governments, Parliaments, Barronies, Counties, Marquesies, Dukedomes, Cures, Bishoprickes, Archbishoprickes, beeing in and of it selfe sufficiently furnished with all necessary and honest things, for the leading of a good and vertuous life, and obeying the statutes, lawes and ordinances established therein, according to which the Magistrate ought to rule and to gouerne his subiects, shewing thereby thereby, that albeit they be not subiect to the law, yet hee will (as it becometh him) liue and gouerne himselfe vnder the law. Therefore the Magistrates is very well called by some a living law, and the law a mute Magistrate. Moreover, the marke of a soueraigne prince, of which dependeth whatsoeuer he doth by his imperiall authority, is the power to prescribe lawes vnto all in generall, and to euery one in particular, and not to receive any but of God, who is the iudge of Princes, (saith Marcus Aurelius) as Princes are the iudges of their subiects; yea it is God (saith the wise man) that will proceede with rigour against them for the contempt of his law. So that they which say generally, that princes are no more subiect to lawes, than to their owne covenants, if they except not the lawes of God and of nature, and those iust covenants and bargains that are made with them, they are iniurious to God. And as for their power to abrogate such lawes by their absolute authority, it is no more permitted vnto them than the other seeing the power of a soueraigne is onely ouer the ciuill or positue lawes. But that wee may haue some certaine vnderstanding of the matter here propounded vnto vs to intreate of, we must first see what the law is, into how many kindes it is diuided, whereunto it ought to tend, the profit of it, and how we must obey it. The law is a singular reason imprinted in nature, commanding those things that are to be done, and forbidding the contrary. Wee haue both the law of nature, and the law written. The law of nature is a sense and feeling, which euery one hath in himselfe, and in his conscience, whereby he discerneth betweene good & euill, as much as sufficeth to take from him the cloke of ignorance, in that he is reprooued euen by his owne witnes. The written law is double, diuine, and ciuill. The diuine law is diuided into three parts, that is, into Manners, Ceremonies, and Iudgments. That of manners was called of the auncient writers the Morall law, being the true and eternall rule of Iustice, appointed for all men, in what country or time soeuer they liue, if they will direct their life according to the will of God. And as for the Ceremonies and Iudgements; although they haue some relation to manners, yet because both of them might bee altered and abolished without the corruption or diminution of good manners, the auncients did not comprehend those two parts vnder the word Morall, but attributed his name particularly to the first part of the law, of which the sincere integrity of Manners dependeth, which neither may nor ought in any sort to be altered or changed, and whereunto the end of all other lawes is to be referred, in honouring God by a pure faith, and by godlines, and in being ioyned vnto our neighbour by true loue. The ceremoniall law was a Pedagogie of the Iewes, that is to say, a doctrine of infancy giuen to that people to exercise them vnder the obedience to God, vntill the manifestation of these things which are then figured in shadows. The Iudiciall law giuen vnto them for policy, taught them certaine rules of iustice and equity, whereby they might liue peaceably together without hurting one another. Now, as the exercise of ceremonies appertained to the doctrine of piety, which is the first part of the Morall law (because it nourished the Iewish Church in the reuerence of God) and yet was distinct from true piety: in like manner, albeit the Iudiciall law tended to no other end than to the preservation of the selfe same charity that is commanded in the Morall law, yet it had a distinct property, which was not expressely declared in the commandement of charity. As therefore the ceremonies were abrogated, and true religion and piety, I meane Christian, substituted in place of the Iudiciall law: so the iudiciary lawes were cancelled and abolished, without violating in any sort the duty of charity. So that all nations haue liberty to make for themselves such lawes as they shall thinke expedient for them, called of vs ciuill lawes, which must be squared according to the eternall rule of charity, and differing onely in forme, they must all haue one end, commanding alwaies honest and vertuous things, and contrariwise forbidding those that are dishonest and vicious. Now of these ciuill lawes, there are two chiefe kinds amongst vs. The first consisteth in lawes that are ratified and established, vpon which euery Monarchy and publike gouernment is first grounded, and hath his beginning, which ought not in any wise to be infringed or changed: such are those which we call the lawes of the French men: namely, the Salicke law, established by Pharamond, who was the first that tooke vpon him the name of king ouer them. Such lawes also are annexed & vnited to the crown, & therefore the prince cannot so abrogate them, but that his successor may disanull whatsoeuer hee hath done in preiudice of them, much lesse are subiects permitted to attempt any such matter, yea al those that go about it, seeke nothing but to moue sedition in the Estate, and to cause subiects to reuolt from their superiors. As for the other ciuill lawes, as Constitutions, Ordinances, Edicts, and Customes, which haue bene made and receiued according to the condition and circumstance of times and places, they are in the power of the soueraigne Prince, to

What a city is The diuers end of the three good Common-wealths.

A king must liue vnder a law, albeit he be not subiect to the law. The marke of a soueraigne. W 163. How far princes are subiect to lawes. Wherein the absolute power of princes consisteth.

The definition of the law. The diuision of it. What the law of nature is. The diuision of the written law. The diuision of the law of God. Of the Morall law.

Of the Ceremoniall law. Of the Iudiciall law.

Of ciuill or positue lawes. The diuision of ciuill lawes. What ciuill lawes may not be changed. The Salicke law immutable.

What ciuill lawes may be changed.

A prince may deny the request of his three estates, hauing reason and iustice on his side.

The change of lawes in a well settled Estate is dangerous.

A seuer decree of the Locrians against such as would bring in new lawes.

Mischiefes in a commonwealth must be resisted in the beginning.

The Law is the foundation of ciuill societies.

Bias.

We must not iudge of the law but according to the law

Why the Lacedæmonian lawes might not bee changed.

The ancient lawmakers.

No law before the law of God.

The necessity and profite of a law.

change and to correct them as occasion shall serue. And yet in the generall and particular customes of this Realme, none haue beene commonly changed, but after the lawfull assemblie of three generall Estates of France, or else of the particular Estates of euery Province: not as if the king were necessarilie bound to stand to their aduice, or might not doe contrarie to that which they demand, if naturall reason and iustice stand with his will. And then whatsoever it pleaseth him to like or dislike, to command or forbid, is held for a Law, an Edict, and Decree, and euery subiect is bound to obey it. But to speake generally of the lawes of an Estate, the changing and gainsaying of them is a very pernicious plague in euerie commonwealth. This auncient rule and Maxime of wise Politickes, is well woorth the marking: That nothing is to bee changed in the lawes of a Common wealth which hath a long time preserved it selfe in good estate, what apparant profite soeuer a man may pretend. And for this cause in the popular gouernment of the Romans vnder Publius Philo the Dictator, that Athenian Edict was receiued, and past by force of Law, whereby it was not lawfull for any to present a request to the people, without the aduice of the Senate. But there was a farre more strict and seuer decree amongst the Locrians. For it was to this effect (as Demosthenes rehearseth) that euery citizen that was desirous to bring in a new law, should come and declare it publikelie before the people with a halter about his necke, to the ende that if his new lawe was not thought meete to bee receiued, and very profitable for the common wealth, hee might presently bee strangled as a worthie reward for his rashnesse. In euerie societie (saith Aristotle) that is well instituted and ordained by lawes, great care is to be taken that no part of the law, although neuer so little be diminished or changed: yea, most heed is to be had of that which is done by little and little. For if resistance bee not then made, it falleth out in the Common wealth, as in the diseased bodie of a man, wherein the disease, if speedy remedie bee not vsed in the beginning thereof, increaseth by little and little, and that which might easily haue beene cured, through negligence is made incurable. Men neuer begin (saith Paulus Æmilius the Romane Consell) to alter and change the estate of a Common wealth, but by making their first entrance with some notorious resisting of the lawes. And therefore we must thinke that the preservation of the principall foundation of a Politike Estate is left at random, when men neglect the care of keeping diligently the constitutions thereof, how light, or of smal importance soeuer they seeme to bee. For seeing the law is the sure foundation of euery ciuill societie, if that faile, it must needs be, that the whole politicall building will fall to ruine. Therefore Bias the wise said, that the Estate of that Commonwealth is happy, wherein all the inhabitants feare the law as a seuer Tyrant. For then whatsoever it requireth, is vndoubtedly performed. After the law is once established and approoued (saith Isidorus) we must not iudge of it, but iudge according vnto it. That is the best policy (saith Chilon one of the Sages of Gracia) where the people harken more to lawes, than to the Oratours. This also was the cause that Pausanias the Lacedæmonian made this answer to one who demanded of him, why it was not lawfull in their countrey to alter any of their ancient lawes. Thereason is (quoth hee) because the lawes must bee Mistresses ouer men, and not men Maisters ouer the lawes. Moreouer, the antiquitie and profit of lawes are so euidēt, that it is so needlesse to make any long discourse thereof here. Moses was the first lawmaker of the Hebrewes; Mercurius Trismegistus one of the Egyptians; Phoronius the king of the Gracians; Solon of the Athenians; Lycurgus of the Lacedæmonians; Anacarsis of the Scythians; Numa Pompilius of the Romans. Tenne noble men were chosen by the Senate and people of Rome, to translate and to expound the lawes of the twelve tables. We haue already declared how Pharamond made ours. The greatest and best part of the lawes of Germanie was established by Charles the great, Emperour and King of France. And so all regions haue had diuers lawmakers, according to the condition and circumstance of time, place, and countrey. True it is, that before the publishing of the law of God, there was no lawmaker of whome we haue any knowledge: and surely not so much as one word of a law is to be found in all the workes of Homer, or Orpheus, or of any before Moses. But Princes iudged and commanded all things by their soueraigne power, which kinde of gouernment beeing more tyrannicall than kingly, could not be of any continuance or assurance, because there was no bond to knit the great with the small, and so consequently no agreement. Besides, this is out of doubt, that all the subiects of an Estate stand in neede of a law, as of a light to guide them in the darknesse of humane actions: especiallie it is necessarie for the terrifying of the wicked, who might pretend some true cause of their ignorance, or some probable colour of their wickednesse, or at least some shewe why they should escape the punishment, which is not imprinted in our hearts, as things forbidden by nature. Neuerthelesse it is not the lawe that maketh a right government, but vpright iustice, and the equall distribution thereof, which ought to bee surer ingrauen in the mindes of good kings and princes, than in tables of stone. And it is to small purpose to multiply Edicts and Decrees, if they bee not seuerely obserued: yea the first signe that a man may haue of the losse of an Estate, is when there appeareth an vbridled licence and a facilitie in dispensing with good statutes, and when new decrees are daily consulted of. And if the estate be already troubled, the heaping vp of lawes vpon lawes is no lesse dangerous for it, than a multitude of medicines in a weake stomacke; whereas contrariwise, new introductions and abuses are then especially to be taken away, and things brought backe againe to their first and ancient forme. Histories teach vs, that when Edicts and decrees were most of all multiplied, then did tyranny gather greatest strength. As it fell out vnder the tyrant Caligula, who published decrees of all sorts both good and bad, and those written in so small a letter, that men could not reade them, to the end that hee might thereby snare those that were ignorant. His successor Claudius made twenty edicts in one day, and yet tyranny was neuer so cruell, nor men more wicked than at that time. Therefore let the lawes and good ordinances of an estate bee inuiolable, straightly kept, and subiect to dispensation, not fauourable to great men, but common and equall to all, and then shall the bond of ciuill society bee surely tyed. Now whereas I saide, that all nations haue liberty to prescribe and frame ciuill lawes for themselues, my meaning was not to approoue certaine barbarous and beastly lawes receiued of some people: as those lawes which allowed theeeues a certaine reward, which permitted the companie of men and women indifferently, and innumerable others more dishonest, which are not onely void of all iustice, but euen of all humanity. But these two things must bee kept inuolably in all lawes, namely, The ordinance of the Law, and the equity of it, vpon the reason whereof the ordinance is grounded. Equitie is alwaies one and the same to all people, because it is naturall. Therefore all the lawes in the world, of what matter soeuer they are, must meete in the same equitie. Concerning the ordinance of the law, because it is ioyned with circumstances, no inconuenience letteth but that it may bee diuers among fundry nations, provided alwaies, that they all tende alike to the same marke of equity. Now seeing the diuine lawe which wee call morall, is nothing else but a testimony of the law of nature, and of the conscience that is imprinted in all mens hearts, no doubt but this equity whereof wee now speake, is wholly declared and comprehended therein. Therefore it is meete that this equity onely should bee the white, rule and end of all lawes. For (as S. Augustine saith in his booke of the city of God) every law that beareth not the image of the diuine law, is a vaine censure. And iustice is the end of euery law well established; which is the cause why S. Paul so greatly extolleth the vigour of the law, calling it the bond of perfection. Those lawes then which are squared out by this heavenly rule, which tend to this end, and are limited out by this measure, ought to bee receiued and followed cherefully, albeit they differ from the Mosaicall law, or otherwise one from another. For many haue denied (and some amongst vs are yet of that opinion) that no common wealth can bee well and iustly instituted and ordained, if leauing the policie of Moses, it bee gouerned by the common lawes of other nations: which is so absurd a thing, and would bee the cause of so great confusion in the policies of the world, that there needeth no great store of arguments to prooue it vaine and friuolous. Moreover, by that distinction of the law which wee haue already set downe in our discourse, it appeareth sufficiently, that the opinion of these doters is grounded vpon a meere ignorance of the will of God. The Lawe of God forbiddeth stealing, and diuers paines and punishments are appointed for the same in the policy of the Iewes, according to the kinde, time, and place of the theft. The ancientest lawes of other nations punished theeeues by causing them to restore double that which they had stolne. Those lawes which followed made a distinction betweene open & secret theft: others vsed banishments, & some death. The law of God forbids false witnes bearing which was punished amongst the Iewes with the same punishment that the partie falsely accused should haue incurred, if hee had bene found guilty. In some other Countries there was no punishment for it but publike ignominie and shame: and in some also the gibbet. Briefly, all the lawes in the world with one common consent, how different soeuer they bee, tend to one and the same ende, pronouncing sentence of condemnation against those crimes that are condemned by the eternall Law of God: onely they agree not in equality of punishment, which is neither necessary nor expedient. There is some such countie that would speedily become desolate through murders and robberies, if it did not

The vpright & equal distribution of the law maketh a good government.

To dispence with good statutes, & daily to make new, is a token of the decay of a commonwealth. Examples thereof in Caligula, and in Claudius.

How laws may be kept inuolable.

Two things required in the keeping of euery law.

Equitie is alwaies one & the same to all people. The equitie of the morall law ought to be the end and rule of all other lawes.

Their opinion is confuted, who would tie all nations to the policies of Moses.

These punished diuersely in diuers nations. How false witnes was punished among the Iewes.

Ciuill ordinances depend onely of the soue-
raigne ruler.

The ende
whereunto all lawes are to be referred,

exercise horrible and grievous punishments vpon the offenders in those crimes. There falleth out some such time as requireth increase of punishments. Some such nation there is that standeth in neede of some grievous correction to bee appointed for some speciall vice, wherunto otherwise it would bee more giuen than other nations. Hee that should bee offended at this diuersity, which is most meete to maintaine the obseruation of the Law of God, would bee not bee thought to haue a malicious minde, and to enuy publike benefit and quietnesse. For the conclusion of our present speech, let vs learne, that ciuil lawes and ordinances depend onely of the soueraigne ruler, and that he may change them according to the occurrence and benefit of state affaires. Let vs learne that all lawes must bee referred to the infallible rule of the iustice and will of God, and to the common profit of ciuill society: that he which commandeth vs to obey Magistrates not onely for feare of punishment, but also for conscience sake, requireth of vs such obedience to their lawes and ordinances: so that he is accursed that infringeth or contemneth them. Therefore we must voluntarily submit our selues vnto them, so that their generall end be to set an order and policy amongst vs, and not dispute of their reason and cause, as long as their iurisdiction extendeth not to our soules to lay vpon them a new rule of iustice.

Of the People, and of their obedience due to the Magistrate, and to the Law. Chap. 56.

A M A N V E haue hitherto seene, that the preservation of policies dependeth on the obseruation of the law; that the soueraigne magistrate ruleth thereby, and vseth it as a bond to reduce to vnity and agreement all the Citizens of one Commonwealth, beeing vnlike in calling, and liuing vnder his dominion: at which marke every good politicke gouernor ought chiefly to aime. Now (my Companions) wee are to intreate of this third part of a city, which maketh the politike body perfect and absolute, namely, of the people, and of that obedience which they ought to yeeld to the magistrate and to the law.

The Magi-
strate is the
head, the law,
the soule, and
the people,
the body of the commonwealth.

A R A M. The whole common wealth fareth well or ill, as all her parts, euen to the least, are ruled, and containe themselves within the compasse of their dutie. For all of them together make but one body, whereof the magistrate is the head, and the law the soule that giueth life vnto it. Wherefore it is very needefull that these should alwaies commaund, and the other obey.

A C H I T O B. Whatsoeuer profiteth the whole, profiteth the part, and that which is commodious to the part, is also commodious to the whole: and so contrariwise. Wherefore to obey well, which is necessarily required of the people, is greatly auailable to the whole politticall body. Now let vs heare A S E R handle this matter vnto vs more at large.

The noun &
verbe are no
parts of Logike but of Grammar.

A S E R. In every discipline the beginning is commonly taken from the least parts thereof. Grammer taketh his beginning from letters, which are the least things in it: Logicke from the two least parts thereof, namely, the Nowne, and the Verbe. Geometrie from the point: Arithmeticke from Vnity: Musicke from the Minnem and Sembrie, which are likewise the least parts thereof. Therefore hauing seene that policy is the order and life of the city, and that the city is a multitude of citizens, before wee speake of the whole body of them, we must (as I thinke) intreate first of a citizen, who, although he differ according to the diuersitie of common wealth, yet to take him properly, may bee said to bee every one that hath right to iudge in his city, and hath a deliberative voice in the generall or common councill thereof. This definition of a citizen cannot fitly bee applied to all citizens of all Commonwealths, but onely to those that are ruled popularly, wherein they are all equall, and gouerne themselves by assemblies, in which every one hath libertie to speake his aduice. Some define a citizen to bee hee whose parents are citizens: or else, to bee a free subiect holding of the soueraigntie of another: wherein they adde this word Free, to distinguish him from slaues and strangers. But generally wee may say, that whosoever may beare offices, or magistracy, in what forme of government soeuer, it is reputed and taked for a citizen: & such are all the naturall Frenchmen in this monarchy, amongst whom there is not one, how base soeuer he be, that may not be made noble by vertue, or that may not by skill and integrity of life attaine to the greatest estates of iustice, of treasury, & of other publike charges. This is not seene in all common wealths. For in the Seigniorie of Venice it seemeth that none are truly citizens

The definitio
of a citizen in a popular state
Other definitions of a citizen.
A generall definition of a citizen.

citizens; but the lords and nobles, who onely enjoy the office of magistracie, and may enter into the great Councell after they have attained the age of five and twentie yeares. As for the people they intermeddle not with any matter of government, this onely excepted, that they may be Secretaries and Chancellors, as Contarenius reporteth. The citie of Rome having many times sundry governments, the appellation of a citizen was likewise diuers therein. Foraslong as the first kings ruled, the common people were altogether excluded from publike honors and offices. But after when the regall power was changed into the government of a certaine number of men, chosen by suffrages and common voices, the people were admitted to magistracies, and to the managing of affaires, being present at the publike assembly had in Mars his fiede, which was distributed by tribes, wards, companies; and centuries, to deliberate of the common estate, to create magistrates, and to decree new lawes: where he was reputed for a citizen indeed, that was a free man, that had both house and tribe, and possibilitie to attaine to honour, enjoying besides many other priuiledges and prerogatiues. But when the soueraigntie came into the Emperors hands, those assemblies continued onely vnder Iulius and Octavianus, and after were abrogated by Tiberius, and translated to the Senat, and to the absolute power of the Prince, taking away all authoritie from the people in publike matters. Now to returne to our former assertion, wee say, that all they are citizens to whom the gate that leadeth to the government of the citie lieth open, I meane the whole company of them that liue vnder the same lawes and soueraigne magistrates. Such are all the subiects and naturall vassals of our king, of whom the people and the nobility are the two orders of estates, and of them is the estate of the Church compounded, which maketh one part of the common wealth of France. This selfe same distinction of citizens is obserued almost throughout all Europe. But besides this generall diuision, there are some more speciall in many common wealths, as at Venice, into the Gentlemen, Burgeses, and Common people. And our ancient Gaules, had the Druides, the Horsemen, and the inferior people. In Egypt were the Priests, the Souldiers, and the Artificers. And although Plato laboured to make all the citizens of his common wealth equall in rights and prerogatiues, yet hee diuided them into three estates, into Gardes, Souldiers, and Labourers. Whereupon we must necessarily infer this conclusion, that there neuer was, nor can be Common wealth, wherein the citizens were equall in all rights and prerogatiues, but that some had more or lesse than others, and yet so, that wise Politikes haue carefully provided, that the meanest should haue no cause to complaine of their estate. Moreover, the conueniency and proportionable agreement of our French estates, hath bene the cause why this kingdome (vntill this our infortunate age) hath continued and prospered so long amongst other kingdomes both of ancient and late times, namely, when Goods, Honours, and publike charges were ordinarily distributed, according to the condition of euery estate, and their rights and priuiledges preserved: especially when it was carefully provided, that one estate should not grow too great above the other, I meane, that the nobility should not keepe the people too much vnder, and bring them to a desperate estate: and that the people through their trafficke, offices of iudgements, and receipts for the prince which they exercised, and benefits which they enjoyed, should not excessively enrich themselves, to the preiudice of the Nobility, nor get into their hands, the land of the Nobles, who being impouerished could not sustaine the charges of warre, nor serueth the king in his armies. But the neglect of this foresight, and the great inequality of riches among the estates (that one part which was wont to be poorest, being now become richer than both the other two) is the cause of great wounds in the bodie of this monarchie. The poore people being oppressed by both the other estates, is fallen vnder the burthen like to Aesops asse, And the horse that would carry nothing, I meane the nobility and clergy, are constrained, some to beare their tenth and extraordinary subsidies, and others to sel their living to goe to warre at their owne charges. But this thing deserue a long discourse by it selfe, and may hereafter be touched more fitly than at this time. Let vs then generally consider of our proposition, namely, of the duty of all those subiects which liue vnder one estate and policie. First, it is necessary that they should haue the estate of the magistrate in great estimation, acknowledging it to bee a commission and charge given by God, and therefore they must honour and reuerence him, as one that representeth vnto them the heauenly Empire over all creatures. For as God hath placed the Sunne in the heavens as an image of his diuine nature, which lighteth, heateth, quickneth, and nourisheth all things created for mans vse, either in heauen or earth: so the soueraigne magistrate is the like representation of light in a citie or kingdome, especially so long as the feare of God, and obseruation of

Of the state of Venice.

Of the ancient estate in Rome.

Who are truly
citizens.

The diuision
of the whole people into three orders
or estates.

The diuision
of citizens in Venice and Florence.

In Egypt and among the ancient Gaules.

These gardes
were the Senate & coun-
cell for state
affaires, constituting of 400.
Burgeses.

Of the agreement that is to be kept betweene the estate of a commonwealth.

One cause of the misery of France at this present.

The office
and duty of subiects.

The soue-
raigne magistrate compared to the Sunne.

iustice

Against them
that think the magistrate to be a necessary
euill.

Prou. 24. 31.

What is meant by honouring the king.

Rom. 13. 5.

Subjects must obey their prince for the feare of God.

Of the seruice due to the prince.

Rom. 13. 1, 2.

Tit. 3. 1.

1. Pet. 2. 13,

14.

1. Tim. 2. 1, 2.

Private men must not bu-sic themselves
in publike
affaires.

The counsellors of a prince are his eyes and eares:
and his officers are his hands.

Two kinds of publike power.

The difference betweene the prince, the magistrate,
and the pri-
uate man.

How far subjects are bound to obey their prince and his lawes.

The titles of a good magistrate.

injustice are imprinted in his heart. Some are obedient ynough to their magistrates, and would not but that there should be some superiour vnto whom they might be subiect, because they know it to be expedient for common benefit: yet they haue no other opinion of a magistrate, but that he is a necessary euill for mankind. But when wee know that wee are commanded to honour the king, to feare God and the king, which we finde often in the Scripture, we must vnderstand that this word to honour, comprehendeth vnder it a good opinion and estimation, which we must haue of the soueraigne magistrate, and that the ioyning of the king with God, must cause vs to attribute great dignity and reuerence vnto him, in respect of that power which is giuen him from his maiesty. Likewise when it is said, that we must be subiect to the higher powers, not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake, it is to honour them with an excellent title and to binde vs to obey them for the feare of God, and as wee will obey his ordinance, because their power dependeth of him. Of this honour and reuerence it followeth, that we must submit our selues vnto them in all obedience, whether it be in yeelding to their ordinances or hefts, in the payment of imposts and subsidies, or in receiuing such publike charges, as it shall please them to commit vnto vs. Briefly, every subiect is bound to serue his prince with goods and life, which is the personall seruice of a naturall subiect, not as a hireling that serues at will, whereas the other seruice is necessary. Let every soule (saith Saint Paul) be subiect to the higher powers. For whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. He writeth also to Titus in this manner. Put them in remembrance that they bee obedient and ready to every good worke. Submit your selues (saith S. Peter) vnto all manner ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be vnto the king, as vnto the superiour, or vnto gouernours, as vnto them that are sent of him for the punishment of euill doers, and for the praise of them that doe well. Moreover, to the end that subiects should testifie, that they obey not dissemblingly, but of a free and willing minde, Saint Paul addeth, that they must by prayers to God recommend their preservation and prosperity vnder whom they liue. I exhort (saith he) that first of all supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giuing of thanks be made for all men, for kings and for all that are in authority, that we may leade a quiet and peaceable life in all godlinesse and honesty. Neither let any man deceiue himselfe herein. For seeing no man can resist the Magistrates without resisting God, howsoever some may thinke, that a weake and powerlesse magistrate may be contemned without punishment, yet God is strong and mighty to reuenge the contempt of his ordinance. Besides, vnder this obedience is contained that moderation which all private persons ought to obserue in publike affaires, namely, that they must not of their owne motion intermeddle in the government or reformation of them, nor take vpon them rashly any part of the magistrates office, nor to attempt any publike thing. If there be any fault in the common policie that needeth amendment, they must not therefore stirre at all therein, nor take to themselves authority to redresse it, or once to put too their helping hands, which in that respect are as it were bound behind them. But they are to shew it to the superiour, who onely hath his hand vnbound to dispose and order publike matters, and if he then command them to deale therein, they may put it in execution, as beeing furnished with publike authoritie. For, as we vse to call the counsellors of a prince, his eyes and eares, because they must be vigilant for him, so we may also call those men his hands, whom hee hath appointed to execute such things as are to be done. And to these we owe honour and obedience, seeing the force of the lawes consisteth in their commandement. These are the magistrates and officers established by the soueraigne, and armed with power to compell the subiects to obey his lawes, or else to punish them. Whereby wee see two kinds of commanding with publike power, the one in chiefe, which is absolute, indefinite and aboue the lawes, aboue magistrates and priuate men: the other is lawfull, subiect to the lawes and to the soueraigne, which power properly belongeth to them that haue extraordinary power to command, as long as their commission lasteth. The soueraigne prince acknowledgeth (after God) none greater than himselfe: the magistrate holdeth his power (after God) of the soueraigne prince, and is alwaies subiect to him and to his lawes. Private men acknowledge after God (who must alwaies be first) their soueraigne prince, his lawes and his magistrates, every one in his place of iurisdiction. They are bound to obey them, even then (which is repeated in many lawes) when they command any thing contrary to publike profite, or against ciuill iustice, so that it be not against the law of God and of nature. Now forasmuch as when we intreated of the soueraigne magistrate, we described him such a one as he ought to be, answering truly to his title, that is to say, a father of the countrey which he gouerneth, a sheepeheard of his people, the gardian of peace, protector of iustice, and preseruer of innocencie, that man might well be iudged judged to be beside himselfe that would reprehend such a government. But because it commonly falleth out, that most princes wander farre out of the right way, and that some having no care to doe their duty, sleepe in their delights and pleasures, others fixing their hearts upon covetousnesse, set to sale all lawes, priviledges, rights and iudgements: some spoile the poore people by overcharging them with imposts and exactions to furnish their prodigalitie and vnmeasurable dissolutenesse: others exercise open robberies, in sacking houses, violating of virgins and married women, in murdering innocents, or suffering such violence to be done vnder them by the ministers and bauds of their pleasures: some also oppresse the nobilitie, even the princes of their blood, to shew fauour to base persons, and those strangers, despising worthy men that are their naturall subiects and vassals: I say, considering these things, it will be very hard, yea altogether impossible, to perswade a great many, that such are to be acknowledged for princes and true superiours, and that we must of necessity obey them so farre as we may without offending our consciences consecrated to God onely. For this affection is rooted in the hearts of men, to hate and detest tyrants no lesse than they loue and reuerence iust kings. So that when amongst such lothsome vices, so farre estranged not onely from the duty of a magistrate, but also from all humanitie, they see in their soueraigne no forme of the image of God, which ought to shine in him, no shew of a minister giuen from aboue for the praise of good men, and execution of vengeance vpon the wicked, they are easily driven forward to hate and to contemne him, and finally, to rebell against him. But if we direct our sight to the word of God, it will leade vs a great deale further. For it will make vs obedient, not onely to the rule of those princes which execute their office according to iustice, but to them also that do nothing lesse than their duty. It telleth vs, that whatsoeuer they are, they haue their authoritie from God onely: the good, as mirrors of his goodnesse; the bad, as scourges of his wrath to punish the iniquitie of the people: but both the one and the other, authorized from him with the same dignitie and maiesty in regard of their subiects. Therefore in respect of obedience and reuerence, we owe as much to the vniust, as to the iust Prince. Which thing because it is so hardly beleued amongst men, and lesse practised now than euer, I will insitt a little longer in the ptoofe of my saying by testimonies of the Scripture, then we haue vsed to doe in our other discourses. First, I desire every one diligently to consider and mark the prouidence of God, and that speciall working wherby he vseth to distribute kingdomes, and to establish such kings as he thinkes good, whereof mention is often made in the Scripture. As it is written in Daniel: He changeth the time and seasons: he taketh away kings: he setteth vp kings, that lining men may know, that the most High hath power ouer the kingdome of men, and giueth it to whomsoeuer he will, and appointeth ouer it the most abiect among men. It is well knowne what manner of king Nebuchadnezzar was, euen hee that tooke Ierusalem, namely, a great theefe, and a robber: Notwithstanding God affirmeth by the prophet Ezechiel, *That he gaue him the land of Egypt for the reward of his worke, and for the wages of his armie wherewith he had serued him in spoiling and sacking Tyrus. And Daniel said vnto him: O king thou art a king of kings: for the God of heauen hath giuen thee a kingdome, power, strength and glory. When wee heare that he was appointed king by God, we must withall call to minde the heavenly ordinance, which commandeth vs to feare and honour the king, and then we will not doubt to yeeld to a wicked tyrant that honour which God hath thought him meet for. When Samuel declared to the people of Israel what they should suffer of their kings, not onely according to the rights and priuiledges of his maiesty, but by tyrannicall customes and fashions, namely, that they would take their sons and daughters to serue them, their lands, vines and gardens, to giue them to their seruants, contrary to the commandement of the law of God: yet he enioyned them all obedience, leauing them no lawfull occasion to resist their king. I haue (saith the Lord in Jeremy) made the earth, the man, and the beast that are vpon the ground, by my great power, and by my outstretched arme, and haue giuen it vnto whom it pleased me. But now I haue giuen all these lands into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar the king of Babel my seruant, and the beasts of the fields haue I also giuen him to serue him. And all nations shall serue him and his sonnes sonnes, vntill the very time of his land come also. And the nation and kingdome which will not serue the same Nabuchadnezzar king of Babel, and that will not put their necke vnder the yoke of the king of Babel, the same nation will I visite (saith the Lord) with the sword, famine, and pestilence. Wherefore serue the king of Babel and liue. We know by these words with what great obedience God would haue this peruerse and cruell tyrant to be honoured, only for this reason, because he was lift vp by his hand vnto that roiall maiesty. Now if wee are bound to beleue as much of all the kings of the earth, these foolish & seditious thoughts should neuer come vnto our minds, that a king must be handled according as he deserueth,*

The behauiour of euill princes.

Tyrants are naturally hated.

We must obey and reuerence vniust princes as well as iust.

Dan. 2. 21.

& 4. 14.

Nabuchad-

nezzar.

Eze. 29. 18. 19

Dan. 3. 37.

1. Sam. 8.

Ier. 27. 5 &c.

A tyrant called the seruuant of God

and that it standeth not with reason, that we should account our selues his subiects, who for his part behaueth not himselfe towards vs as a king. There is in the same prophet a commandement of God to his people to desire the prosperity of Babylon, wherein they were held captiues, and to pray for it, because in the peace thereof they should haue peace. Behold how the Israelites were commanded to pray for his prosperity, who had spoiled them of their goods and possessions, carried them into exile, and brought them into miserable bondage: so farre off is it, that they were permitted to rebell against him. Although Dauid already elected king by the will of God, and annointed with holy oyle, was vniustly pursued of Saul, yet hee said.

1. Sam. 24. 7.
& 26. 10.

Dauid would not lay violent hands vp-
on Sauls person.

These Essai, or Essau, were a superstitious sect among the Iewes,
that pretended to leade
a most perfect
kinde of life.

Exod. 22. 28.

A gentleman
iudged to die,
because he once thought to haue killed
his prince.
A seuerer law against treason.

How we must behaue our selues vnder
a tyrant.
Psal. 82. 1.
& 2. 12.
Elsay 10. 1.

The Lord keepe me from doing that thing to my master the Lords annointed, to lay my hand upon him. For who can lay his hand upon the Lords annointed and bee guiltlesse? As the Lord liueth either the Lord shall smite him, or his day shall come to die, or he shall descend into battell and perish. The Lord keepe me from laying my hand upon the Lords annointed. This word is directed to vs all, and it ought to reach vs not to lift out the life of our soueraigne prince, but to content our selues with this knowledge, that by the will of God he is established and set in an estate, that is full of inuiolable maiesty. Moreouer, we read in Iosephus, that the holiest men that euer were among the Hebrewes, called Essai, that is to say, true practisers of the law of God, maintained this, that soueraigne princes, whatsoever they were, ought to bee inuiolable to their subiects, as they that were sacred and sent of God. Neither is there any thing more vsuall in all the holy Scriptures, than the prohibition to kill or to seeke the life or honour, not onely of the prince, but also of inferiour magistrates, although (saith the Scripture) they be wicked. And it is said in Exodus, Thou shalt not rase upon the iudges, neither speake euill of the ruler of thy people. Now, if he that doth so is guilty of treason, both against the diuine and humane maiesty, what punishment is sufficient for him that seeketh after their life? According to mens lawes, not onely that subiect is guilty of high treason that hath killed his soueraigne prince, but he also that attempted it, that gaue counsell, that consented to it, that thought it. Yea, he that was neuer preuented nor taken in the manner, in this point of the soueraigne the law accounteth him as condemned already: and iudgeth him culpable of death that thought once in times past to haue seized vpon the life of his Prince, notwithstanding any repentance that followed. And truly there was a gentleman of Normandy, who confessed to a Franciscan frier, that he once minded to haue killed king Francis the first, but repented him of that euill thought. The frier gaue him absolution, but yet afterward told the king thereof, who sent the gentleman to the Parliament of Paris there to be tryed, where he was by commou consent condemned to die, and after executed. Amongst the Macedonians there was a law that condemned to death five of their next kinsfolks that were conuicted of conspiracy against their prince. We see then the straight obligation whereby we are bound vnto our princes both by diuine and humane right. Wherefore if it so fall out that we are cruelly vexed by a prince voide of humanity, or else polled and burthened with exactions by one that is couetous or prodigall: or despised and ill defended by a carelesse prince, yea afflicted for true piety by a sacrilegious and vnbeleeuing soueraigne, or otherwise most vniustly and cruelly intreated, first let vs cal to minde our offences committed against God, which vndoubtedly he correcteth by such scourges. Secondly, let vs thinke thus with our selues that it belongeth not to vs to remedy such euils, being permitted onely to call vpon God for helpe, in whose hands are the hearts of kings, & alteration of kingdomes. It is God, who (as Dauid saith) sitteth among the gods, that shall iudge them: at whose only looke all those kings and iudges of the earth, shall fall and bee confounded, who haue not kissed his Sonne Iesus Christ, but haue decreed vniust lawes, to oppresse the poore in iudgement, and to scatter the lawfull right of the weake, that they may preie vpon the widowes, and poll the orphans. Thus let all people learne, that it is their duty aboue all things to beware of contemning or violating the authoritie of their superiours, which ought to be full of maiesty vnto them, seeing it is confirmed by God with so many sentences and testimonies, yea although it be in the hands of most vnworthy persons, who by their wickednesse make it odious (as much as in them lieth) and contemptible. Moreouer, they must learne that they must obey their lawes and ordinances, and take nothing in hand that is against the priuiledges and markes of soueraigntie. Then shall we be most happy, if we consecrate our soules to God onely, and dedicate our bodies, liues and goods, to the seruice of our Prince.

The end of the fourteenth daies worke.

THE

Of a Monarchie.

The fifteenth daies worke.

253

Of a Monarchy, or Regall power. Chap. 57.

ASER

When we began yesterday to intreat of the sundry kinds of estates and governments that haue beene in force amongst men, and of the excellency or deformitie of them, wee referred to a further consideration the monarchy or kingly power, vnder which we liue in France. This forme of regiment by the common consent of the worthiest Philosophers and most excellent men, hath beene alwaies taken for the best, happiest, and most assured common wealth of all others, as that wherein all the lawes of nature guide vs: whether we look to this little world, which hath but one body, and ouer all the members one only head, of which the will, motion and sense depend, or whether we take this great world, which hath but one soueraigne God, whether we cast vp our eyes to heauen, we shall see but one sun, or look vpon these sociable creatures below, we see that they cannot abide the rule of many amongst them. But I leaue to you (my Companions) the discourse of this matter.

The lawes of nature lead vs to a monarchy.

In euery kind of thing one excelleth.

AMANA. Among all creatures, both with & without life, we alwaies finde one that hath the preheminence aboue the rest of his kind. Among all reasonable creatures, Man: among beasts the Lion is taken for chief, among birds, the Eagle, among graine, wheat, among drinks, wine among spices, baulme among all mettals, gold: among all the elements, the fire. By which naturall demonstration wee may iudge, that the kingly monarchicall government draweth nearest to nature of all others.

ARAM. The principality of one alone is more conformable, and more significant to represent the diuine and ineffable principalitie of God, who alone ruleth all things, than the power of many ouer a politicall body. Notwithstanding there hath bin many notable men that haue iudged a monarchy, not to be the best forme of government that may bee among men. But it is your duty (ACHITO) to handle vs this matter.

A Monarchy most significantly representeth the diuine regimē

ACHITO. This controuersie hath alwaies beene very great among those that haue intreated of the formes of policies and governments of estates, namely, Whether it bee more agreeable to nature, and more profitable for mankind to liue vnder the rule of one alone, than of many, neither side wanting arguments to proue their opinion. Now although it be but a vain occupation for priuat men, who haue no authority to ordain publik matters, to dispute which is the best estate of policie, and a greater point of rashnesse to determine thereof simply: seeing the chiefest things consisteth in circumstances, yet to content curious mindes, and to make them more willing to beare that yoke vnto which both diuine and humane nature and equity hath subiected them, I purpose here to weigh their strongest reasons that haue misliked a Monarchy, to the ende that by contrary concluding arguments, which maintaine and defendit, both they and wee may bee so much the more stirred vp, to range our selues willingly vnder the happie and lawfull rule of our king, considering the agreement and participation which it hath with all the good pollicies that can be named, as also the happinesse and certaine benefit that commeth to vs, as wel in respect of this our our priuate life, as of the common prosperitie of the publike bodie, vnto which we owe our selues. First, wee will note that a Monarchy, a kingdom, or royal power, signifie one and the same thing, namely, one kinde of Common wealth, wherein the absolute soueraignty consisteth in one onely Prince, who may not bee commanded by any, but may command all. If there be two princes of equall power in one estate, neither the one nor the other is soueraigne. But a man may well say, that both together haue the soueraignty of the Estat, which is comprehended vnder this word Oligarchy, and is properly called a Duarchie, which may continue so long as these two princes agree, otherwise it must needs be that the one will overthrow the other. Therefore to auoide discord, the Emperours divided the estate into two parts, the one taking himselfe for Emperour of the East, the other of the West: and yet the edicts and ordinances were published by the common consent of both princes, to serue both their Empires. But as soone as they fell in debate, both the Empires were indeede diuided, both for power, for laws, and for estate. He therefore may be called a Monarch that of himselfe alone hath power to prescribe lawes to all in generall, and to euery one in particular.

What a Monarchy or kingly power is.

Of a Duarchie, that is of the rule of two.

The deuision of the Empire

Y

And

Eight marks of soueraignty

Their reasons
who mislike a Monarchy.
What excellency is required in him
that ruleth
others.

The persian councell held for the establishing of their estate.
Otanes orati-
on,

The effects of a Tyrant.

Megabyfes
oration for an Aristocracy

The dangers of a Monarchy.

And vnder this power are comprehended all the other rights & marks of soueraignty, which the lawyers call legal rights, & handleth severally, which neuertheles we may comprehend vnder eight soueraigne marks: namely, to make and to abrogate a law: to proclaime war, or to make peace, to take knowledge in the last appeale of the iudgment of all Magistrates, to appoint or to dis appoint the greatest officers, to charge or discharge the subiects of taxes and subsidies, to grant tolerations and dispensations against the rigor of lawes, to enhance or to pull downe the title, value, and constant rate of money, to cause subiects and liege people to sweare that they will bee faithfull without exception, to him vnto whom the oath is due. Now, to enter into that matter, which we purposed especially to handle, namely, whether a Monarchy be more profitable, than any other forme of estate, many haue maintained that it is a dangerous thing to liue vnder the rule of one onely king or prince, because it is a very hard matter to finde one perfect in all points, as every King or Prince must of necessity be, if he will deserue that name, according to that which Cyrus Monarch of the Persians said, That it belonged to none to command, if he were not better than all those ouer whom hee commanded. Moreover, although it were possible to finde one of that perfection which is required, yet were it a thing alwaies to be greatly feared, that by reason of humane frailtie, and of the great licencethat kings haue to execute their wils, he would change both condition and nature, and of a king become a tyrant, of which there are infinite examples set downe in histories, yea it is certaine and granted by the greatest part of them that haue written of state matters, that every kind of common wealth that is established simply, and alone by it selfe, quickly degenerateth into the next vice, if it be not moderated and held backe by the rest. As a king dome is soone changed into a tyranny, an Aristocracy into an Oligarchy, and so of the other. But this danger is greater in a Monarchy (as they say that mislike it) than vnder the rule of many, because it is vnlikely, that all of them should bee wicked, and if any one bee so, the good men may bridle him. And so they conclude, that it is not so dangerous a matter to liue vnder the government of many, as of one, who may more easily corrupt his nature, becoming a Monarch, than many can doe that are elected in an Aristocracy, as the Areopagiticall Lord in Athens, the Ephories in Lacedemonia, and the Senate in Rome. After the death of Cambyfes Monarch of the Persians, when the chiefe Lords of the kingdome had slain that Magus who vnder the name Smerdis, had vsurped the rule of the estate, they deliberated of the affaires, and helde a generall Councell, wherein (as Herodotus writeth) many very woorthie and memorable speeches were vttered. Otanes mooued this, that the affaires might bee gouerned in common by the Persians, speaking vnto them in this manner. I am not of opinion, that one of vs from hence forward should be sole Monarch ouer all, because it is neither pleasant nor good to haue it so. For ye know to what insolency Cambyfes was growne, yee haue also thoroughly seene the boldnesse of the Magus, and ye may thinke with your selues how perillous a thing it is to haue a Monarchy, which may doe what it list, not being subiect to correction. The best man in the world placed in his estate, will soone bee carried away with his woonted thoughts. Insolency possesseth him, because of present prosperitie and hatred is soone bred in such a man. Now hauing these two vices, he aboundeth in all iniquitie, & committeth great iniustice, one while through insolency, another while of hatred. Although a tyrant, hauing abundance of all good things, should be farre from enuie, yet the contrary faileth out in him towards his subiects. For he hateth good men that liue and prosper well, he delighteth in the wicked, and gladly heareth euill reports of other men. And which becommeth him very ill, if you admire and praise him moderately, hee is angry that you doe it not excessiue, and yet if you doe so, hee wil mislike it, thinking that you flatter him. Besides, which is woorst of all, he changeth the lawes and customes of the countrey, forceth women, killeth good men, not taking knowledge of their cause. This did this persian lord conclude, that a Monarchy was to be left, and a Democracy to be chosen. Megabyfes one of his companions, liked well the abolishing of a Monarchy, but perswaded the Aristocraticall government, saying, that nothing was more ignorant, or more insolent, than an vnprofitable multitude. Therefore it was in no wise tolerable, that eschuing the insolency of a tyrant, they should fall into the hands of an vnbrideled and disordered people. Many others haue noted great dangers and discommodities in a Monarchy, especially in the change of the Monarch, whether it be from ill to good, or from good to better. For wee commonly see at the changing of princes, new deuices, new lawes, new officers, new friendes, new forme of liuing. Because princes ordinarily take delight in changing, and in remouing almost all things, that men might speake of, them, which many times bringeth great great discommodities to their subiects. But if this were not so, and the prince as wise as heart could wish, yet the alliances, and leagues made by a mans predecessour, and with him which is the cause that alliances ending, the neighbours betake them to armes, and the strongest assaulteth the weakest, or else prescribeth him lawes. For many maintaine, that the successours of Princes are not bound to the treaties and obligations of their Predecessours, if they bee not their heires. Another inconuenience to bee feared in a Monarchy, is the danger of falling into ciuill warre, through the diuision of those that aspire to the crowne, and namely, if there bee right of election, which oftentimes draweth after it the ruine of the estate. But put the case there where no strife for the Monarchy, yet if the Monarch bee a childe, there will bee diuision for the government of him, betweene the mother and the Princes, or betwixt the Princes themselves. Also when God purposeth to bee reuenged vpon nations, hee threatneth to giue them children for princes. And although the Childe hath a tutour by the appointment of the predecessour, or by custome yet is there danger of making himselfe soueraigne Lord, of which thing histories set downe many examples before our eyes. If a yong Prince freed from tutours, come to the crowne, his government is no lesse to bee feared. For beeing then set at libertie when his lusts are most violent, you shall see nothing in his court but fooleries, maskings, and loose behauiour. If he be warlike, he wil hazard his subiects, his estate, & his person, to make triall of his valure. Briefely, a crafty and wicked Monarch will establish a tyranny: a cruell man will make a slaughter house of the Common wealth: a whoore master will make it a stewes: a couetous wretch will pull off both haire and skinne from his subiects: a prodigall prince will sucke the blood and marrow, to glut a dozen of horse leaches about his person: a foolish and ignorant prince will doe woorse, falling easily into the most of these vices, for want of iudgement to knowe and to make choice of counsell, necessary for the government of his Estate. These are the chiefe reasons of them that mislike a Monarchy. Now wee will alleadge the other reasons in the defence of it, and beginne with Darius his declaration vpon the speeches of his companions, rehearsed by vs in the generall Councell of the Persians, because it is well woorthy to bee remembred, according vnto which the Monarchie was concluded of in the councell. In my iudgement (saide hee to the assemblie) Megabyfes saide well concerning the multitude, but ill in that which belongeth to an Oligarchy. For although there be three kinds of Policies, a Democracy, an Oligarchy, and a Monarchy, and all good, yet I say this last is farre better than the other, because there is nothing so good as the government of one vertuous man alone, who iudging thereafter, gouerneth his people without reprehension. I will not speake of the counsellors which he taketh in like manner against his enemies and ill willers. But in an Oligarchie, where many busie themselves with publike affaires, great enmities arise between them, from whence proceede seditions, and from seditions Murders, and by murders some one attaineth to a Monarchy. Whereby you may easily know how much better a Monarchy is. Astouching the people, it is impossible but that where they rule, there should be much wickednes, which increasing in the euill gouernours of the Common wealth, breedeth not hatred betweene them, but great friendship. For they that are euill affected towards the Common wealth, hide one anothers counsell, vntil some one man being set ouer the people, cause them to giue ouer. Then is that man admired, and therewithall made a Monarch, whereby also it is euident, that a Monarchy is best. Wherefore my aduice is, that, seeing wee haue bene set at liberty by one onely man, wee should maintaine that Estate, otherwise we shall disanul the lawes of our countrey, that are already well established, which will not turne to the best for vs. Dionysius Halicarnassensis in his antiquities of Rome, affirmeth that the like speech was vsed before Romulus, where he first established the gouernment in Rome, where Amulius concluded for the Monarchy, as Darius did among the Persians. The same question was deliberated of by Augustus among his friends, because hee desired nothing more than to liue in rest, and to giue ouer the Estate: but it was then concluded, that a Monarchy was best for the Common wealth, and the event prooued the same. For before the Romanes could not liue tenne yeares without ciuill warre or sedition: whereas Augustus preserved them almost fiftie yeares in perfect peace, which continued also long time after his death. Demosthenes in his first Olynthiacke oration, sheweth the Atheniens what aduantage a Monarch hath in the deliberation and execution of great enterprises, speaking in this manner. It is greatly auailable for the speedy and commodious execution of warlike exploits, when one man alone hath the oversight of all enterprises, both secret and open, and withall is Captaine, Lord, and treasurer, and alwaies present at the affaires. But who can denie, that it is not a great

A child prince is a token of Gods wrath.

Darius prati-
on for a Monarchy.

Against an Oligarchy.

A Monarchie
concluded vp on in the cou-cel of the Persians, of Romulus, and of Augustus.

The commodities of a Monarchy.

deale better for great and mightie nations to bee governed Monarchically, to the end that they may maintaine themselves in vnitie at home, and abroade in reputation? Especial-ly those nations where there are Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Barrons, and other Gentlemen, who possesse in the highest, lowest, & middle sort of iustice, Villages, Borroughs Townes, Castles, with vassals holding and relying of them by fealtie and homage: as name-ly, in France, Spaine, and other countries, wherein the Monarch by absolute power and force when neede is, holdeth in the greater sort with the lesse, staying the insolency of the one, and releueing others from oppression. Otherwise, if they were diuided into many heads, dis-agreeing among themselves, and acknowledging no soueraigne Lord, who doubteth but that they would be continually troubled with ciuill warres, set vpon by strangers, and spoiled of all sides? Italy prooueth this sufficiently vnto vs, which commanded the greatest part of the world, when it was vnited in one: but being now diuided into many Potentates and Seignories, after vnspeakeable calamities of ciuill warres, which it hath suffered a long time it is yet without doubt exposed for a prey to all the neighbors, if they were not staied with other warres: If wee consider the antiquity of the royall government, and how it hath bin practised of al nations almost either whole, or in part, to their great honor & felicity, wee shall be constrained to prefer it before all others, & to account al those happy that liue vnder a Monarchy. As men liued in old time (saith Aristotle) vnder kings so they thought that the gods had a king. All nations (saith Cicero) obeyed kings in old times, which kind of rule was at the first bestowed vpon most iust men. And it hath greatly profited our common wealth, that from the beginning ther- of it hath bin ruled by a kingly government. The first name of Empire and rule, known in the earth (saith Salust) was the royall estate, but then men liued without countenances, every one being content with his owne. From the beginning (as Trogius Pompeius writeth) of countries and nations, the government was in the handes of kings, who were not lift vp to that high degree of maiesty by popular ambition, but for their modesty, which was knowne and approoued of good men. Then the people were not kept in awe by any lawes, but the pleasure and will of princes stood for lawes. They were more giuen to keepe the ifrontires of their Empire, than to enlarge them. Kingdomes were boun- ded by his Country, that reigned therein. Ninus king of the Assyrians, whom the Scripture calleth Nimrod, (that is a rebell) and a mighty hunter, was the first that changed the ancient custome of the nations, through greedy desire of ruling, and that began to warre vpon his neighbours. For finding that the people knew not as yet how to resist, he subdued them al, from his kingdome to the end of Lybia. Almost all the ancient nations of greatest renowne liued vnder the royall government, as the Scythians, Ethiopians, Indians, Assyrians, Medes, Egyptians, Bactrians, Armenians, Macedonians, Iewes, and Romanes, after they were wea- ry of other government. Those also that are most famous at this day, liue after the same sort as the French men, Spaniards, Englishmen, Polonians, Danes, Moscovites, Tartares, Turks, Abissines, Moores, Agiamelques, Zagathians, Cathains, yea the sauage people newly dis- covered, are in manner all vnder kings. And they that liue in other kindes of Common- wealths, as the Venetians, do retaine an outward shew of a King, whom they call a Duke, who is electiue, and to continue his estate as long as hee liueth. In other places they haue Gonfalonners, as at Lucques, the like whereof they were wont to haue at Florence, and at Sienna. In some places they haue Aduoyers, or Bourge maisters, as in the Cantons of Switzerland, and in the free Townes of Germanie, which acknowledge an Emperor. Vpon which name wee will note by the way, that it importeth no more than the name of a king, although amongst the Lawyers and others, there haue beene infinite questions as touch- ing the authority and preheminance of both: namely, that the Emperours haue vsurped ouer other kings vntill this present, albeit the power and Maiesty of the Empire is great- ly diminished, so that nothing else remaineth in a manner but the name and shadowe of it within Germanie. As for this title of Emperour, which the Romane Monarkes tooke to themselves, and before vsed to call their Generals in warre by that name, it was vpon this occasion taken vp. After they had deprived Tarquine of the kingdome of Rome, by reason of his pride and insolency, this name of king became so odious amongst the Romanes, that it was forbidden to be vsed, by an edict and solemne oath. Whereupon when their popular Estate was changed into a Monarchy, they would not call their Monarch by the name of king, by reason of their auncient oath, but called him Emperour, as Appian writeth. But to continue the discourse of our principall matter, and to answer briefly to the rea- sons alleadged against a Monarchy, wee haue first to note, that the most part of the dangers mentioned doe cease, where the Monarchy goeth by succession, as it doth in ours. For

Italy a prey to all her neighbors, & why

Of the antiquity of a kingdome.

Ninus was the first that extended the limits
of his king-
dome.
What estates were ruled Monarchically.

The Duke
dome of Venice is electiue
What this word Emperor importeth

Vpon what occasion the name of Emperor was first giuen to a Monarch.
The reasons
alleadged against a Monarchy answered.

there

there is no cause of feare in regard of any that might aspire to the crowne, or of the treaties and alliances; which are not broken by the prince his death, but renewed and confirmed by his successor and heire, vnlesse before they were greatly preiudiciall to the Estate: That new princes seeke after nouelties, it may be said of some: but it is much more vsuall in Aristocrati- call and Popular-estates. For Magistrates that are renewed so often, would be very sorrowfull that their yeare should run out before they had done some thing that might cause men to speake either good or euill of them. As for the troubles about the government of a yong king, peraduenture it falleth not out once in a hundresh yeares: whereas if a Gonfalonner of Genes be chosen but onely for two yeares, and the commonwealth will be all on fire. To put into the ballance the cruelties and robberies of a tyrant, whereby to counterpoize many good Princes, there is no shew of reason in so doing. For we know well ynough, that a peace- able Aristocracy wisely guided, if it may be so, is better than a cruell tyrannie. But the chiefe matter subiect to our discourse, is to know whether it be not better to haue one iust and per- fect king, than many good Lords: and by the contrary argument, whether the tyranny of fifty tyrants is not more perillous, then of one onely tyrant. Now, if many Masters, Pilots, how wise soeuer they are, hinder one another, when euery one desireth to hold the rudder, then surely many Lords will do the like, when they seeke altogether to gouerne the common wealth, albeit they are wise and vertuous. And truly no Aristocraticall or Popular estate can be named, that hath lasted above 600. yeares together, and few haue endured so long: But many Monarchies haue continued 1000. and 1200. yeares in the same estate. Moreover, they are agreeable to the vpright lawes of nature, which (as wee haue before discoursed) doe all leade vs to a Monarchie. But there is more to bee considered of in our French kingdome, which ought to moue all French hearts very much to desire the preservation thereof, and to thinke themselves happie, that they may liue vnder it: I meane that which we touched in the beginning of our speech: namely, the agreement and participation, which it hath with all good policies. Many Politicks haue giuen this out, that no common-wealth instituted to continue long, ought to be simple of one onely kinde: but that the vertues and properties of the other estates must meete together in it, to the end that nothing grow out of proportion, which might cause it to degenerate to the next euill, and so consequently ouerthrow it. This was first obserued by Lycurgus, who in ordaining the Lacedemonian Common-wealth, mingled the Senate with the kings, and after the Ephories were established aboue the Kings, in- somuch that they were mingled and weighed so equally together, that a man could not well discerne vnder what kinde of government it was erected. The Carthaginian common- wealth also, most flourishing for a long time was so instituted in the beginning thereof. It had kings, the Aristocraticall power of Senators, and the common people, who had their prehe- minence in things belonging vnto them. The Romane Common-wealth, during the time of her greatest glory, had these three parts so equally and proportionably tempered, that a man could not tell, whether it were altogether Aristocraticall, or Democraticall, or Monarchicall. In looking to the power of the Consuls, a man would haue iudged it Monarchicall and Roy- all: to the Senators, Aristocraticall: to the Tribunes and common sort, Democraticall. The Venetians in their Common-wealth represent all these estates. Their great Councell hauing soueraigne power, whereof the Senate and the authoritie of all their Magistrates dependeth, doth represent the Popular estate. The Duke, who is President as long as he liueth, repre- senteth the royall power, because he especially retaineth the grauity and dignity thereof. And the Colledge of ten men, with the Colledge of Ancients, commonly called Sages, represen- teth the Aristocracy, as Contarenius writeth. As for our French Monarchy, it may well be said also to be partaker of all 3. in regard of the government thereof, albeit in truth the estate ther- of is a simple and pure Monarchie. For the king is the Monarch, beloued, obeyed, and reue- renced: who although he haue all power and soueraigne authoritie to command, and to doe what he will, yet this great and soueraigne liberty seemeth in some sort to be ruled and limited by good lawes and ordinances: and by the multitude and great authority of Officers, and Counsellors, who are as well neere his person, as in sundry places of his kingdome. The 12. Peeres, the secret and priue counsels, the Parliament and great Councell, the Chambers of accounts, the Treasurers, and Generals of charges, resemble in some sort the Aristocracy. The States yearly held in the Provinces, the Miralties of townes, Shreeualties, Consulships, Ca- pitolats, and Churchwardens, are as it were the forme of a Democracy, as Steffel declareth more at large. Moreover the generall Estates of the Realme, which are wont to be gathered together to deliberate (the king being President) of all matters concerning the Estate,

One iust
prince better than many good Lords:
and many Tyrants worse than one.

Monarchies
haue continued longer.

The opinion
of many Poli-tickstouching
a mixt estate
of a Common-wealth.
The Lacede-
monian estate
mingled.
The Carthaginian Common wealth
was mixt.
The Romane
estate mingled.

The estate of Venice compounded.

What agreement the French Monarchy hath with euery
good policie.

doe they not sufficiently testifie the happy order thereof, drawing neere to the gouernment of a good Oeconomist, when the king (as Aristotle saith) commandeth in his kingdome, as a good father of a familie ruleth ouer his children, with loue, and according to right and iustice? Wherefore although all the authority of Officers, Counsellors, Parliaments, and Estates, dependeth (as riuers of a fountaine) of the onely power of their king and prince, yet of his fatherly and royall goodnesse he granteth them such authoritie, that hardly could he doe any thing that were very violent, or too preiudiciall to his subiects. And if some such actions may be noted, they come rather through the fault of his Counsellors, than from his Maiesty. Thus let vs conclude with Plato, that the royall gouernment and authority ought to be preferred before all other policies, as that which draweth neere to the diuinitie. But it must haue a Senate of good men ioyned vnto it, after the forme of an Aristocracy, as our kings haue alwaies vsed to haue, of their naturall benignity, which maketh them inclinable to all exercises of vertue, piety, and iustice.

Of diuers kinds of Monarchies, and of a Tyranny. Chap. 58.

Why men are diuersly affected vnto diuers formes of gouernments.

The praise of the French nation for their loue to a Monarchy.

The difference betwene the rule of a king & of a tyrant.

Five kinds of Monarchies.

How the first Monarchie came vp.

Gen. 10. 8. Of the reigne of Nimrod. Nimrod was the first king that warred vpon his neighbors.

A C H I - T O B. The variety of manners, and inclinations to diuers things, which is (wee see) particularly in euery one from his birth, and generally throughout all nations of the world, disposeth without doubt the people as they grow in age and iudgement, and according to their bringing vp, to like one kinde of gouernment rather than another. But Frenchmen haue euen to these last times, carried away the praise of a more naturall and constant disposition, loue, obedience, and fidelity towards the maiesty of a king, than other nations euer shewed to their forme of estate and gouernment. For amongst them all, there is not one nation to be found, that hath so constantly continued in their lawes and ancient customes without any alteration and change, as this flourishing Monarchie, which hath also gone beyond them in all goodnesse and mildnesse of gouernment, as we may see better (my Companions) if we compare with it those sundry sorts of Monarchies, which haue bin heretofore, and doe at this day flourish, of which many come as neere to a tyranny, as ours is farre distant from it. And to make a tyranny appeare more odious, we will consider the pernicious and miserable estate thereof.

A S E R. As it properly belongeth to a royall estate to gouerne and to rule subiects, not according to the sensuall appetite, and disordered will of the Prince, but by maturity of counsell, and by obseruation of lawes and of iustice: so it agreeth with a tyrant to reigne by his absolute will, without all regard either of lawes, or of the precepts of iustice.

A M A N A. A tyrant (saith Seneca) differeth from a king in effect, not in name. The one seeketh his owne good onely, and the other, the profite of the common-wealth. Now let vs heare A R A M, who will teach vs to discerne them well by their workes.

A R A M. Amongst all the Monarchies that euer were, or are at this day among men, most of the ancient Authors and great Politicks haue noted out five sundry sorts, of which I purpose here to discourse particularly with brieue examples, that the excellency of ours may the better appeare ouer others, especially ouer those that decline much vnto tyranny, whose shame and infamie I will here display. The first and most ancient kinde of Monarchie was that, which was voluntarily offered by the people for some heroicall vertue appearing in those men whom they iudged worthy to gouerne them iustly and vprightly. And when they continued in this sort to declare themselves benefactors of the multitude, in gathering them together, in giuing vnto them territories, and in distributing lands among them, in finding out of arts, in making of warre, and in the administration of iustice vnto them, their authoritie and power did lawfully descend to their successors, who had soueraigne power in time of warre, and were chiefe in certaine solempne ceremonies of their sacrifices. Herodotus, Demosthenes, Aristotle, Cicero, and many others, make mention of this kinde of Monarchie. After the floud, when the number of men increased, Noah perswaded his children, and others of his posterity, to disperse themselves in diuers countries, to till the ground, and to build townes, and to this end hee assigned to euery one his Province by lot. Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose grandfather Noah was, abode with his men in the land of the Chaldeans, and was their first king, and the first king of Babylon. Hee was the first that beganne to extend his boundes by force vpon his neighbours, sending whole companies of people into many and diuers countries, to lay the foundations of other kingdomes, as histories

histories dogue vs certaine knowledge thereof. This is the cause why many establish the first Monarchy in Assyria vnder him. Wee reade also in good authors that the first and auncient kings of Egypt kept themselves a long time in this heroicall vertue, which had procured vnto them their dignity. They liued not disorderly as those do, who because of their dominion, iudge their owne will to be a iust law for them, but they followed the constitutions of lawes, as well in the gathering of their duties and tributes, as in their manner of life. They vsed the seruice of Noblemens and Princes children onely, who were of the age of twentie yeares, and were instructed in all sciences. The reason whereof was, that the king beeing pricked forward with the sight of them that were about him, might beware howe hee committed any thing woorthie of reproch. And truly there is nothing that corrupteth Princes so much as vicious seruants, who seeke to please their sensuall desires and affections. When the king arose in the morning, hee was bound first to take and receiue all the letters and requestes that were brought vnto him, that answerin g necessarie matters first, al his affaires might be guided by order & reason. Then he went to the temple to offer sacrifice to the gods, where the Prelate & chiefe Priest, after the sacrifice & praiers were ended, rehearsed with a loud voice in the presence of the people, what vertues were in the king, what reuerence and religion towards the gods was in him, and what clemencie and humanitie towards men. Moreover, hee tolde that hee was continent, iust, noble minded, true liberall, one that brided his desires, & punished malefactors with a more milde & light punishment than the greatnesse of their sinne and offence required, rewarding also his subiects with graces and gifts that were greater than their deserts. This done, hee exhorted the king to a happie life agreeable to the gods, & likewise to good manners, by following after honor and vertue, and therewithall propounded vnto him certaine examples of the excellent deeds of ancient kings, thereby to prouoke him the rather thereunto. These kings liued with simple meats, as with veale and birds for all dishes: they kept very exactly all the lawes and ordinances of their countie in every point of their life, which was no lesse directed even in the least things, than the simplest of their subiects. And truly so long as the kings of Egypt were such zealous obseruers of their lawes, and of iustice, and reigned peaceable among their subiects, they brought many strange nations into their subiection, and gathered together infinite riches, whereby they adorned their countrey with great buildings and sumptuous workes, and decked their townes with many gifts and benefits. The barbarian kingdoms were the second kinde of Monarchie: namely the auncient Monarchies of the Assyrians, Medes and Persians, whose princes vsurped lordly rule ouer their goods and persons, and governed their subiects as a father of a family doth his slaues. Which kinde of government fauoreth more of a tyranny, than of a kingdom: besides, it is directly against the law of nature, which keepeth every one in his liberty, and in the possession of his owne goods. Notwithstanding when by the law of armes, and of iust war, a prince is made lord ouer any people they properly belong to him that conquereth, and they that are overcome, are made his slaues by the auncient consent of all nations: and this maketh the difference betweene the Lord like Monarchie, and a tyranny, which abuseth free subiects as slaues. Of the second kinde of Monarchie was the kindome of Persia (as Plato writeth) vnder Cambyses, Xerxes, and other kings, vntill the last Darius. For vsurping more absolute authoritie to rule than was conuenient, they began to contemne their Vassals, and to account of them as of slaues: and putting no more confidence in them, they entertained into their seruice mercenary soldiers and strangers, whereby they made their owne subiects vnfit for warre, and so in the end lost their estate, when it seemed to haue attained to the top of worldly prosperitie. Such is the estate of the Turke at this day, wherein hee is sole Lord, commaunding ouer his subiects in rigorous maner, as wel ouer the Musulmans, as Christians and Iewes. He vseth in his principall affaires, which concerne peace and war, and matters of government, the seruice of runnegate slaues, whome he placeth in authoritie, changeth or deposeth as he thinkes good, without perill and enuie: yea hee stranglet them vpon the least suspition or dislike conceived of them, not sparing his owne children and others of his blood, if they anger him. So did Sultan Solymán deale with Hibrahim Bascá, who was almost of equall authoritie with him: in so much that hee was there called the Seignior, king of the Janitzaries, the Bascá, and king of the men of armes. Neuerthelesse in one night, wherein hee made him stay and sup with him, and lie in his owne chamber, he caused him to bee slaine, and his body to bee cast into the sea. The morrow after he seized vpon his goods, as confiscate: and caried them away: and yet no man euer knew the cause of his death, except it were this, that hee was growne

Of the happy
 reigne of the auncient kings
 of Egypt.

They vsed the seruice only of Noble mens children, and they well learned.

The Priests of Egypt vsed
 to praise their Princes in the Temple before the people.

The diet of the auncient
 kings of Egypt.

Of the second kind of Mo-
 narchie.

The difference betweene a lord
 like Monar-chie and a tyranny.

Markes of a tyrannicall government.

Of the estate
 of the Turke.

The death of Hibrahim Bas-chá.

The Turke
disposeth of all Lordships
at his pleasure

Of the Estate
of Moscouia.

Of the king
of Ethiopia.
The king of Ethiopia
whipped his Lords like slaves.

Of the king-
dome of Peru
Of the third
kind of Mo-
narchie.
Where kings
tooke vpon
the soueraign-
ty of religion

Of the 4 kind of Monarchie
which is electiue.
The dangerous state of an electiue
kingdome
when the prince is dead

Examples
thereof in the kingdomes of Thunes, of Egypt.
The great disorder in Rome vpon
the death of the Pope.
In the empire
of Germanie.
In the Pope-
dome.
All electiue Princes are either taken indefinite y,
or out of cer-
taine estates.

growne too great, and consequently suspected of his master, who was a tyrant, rather than a king. Likewise hee keepeth in his hands all the Lordships of his kingdome, which hee distributeth to men of warre, who are charged to maintaine a certaine number of men of armes, and of horses, according to the rate of their reuenue: and when it pleaseth him hee taketh them away againe. Neither is there any man in all the countries vnder his obedience, that possesseth Townes, Castles, and Villages, or dwelleth in strong houses, or that dare build higher than one story or than a Dooue house. The great Knees, or Duke of Moscouia, exceedeth for seueritie, and rigour of commaunding all the Monarchs in the world, hauing obtained such authority ouer his subiects both Ecclesiasticall and secular, that hee may dispose of their goods and liues at his pleasure, so that none dare gaine say him in any thing. They confesse publicly, that the will of their prince is the will of God, and that whatsoeuer hee doth, is done by the will of God. The king of Ethiopia is also a Lordly Monarch hauing (as Paulus Iouinus affirmeth) fiftie kinges no lesse subiect vnto him than slaves. And Frauncis Auarez writeth, that hee hath seene the great Chancellour of that Countrey scourged starke naked with other Lords, as the very slaves of the Prince, where in they thinke themselves greatly honored. The Emperour Charles the fift, hauing brought vnder his obedience the kingdome of Peru, made himselfe soueraigne Lord thereof in regard of goods, which the subiects haue not, but as they farme them, or for terme of life at the most. The third kind of Monarchy, whereof the Auncients made mention, was that of Lacedemonia, wherein the king had not absolute power, but in time of warre out of the countrey, and a certaine prebeminence ouer the sacrifices. Wee made mention of their gouernment before. The first kings in Rome were sacrificers also, and afterward, the Emperours called themselves Pontifices, that is, chiefe Bishops, and those of Constantinople were consecrated, as our kings of France are. In like manner the Caliphaes of the Saracins were kinges and chiefe Bishops in their religion, the one in Bagdet, the other in Cayre. The king of Calcuth is chiefe of his religion, and for this cause goeth before the other kings of India in dignity, and is called Samory, that is to say, God on earth. The Pope commandeth ouer the temporalities of the Church, called S. Peters patrimonie, as king, and is held of the latin Christian churches, as head of religion, I meane in those places, and of those persons, where hee is so taken and acknowledged. The king of England certaine yeares past tooke vpon him the title of king and supream gouernour of the Church. The fourth kind of Monarchy is electiue, not hereditarie. in some places for terme of life, as the Empire of Almaine, the kingdome of Polonia, of Bohemie, and of Hungaria, in other places for a certaine time, as was the Dictatorship at Rome. These estates are not commonly so sure and durable as those that are hereditarie, because of the practises and foreshalling of voices, which are for the most part vsed whereupon seditions arise, to the great detriment of those kingdomes. For the Prince beeing dead, the estate remaineth in a pure Anarchie, without king, without lord, without gouernment, and in danger of ruine, like to a ship without a Pilot, which is ready to bee cast away with the first winde that bloweth. Also a gate is set open to theues, and murderers, who kill and slay at their pleasure vpon hope of impunity, as it is commonly to be seene (as histories rehearse) after the death of the kings of Thunes, of the Soldans of Egypt, and of the Popes of Rome, where the seat being vacant, the first thing that is commonly done, is the breaking open of prisons, the killing of iailers, the letting out of guilty persons, and the reuenging of iniuries by all possible meanes, and this continueth vntill the colledge of Cardinals haue agreed vpon a successeur. And indeede in the yeare 1522. two were executed, against whom it was prooued, that in sundry tumults mooued at this election, they had slaine an hundred and sixteene men. As touching the Empire of Almaine, their histories are full of impouerishments fallen vpon them through the election of their Emperours, as well by ciuil warres as by murders and poysonings. So that within three hundred and three score yeeres since the Empire fell vnder the election of seauen Princes, eight or nine Emperours haue bene slaine or poysoned, besides those that haue shamefully bene thrust out of their imperiall seate. Ecclesiasticall persons also haue not wanted ciuill warres about their elections, where in no such prouision could be made, but that two and twenty Popes were cut off and many thrust out of their seate, as may bee seene in the Registers of the Vatican. Now we must note further, that among the electiue estates, euery election is either of such persons as the Electors like of, as in Germanie they doe not onely choose for Emperours the Princes of Almaine out of their diuers families, but sometime strangers haue bene chosen, as Alphonse king of Spaine, and Richard Duke of Cornewall, and brother to knig Henry the third, or else it is out of certaine inferiour estates, as the Pope out of the Colledge of Cardinals, and not long since the Souldan of Cayre out of the Mammelucks: vnto which degree of honor none could ascend, except before he had beene a slave and a runnagate Christian: so that afterward he commanded absolutely in Egypt and Soria. This estate hauing continued about three hundred yeares, was not long since quite ouerthrowne by Sultan Selym king of the Turkes, who tooke the last Souldan, and caused him to be carried vpon an old Cammell all along Cayre, and then to be hanged vpon of the gates of that citie. The great Master of Malta is chosen by the chiefe Priors of his religion: as that also of Prussia was before the agreement made with the king of Polonia, by which composition his estate was turned into a Duchie, subiect to the crowne of Poland, and of electione made hereditarie. The fift kinde of Monarchie is hereditarie, and is properly called royall and lawfull: whether the king come to the estate by right of succession, as Thucydides writeth of the ancient kings: or whether the kingdome bee giuen by vertue of the law, without regard had to daughters, or to males descending of them, as it is in this kingdome, by the Salicke law: or whether it bee giuen as a meere gift, as the kingdome of Naples and Sicill were giuen to Charles of France, and since giuen againe to Lewes of France, first Duke of Aniuw: whether it be left by will, as the kings of Thunis, Fez, and Marocke vsed to do, and as it was practised also by Henrie the eight, king of England, who left his kingdome to his sonne Edward, appointing Marie after him, and after her Elizabeth, or by what other meanes soeuer the Prince becommeth Lord of the estate, his monarchie is alwaies royall and lawfull, if he in like manner be obedient to the lawes of nature, as he desireth that his subiects should be towards him, leauing to euery one his naturall libertie and property of his goods, and looking to the profit and commoditie of the Common wealth. This kingly government Aristotle compareth to Oeconomie. For although a father of a family gouerne his house after his pleasure, yet he respecteth the commoditie of his familie. Vnder this happy forme of government, being the best of all, we may boast that we liue in France, through the goodnesse of our kings, who neither ordaine, nor put any thing in execution, but by mature deliberation and counsell, which they take with the Princes of their blood, and with other notable and graue persons whom they call neare vnto them, as though their soueraigne power were ruled and moderated. For first the king commandeth nothing that taketh effect, if it bee not signed by his Secretaries, and sealed with his great seale: that is to say, seene and approoued by the Chancellor, who is a seuerer controller of all matters that passe. All the kings letters must alwaies of necessitie be approoued by the Iudges to whome they are directed, and examined not onely whether they were obtained by priuie insinuation or fraudulent dealing, but also whether they be lawfull or vnlawfull. Yea in criminall matters, there inabling of such as before were not capable of offices or dignities, writs of repeale from banishment, pardons and remissions, are scanned with such rigor by them, that the procurers of such letters are compelled to deliuer them bare headed and kneeling, and to offer themselves prisoners of what estate soeuer they be in so much that oftentimes men are condemned and executed with their pardons about them. As for the gifts and expences of the king, whether they be ordinary or extraordinary, the chamber of accounts examineth them narrowly, and many times off such as haue no good ground by reason that the officers are sworne to let nothing passe to detriment of the realme, notwithstanding any letters of commandement whatsoever. Among other things the king may not alienate his crowne reuenues without some cause knowne to the said officers of accounts and to the Parliaments. And which is more, publick treaties with neighbor states, edicts, and decrees haue no authoritie before they are published in the high courts. By which moderation his power is not lessened, but made surer, more durable, and lesse burdensome to his subiects, being wholly separated from tyranny, which is hated of God and men, as wee may haue further knowledge by discoursing thereof particularly. So that ouer and besides those fise kinds of monarchies, mentioned of vs, tyranny may be put for the sixt, which wee may call that, wherein the monarch treading vnder foote the lawes of nature, abuseth the libertie of free subiects, as if they were slaves, and other mens goods as his owne. Among the Ancients the name of Tyrant was honorable, and signified nothing else (being a Greeke word) but a Prince that had gotten the gouernment of the estate without the consent of his subiects, and of a companion had made himselfe a master, whether hee were a wife and iust Prince, or cruell and vniust. And indeede most of them became wicked to make sure their estate, life and goods, knowing that they were fallen into many mens hatred, because they had inuaded the soueraigntie. In this respect therefore was this dominion and rule called tyrannicall,

The Souldan
of Cayre chosen out of the Mammelucks.

The great
mastership of Malta ele-ctiue, and that also of Prussia.

Of the fift
kinde of Monarchy which is hereditarie.
The Salick
law excludeth daughters
and their sonnes.
Kingdomes
left by will.

Of the happy
government
of the estate
of France.

The Chancellor of France must approoue all matters before they can passe.

Officers in France sworne
to let nothing passe, that is hurtful to the realme, notwithstanding
the king his commandement.

Of tyranny
and of the name of a tyrant.

The difference between a good king and a tyrant.

Diogenes gir-
deth Dionysus.

Of the miserable condition
of tyrants.

Democles
was quickly
wear e of the estate of Dionysius.
A tyrant cannot long continue.

Tyrants have commonly
an euill end.

Examples of the extraordinary deaths
of tyrants.

Rewards appointed for murderers of tyrants.

tyrannicall, because it gouerned in lord-like manner without right ouer free men, compelled and forced to obey. But generally we may call that a tyranny, when the prince accounteth all his will as a iust law, and hath no care either of pietie, iustice or faith, but doth all things for his priuate profite, reuenge, or pleasure. And as a good king conformeth himselfe to the lawes of God and nature, so a tyrant treadeth them vnder foote: the one striveth to enrich his subiects, the other to destroy them: the one taketh reuenge of publike iniuries and pardoneth his owne, the other cruelly reuengeth iniuries done to himselfe, and forgiveth those that are offered to others: the one spareth the honour of chaste women, the other triumpheth in their shame: the one taketh pleasure to bee freely admonished, and wisely reprooued when hee hath done amisse, the other misliketh nothing so much, as a graue, free, and vertuous man: the one maketh great account of the loue of his people, the other of their feare: the one is neuer in feare but for his subiects, the other standeth in awe of none more than of them: the one burdeneth his as little as may bee, and then vpon publike necessitie, the other suppeth vp their blood, gnaweth their bones, and sucketh the marrow of his subiects to satisfie his desires: the one giueth estates and offices to meete with bribery and oppression of the people, the other selleth them as deere as may be, & careth not for the oppression of his subiects: the one in time of warre hath no recourse but to his subiects, the other warreth against none but them: the one hath no guard or garrison but his owne people, the other none but of strangers: the one reioyceth in assured rest, the other languisheth in perpetuall feare: the one is honoured in his life time, and longed for after his death, the other is defamed in his life, and rent in peeces after his death. Examples hereof are in euery mans sight. And therefore Diogenes the Sinopian meeting one day in the city of Corinth with Dionysius the yonger, tyrant of Syracuse, who was then brought into the estate of a private man, banished from his countrey, and fallen from his dignity, spake thus vnto him: Truly Dionysius thou art now in an estate, vnworthy of thee. The tyrant standing still withall, made him this answer: I like thee well Diogenes, because thou hast compassion of my miserable fortune. What? (replied the Philosopher) doest thou thinke that I pitie thee? I am rather grieved to see such a slave as thou, who deseruest to grow old and to die in that cursed estate of a tyrant, as thy father did, to take thy pleasure in such safetie, and to passe away thy time freely amongst vs without feare. And to say truth, tyranny is such a miserable condition, that euen they that practise it and glorie therein, are constrained many times to confesse with their own mouth, that no kind of life is so wretched as theirs. This self same tyrant Dionysius, when he was in the greatest glorie of his estate, declared as much to Democles, one of his familiar friends, who had said that he was most happie. Wilt thou (quoth Dionysius to him) enioy my felicitie but for one day onely? Whereunto when Democles agreed, he caused him to be serued at the table as himselfe was wont to be, with all the magnificence that could be deuised, hanging in the meane while a sword right ouer his head, which was tyed to the roofo aloft onely by one haire of a horse taile. When Democles perceiued that, he was well contented to make a short dinner, and to passe away the rest of the day in his former estate. Loe, (quoth the tyrant then vnto him) how happie our life is, which with all our armed garde hangeth but by a little threede. Moreover, the reigne of tyrants being without measure and reason, and guided onely by violence cannot be of any long continuance, This is that which Thales the wise man said, that there was nothing so strange or rare, as an old tyrant. And albeit they liue miserably in perpetuall distrust of every one, yea, of their kindred, yet there end is more wretched. For there were few of them that died not a cruell and extraordinary death: most of them being slaine and murdered, and others persecuted with strange griefes, died like mad and desperate men, through the remembrance of their corrupt life, and of the cruelties which they had committed. In ancient time tyranny was detestable, that euen schollers and women sought to winne the reward of honour by killing tyrants: as Aristotle the Logitian did, who slue a tyrant of Sicinia, and as Thebe, who killed her husband Alexander, tyrant of the Phereans. Thirty tyrants were slaine in one day in the citie of Athens, by Theramenes, Thrasybulus, and Archippus, who had but threescore and ten men to execute that enterprise. Leander tyrant of Cyrena, was taken alive, and being sewed into a lether bagge, was cast into the sea. Aristodemus tyrant of Cumes tooke Xenocrita by force, beeing a wealthy citizens daughter whom he had banished, and keeping her with him as his wife, shee stirred vp Thymoteles and others to recover the libertie of their countrey, who being safely let into the tyrants chamber by her, slue Aristodemus. Besides, the Ancients had appointed great rewards and recompences for the murderers of tyrants, namely, titles of Nobilitie, of Prowesse, of Chualrie,

Chivalrie, images, and honourable titles: to be short, the goods of the tyrants were given vnto them, as to the true deliuerers of their countrey. Now albeit we said, that this word, Tyrant, was taken amongst them for him that made himselfe soueraigne prince of his owne authoritie, without election, or right of succession, or lot, or iust warre, or speciall calling of God; yet we must not inferre this consequent, that therefore it is lawfull to kill euery Prince that exerciseth tyranny. For it belongeth in no wise either to any particular subiect, or to all in general, to seeke the honour or life of the Prince that is absolutely and lawfully soueraigne, as we haue already discoursed. Now to conclude our present speech, wee may see how farre the establishment of this French Monarchie is from any inclination, and from all things that may seeme to giue any entrance, life and preservation to a tyrannie: nay it is cleane contrary thereunto, and goeth beyoud all monarchies that euer were or are amongst the sundrie nations of men, for goodnesse and mildnesse of gouernment: which ought wonderfully to stirre vp Frenchmen to perseuere in loue, obedience, and fidelity towards their king: for which strangers haue alwaies praised them.

Of the Education of a Prince in good manners and conditions. Chap. 59.

A R A M. THe effect of custome is wonderfull, yea it is so powerfull, that it passeth nature, especially, in vice and dissolutenesse. Wherein if men bee once plunged, it is a very hard matter, especially if they bee yong, to draw them out of it. But further when they know that they haue in their hands an vnbrideled license, and a soueraigne authoritie to enioy their lusts and desires at their pleasure, a man may then say, that all hope of amendment is vtterly perished in them, and that it is altogether impossible to gaine any thing of them by counsell, instruction or reason. Therefore it is very certaine, that the principall hope and expectation of a Prince (after request made to God, that by nature he may be of a good and teachable disposition) ought to bee grounded alwaies in his education and first institution, which beeing either good or bad, will bring forth like effects, to the great good or hurt of his subiects. Now then (my Companions) let vs discourse of that which we thinke ought to be obserued in the right instruction of a Prince in all kinde of good manners, and commendable conditions, as well for his owne profite, as for the common vtility of all those ouer whom he is to command.

Custome goeth beyond nature in that which is euill.

The chiefe hope of a prince dependeth next to God of his institution.

A C H I T O B. Men are commonly carefull to strengthen with rampires the bankes of riuers, which receiue into them great quantity of waters. But it is needful that more diligence be vsed in preserving and fortifying the minde of a yong prince with strong reasons, graue sentences, and most learned precepts of wisdom, against the greatnesse of his fortune, the great abundance of wealth, riot, delights, and flatterie, disguised with fidelitie; which, like to a mighty streame, fall from some rocke to ouerwhelme and to drowne the weake seedes of vertue naturally in a Prince.

A notable comparison.

A S E R. Men must be so much the more carefull in the dressing and tillage of that spirit and soule, which they know ought to be vigilant, wise, prudent, and iust for the benefite of many. Such a one is the king or magistrate, or any other man that is to deale in gouernment, and in publike affaires. For to fill that soule with vertue and goodnesse, is to profite an infinite number by the meanes of one. Now let vs heare A M A N A discourse vpon this matter.

Why great care is to be had in the institution of a prince.

A M A N A. All kingdomes vnder which men do liue at this day, are either hereditary, or giuen by election. Some that are hereditary goe by succession from male to male onely, as this kingdom of France. And this did the Frenchmen wisely ordaine in the beginning of their Monarchie by the Salicke law, by which prouidence and foresight, they haue continued in the same kinde of gouernment almost one thousand and two hundred yeares, so that the crowne neuer went out of their nation, neither hath the royall linage changed oftener than thrise in so long continuance: which thing neuer happened to any other Monarchie or Seignory to any mans knowledge. In other kingdomes, when males are wanting daughters succede, as in Spaine, England, and Scotland. Moreouer in hereditary kingdomes where males succede, in some places that honour is alwaies reserued for the eldest, who giueth an honest pension to his yonger brethren, as it is in France: or if no regard be had to birthright, either

The kingdom of France goeth onely from male to male.

The barbarous cruelty
of Selim.

The custome
of electing of a king in Ethiopia.

The custome
of succession
in Calcuth.

When a prince may best be corrected.

The best token of remembrance that a prince can leave behinde
him.

How a prince
ought to liue
himselfe, and to bring vp
his children.

What teachers
a yong prince
must haue.

either he is preferred that is fittest to gouerne, or he that is most warlike, and in greatest fauour with the souldiers, as in Turkie, Selim the first of that name, beeing the third and yongest sonne of Baiazet the second, vsurped the Empire by the aide of the laniezaries vpon his father, whome he caused to be poisoned, and slue, Achmeth and Corcuth his two eldr brothers, with all his nephewes, and others of Ottomans race, saying that nothing was pleasanter than to rule when all feare of kindred was taken away. In some places they kill not their brethren and kindred, but shut them vp in some most sure and safe place of custody, as they vse or are accustomed to doe in Ethiopia, where he that must beare rule, is kept alone, the rest are sent to a very high and strong mountaine, called the mountaine of the Israelites: from whence none of the male kinde may euer come forth, except Prestor Iohn die without heire of his body to succede him in the crowne: for then he that is next vnto it, and knowne to be woorthiest and fittest, is taken forth. By this meanes that great kingdome hath continued very long without ciuill warre or murder, and neuer wanted offspring of the royall race. In Calcuth, when the king dieth, although he haue male children, or nephewes by his brother, yet none of them succeed in the kingdome, but his sisters sonne: and if they faile, the next of the blood royall commeth to the crowne. They ground this vpon a foolish and fond superstition which they haue in causing the Queene to be defloured by some yong priest called Bramen, in whose custody she remaineth euer after, so long as the king is abroad. Whereupon they presume, and peradventure not without good cause, that the children which descend or are borne of that lady, holde more of the priest than of the prince. Concerning kingdomes that go by election, wee haue spoken of them already. Now because it is a very hard matter to change him that is once chosen in such a kingdome, greater consideration must be had in making the election, least the oversight of one houre procure a perpetuall repentance. But where the prince is by nature and not by election, men must labour by carefull industry and diligence to bring him vp, and to instruct him well in replenishing his minde with sound opinions from his infancie, and by casting vpon his new ground seeds of vertue and honesty which by little and little may grow and waxe ripe with age, and hauing once taken roote, may abide stedfast and firme to his liues end. For there is no time better and fitter to frame and to correct a prince in, than when he knowes not that hee is a prince. For if hee learne to obey from his infancie, when he commeth to the degree of commanding, he applieth and behaueth himselfe a great deale better with his subiects, than they that from their youth haue bene alwaies free and exempted from subiection. For by such education or bringing vp, a prince addeth to his royall greatnesse, and to those fashions which great men haue by nature, curtesie and gentle behauiour, which cannot but be very acceptable to his people, and containe them more willingly in the duty of obedience. Therefore the prince in his yong and tender yeares must be diligently imployed, not onely in withdrawing him from dishonest things, but also in causing him to taste of vertue, and to haue some precepts thereof ingrauen in his braine, vntill in the ende he vnderstand all that belongeth to his duty, and what soeuer else may helpe him forward to leade a good and happy life. If wise fathers with great care bring vp, and instruct their children, who shall succeed them but in the gouernment of some little house in the countrey, how much greater care and labour ought to be taken in teaching him well and wisely, who is to succeed in the Empire ouer much people, and whose life ought to be the discipline of their manners and conditions? For this cause a good and prudent prince must take paines in causing his children to be brought vp, that hee remember he hath begotten them for the Commonwealth, not to serue his priuate affections. Let him know, that although he erect a great number of images, build sumptuous houses, establish good and wholesome ordinances, yet he cannot leaue a more excellent marke of his, than a sonne, who degenerating in nothing, representeth the goodnesse of his father by vertuous actions. For hee dieth not that leaueth behinde him a liuely image of himselfe. And truly it is the perfection of an excellent prince to rule in such sort, as if he would strue, that his like for goodnesse and iustice could not succede him, and so to bring vp his children, as if he desired that they should surmount him in vertue. To this end therefore let him make choice of al his subiects, yea from what place soeuer, and gather together vertuous and sincere men, vncorrupted, graue and such as are learned not onely through precepts, but also through the experience of many things, to whom their age breedeth reuerence, their good life authoritie and their mildnesse and gentle behauiour loue, and good will: that the tender spirit of the yong prince, offended with the rough dealing of his teachers, may not begin to hate vertue before he know it, nor yet corrupted through their ouer great gentlenesse, elenesse, degenerate and start aside where it ought not. Wherefore Seneca said, that a Prince his teacher must haue these two properties. He must know how to chide without shaming of him, & how to praise him without flatterie. Moreouer, great care must be had in making choise of all such persons, whether they are men, women, children, or seruants, as come neare about him, either to gouerne, or to serue him, or to keepe him company. For seeing the most part of mens mindes encline to euill, and no childe is so happily borne, but he may be corrupted through wicked education: what may a man looke for but very great euils from that prince, who, of what nature and spirit soeuer he be, presently after he is out of his cradle, is stuffed with foolish and false opinions, nourished among fond women, brought vp in the midst of lasciuious maidens, of lost children, vile and abiect flatterers, of iuglers and players, of drunkards, of dice plaiers and inuenters of pleasures: briefly, in the midst of such caitifes, amongst whom he heareth and learneth nothing but pleasure, delight, pride, arrogancy, couetousnes, choler and tyranny, and so departing from this schoole, takes vnto him the scepter and gouernment of his Empire? Now he that is elected and chosen to vndertake such a great and difficult charge, as is the education and instruction of the prince, must bring with him a will worthy the same, considering with himselfe, not how many benefices and bishopricks he may get into his hands, but how he may deliuer vp a vertuous prince into his country, which putteth al his trust and confidence in him. Let him know that they do good to all the people, who make them good men whom the people cannot want: as contrariwise, they that marre and corrupt princes and kings, ought to be an abomination to all men, and punished no lesse than they that put poison, not into a cup, but into a common fountaine, of which they see every body drinke. First then hee that hath taken this charge vpon him, must narrowly note wheerunto the nature of the prince is inclined, seeing it may be knowne by some signes even in his yong yeares: as whether he be not given to anger, to ambition, to desire of renowne, to riot, to play, to couetousnes, to reuenge, to war, or to tyranny. After, when he knoweth to what vice he is inclined, he must fortifie his minde against the same with good opinions and with holy resolutions, and labor to change his hart which is yet tender into a habit that is contrary to his nature. And when he perceiueth that his tender nature inclineth to honest and commendable things, or to such vices as will easily change into vertues in princes well brought vp, as to ambition and prodigality, he must prick him forward, and helpe his good nature by diligent trauell. Neither must he vse precepts only to withdraw the prince from dishonest things, and to procure in him a longing desire to doe those things that are vertuous, but hee must labour to imprint and to roote them in his memory by diuers formes, now by sentences, another while by fables, after by comparisons, then by examples, or by some notable sayings, ingrauen in rings, and planted in tables. Briefely, if there be any other thing wherein this age taketh pleasure, let that be a meane to worke in him a tast of vertue. Aboue all things specially regard is to be had, what opinions are ingrauen in the Prince his braine. For the whole order of his life proceedeth from that fountaine. And therefore he must labor immediatly to imprint in his minde holy and good opinions, which may serue for a counterpoison against the common errors of the ignorant people: hut chiefly to instruct him thoroughly in Gods truth, and in that which concerneth his saluation. He must perswade him, that whatsoeuer is taught in the law of God, belongeth to none so much as to the prince, and that as he is to raigne by him, so likewise it belongeth to his office to raigne according to his will, that he may enioy prosperity in this world, and eternall felicity in the blessed life to come. Let him be taught to loue vertue as the only good and to hate vice as the only euill: let him know that the one is followed no lesse with shame and dishonour, than the other with glory and honour, especially in a prince, in whom if vertue take place, as it were in a high watch tower, it shineth so cleerely, that the brightnes thereof remaineth long after his death. As for all worldly pompe, antiquity of petigree, imagery, and riches, they are but meere vanity and folly, not worthy to be cared for, or to be admired by a vertuous prince. Let him be perswaded that dignity, greatnes and maiesty are not to be sought after by the helpe of fortune, or by humane meanes, but by wisdom, integrity of life and manners, and by vertuous and noble deeds. Plato saith not without cause, that a Common wealth will neuer be happy vntill princes play the Philosophers, or Philosophers take the rudder of the Empire in hand. Now his meaning is not to cal him a Philosopher, that is learned in Logicke, in naturall Philosophy, and in the Mathematicks, but him, who with an vntamed heart despiseth the vaine shadowes of things, and followeth after true goods. A Philosopher and a Christian differ but in name: and a prince well instructed in piety, is truly

Two properties requisite to him that teacheth a prince. What manner of person must be about the prince.

The duty of him that is chosen to bring vp the prince.

To make a good prince is to do good to all his people. The inclination of a yong prince, must first be known.

How a yong prince must be taught.

Deut. 17. 18.

The law of God belongeth to the prince.

When a commonwealth is happy.

The agreement between a Philosopher & a Christian.

truly both the one and the other. Therefore hee ought to learne nothing sooner (next to the law of God) than the morall Philosophie of the auncients, which teacheth all vertue. Is there any thing more foolish than to esteeme highly of a prince if he vault well, if he play well at Tennis, if he be stout and strong: briefly, if he be cunning in some things, which peradventure a peasant would doe better than he, and in the meane while he is puffed vp with pride, hee polleth his people, and sporteth himselfe in all kind of dissolutenesse and pleasure? What honour is it for a prince to goe farre beyond the common sort in precious stones, gold, purple, traine of seruants, and in other ornaments of the body, and in euery thing that is fasly called good, and in the meane while to be farre inferior in the true goods of the soule to many of his people, and those of lowest calling? These opinions, as holy and inuiolable lawes, must be ingrauen in the heart of a yong prince, and must bee, as it were the first lines that are to be drawne in the void table of his soule, namely, that hee must strue that none excell him in the goods of the soule, in wisdom, magnanimity, temperance and iustice. Frugality, modesty, and sobriety in other men may be attributed either to pouerty or to niggardlinesse, but in a prince they cannot but be a note of temperance, I meane, when he vseth good modesty, who hath as much as hee will. Ancient men called that prudence miserable, which was gotten by the experience of things, because it is bought with publike losse and calamity. But such kind of experience ought to be farthest off from a prince, because the longer it is a learning, the greater cause is it of many euils unto all his people. If Scipio Africanus had reason to say, that this speech, I had not thought it, did not beleeue a wise man, how much more vnseemly is it for a prince, who cannot vtter the same without his great harme, and greater to the common-wealth? For as in a voyage the fault of a comon Mariner (said Agapetus) doth but little hurt, whereas the slip of a Pilot bringeth shipwracke: so in Monarchies the offence of a priuate man is more hurtfull to himselfe than to the common-wealth, but if the Prince begin to faile, hee hurteth euery one. This is the cause why the mind of a prince must especially be instructed with good resolutions and sentences, to the ende hee may bee skilfull by reason and not by vse. For then the counsell of aged men will supply that experience of things which is wanting in him. He must be giuen to vnderstand, that his life is in the face of all the world, that hee can doe nothing that will bee hid, and therefore if he be good, it must needs turne to the great benefit of many; if wicked, to their hurt likewise, because the prince is alwaies the very portarature after which subiects conform themselves. He must know that the greater honor is giuen vnto him, the more he is to strue that hee may be woorthy of it, looking more to his owne doings and actions, than to the praises that men giue him, which he must beleeue and receive according as he behaueth himselfe. For if he rule well, they are due vnto him, if ill, he is honored and praised, either through constraint, or of flattery, or else it is to shewe him vnder hand what hee ought to bee. Let him know that as God hath placed the Sunne and the Moone in the heauens for a resemblance of his diuinity: so a prince is the like representation and light in a kingdome, as long as hee hath the feare of God, and the obseruation of iustice imprinted in him. For these two things make their life diuine and celestiall, that are in placed in high degree of power and authority: as contrariwise, the contempt of piety and iustice, maketh it beast like and sauage. As God the giuer of all things standeth not in neede of any mans seruice to receive a good turne of him: so it is the duty of a worthy prince, who representeth the figure of the eternall king, to profit euery one without respect of his owne commoditie and glory. As God is not touched with any affections or passions, but ruleth and gouerneth all things perfectly by his prouidence: so after his example a Prince laying aside the perturbations of his soule, must follow reason onely in all his doings. As there is nothing more common than the Sunne, which imparteth of her light to all the celestiall bodies, so a Prince must be alwaies ready to profit the commo wealth & haue within him the light of wisdom, to the end that if others loose their brightnes, yet he may neuer bee overtaken with darknesse. As the Sunne when it is highest in the zodiacke moueth slowest, so the higher that a prince is lift vp in greatnesse and authoritie, the more gentle and gracious he ought to be, keeping himselfe from dooing any thing that becometh not a prince. Therefore let him thinke, that nothing is more vile and abiect, than for him that is called a king and prince of free men, to become a slaue to riot, choler, couetousnes, ambition and other vices of like qualitie, which are most vile & cruell masters. Hee must bee so affected towards his subiects as a good father of a familie is toward those of his household, because a kingdome is nothing els but a great familie, and a king the father of a great many. For although he passe them in greatnes & authoritie, yet he is of one & the same kind with them, a man

Wherein a Prince ought to excell others.

The fault of a prince is much more hurtfull than that of a priuate man. A prince ought to bee skilfull by reason and not by vse

How a prince is to receiue the praises that are giuen him.

Good precepts for princes set out by comparison.

A kingdome is but a great family.

man commanding men; and free over those that are free, not over beastes or slaves, as Aristotle saith very well. And if hee would haue that excellent title, which wee giue to God, the prince of all men, calling him Our Father, hee must procure it not by threatnings and feare, but by good deeds, by meekenes and humanity, which will stand him in steade of a sure Guard to preferue his estate. For the loue and loyalty of his subiects will greatly increase thereby, of which the assurance of Monarchies dependeth. When the nobility and common people vse to feare, not him, but for his sake that commandeth them; then hee seeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares, and perceiueth a far off whatsoeuer is done. Let the prince haue this saying of Plutarke alwaies ingrauen in his soule: That nothing beere below please God more, or draweth nearer to his diuine nature, than to rule well in all iustice and equity, which is the chiefest charge of his vocation, and that vnto which hee is straightly bound in respect of his subiects. For as the subiect oweth obedience, aide, and reuerence to his Lord: so the prince oweth iustice, defence, and protection to his subiects. When a Prince sheweth himselfe vpriight, indifferent, and true of his word to all, it is the greatest felicity that can happen to a Common wealth, and that which crowneth the Monarch thereof with greater glory and honour. And truely a prince ought to be more carefull to obtaine that praise and reputation which proceedeth of goodnesse and vertue, than that which commeth of strength and power. For as the diuine nature, vnto which kinges must endeavour to conform their workes and actions, excelleth all other essences and natures chiefly in three things, that is, in immortality, power and goodnes, so a prince must strue to excell his subiects, not so much in the immortality of his name, or in power, as in goodnes, which vertue is certainly much more venerable, and draweth neere to the diuinity. For to be incorruptible and immortall, the fowre Elements, and the whole frame are indued with that quality, as naturall Philosophers maintaine. And as for strength and power, earth quakes, lightnings, tempestuous whirlle winds, floods and inundations of waters, are full of force and might: but nothing is partaker of iustice, vpriightnes, and equity, except it be diuine and that by the meanes of reason and vnderstanding. So that (as the same Plutarke saith) we only are capable of that Good of vertue that commeth from God. To be short, let the prince bee diligently taught whilest hee is young, and labour to know how he may adorne his name with workes answerable to those excellent Epithites and titles, wherewith Iulius Pollux, who was gouernour to the Emperour Commodus in his yong yeares, setteth forth a good king. He calleth him Father, gentle, acceptable, mercifull, prudent, iust, courteous, noble minded, free, a conseruer of money, not subiect to passions, but commanding ouer himselfe, one that ouercometh pleasures, and useth reason, quicke of iudgement, sharpe, prouident, good in counselling, iust, sober, godly and full of good religion, carefull ouer the welfare of men, constant, firme, no deceiver, minding great things, decked with authority, industrious, a quicke dispatcher of affaires, carefull ouer those whom hee commandeth, a Saviour, ready to doe good, slowe to reuenge, alwaies one and the same without turning aside, inclining greatly to iustice, easie to haue access vnto, courteous in speech, gentle to them that haue to deale with him, plaine, a lover of a vertuous and valiant man, who neuertheless are desirous of warre, a lover of peace, a peace maker, a precise observer thereof, borne to correct the manners of people, skilfull in discharging the dutie of a king and prince, hauing knowledge to make good lawes, borne to profite euery one, and of a diuine forme. A prince of noble birth shall feele himselfe greatly prouoked to desire and seeke after these excellent giftes and graces, through the consideration of examples propounded vnto him, concerning the liues and deedes of so many famous and woorthy men, as are at this day after innumerable ages receiued againe by meanes of histories. And it cannot bee but he wil be greatly pricked forward to conforme himselfe vnto them, thereby to giue like occasion to good wittes, to write, sing, and publishe his praises. What Prince will not burne with a iealous desire of vertue when he heareth that the onely fame thereof in the person of Scipio Africanus allured and rauished theues and robbers with such an admiration, that when they vnderstood that hee was in a house far from any towne, they did beset it round, and as he stood in his defence to drive them away, they threwe downe their weapons, assuring him, that they came thither onely to see and to reuerence him, as indeede they did? What Prince will not be possessed with ioy when he heareth that Menander king of the Bactrians was so beloued of his subiects for his iustice and vertue, that after his death the cities were in great contention, which of them should haue the honour of his buriall, for the appeasing of which strife, order was taken that each of them should make a tomb? Who will not be moued with loue towards the goodnes of Traian Emperour of the Romans, when he heareth his Panegyricall Oration, wherein Plinie, Traian, after he had extolled him to heauē, concludeth thus. That the greatest happines, which could come

The safetie of Monarchies dependeth of the loue and loyalty of subiects.

The mutuall duties of the Prince & his subiects. What praise a prince is to seeke after.

The whole world is immortal in respect of substance, but not of qualities.

Excellent titles of a good Prince.

Examples of former ages must be propounded to princes.

Scipio Africanus

Menander

Agefilans.

Aristides.

Deut. 17. 19.

to the Empire, was, that the Gods tooke example by the life of Traian. Who will not desire the honor that king Agefilans receiued when he was fined by the Ephories, because he had stolen away the hearts, and woone the loue of all his citizens to himselfe alone? Who will not wish to haue the surname of Aristides the Iust, as diuine and small a title as ever king could obtaine, rather than as many vse to bee called Conquerors, Besiegers, Thunderers? Briefly, vnto these examples oppose the reprehension and marke of perpetuall infamie, which histories set vpon euill Princes, and it cannot bee but that a Prince well brought vp, and exercised in the loue and studie of vertue, will be very desirous to shew forth the fruits and effects thereof, especially if he be well instructed in the feare of God, and knowledge of his duty, whereof hee shall haue perfect vnderstanding in the law of God, which hee is commanded by the foueraigne King of all to haue with him, to reade in it all the daies of his life, and to obey it, to the end he may reigne happily in earth, and finally in heauen.

Of the office and dutie of a King. Chap. 60.

A M A N A

It is as hard a matter to gouerne well as to get an Empire.

Why princes are placed in their thrones.

The good will of the people dependeth of the integritie of religion. The sayings of the seuen wise men of Græcia touching the estate of princes.

Traians letters to the Senate touching the carefull estate of princes. To what false surmises a prince is subiect.

Augustus Caesar hearing some rehearse, that Alexander the Great after hee had finished most of his conquests at two and thirty yeares of age, said that he tooke great care to know what he should doe afterward: I wonder (said the wise Monarch) at the speech of that great Prince, whereby it seemeth he thought that there was lesse to do in well ordering, ruling, and preserving a great Empire once intirely gotten, than in conquering the same. And surely to speake truth, there is nothing more difficult than to reigne well. Moreover it is better for a prince to gouerne prudently and to rule according to his estate, than to invade and possesse another mans countrie: namely, if he consider, that God, beeing so gracious vnto him as to bring innumerable persons vnder his obedience, hath chiefly established him to keepe them in the knowledge and obseruation of true religion, to rule them by good lawes, to defend them by armes, and in all things to bee so carefull of their good, that they may esteeme of him, as of their father and shepheard. Now seeing we haue summarily intreated of the education and institution of a Prince vnder the charge of a teacher and gouernour, let vs in this place (my Companions) consider of his office and dutie, when he reigneth with full authoritie over his subiects.

A R A M. Forasmuch as integritie of religion, and the good will of the people are two principall pillars vpon which the safetie of euery Estate standeth, the king ought to procure the first, being therefore appointed by God over so many millions of men: and the second without doubt dependeth of the former, which is the onely difference betweene a king and a tyrant, who ruleth by constraint.

A C H I T O B. In a king is seene the ordinance of God, who is the author and preseruer of policies, and of good order. Therefore his feare, and reason, must neuer depart out of his mind to the end that seruing God, he may profite all those that liue vnder his dominion. But from thee A S E R, we looke for the discourse of this matter.

A S E R. The seauen Sages of Græcia being invited to a feast by Periander prince of Corinth, were requested by him to enter into the discourse of the estate of great men. Solon speaking first, said, That a soueraigne king or Prince cannot any way procure greater glory to himselfe than by making a popular estate of his monarchie: that is to say, by communicating his soueraigne authority with his subiects. Bias speaking next said, By submitting himselfe first of all to the lawes of his countrey. Thales, I account that Lord happy that attaineth to old age, & dieth a naturall death. Anacharsis, If he be the onely wise man. Cleobulus, If he trust none of these that are about him. Pittacus, If he be able to preuaile so much, that his subiects feare not him, but for him. Chilon, a prince must not set his mind vpon any transitory or mortall thing, but vpon that which is eternal & immortall. Periander concluding vpon these opinions said, that all these sentences seemed to him to dissuade a man of good iudgement, from desiring at any time to command ouer others. The Emperour Traian writing to the Senate of Rome, among other things vsed these very words. I freely confesse vnto you, that since I began to tast of the trauels & cares which this imperiall estate bringeth with it, I haue repented me a thousand times that I tooke it vpon me. For if there be great honor in hauing an Empire, there is also very great paine and trauell in gouerning the same. But ouer and besides, to what enuy is he exposed, and to how many mislikings is hee subiect that hath others to gouern? If he bee iust, hee is called cruell: if pittifull, hee is dispersed: if liberall, hee is thought to bee prodigall: if he lay vp money, hee is taken for conetons: if hee bee addicted to peace, hee is supposed to bee a coward: if hee bee couragious he hee is iudged ambitious: if graue, they will call him proud: if affable and courtous, hee is tearmed simple: if solitary, an hypocrite: and if hee be merrie, they will say hee is dissolute. After many other speeches, this good Emperor concluded, that although hee willingly accepted of his estate at the first, yet hee was very sorrowfull afterward that hee had so great a charge: because the Sea and the Empire were two pleasant things to looke vpon, but perillous to taste. Diuine Plato wrote also, that none was fit to gouerne an Empire, and to be a Prince, but he that commeth vnto it through constraint, and against his will. For whosoeuer desireth the charge of a Prince, it must needs be, that hee is either a foole, not knowing how dangerous and full of care the charge of a king is: or if he be a wicked man, that he mindeth nothing but how hee may reigne to satisfie his pleasure and priuate profit, to the great hurt of the Common-wealth: or else if he be ignorant, that hee considereth not how heauy the burden is which hee taketh vpon him. Therefore a wise prince will not thinke himselfe the happier because he succeedeth in a greater Empire and kingdome, but remember rather, that hee laieth so much the more care and paine vpon his shoulders, and that he beginneth then to haue lesse leisure, lesse rest and happinesse in passing away his time. In other persons, a fault is pardoned in youth, and growing old, they are suffered to take their ease: but he that is Head of a Common-wealth, because he is to trauell for all, must be neither yong nor old. For he cannot commit a fault how small soeuer it be, without the hurt of many men, nor yet rest from his study, but it will turne to the miserie of his subiects. This caused the Philosphers to say, that a prince ought not to dedicate the Common-wealth to himselfe, but to addict himselfe to the Common-wealth, and for the profit thereof alwaies to be diligent, vertuous, and wise, and so to gouerne his Empire, that he may be able easily to giue a reason of his charge. And because no man asketh an account of him in this life, he ought to be so much the more stirred vp to demand a straighter reckoning of himselfe, being assured that the time will come, and that speedily, wherein hee must yeeld it vp before him, with whom there is no respect of princes, except in this, that they shall haue the Iudge more rigorous against them, that haue abused greater power and authoritie. To begin therefore to handle the duty and office of a Prince: first he must haue the law of God continually before his eyes: hee must ingraue it in his soule, and meditate vpon the words and ordinances thereof, all the daies of his life, desiring of God to graunt him the spirit of vnderstanding to conceiue them well, and according to that diuine rule to direct all his intents and actions to the glory of that great, eternall, and Almighty King of kings: as well for the saluation of his owne soule, which hee ought to preferre before the rule of the whole world: as for the good of those that are committed to his charge to gouerne, teach and iudge them. For it is most certaine, that of the knowledge of the truth in the Prince his heart, all good order of his Estate dependeth: and that his piety is of great force to awaken his subiects to their duty: namely, when they see him follow and cleaue to true religion without faining and dissimulation. Therefore hee must carefully provide, that false doctrines, heresies, blasphemies against the name of God and his truth, with other offences in matters of religion, be not openly broched and sowne amongst the people, but that some publike forme of Christian religion may alwaies be seene in his kingdome, which is the sure foundation of euery well established Monarchy. But herein that which I said before, is diligently to be noted: namely, that the Prince through wisdom craued before at the hands of God, must be well assured of his diuine iust, and eternall will, and according to that, take order that true piety may not be publicly violated and polluted by an vncorrected libertie. Next, wee will briefly comprehend all those pointes, which auncient men, both Philosophers and Christians, haue required in an absolute and perfect Prince, into three principall duties and actions: that is, in ruling, iudging, and defending. Hee must rule by good lawes, and by good example; iudge by wisdom, prouidence, and iustice; and defend by prowesse, care, and vigilancy. These duties, that excellent Greek Orator and Philosopher, Isocrates seemeth to haue covertly contained in these words: which he wrot to Nicocles the prince. This may prooue vnto thee that thou hast reigned well, if thou seest that the people, which is subiect vnto thee, increase in modesty and wealth vnder thy government. For good lawes, iustice, and good example of life, make subiects better, and prouidence ioyned with fortitude and prowesse, richer. Now that a good prince (I call him good and iust that imployeth all his power to be such a one, being ready to spend his blood and life for his people) may attaine to these excellent qualities, his loue and affection towards his subiects is very necessary, as that which is able to preserue the indissoluble bond of mutuall good will betweene them and him, which is one of the surest meanes to maintaine great estates and Monarchies. Next, hee is to begin the good ordering of

Who is fittest to rule.

The Prince must giue account to none but to God. The first and principall duty of a prince is to haue the law of God before his eyes Psal. 119.

The piety of the prince is of great force with his subiects to stirre them vp to their duty.

The Prince must be sure that the religion he maintaineth is the iust will of God.

The duties of a prince comprehended in three points. Isocrates argument, whereby he proueth the good reigne of a Prince. A prince must loue his subiects.

- Hee must begin reformation at himselfe. his Estate at himselfe, and reforme first of all, all disorder in his owne life and manners, and correct those things that are most secret in his court: knowing that from thence forward he must liue as it were in an open Theater, where he is seene on euery side, so that his life will be a discipline and instruction of good or ill liuing vnto others. Therefore let him strue to excell those whom he ruleth, and to surmount them as farre in vertues, as he surpasseth them in riches and honour. Amongst all those that follow him, he must alwaies haue the wisest next his person, and all other from all parts neere vnto him, not refusing or contemning any man of skill and reputation. He must often heare them, learne of them, and being a Iudge amongst such as are lesse skillfull, strue to goe beyond the best learned through diligence and study. By which kinde of exercises he shall know how to gouerne the estate of his kingdome vprightly, and cannot but doe such things as are praise-worthy. And forasmuch as common tranquillitie and publike quietnesse is one principall end of ciuill society, the first dutie of a good king towards his subiect, is to maintaine them in peace and concord. For it is vnpossible that a Common-wealth should flourish in religion, iustice, charity, integrity of life: briefly, in all things necessary for the preservation thereof, if the subiects enioy not an exceeding great and assured peace. Let the prince then without intermission, seeke after the safest meanes to keepe his kingdome in quietnesse and rest: let him deliuer his subiects from calamity: let him be carefull of all things which may be profitable and commodious vnto them, and let him command them with mildnesse, and teach them obedience by the vprightnes of his commandements. Let him not suffer his people to be very insolent, nor yet to bee troden vnder foote and oppressed: but let him take order, that such as are most honest may be preferred to honors and offices, and that the rest may not any way be wronged. He must alter those ciuill lawes and customes of liuing, which beeing ill established, are preiudiciall to his subiects, and ordaine all iust and profitable lawes, agreeing with themselves, and such as breeding but few suites among his people, may briefly iudge and decide them according to right and equi-ty. In this point a good prince must vse great care and diligence that iustice may be well administred, to the preservation of euery mans right, and to the punishment of the wicked. This is that which the Spirit of God so often commandeth: namely, To execute iudgement and righteousnesse, to deliuer the oppressed from the hands of the oppressor, not to vex the stranger, the fatherlesse, nor the widdow, to doe no violence, nor shed innocent blood. And these selfe-same things must he cause to be obserued by them that are appointed to exercise iustice in his name. Which because it was neglected by many kings, they lost both life and kingdome, as we reade of Philip king of Macedonia, a very milde prince, and of an excellent nature, who was neuerthelessse slaine by Pausanias, because he delaied a long time to let him haue right and iustice, concerning an iniury which another had offered him. Demetrius also lost his kingdome, because he could not abide to heare his subiects, but especially for this matter. One day when many supplications were presented vnto him, he put them into the plaits of his cloake, and passing ouer a bridge he threw them all into the water, and would not once vouchsafe to reade them: whereupon the people being filled with indignation, rebelled against him. On the other side, a good prince ought freely, & at all howers of the day, to heare the complaints of his subiects, and to provide thereafter, as one that is truly zealous of iustice, clemency, & goodnes, which are rather diuine than humane qualities, and most proper to him that will conforme himselfe as much as may be (as it becommeth him) to that heavenly vertue, which is alwaies iust and mercifull, and (as Plutarke saith) ruleth all things without compulsion, mollifying the necessitie of obeying by admonition and perswasion of reason. Nothing is more conuenient for a soueraigne than gentlenes, for a princethan clemency, for a king than mercy: and yet severity and rigor of iustice are no lesse necessary ornaments, for the discharge of his duty, and the good of his subiects. Therefore in that which concerneth diuine and naturall right, and the punishment established for the transgression thereof, he must alwaies vse iustice and beware lest his facility in granting fauour and dispensations, make him a promoter of euill, which (as Seneca saith) (if he leaue unpunished), is transferred vnto his posterity. But when the prince onely is offended through somelicht contempt, or excusable breach of his Edicts, it cannot but bee commendable in him to vse pardon and pity. These are those strong and mightie chaines, which (as Dion said to Dionysius the king of Syracuse) will preserve his kingdome in a happie, flourishing, and peaceable estate, I meane goodnesse and iustice. For force, feare, and the multitude of his gard, assure not the estate of a prince so well, as the good-will, affection, fauour, and loue of his subiects, which he may obtaine by goodnesse and iustice. They onely (said Marcus Aurelius instructing his sonne) are to hold a kingdome long time without danger,
- Hee must haue the wisest next his person.
- The first duty of a king towards his subiects.
- Good precept for a Prince.
- What manner of lawes are to be established in a Common-wealth.
- Jerem. 22. 3.
- Philip lost his life because he delaied iustice.
- Demetrius threw the supplication of his subiects into a water.
- A Prince must execute iustice vpon the transgressors of the law of God & of nature.
- When it is commendable in him to shew mercy.
- How a Prince may preserve his kingdome a great while without danger.

danger, who by good behavior and iust dealing imprint in the hearts of their subiects, not a feare of their power: but a mutuall loue of their vertue. For those subiects are to bee suspected that serue through constraint and extremitie, not they that obey beeing mooued with reason and gentlenesse. These holy precepts were so well put in practise by this good Emperour Marcus Aurelius, that all his subiects had very easie access vnto him: insomuch that albeit hee were a great Monarch, yet hee had neuer any garde, no not so much as a Porter to his Palace. Likewise king Numa put from him those three hundred Archers, which Romulus vsed to haue for his guard: saying, that hee would not distrust that people which put their trust in him, nor commaund ouer that people that distrusted him. To this purpose when Plato sawe the aboue named Dionysius compassed about with many souldiers of his garde, hee saide vnto him: What? Hast thou committed so many euils, that thou standest in neede of such a guard of armed fellowes? Now it is most certaine, that the obedience of the subiect springeth and proceedeth from the loue of his Lord, as also that the loue of the Lord encreaseth through the obedience of the subiect. But because the wickednesse of men is so great at this day, that they which strue to bee very gracious, are contemned and despised, it is very necessary that the prince should shewe forth a certaine kinde of grauity and severity, and according to the times, places, persons, and occasions that are offered, cause his power, and the maiestie of his commandements to bee perceiued, beeing alwaies the stronger: because in matters of Estate a man may holde this for an vndoubted principle, that hee is master of the estate, who is master of the forces. Thus the gentlenesse of the prince accompanied with severity, his bounty mingled with rigour, and his facility with austeritie will bee the meanes that his vertue shall attaine to a harmonicall iustice, which distributeth vprightly that which appertaineth to euery one: reward to whome reward, and punishment to whom punishment belongeth. From these duties and offices of a good prince towards his subiects, already mentioned, proceedeth the fatherly care which hee hath of their prosperity in the preferuation and increase of their commodities and riches, so farre off is he from all headlong desire to inuade and spoile them. Hee considereth wisely, that although he hath authority and power ouer the goods of his subiects, yet not in such sort as he hath ouer his owne demaine, or as if the property thereof belonged to him, but onely to this end to demaund aide and succour for the good and profit of the Common wealth. Homer bringing in Achilles offering great iniuries to Agamemnon, against whom he was fore incensed saith that he called him Devourer of the people: and contrariwise when hee would in other places praise the king, he termeth him Shepherd of his people. And truly they are vnwoorthy of the title of Prince, that lending their eares to such as inuent new subsidies, impose them daily on their subiects, and hauing against all humanity spoiled them of their goods and riches, consume them miserably vpon pleasures, or cruelly in war, when they might as well suffer their poore subiects to liue in peace. When Marcus Antonius was in Asia, he doubled the taxe, and laid a second charge vpon them, that he might haue wherewith to furnish his immoderate expences. The estates of the countrey sent Hebreas to shew him how the case stood with the, who vsing a marvellous freedome of speech, spake vnto him in this manner, If thou wilt haue power to lay vpon vs two taxes in one yeare, thou must also haue power to giue vs two summers and two Autumnes, two haruests and two Vintages. Further, hee added this, Asia hath paid thee 200000. Talents, (that was sixe score millions of gold) if all this sum came not into thy coffers, call them to account that haue receiued it. But if thou hast receiued it, and yet hast nothing left, we are cast away and vndone. These words ought to be well noted of a prudent prince, that he may thoroughly consider with himselfe and keepe a register of all that is leuiued of the poore people in his name: least some few about him sat themselves with the oppression and ouerthrow of many as it commonly falleth out, and let him be so carefull of the blood and substance of that body whereof he is head, that he profit all the members equally. Ezechiel crieth out against such princes as deuoure the substance of their Vassals by loanes and taxes. Apollonius saith, that the gold which is taken from subiects by tyranny, is more vile than iron, because it is wet with the teares of the poore subiects. Artaxerxes saide, that it was a great deale more seemelier for the maiesty of a king to giue, than to take by polling, and to cloath than to vnclouth, the one belonging to theeues, and not to Princes and Kings, vales they will falsifie and staine their name. King Darius sent for all the gouernors of the Princiues under his subiection, and inquired of them among other things, whether the taxes and tributes were not to excessiue, whereunto when they made answer that they thought them moderate, he presently commaunded that they should raise but the one

Marcus Aurelius stood not in feare of his subiects. Numa refused the guard of three hundred archers which Romulus had.

Plato his speech to Dionysius concerning his guard. Grauity and severity requisite in a Prince.

A principle in state matters. The effects of harmonicall iustice.

What authority a Prince hath ouer his subiects goods.

Hebreas freedome of speech in reproouing Antonius.

Some gold more vile and base than iron.

Darius diminished his tribute.

Lewes the 9.
was the first
that raised a tax in France.

His exhortati
on to his eldest sonne.

Liberality necessary in a prince.

The differēce
between a reward and a benefit.
A king must be as good as his word.

The saying of Theopompus

A prince must discerne wisely betweene
faithfull ser-uants and flatterers.
Wisedome
necessary in a King.

Temperance requisite in a Prince.
What manner
of exercise a prince must use.

halfe thereof: esteeming the loue of his subiects a richer treasure, than all the heaps of gold, which he might haue gathered. We may not here forget to propound to kings the example of that good king. S. Lewes the ninth of that name, who was the first that raised a tax in his kingdome, but it was onely by way of a necessary subsidie during the warre, not vsing it as an ordinary receipt. Directing his speech to Philip his eldest sonne and successour, he vttered these words in his Testament, which is yet to be found in the treasury of France, and is registred in the Chamber of accounts. Be deuout in the seruice of God, haue a pitiful and charitable heart towards the poore, and comfort them with thy good deedes. Obserue the good lawes of thy kingdome: take no taxes or beneuolences of thy subiects, vnles vrgent necessity, and euident commodity force thee vnto it, & then vpon a iust cause, & not vsually, if thou dost otherwise, thou shalt not be accounted a king, but a tyrant, &c. I leave the rest of the clauses in his Testament. Moreouer liberality wel vsed, as wee haue else where hand led the same, is a very comely ornament for a Prince. Socrates said, that it was the duty of a king to be beneficiall to his friends, and of his enemies to make good friends, to which purpose nothing will helpe him more than Liberality. Neither must hee be only liberall, but magnifical also and sumptuous, provided alwaies that of magnifical, he become not prodigal which would soone make him an exactor, and in the endea tyrant. But a soueraigne prince must especially haue an eie to this, that the rewards of vertue due to worthy men be preferred before all his gifts and good turnes, and that he recompeuce such as haue deserued any thing, before he giue to them that haue deserued nothing. For an vngratefull prince wil hardly retaine an honourable and vertuous man any long time in his seruice. Neither is the estimation of a reward, and of a good turne all one: because a reward is giuen for a desert, and a benefit by grace. Besides, a prince must be alwaies true, and as good as his promise, that men may giue greater credit to his bare word, than to another mans oath. For it ought to be as an oracle, which looseth his dignity, whē men haue conceived such an euil opinion of him, that he may not be beleeued vnlesse he sweare. And if he pawne his faith at any time, he must account it sacred and inuiolable: because faith is the fonnation and stay of iustice, vpon which the estate of great men is grounded, as we discoursed else where. That saying of Theopompus king of Sparta, is also to be well noted by the prince. When a friend of his asked him how a king might keepe his kingdome in safety, he answered: By granting liberty to his friends freely to tell him the truth. He must take their aduice in doubtfull matters, that he may gouerne his estate more assuredly, waighing and iudging of their opinions with great prudence. Neither must he thinke them his best seruants that praise al his sayings and doings, but those that with modesty reprocue his faults: he must discerne wisely betweene them that cunningly flatter him, and those that loue and serue him faithfully, that wicked men may not be in greater credit with him than good men. For this cause also he must carefully inquire after his household seruants and familiar friends, that he may know them well: because all other men will take him to be such a one as they are with whome hee conuerseth ordinarily. Osiris king of Egypt had for his Armes a Scepter with an eie in the top of it: noting thereby the wisedome that ought to be in a king: namely, that it belongeth not to one that wandereth out of his way, to direct others; that seeth not, to guide: that knoweth nothing, to teach: and that will not obey reason, to commaund. Likewise in all his actions hee must vse reason as a heauenly guide, hauing chased away the perturbations of his soule, and esteeme it a greater and more royall matter to commaund himselfe, than others. Hee must thinke that it is the true and proper office of a king, not to submit himselfe to his pleasures, but to containe his owne affections rather than his subiects. Further, hee must vse to take pleasure in those exercises, which may procure him honour, and cause him to appeare better to the world. Hee must not seeke for reputation in vile things, which men of base estate and naughty behaviour commonly practise, but follow after vertue onely, wherein wicked persons haue no part. Let him remember alwaies that hee is a king, and therefore that hee must strue to doe nothing vnworthy so high a dignity, but continue his memory by valiant and noble acts. This is that wherein one of the wise Interpreters knew well how to instruct king Ptolomie, who demanded of him how he might behaue himselfe, that neither idlenesse nor pleasure might distract him. It is (said he) in thine owne power, as long as thou commandest ouer a great kingdome, and hast so many great affaires to manage continually, which will not suffer thee to distract thy minde vpon other matters. If priuate men, borne to vertue, are willing many times to die, that they may purchase honour: much more ought kings to doe those things which will procure them honour, feare, and estimation every where during their life, and also through their their brightnes shine a great while after their death. Moreouer, a Prince must be warlike, and skilfull in warfare, prouiding carefully all things necessarie for warre, and yet hee must loue peace, and vsurpe nothing that belongeth to another man contrarie to right; nor enter into warre, but to repell violence in extreame necessitie. Above all things he must feare ciuill dissensions, as most pernicious to his Estate, and take aduice prudently concerning the means whereby all occasions of their entrance may be taken from his people. Herein learning will helpe him well, and the knowledge of Histories, which set before his eyes the adventures that haue befallen both small and great, and cal to his remembrance the times past, whereby he may better prouide for the time to come. Vnto which if he adde the counsell of wise men as wee haue already touched, he shal know more perfectly whatsoeuer concerneth the good of his estate. But aboue all he must know how to make choice of men, and not thioke them wise that dispute curiously of smal things, but those that speake verie aptly of great matters. Neither let him account those men best, and worthiest of credit, that haue gotten most authoritie, but trie and iudge them by their profitable workes: namely, if he see that they giue him wise and free counsell, according as occasions concur, and affaires require: and then let him alwaies with speed execute those things, which by their counsell he findeth good and necessarie. For the conclusion thereof of our present discourse, wee will comprehend the office and dutie of a good Prince in few words: namely, if he serue God in sinceritie and puritie of heart, if he inquire diligently after the truth of his word, and cause his subiects to liue thereafter: if he prouide for their profit, redresse their miseries, and ease them of oppression, exaction, and polling. If he be pliable to heare the requests and complaints of the least, indifferent and moderate in answering them, readie to distribute right to euerie one, by propounding reward for vertue, and punishment for vice. If he be prudent in his enterprises, bold in his exploits, modest in prosperitie, constant in aduersitie, stedfast in word, wise in counsell: briefly, if hee gouerne in such sort, and reigne so well, that all his subiects may haue what to imitate, and strangers to commend.

The end of the fifteenth daies worke.

The sixteenth daies worke.

Of a Councell, and of Counsellors of estate. Chap. 61.

A SER.

Ioeliasan the Emperour said: That the condition of Princes was miserable and dangerous, because they were commonly deceived by them whom they trusted most, being themselves almost alwaies shut up in their pallaces, and vnderstanding no more of their affaires, than their Ministers would declare vnto them, who consulte manie times together how they may disguise the truth of their estate.

For this cause although it be necessarie for a Prince to haue manie eyes and eares, for which intent we say that his Counsellours serue, yet he must looke himselfe as much as he can euen to the depth of his affaires. And truly it belongeth to the dumbe, blind, and deafe, to speak, see and heare nothing, but by the mouth, eyes, and eares of other men. But in those things wherein the Prince is constrained to relie upon another mans report, he must vse great prudence to discerne flatterers and disguisers of matters, who are not touched but onely with their private profit, from those that are moued with the zeale of publique benefit, and of his seruice; and vse these men in matters of counsell, which is most necessarie for the sound preservation of all estates. And indeed there was neuer any estate but vsed counsell and counsellors in the establishing and gouernement thereof, as wee may vnderstand more of you my companions, if you thinke good to discourse of this matter.

A M A N A. Counsell (said Secrates) is a sacred thing, and (as Plato calleth it) the anchor of the whole Citie, whereby it is fastned and stayd, as a ship in the water. Yea, all the great and goodly exploits of armes and Lawes, are nothing else but the execution of a wise counsell.

A R A M. Counsell (saith the same Plato) hath the selfesame place in a Common-wealth that the soule and head hath in liuing creatures. For the vnderstanding is infused into the soule,

A prince must be skilfull in warre, and yet loue peace. A prince must carefully auoid ciuill dissention.

What counsellors a prince must vse.

The summe of the dutie of a prince.

A common misery incident to the estate of Princes.

Counsellors are the eyes and eares of a prince.

What counsellors are to be vsed by princes.

Counsell is the anchor of the Citie.

The excellencie of counsel.

soule, and sight and hearing are placed in the head: so that the vnderstanding being ioyned to these two goodly senses, and reduced into one, preserveth every thing. But of thee (ACHITOB) we expect a whole discourse vpon this matter.

- All common-wealths consist chiefly of two things. ACHITOB. All Common-wealths consist chiefly of two things, of counsell and of iudgement, according to the disposition of which, the affaires of the estate are well or ill handled. Therefore to enter into this matter here propounded, and to leave iudgements to bee considered of hereafter, wee must first know that the ordinary Councell of an Estate, which the Auncients commonly called a Senate, is the lawfull assemblie of Counsellors of estate, to giue aduice to them that haue soueraigne power in euery common-wealth. When wee say a lawfull assemblie, it is to bee vnderstood of that power which is giuen vnto them by the soueraigne to meete together in time and place appointed. And whereas we call them counsellors of estate, it is to distinguish them from other counsellors and officers, who are often called to giue aduice to princes, euery one according to his vocation and qualitie, and yet are neither counsellors of estate, nor ordinarie counsellors. Of this Councell all the rest of the publike government dependeth, and by this all the parts the Common-wealth are tied, vnited, and knit together, through that direction of religion, iustice, warre, treasures, lawes, magistrates and manners, which proceedeth from it. Therefore the Senate is very well called by Cicero, the soule, reason, and vnderstanding of a common-wealth: whereby hee meaneth, that it can bee no more maintained without a counsell, than a body without a soule, or a man without reason. The Hebrewes likewise called the counsell a foundation whereupon all goodly and commendable actions are built, and without which all enterprises are ouerthrowen. Now forasmuch as there hath beene, and are at this day among sundry nations, sundrie sorts of governments and policies, so there is no lesse difference in the establishment of a counsell in them, as also many alterations in the institution and power thereof. And namely, among the auncient Græcians, beside the seuerall counsell of euery Common-wealth, there was the sacred counsell of the Amphictions, so called, because it was instituted by Amphiction the sonne of Deucalion. This counsell was as it were the generall assemblie of the estates of all Græcia, and was held twice a yeare, in Spring time, and in Autumne, at Delphos in the Temple of Apollo, for the commodity of the seate thereof, being as it were in the middelt of all Græcia. The authoritie thereof was so great, that whatsoever was concluded vpon there, the Græcians obserued and kept it inuolable, whether it were in matters concerning religion and piety towards their gods, or peace and vnity among themselves. The Lacedæmonians and Messenians met together certaine daies in the yeare at the Temple of Diana vpon the borders of Laconia, and thereafter sacrifice, consulted of their weightiest affaires. And yet both they and the rest of Græcia had certaine generall counsels concerning the government of their estate, besides those that were particular, which they vsed daily. The Senate of thirty counsellors established by Lycurgus when he reformed the Lacedæmonian estate, obtained the soueraignty not long after, and of Senators became absolute Lords. Solon ordained amongst the Athenians, besides the Senate of foure hundred which was changeable euery yeare, a priuy and perpetuall counsell of the Areopagites, compounded of threescore of the wisest, and of such as were blamelesse, who had the managing of those affaires that were most secret. Romulus the first founder of Rome, compounded the Senate of a hundred of the notablest citizens: and hauing received the Sabines into his protection, he doubled the number of Senators, which after Brutus increased with another hundred. As long as the happy popular government of the Romanes lasted, the Consuls, albeit in dignity they represented a royall person, yet they had no other power but to leade the armies, to assemble the Senate, to receiue the letters of Captaines, and of their allies, and to present them to the Senate, to heare Embassadors before the people, or before the Senate, to assemble the great estates, and to aske the peoples aduice concerning the creation of officers, or publishing of lawes. But the Senate disposed the reuenues of the Empire, and the common expences: appointed lieutenants to all gouernours of prouinces, determined of the triumphs, ordered religion, received and licenced Embassadors of kings and nations, and tooke order for such as were sent to them. The punishment of all offences committed throughout Italy, which deserued publike execution, as treason, conspiracie, poysoning, wilfull murder, belonged to the Senate. If any private person or any citie stood in neede of some special fauour, or of reprehension, or of succour and protection, the Senate had all the charge thereof. It was forbidden vnder paine of high treason to present any request of the people without aduice taken of the Senate. Neuertheles, the soueraignty alwaies belonged to the people, who
- What a Councell is
- The profit of counsell.
- A counsell or Senate is the soule of the Common-wealth.
- The Hebrewes compared it to a foundation.
- The counsell of the Amphictions
- The Senate of the Lacedæmonians.
- The Senate of the Athenians.
- The Senate of the Romans.
- The power of the Consuls of Rome.
- The power of the Senate of Rome.

who might confirme or infringe the decrees of the Senate. Since that time according to the sundrie alteration of their estate and gouernement, the counsell varied in forme. Augustus established a particular counsell of the wisest Senators, and those but few in number: and after that another strict counsell of Mecenas and Agrippa, with whom he decided the chiefest matters. In Turkie the counsell is kept foure dayes in a weeke by the Bassaes wheresoeuer the Prince sojourneth. If it be in time of peace, at Constantinople, or in some other towne within his dominion: If in warre, it is kept within his pauillion. In this counsell called Diuhan, where audience is open to euerie one, they consult of embassages and of answers to be made vnto them, of matters of estate, and of soueraigntie, of the meanes how to provide for decayed prouinces, of murders, and condemnations. The suppliant, complainant, or suter, speaketh without an aduocate, and is forced to answer presently to the obiection of his aduersarie if he be present, or to prooue his saying by witnesses: and forthwith the definitiue sentence is given, which may not be reuoked. When the counsell hath continued seuen or eight houres, the Bassa Viser maketh true relation to the Prince of all that hath bene handled: if he lie it is present death. For the Prince oftentimes listeneth at a Window, called Dangerous, right against the Diuhan, which is made in such sort, that he may heare and see, and not be perceiued: and although he were neuer there, yet they thinke he is alwaies there. After he hath heard the discourse and aduice of his counsell, he seldome gainsayeth, but confirmeth or moderateth the same. These things beeing thus ordered, they are written and registered by officers appointed thereunto. Concerning his treasure, the Bassaes meddle not therewith, but two generall treasurers are ouerseers and chiefe dealers therein, the one beeing of Romania, the other of Anatolia. Two Cadelisquers haue the administration of all iustice, who sit with the Bassaes in the Diuhan: neither doth any other sit there but the twelue Bellerbeis, the Prince his children beeing Presidents in their fathers absence. The Muphtie is chiefe of the Religion, and looketh vpon matters of conscience. At Venice the generall assemblie of Lords and Gentlemen is called the Great Council, which hath the soueraigne power of the estate, and of which the Senate and the authoritie of all their magistrates dependeth. Besides this Great Council and Senate compounded of threescore persons, there are foure other counells, that is, the counsell of Sages for Sea matters, the counsell of Sages for land matters, the counsell of tenne, and the counsell of seuen, where the Duke maketh the seventh, and this is called the Seignorie. If there arise anie hard matter among the Sages, it is referred to the counsell of tenne, and if they be diuided, the counsell of seuen is ioyned to the counsell of tenne. But if the matter be of great weight, the Senate is called, and sometimes also (albeit rarely) the great Council of all the Venetian Gentlemen, in which the last resolution is made. At Rhagufium they create a President from moneth to moneth, who dwelleth in the palace, and hath twelue counsellours, which assemblie is called the little counsell. There is also another counsell called the counsell de Pregadie, into which a hundred of the auncientest citizens may enter. Next, there is the great counsell, at which all the Nobilitie aboue twentie yeares of age are present. At Genes the whole common-wealth is gouerned by them that are borne of eight and twentie families: neither is anie man called to heare anie office whatsoeuer, vnlesse hee be of this assemblie, which they call an Aggregation. Out of this are taken foure hundred, which make the great counsell, that hath all the power and authoritie of the estate, and is chosen from yeare to yeare. They create the Duke and the eight gouernours of the Common-wealth, who are renued from two yeares to two yeares. In Switzerland there are two counells in euerie Canton, a little one, and a great one. But if anie great matter fall out, that is common to all the leagues, they hold their generall counsell, called a Iourney, or a Diet. The like is vsed in Almaine, where the Emperour can ordaine nothing that concerneth the common benefit of Germanie, or the authoritie and preservation of the Empire, without the counsell and consent of all the Estates, especially of the seuen Electours. Hee may not of himselfe vndertake any warre at his pleasure, neither leuie tributes, nor raise souldiers of that nation, nor call in anie foraine souldiers. They haue also a counsell established at Spira, which is called the Imperiall chamber, beeing as it were a Parliament of Almaines, for the administration of iustice among them. In Polonia there is an assemblie of estates euerie yeare, especially for these two causes: the one, to administer iustice in soueraigntie, vnto which are brought appeales from all the Iudges of the countrie: the other to provide for the defence and safetie of the countrie against their next enemies, namely, the Tartares, who make often incursions vpon them. None is receiued for a Senatour amongst them, if he be no Palatine, Bishop, Gouernour of some

The power of the people of Rome.

Of the counsell of the Turke.

Of the counsell of the Venetians.

Of the counsell of Rhagufium.

Of the counsell of Genes.

The counsell of Switzer land.
The counsell of Germanie.

Of the coun-
cel of Spaine.
Seuen feueral councils in Spaine.
Of the coun-
cel of England

Of the secret council of France.

Of the priue
council of France.

What matter are handled
therein.

A commendable custome
vsed in the pri-uy council
of France.

some Forte, or other Captaine, or hath not bene Embassadour. In Spaine there are seven councils, besides the priue Council, which are alwaies neare the King in feueral Chambers vnder one rooffe, that the King may be the better informed of all affaires. Their names are these, the council of Spaine, of the Indies, of Italy, of the low Countries, of Warre, of the order of Saint John, and of the Inquisition. In the Realme of England there is a priuy Council, which neuer exceeded the number of twenty persons. The first establishment thereof was but of fifteene, although it appeareth by the conclusion of a peace made betweene Lewes the ninth, and Henry king of England, that seuentene of the priuy Council swore vnto it, namely, one Archbishop Chancellour, one Bishop, sixe Earles, and sixe other lords besides the high Treasurer, and the two Magistrates, whom they call the chiefe Iustices of England. From three yeares to three yeares they hold a Parliament, where all the Estates are called together to deliberate about the affaires of the kingdome. But enough of strangers. Let vs now come to the establishment and institution of the council in this French Monarchy, where we shall see that it is not inferiour (if it go not beyond them) in excellency and good order to all that are already set downe, or that euer were. First wee know, that the King hath all soueraignty by right of the estate, as heretofore we have discoursed. The first council neare about him is the strict or secret council, called the council of state affaires, which is commonly held in the morning after his Maiestie is vp. None haue entrance into to this, but a few whom the king iudgeth wisest, or of greatest experience and most trueth to his maiesty, with whom he communiceth his weightiest affaires as they fall out, and determineth with them of such principal matters as were deliberated of before in the priue council, and in the council of the treasure if they be such as deserue to be brought thither. In the secret council the letter of princes, of embassadours, of gouernors and captaines are opened, resolutions & matters agreed vpon are commended to the Secretaries of the estate, gifts and rewards graunted with the rols and records thereof, letters and commaundements signed with the kings hand. The priue council is compounded of diuers great personages called thereunto by his Maiestie, either for the nobility of their bloud and greatnes of their house, or for their worthinesse, wisdom, knowledge and experience, who haue places and deliberative voices in the council as long as it pleaseth him. Sometime the king sitteth among them when any great matter is in question, in his absence the first Prince of the blood is President. The Constable and Chancellour, two chiefe officers of the crowne, haue great authoritie therein, the one beeing principall of warre, the other of iustice. They sit on each side in equall degree, beeing alwaies one right before another. This council is helde either for matters belonging to the treasure, or for other things concerning state affaires of the kingdome, and then none enter therein but the Secretaries of the estate, the Treasurer of the priue treasure, the Ouerseers of the treasure, appointed to take knowledge of the leuying and laying out of money, and the Secretaries belonging to the same, or else it is held for parties, that is, for the affaires of iustice depending of the soueraignty. Then the matters of the Requests seruing in their turnes enter therein, who bring in requests, informations, suits called thither by inunctions, and other weighty matters which the king hath reserued to his owne knowledge, or such as cannot bee decided else where. Sometimes also the parties themselves are heard, or else they speake by Aduocates. This is greatly to be commended therein, that every one that hath entry into the council (although peradventure he hath neither deliberative voice, nor place) may bring in any mans request, and aduertise the council of that which is profitable for the Common wealth, that order may bee taken for the same. And many times their counsell is first demanded, then the aduice of the counsellours of estate, so that the greatest Lords giue their opinion last, to the end that freedome of speech may not be taken away by the authority of the princes, especially of factious and ambitious men, who neuer suffer any contradictions but against their wils. By this meanes also they that haue consulting voices onely, prepare the way and make it easie for them that haue deliberative voices, to conclude of matters, and many times furnish the council with good and forceable reasons: and if they erre at any time, they are brought backe againe by the residue without Iealousie. This priue council deliberateth and finally determineth (vnder the soueraigne will of the king) of the complaints of private men in matters concerning the estate, of the suits of townes and prouinces, iudgeth of the appeales made from parliaments, considereth vpon extraordinary daies of the decrees of Parliaments, concerning their order and discipline how it is kept: dealeth with the transporting of wheate & wines also with all merchandises either brought in or caried out of the realme, and with the imposts laide laide vpon them: taketh order for the current and finenesse of money: hath regard to the demaines of the crown, to lones and taxes, and other reuenues of the king, and to the chiefe customes, prolonging their yeares, abating the rents of Farmers, or discharging them altogether, taking knowledge of their cause and of former informations, ioyning therewith the aduice of the Treasurer, and of the Generals of those charges. All matters whatsoever being agreed vpon and appointed to take effect, wust be signed to one Secretary at the least, and sometimes also by one of the masters of Requests before it be sealed by the Chancellour, who ouerlooketh and examineth narrowly all matters concluded vpon: which maketh his authority very great, and sometimes odious. The great council, which at the first institution thereof was seldome imployed about states affaires, was made an ordinary court of 17. Of the great counsell. by Charles the 8. and Lewes the 12. made it vp 20. besides the Chancellour, who was President of that court: but vnder K. Francis another President was appointed. This counsell had the knowledge of extraordinary causes by way of commission sent from the priuie Councell, and ordinarily of appellations made from the Marshall of the kings house. The court of Parliament was the Senate of Fraunce in old time, and erected by Lewes the yong Of the court of Parliament according to the truest opinion, to giue aduice to the king: in which twelue Peeres were established, so that the name of the court of Peeres remaineth with it to this day. But Philip the faire made it an ordinary court, and graunted vnto it iurisdiction and seate at Paris, but tooke from it the knowledge of state affaires. For, as wee haue already declared, there are no counsellours of estate amongst all the magistrates of Fraunce, but those that are ordinary of the priuie council. But besides the counsels specified by vs. Princes haue alwaies had a strict counsell of two or three of the dearest and truest about them, wherein the resolution of the aduices and deliberations of other counsels is bad, yea many times of the greatest Of the strict counsell. affaires of the estate, before others haue deliberated of them. Neuerthelesse, this auncient custome of calling the generall estates of the realme together when they sawe it necessary, hath beene alwaies obserued by Kings and Princes. Our first progenitours the Gauls, before either Romanes or kings ruled ouer them assembled together out of Aquitaine, out of the prouince of Narbone, of Lyons, and of other quarters, about the number of threescore nations, to take aduice and counsell of their generall affaires. Since that time our auncient kinges of Fraunce haue vsed oftentimes to holde the Estates, which is the assembly of al their subiects or of their deputies. For to holde the Estates is nothing else, but when the king communicateth his greatest affaires with his subiects, taketh aduice and counsell of them, heareth their complaints and griefes, and provideth for them according to reason. This was called in old time the holding of a Parliament, which name it retaineth yet in England and Scotland. But at this day the name of Parliament belongeth onely to priuate and particular Courtes of Audience, consisting of a certaine number of Iudges established by the king in sundry of his Prouinces, and the publike and generall courts of Audience haue taken the name of estates. The estates were assembled for diuerse causes, according as matters were offered: either to demanda succour and money of the people, or to take order for iustice, and for men of warre, or for the reuenues of the children of Fraunce, or to provide for the government of the kingdome, or for other matters. The kings sate amongst them, and were Presidents, except at one assembly, wherein was debated the noblest cause that euer was, namely, to whome the kingdome of Fraunce belonged after the death of Charles the faire, whether to his cousin Philip de Valois, or to Edward king of England his brother in law, King Philip was not President, not being at that time king, and besides a party. No doubt but the people receiue great benefite by this assembly of Estates. For this good com-meth vnto them, that they may drawe neere to the kings person, to make their complaints vnto him, to present him their requests, and to obtaine remedy and necessary provision for redresse. Whereby wee may easily iudge, that many, who haue written of the duty of Magistrates and such like treatises, are greatly deceiued in maintaining this, That the estates of the people are about the prince: which layeth open a gap to the rebellions of subiects against their soueraigne, so that this opinion can haue no reason or good ground to leane vpon, for if this were true, the Common wealth would not bee a kingdome or monarchie, but a pure Aristocracy, as wee haue declared heretofore. Yea, what shewe of reason is there to maintaine this error, seeing every one in particular, and all in generall bowe their knees before the king vnto him? But in this case wee except a king that is captive, beside himselfe, or in his infancy. For that which is then decreed by the estates, is authorized as from the soueraine ueraigne power of the Prince. Moreover, wee may see what great good commeth to the king by the assembly of his estates, in the first speech, which master Michael de le Hospital Chauncellour of France made at the least assembly of estates in Orleans. Where he confuteth at large their opinion that say, that the king after a sort, diminisheth his power by taking aduice and counsell of his subiects, seeing hee is not bound so to do: as also that he maketh himselfe too familiar with them, which breedeth contempt, and abaseth his royall dignity. But we may answer them as Theopompus king of Sparta did his wife, who objected this vnto him by way of reproach, that by bringing in the Ephories, and mingling their government with his, he would leaue his authority and power lesse to his children than he receiued it from his predecessours. Nay (said this Prince vnto her) I will leaue it greater, because it shall be more assured. The Emperor Aurelius said as much to his mother, because he freely heard every one. Besides, as wee see in any great perill of sea, or fire kindled to the danger of publicke profit, no mans seruice or succour is reiected, how base soeuer his calling is: so it cannot but be profitable for the estate, when it is threatned with ruine, and the affaires thereof are of great importance, to receiue the counsell of all that haue interest therein, laying the opinions in balance, rather than the persons from whom they come. And hereby the soueraigne maiesty and prudence of a prince is knowne, when hee hath both power and skill to weigh and to iudge of their aduice that giue him counsell, and to conclude with the soundest, not the greatest side. But to go forward with that which remaineth, let so many as haue this honor to be ordinary counsellors to Princes, remember the saying of Solon the wise. That they are not called thither to please, and to speake to their liking, but to utter the truth, & to giue them good counsell for common safety: that they must bring with them, for an assured and certaine foundation of their conference about state affaires, a good intent moued with reason and iudgement to profite him, not with passions or desires of vaine glory, of conetousnesse, emulation, of any other imperfection that leadeth them to their private profite: that they must at the entry of the counsell chamber vnclouth themselves of fauour towards some, of hatred towards others, and of ambition in themselves, and aime at no other markes, than at the honour of God, and safety of the Common wealthe. To this end they must necessarily bee furnished with wisdom, iustice and loyalty. As for skill and knowledge, although it bee requisite in counsellours of estate, namely, the knowledge of the lawes, of histories, and of the estate of commonwealths, yet sound iudgment, integrity & prudence are much more necessary. Aboue all things they must holde nothing of other Princes and Seignories, that may binde them to their seruice. And yet now adaies to receiue a pension of them is so common a matter (but very pernicious in any estate) that it is growne to a custome. Agefilus would not so much as receiue a letter, which the king of Persia wrote vnto him, but saide to his messenger, that if the king were friend to the Lacedæmonians, hee neede not write particularly to him, because hee would also remaine his friend: but if hee were their enemy, neither letter or any thing else, should make him for his part otherwise affected. To bee short, let counsellours of estate learne of Plutarke, that it is necessary for them to bee free from all passions and affections, because in giuing of counsell the mind hath most force towards that whereunto the will is most enclined. As for feare, danger, or threatnings, they must neuer stay them from dooing ther duty, but let them constantly propound and maintaine that which they iudge to bee good and profitable for the Common wealth. Wee reade that the Thracians making war with great vehemency against the Athenians, published a decree, that whosoever counsellor or spake at any time of concluding a peace betweene them, should die the death. Within a while after one of the citizens considering what great hurt his countrey receiued by that warre, came one day into the assembly of the people with a halter about his necke, and cryed with a loude voice, that he was come thither to deliuer the common wealth by his death: that they should put him to death when they would, and that for his part hee gaue them counsell to abrogate that law, and to make peace: which was done, and hee pardoned. Consilius a Romane Senatour would neuer bee from the Senate, no not when Caesar ruled all by violence, and did what pleased him, and when none of the other Senatours came any more through feare of his force. And when Caesar asked him how hee durst bee there alone to stand against him: because (quoth hee) my age taketh all feare from mee. For hauing from hence forward such a short time to liue in, I am not greatly carefull to saue my life. If kings did correct all those that giue them ill counsell, as Solyman did one of his Bassaes, who was his kinsfeman, they would not so readily consent to the passions of great men. This Infidell caused him to bee hanged, because hee counsellor him to put a gentleman to death vniustly (which hee had done) that hee might enioy his wife more easily. Now for the answer to his wife.

Theopompus

An excellent
comparison.

The duties & qualities of counsellors
of estate.

Three things necessary in a counsellor of estate.

Counsellours
may not be Pensioners
to forraigne
princes.
Example here
of in Agefilus.

Counsellours
must not thro-rough feare shrinke from their duty.

Examples
hereof.

Consilius
answer to Caesar.

the conclusion of our discourse, we will here set downe the answer of one of the Hebrew interpreters to king Ptolemie, who asked him, To whom a Prince should trust or commit himselfe. To those (said this wise man) that loue him so entirely, that they cannot be drawne from him neither through feare, gifts, or gaîne: because hee that aspireth to riches, is naturally a traitour. Let vs learne that a counsell well instituted and compounded of good men is a most necessary point in the establishment and preservation of euery estate: and as the olde proverbe saith, Good counsell is better than many hands. Let vs learne, that all those that are called thereunto, ought to aime at nothing but at publike profite, of which the happines and greatnes of the Prince dependeth, who must not contemne the counsell and seruice of the least when they can profit the Common wealth, but heare them willingly, and satisfie iust requests.

Good counsell better than many hands.

Of Iudgements, and of Iudges. Chap. 62.

ACHITOB. V We are now (my Companions) according as the sequele of our speech requireth, to consider of Iudgements, which I affirmed in the beginning to be one of those two things whereof euery common wealth consisteth and that according as they are ordained, the affaires of the estate proceed well or ill. Therefore I leaue the discourse of this matter to you,

A SER. No citie (saith Plato) can truly be called a city if it want iudgement well instituted, and consequently iudges to exercise them.

A MANA. Iudgements are lawfull to such as vse them aright, and Iudges are to vs the ministers of God for our good, as S. Paul saith. But let vs heare ARAM vpon this matter.

Rom. 13.4.

ARAM. As it is a very dangerous matter for an estate to wauer daily in deliberations, and not to be well resolved touching the affaires thereof, or after resolution to leaue them without speedy execution: so the establishment of many good lawes and ordinances, bringeth greater perill than profit to the same estate, if they bee not seuerely obserued and kept. For the authority of the soueraign magistrate, in whose name they are made, is so much the more contemptible amongst his subiects, as they know that they are lesse obeyed: as though the fault proceeded from his insufficiency of skill to command. He that leadeth well before, is the cause why he is well followed, and the perfection of the art of a good Querie of the stable, consisteth in making the horse obedient, and in bringing him to good order; so the principall effect of the knowledge of a king is to instruct wel his subiects in obedience. To this purpose the establishment of good iudges over them will helpe well that they may take knowledge of such as gaîne say and resist the publik lawes and ordinances of his maiesty, who is to authorize their iudgements, as the chiefe sinewes of the whole body of his estate. For nothing euer caused Common-wealthes to flourish so much as the constant keeping of their country lawes, and the strict execution of iudgements agreeable vnto them. And as Cicero saith) those estates that are neere their ouerthrow, all things beeing in a desperate case, fall into this miserable issue, that men condemned by the lawes, are restored, and iudgements giuen are cancelled, which things when they come to pass, euery one knoweth, that their ruine is at hand without all hope of safety. Moreouer, forasmuch as the Prince knoweth that he is as it were bound and indebted for iustice, hee ought to bee so much the more carefull, that it may bee rightly administred by those to whom hee committeth that office specially, seeing he must answer for it himselfe before God, to whom he may not say, that hee charged the consciences of his iudges therewith, and so discharged his owne. Wherefore if hee adorne his estate with resolute and prudent officers, who will exactly preferue the bond of the Common wealth by the seuerity of their iudgements, and vpriht holding of the balance: no doubt but al kinde of publik felicity will issue from the same. But let vs briefly consider what iudgement is, the diuision of Iudgements, their administration, and what manner of Iudges ought to exercise them. Iudgement is properly that which is ordained by the Magistrate, obseruing the tenour of the law. But for as much as through the infinite variety of causes, times, places, and persons, which cannot be comprehended in any lawes or statutes whatsoever, punishments were referred to the will and power of the Magistrates, and the dammages of ciuill matters to the conscience and religion of the Iudges; that which

The common breach of law breedeth contempt of the magistrate.

Iudgements are the sinewes of an estate. A certaine token of the ruine of an estate. The prince standeth bound for iustice, & must answer before God for the breach thereof.

What iudgement is.

Magistrates
must alwaies
haue the law
and equity before their eyes.
The diuision
of iudgements.

A rigorous iudgement of the Phocians

Of the iudge-
ments of the Romanes.
VWho were Iudges amongst them,
and how they were chosen.
Threekinds
of Pretors in Rome.

Of the reue-rence and honour which was given to Magistrates.
An excellent
way to decide
all controuer-sies betweene parties at discord.

they determine by resolute sentences according to their opinion, is also called iudgement, although more properly it may bee called a decree. For this cause wee say, that as there are two principall points in euery Common wealth, which Magistrates must haue before their eyes, that is, the law and equity: so also there is the execution of the lawe and the duty of the Magistrate, which consisteth either in commanding, in decreeing, or in executing. Of Iudgements, some are called priuate, some publike, some criminall, others ciuill. Priuate iudgements are of bondage, prescriptions, Gardianships, Wardshippes, contracts, testaments, successions, marriages. Publike iudgements concerne hainous offences against God and man, as sacrilege, treason, restitution of money, or other bribes taken by Magistrates, robbery of the kings treasure, forgeries, theft, wilfull and constrained murders. Plato speaketh at large of these in his booke of laws, and it would be an infinite matter, and smally to our instruction, to seeke out the diuers kinds of iudgements, which either haue beene or are among men. But this is well worth the noting, that amongst the auncient Gracians and Romanes, all iudgements both priuate and publike, were from point to point followed, & with al rigour obserued, and they, that stood against them were prosecuted and set vpon with fire and sword. Among other examples Diodorus rehearseth a story of the Phocians, a people of Gracia condemned by the iudgement of the Amphictions in a certaine sum of money, because they had tilled a great deal of ground that was consecrated to the gods. Which summe when they refused to pay, they pronounced their country as confiscate and consecrated to the gods, wherupon arose a war, called the holy war, made by the rest of the Gracians against them, and in the end their vtter ruine and subuersion. Whosoever was once accused of any crime before the Iudges in Lacedæmonia, although he were absolved, yet hee abode a certaine time after in that estate of a criminall person, during which time enquiry might be made againe of him, and new iudgement giuen according to his desert. If the Ephories condemned their Kings in any summe, yea if it were to death, their iudgements were executed with all rigour. The iudgements of the Romanes were for a long time in the hands of three Orders or Estates: namely, of Senatours, Knights, and Tribunes of the treasure. Neuertheles, the same persons did not alwaies iudge, but the Pretors, who were annuall iudges & chief amongst the, took a certain number of Iudges by lot out of those three estates. And if they that were takē were first refused by any one of the parties, others were chosen by an after lot, who being agreed vpon & sworn, were distributed by decuries or tens. There were three sorts of Pretors, the Pretor of the City, who tooke knowledge of particular causes, namely, of land and criminall matters amongst the citizens of Rome: the Pretor established for matters betweene strangers and citizens: and the Pretor appointed for publike causes. The Senators were once the only iudges of all proceses: but Tiberius and Caius Gracchus being popular persons, to diminish the authoritie of the Senate, and to increase the peoples power, ioyned vnto them 300. Knights, according to the number of the Senators, and brought it so about, that the iudgements of all causes were deuided betweene these 600. men. Vander Sylla all authority of iudging was restored againe to the Senate: but Pompey after that brought in the Knights againe, and all iudgements were equally communicated vnto the three Orders aboue mentioned. Afterward, when Cæsar was Dictator, he reduced them to two orders onely that is, to Senators, and to Knights. Budens in his annotations vpon the Pandecks, hath obserued many good thinges belonging to the Romane iudgements, which curious spirits may looke into; among the rest, of the great respect and honour that was giuen to Magistrates. Concerning which matter, we may vse as a good testimony, that which we reade in Plutarke of Fabius Maximus his son, who seeing a farre off his father come towards him on horse-backe, and that his sergeants in regard of fatherly reuerence had not caused him to alight, commanded him to set foote on ground, Which the father presently obeyed, and embracing his sonne, made greater account of him, than if he had done otherwise. The same author writeth, that one Vestius was presently slaine, because he rose not when the Tribune of the people passed before him. And Valerius Maximus saith that the Censor did note with ignominy, and with all disfranchised a citizen of Rome, because hee breathed and yawned a little too loud in their presence. But what? Estates and dignities were then giuen to vertue, and not to him that offered most. And oftentimes the places of iudgement were necessarily, and as it were by force laid vpon iudges, being more honourable than profitable, yea very incommodious to such as would discharge themselves vprightly therein. I remember an excellent iudgement giuen by Archidamus the Lacedæmonian, when hee was chosen arbitrator to decide a certaine contention betweene two friends. After hee had brought them both

both into the temple of Diana, and made them sweare vpon the altar, that they should obserue precisely whatsoeuer he determined, whereunto they yeilded. I iudge then (quoth he) that none of you depart out of this temple before you haue ended your strife. Thus were they both constrained to agree among themselves, and Archidamas freed from perill of loosing one of their friendships, against whom he must needs haue giuen iudgement. By this meanes he put in practise that saying of Putacus, That a man must not be iudge or Arbitrator in the controuersie of two friends, lest by iudging profitably for one, hee lose the friendship of the other. But let vs speake of our owne Estate. In olde time (as many histories report) iudgements were so well administred in France, that strangers did willingly submit themselves vnto them. Fredericke the second, submitted to the iudgements of the king and his Parliament, the deciding of many contentions and controuersies betwene him and Pope Innocent the fourth. In the time of Philip the Faire, the Earle of Namure did the like, albeit that Charles of Valoys the kings brother, was his aduerser partie: so great confidence had he in the equity of those Iudges. At the same time Philip Prince of Tarentum willingly accepted for Iudge, the king sitting in his Parliament, about the controuersie that hee had with the Duke of Burgundie, for certaine charges which hee should defray towards the recoverie of the Empire of Constantinople. The like did the Duke of Lorraine in the suite which hee had against Guy of Castillon his brother in law, for their diuision of lands. And in the yeare 1402. the kings of Castile and of Portingale sent an agreement made and past betwene them, that it might bee published and proclaimed in the Court of Parliament, to haue greater authoritie thereby. Truly these testimonies are as famous for the glorie of iustice vsed in France, as any that can bee alleadged by the Grecians or Romanes, for the prooofe of their iust iudgements, of the reputation of their lawes, and renowne of their Magistrates. But let vs consider how farre iustice is fallen at this day from the auncient opinion and credite, iudgements beeing nowe brought to that length, and intangled in so many formalities, that it is a thing greatly to bee pitied, and full of calamitie, to see this Realme so infected, as it were with a generall contagious disease, wherein such an innnumerable companie of men liue by that miserable exercise of pleading, called Practise. Plato saith, that it is an euident token of a corrupted estate, where there are many Iudges and Philitions: because the multitude of Iudges is maintained by the vnfaithfulness and contention of men, and the great number of phisitions by idlenesse, dainty fare, and gluttony. There was neuer any nation of which this might bee more truely spoken of than ours, as it is notoriously knowne to euery one. Panlus Amilius writeth, that in the beginning, French men haue behaued themselves simply & plainly in matters of iudgment, resting in the determinations giuen by the baliffs & Seneshals, who had the administratio almost of all right & iurisdiction, and thinking it vnseemely and voide of honesty, to seeke a farre off for right by meanes of appeale. But after that slanders arose amongst them, and suits were multiplied, soveraigne iustice began to bee exercised once a yeare, and that for a few daies together: afterward, twice a yeare, alwaies changing the place. In the end it was determined, that the chief iudgments should bee helde in a certaine place, and that a house should bee built for that purpose at Paris, the principall city of the kingdome. Whereupon, in the raigne of Philip the Faire, the Pallace was erected according to that greatnesse and magnificence wherein you now see it, with hals and chambers, into which were distributed by certaine companies those Iudges that gaue the last sentence from which no appeale might bee made, both in ciuill and criminall matters. The erection of this Parliament into an ordinarie Court, doth giue vs to vnderstand that there should bee one or two Presidents. The first President was the Earle of Burgundy, a Prince of the blood: as in the Imperiall Chamber, the President is alwaies one of the Princes of the Empire. And it was a custome for a certaine time, that the chiefe President should be a man of warre, as indeede to this day hee taketh vpon him the estate of knight. Besides, there were eight Clearks, and twelue lay men, foure Princes of the blood for Requests, two Chambers of Inquiries, where there were eight Lay men, and eight Clearks Iudges, and foure and twenty Relators, They were called Clearks that wore long gownes, whether married or vnmarried, and the others Lay men, At this day there is the great Chamber, which is the first and chiefest, and is called the Pleading place where first of all, matters belonging to the Peers and to the King, are decided, and ordinarily those verball appellations that are made vpon the Pleas of the Aduocates; or if they cannot bee readily determined, they are remitted to the Councell, for which there

Of the ancient reputation of iudgements in France.

The iustice of France fallen from the ancient glory. Tokens of a corrupted estate.

The proceeding of iustice in France from time to time.

The officers of the Court of Parliament in Paris.

The present estate of the Parliament.

is a Chamber appointed. Next, there are five Chambers of Inquirie, wherein proceses in writing are examined and determined. There also is the Tournel, or place where criminall actions are iudged, and the Treasure-chamber for causes touching the Kings revenues. There is the court of Requests, wherein chiefly matters of priuiledges belonging to the kings traine and to others, are iudged. There is the Auditorie of the masters of Requests for the household, who iudge of the titles of offices: the Chamber of the Generals of the iustice of the Releefes, and the Chancerie. On the other side is the chamber of Accounts, and that of the generall Receiueurs. Some of the Counsellours are married, others are Ecclesiasticall persons, and are diuided by chambers according as the court is furnished. In the great chamber there are for the most part presidents, vnto whom the necessity of times haue added two others, who may be suppressed when there is no need of them. In the other Chambers there are but two Presidents. Moreover, there is one Procurator for the king, and two Aduocates, to looke to the kings prerogatives, and to all such matters: two Scribes to collect, inroll, and to deliver both ciuill and criminall deeds: foure Notaries and Secretaries to ease them, besides a great number of other writers. Budens, a very skilfull man, and a diligent searcher out of all antiquitie, hath obserued in his first annotations vpon the Pandects, that there were three sorts of Iudges in the time of Philip the Long. In the first bench, which was properly called the Parliament of Prelats and Barons, vnto whom certaine Lawyers were assistants, or other learned men, called Clerks and Laymen, three Prelats and three Barons were Presidents, and iudgement was not given so much by the pluralitie of voices, as by the sufficiencie of those that gaue their verdicts. Hee saith also, that the Lay-counsellours were taken from amongst gentlemen and others, of whom it was not required that they should be Graduars in the law, but it was sufficient if they had indifferent skill in other learning, as wee see that some short gowned men haue. They did not then studie the Romane lawes, as they haue done since: whereupon they haue erected at this day Vniuersities of the law in the best townes of France: from whence many thinke that the multitude of suites haue proceeded, because they learned by this meanes the occupation or craft of pleading, as the Lord Chancellour de l' Hospital declared in his second Oration which hee made to the Estates at Orleans. Wee read that when Ferdinando king of Spaine, sent Pedrarías as gouernour into the West Ilands newly discovered, he forbade him to take any lawyer or Aduocate with him, that he might not carrie the seede of suites thither where there were none at all. Cicero complained of his time, that many notable decrees of lawes were corrupted and depraued by the curious heads of the lawyers. What would he doe if he were now alieue, and saw the great heapes and piles of bookes, with our practise in the law? If he saw that holy Temple of lawes so vilely polluted, and miserably prophaned? Where a thousand cauils and quiddities are continually coined by such writings, according to the saying of that Comickall Poet: That through craft and subtiltie one mischief is begotten vpon another? Moreover, in those happie daies, of which we made mention, there were few statutes and edicts, because men thought that good manners were the best lawes, and that naturall sence holpen with an vpright conscience, and ioyned with due experience, was the rightest rule to iudge by. But after that men became so skilfull in suites, and that offices of iustice, from honourable but small profitable, being freely given to those that deserued them, came to be gainfull, free from yeelding any account of their doings, and set forth to sale, as merchandise, for them that bade most, and offered last: after that men began to spice their fruits with great sums of money, and to forsake that ancient plainnesse, which consisted in giuing of a few iunclets to the Iudges: after that profite began to grow by determining of by matters, and such as happen before the main cause, and by deciding of suites by Commissioners: after that Presidents and Counsellors began to take delight in this, that they were followed, solicited, and sought to by sutors, contrary to the customes of the Areopagites, who iudged by night, and in the darke, and contrary to the opinion of Marcus Cato, who said, that it was not seemely for a man to recommend his right to the Iudges, or to praele them to commit no iniustice, because these two things ought to bee deerer to the Iudges than to the parties, who can loose but mortall and fading goods, whereas the others pawne their soules to hell fire that lasteth for euer: after that giftes were received of both sides against expresse prohibitions given out by publike lawes and statutes, wherein the Switzers may serue vnto vs for a notable example, amongst whome it is, forbidden vnder paine of life, to take any thing either

Of the ancient estate of the parliament.

Ferdinando forbade that any Lawyers should go into the West Indians.

The springs of all corruptions of iustice.

The Areopagites iudged by night, and in the darke. The Switzers forbid their Iudges to take any thing for iudging.

directly

directly or indirectly for iudging: after that aduocates beganne to consider sleightly of causes, not hauing so much patience to end one matter, because they would speedily to another: whereby they giue occasion many times to their Clients to say as a Peasant said not long since to three famous Aduocates, whose counsell he had vsed: Trulie (quoth hee) yea haue laboured faire, for you haue left mee in greater doubting than I was in before: after they beganne to write in sheetes with seuen or eight lines on a side, and to disguise matters with friuolous answers that lay open their grietes, with contradictions, replications, admonitions: after the Proctors, who in former times were to bee had for nothing, and appointed for certaine causes, became hirelings and perpetuall, yea at this day their offices are set to sale: after that Solicitors, were suffered in the middest of them all to bee, as it were the skum-gatherers of suits, with all that rablement of practitioners, who deuoure the substance of poore men, as drones eate vp the honie of Bees: lastly, after the Chauncerie did let loose the bridle of all sorts of expeditions, and went about to teach the Iudges, I say, after these things beganne to bee practised, wee fell into this miserie of long suits, gainefull to wicked and faithlesse men, who seeke nothing but delaies, and very preiudiciall to good men, who many times had rather loose their right, than vndo themselves by following it so long time by way of iustice. For they commonly see the rightest cause frustrated by delayes, which are graunted at their pleasure that are fauoured, and by infinite other vniust meanes. Sometimes many iudgements are giuen vpon on matter, and yet nothing concluded: or if there be any definitiue sentence, it is by and by suspended from execution, vpon the least obiection that is made, or else it is called into doubt by some ciuill request, or by a writ of error. Thrice happie were wee, if wee might continue in that ancient simplicitie and naturall goodnesse, rather than after this manner to infolde our selues in so many proceedings and captious subtilties, which haue corrupted and extinguished the light of iustice, imprinted in the hearts and mindes of all men well borne. Wee see that suits are heaped vp one vpon another, and made immortal: and nothing is so certaine which is not made vncertaine: that no controuersie is so cleare, which is not obscured: no contract so sure, which is not vndone: no sentence or iudgement so aduisedly giuen, which is not made void: all mens actions open to the slanders, craft, malice, redemptions, and pollings of lawyers: the maiestie and integritie of ancient iustice lost: and last of all, that in the dealings of men now adayes, no shew of vpright iustice, but onely a shadow thereof remaineth. This euill beeing so great, and growne to such extremitie, it is impossible but that, according to the course of worldly things, the ruine thereof should bee at hand, or at least it is to receiue some notable change within a short space. For (as Plato saith) in a corrupt Commonwealth defiled with many vices, if a man should thinke to bring it backe againe to her first brightnesse and dignity, by correcting small faults, and by curing the contagion thereof by little and little, it were all one as if hee should cut off one of Hydra's heads, in whose place seuen more did spring vp: but that alteration and disorder whereby all euill and vice was brought into the commonwealth, must bee plucked vp by the roots. Therefore let us not thinke it strange, if they that haue the raines of the government of this Estate in their hands, finde so many difficulties and so small meanes, in the reformation thereof. For as Demades said, they gouerne nothing but the shipwracke of the Commonwealth, Neuerthelesse, honest men, indued with some gifts, and with good iudgement, ought not to bee discouraged in so great a storme, but the more that the tempestuous rage thereof seemeth to torment the Vessell of our commonwealth, and that with such violence, that the Patrone himselfe and the Pilots are in a manner tired, and faint with continuall trauell, so much the more diligently ought the passengers to lead their hands, some to the saile, some to the tackling, and some to the anchor, yea now is the time (following the counsell of Cicero in the like case) that all that are indued with singular gifts of nature, fit for the manning of affaires, ought boldly to take vpon them publike Offices and Estates without feare, to the end that all entrance may be shut vp against the wicked, who are the nourishers of this present corruption. Now if these three things, which Aristotle requireth in the all good Iudges, and Magistrates, did abound in them that should hereafter be called to administer iustice and iudgement: namely, a loue to the present estate, a sufficiencie to exercise those duties that are required in their offices, with vertue and iustice, wee might yet see some Idea and forme of that golden age, wherein your predecessors liued, wee might see piety and iustice flourish, to the great benefite and felicitie of this French Monarchie. Concerning

The saying
of a Peasant to three Lawyers

Of the miserie which length of suits bring with it.
The great
abuse of iustice
in France.

How a corrupt Commonwealth
must be corrected.

When it is law
full to seeke af ter publike offices.

Judges ought to be such old men as haue experience ioyned with their knowledge.

Magistrates
must not be couetous.

The chiefeft point of Phi-
losophie.

A corrupt making of Iudges.

The statute
of S. Lewes
concerning the election of officers.

that which may be further bee required in the duties, qualities and conditions of good Iudges, wee may bee instructed by our other treatise, wherein wee intreated of Counsellors of Estates, and also by calling to minde the former discourses of vertue and iustice. I onely will adde here, that it were very commendable and full of profite, yea necessary for the Estate, that all the companies of Iudges should bee compounded of such notable olde men, as with their knowledge haue experience of many things. And indeede this title of Senatour, which was giuen them in auncient time, signifieth an old man: neither did the Grecians or Romanes call any to that degree, but old men. But how can wee desire a more heavenly ordinance than that which God himselfe appointed, when hee established a Senate? Gather together (saide hee) threescore and tenne of the ancientest of the people, wise men, and such as feare God. Surely in this election of Iudges, it behooueth Kings to vse great prudence, and (as Isocrates said) to take triall of them, to know whether they are of good iudgement, whether they haue a sharpe sight in affaires, and whether they are not troubled with the change of their life, but behaue themselues wisely in euery estate, both in prosperitie and in aduersitie: especially to take good order that they be not such as are subiect to lucre, from whence al iniustice proceedeth. Therefore Cicero would haue the contempt of temporal goods, from whence all quietnes of our minds, commeth, to bee no lesse in Magistrates, than in true Philosophers. Yea, hee saith, that they ought to bee more carefull and laborious to attaine vnto it than the others, because worldly affaires toucheth them neerer, so that they haue greater cause to stand in feare of the alteration of fortune, of aduersity, and of pouerty. Vnto which agreeth fitly that saying of Plinie the yoonger: That no point of Philosophie is more excellent than to deale in publike affaires, and to doe iustice, whereby they practise that which Philosophers teach. But out of question, the forme and manner, which of late time hath bene vsed in calling Iudges and Officers to their charge, is so farre from that which wee desire here, that in this respect a man may call it the mother of all corruption and iniustice. For when a Iudge is made, his knowledge is not examined, his integritie and vprightnesse of life is not weighed, his long experience is not considered, his age and vertue is not regarded, but only his crownes are viewed to see whether they are weight. Now since that such men grew rich, although they are found insufficient, yet they obtaine so many letters of commandement, so many Mandatums one in anothers necke, that in the end they are receiued whatsoeuer they are, to the great preiudice of the whole common wealth. Wee are therefore to wish that all valuing and sale of offices, especially of iudgement and iustice, may be abolished and disanulled, that all meanes of fauour and ambition may bee taken away, that the auncient and happy ordinances of our kings may bee restored: especially that decree of Saint Lewes the king, whereby hee enacted, that all publike offices, should bee bestowed vpon the election of three persons, chosen by the officers and citizens of those places, to one of which so elected, the king was to giue freely without money, the office then voided. This holy ordinance hath since that time bene often renewed by king Philip the Faire, Charles the Wise, Charles the 7. Lewes the 11. and Charles the ninth that dead is, when his Estates were held at Orleans. So that if the king and his Councell would aduisedly consider of these things in the establishing of Iudges and Magistrates in his kingdome, and would strengthen them in the execution of their iudgments, the obedience of his subiects would be greater, and the foundation of all good order and policy more sure.

Of Seditions. Chap. 63.

No earthly thing perpetuall.

ARAM. AS it is necessary that all things which haue a beginning should end, and which increase should diminish and waxe olde, some sooner, others later, according to the disposition of that matter whereof they are compounded, and through the influence of the heavenly bodies, from which (nature working in them by her author) this continuall and mutual succession of generation and corruption proceedeth: so are publike estates first instituted, increased, maintained, lessened, changed, destroyed, turned and returned one from another by the disposition of God. Those that are best grounded grounded in religion and iustice, have their power most assured; and are of longest continuance, but none are perpetuall, although their policy and manner of government be neuer so good. For we see that all are corrupt in proceſſe of time, and in the end perish through their owne vices that follow and accompanie them, being first mooued and stirred vp by nothing so much as by sedition, and ciuill warre. This bringeth to light all euill that lurketh in those members of the politike body that are most pernicious, vntill the infection bee wholly spread, and hath taken hold of the nobleſt parts thereof, whereby it is brought to extreame miserie without hope of remedy. Now, although euery one of vs haue sufficient feeling hereof in himselfe by his owne harme, yet wee may know it better by taking occasion vpon this subiect to discourse of the nature of seditions, and of their common effects, that we may haue them in greater detestation, and bring euery one of vs his heart and minde to helpe this Estate, if there remaine neuer so little shew or meanes whereby the subuersion thereof may yet bee kept backe. But I leaue the discourse of this matter to you my companions.

No Common-wealth perpetuall.

A CHITO B. All sedition is euill and pernicious, although it seemeth to haue a good and honest cause. For it were better for him that is author of sedition, to suffer any losse or iniurie, than to be the occasion of so great an euill, as to raise ciuill war in his countrey.

No iniury is a sufficient cause for any man to moue sedition.

A SER. Nature (saith Empedocles) vseth no other meanes to destroy and ouerthrow her creatures than discord and disunion: and sedition (as Thucydes saith) comprehendeth in it all kinde of euils. Let vs then heare A MANA, who will prooue this sufficiently vnto vs.

A MANA. If we consider, how God minding to punish Adam for his ingratitude and disobedience, made his owne members rebell against the spirit, vnto which they obeyed before, whereby he became captiue vnder the law of sinne, no doubt but we may say, that after the same manner he chastiseth Kings, Princes, and Heads of Common-wealths, that haue no care to obey his commandements and to cause others to keepe them, by the rebellion of their owne subiects, not without great danger of deprivation from all authoritie by them, and of receiuing the law at their hands to whom they should giue it, as it hath beene seene practised in many Estates and governments. Religion and the loue of God bringeth with it all vnion and concord, preserueth Kingdomes and Monarchies in their integrity, and is the nursing mother of peace and amity amongst men. But the contempt of religion bringeth discord and confusion, ouerturneth all order, treadeth vertue vnder foote, giueth authoritie to vice, and soweth quarrels and dissensions amongst men, from whence seditions and priuate murders proceed, and in the ende ciuill and open warres, which are as flaming fires to take hold of, and to consume most flourishing Estates. For without doubt, if men had in them the true loue and feare of God, which cannot be without the loue of our neighbour, no such effects would euer proceede from their workes and actions. Politicks haue laboured infinite waies to maintaine the people in peace, and to cause ciuill iustice to flourish. They haue made many lawes & edicts, many statutes, appointed many punishments, to bridle the boldnesse of seditious fellowes, to repress extorsions, wrongs, & murders: but because they build without a foundation, that is, without the feare of God, all their labour taken therein was fruitlesse. It is the feare of God onely that causeth swords to be broken and turned into mattocks, and speares into fishes, as Isaias and Micah speake: that is to say, which breedeth humanity and gentlenes, mollifieth mens hearts, and causeth them to suffer much to auoide strife and debate, in a word, which is able to vnite in one with vs most strange and barbarous nations. Besides, it is the profession of godlines to suffer, and not to offer violence, neither can it bring forth euill effects contrary to their cause. This deserueth to be handled at large, but our present subiect leadeth vs to discourse of the nature of seditions, and to set before our eyes the euils that proceede thereof, both by reasons and examples, referring the consideration of their causes vnto some other time hereafter. Sedition then being taken generally, is nothing else but ciuill warre, so hurtfull to all estates and Monarchies, that it is the feede of all kinde of euils in them, euen of those that are most execrable. It engendreth and nourisheth want of reuerence towards God, disobedience to Magistrates, corruption of manners, change of lawes, contempt of iustice, & base estimation of learning & sciences. It causeth horrible reuenging, forgetfulness of consanguinity, parentage, & friendship, extorsions, violence, robberies, waisting of countries, sacking of townes, burning of buildings, confiscations, flights, banishments, cruell proscriptions, sauage murders, alterations and ouerthrowes of Policies, with other infinite excesses & intollerable miseries, pitifull to behold, and sorrowfull to rehearse. Sedition armeth the father against the sonne, the brother against the brother, kinsman against kinsman,

The originall of all sedition

The cause of vnion and concord in kingdomes. The fruits of the contempt of religion.

Peace and concord effects of the feare of God. Isaias. 2. 4. Micah. 4. 3.

What sedition is. The fruits of sedition.

men

men of the same nation, prouince, and city, one against another. Hereupon the fields, which before were fertile, are left vntilled, sumptuous and rich houses remaine empty and forsaken, famous and wealthy townes stand desolate, by reason of the losse of their ancient ornaments, I meane their priuate and publike buildings, and their notable Inhabitants and Citizens. And, which is woorst of all, no man will acknowledge a Soueraigne, but every Prouince will seeke to withdraw it selfe, and to be made a Canton. In the end, the body thus dismembred, and the parts thereof infected with the same poyson of discord, destroy themselves: that the prophesie of Iesus Christ, who is the truth it selfe, might be fulfilled, where he saith: that euery kingdome diuided in it selfe shall bee desolate. Therefore Dauid did rather choose a plague amongst his subiects, than warre or Tumults. And Pythagoras said, that three things were by all meanes to be remooued: A disease from the bodie, ignorance from the soule, and sedition from the citie. Plato also affirmeth, that no euill is woorse in a Citie than that which diuideth it, and of one maketh it two: and that nothing is better than that thing which tieth and vnieth it together. Whereupon he wished, that there might be a communion, not onely of all goods, but also of that which nature hath appropriated to euery one, as of eies, eares, and hands, to the end that whosoever saw, heard, or did any thing, hee might imploy all to common profite and vse, thereby to maintaine better the mutuall loue of citizens, who hauing nothing priuate, would by this meanes be alwaies touched with the same ioy and grieve, praising and disliking all ioyntly together the same things. There are two sorts of warre mentioned also by Plato, who calleth the one sedition, which is the worst, & the other which is more gentle is that against strangers. Nestor, a wise and prudent counsellor among the Græcians, said in a counsell, (as Homer reporteth) that he which loueth ciuill warre, is a most wretched, cruell, and detestable man, and vnworthy to liue. And truly if wee looke to the example of those fruits, which haue alwaies proceeded of ciuill warres, we shall see that they haue beene guided after a most cruell and horrible kinde of hostility, and that their issue hath bene the losse and ouerthrow of many flourishing common-wealths. Thucydides speaking of the generall dissention among the Grecians for diuersity of governments, which they sought to bring in amongst themselves, some desiring to be gouerned in a Democracy, others in an Oligarchie, rehearseth incredible euils which arose of that warre. As soone (saith he) as any insolency was knowne to be committed in one place, others were encouraged to doe woorse, to enterprise some new thing, and to shew that they were more diligent than others, or more insolent and hot in reuenging themselves. They disguised all the euils which they committed with commendable titles, calling rashnesse Magnanimitie, and modestie Basenesse of minde: head-long indignation Manlinesse and Hardinesse: prudent counsell and deliberation, Coloured back sliding. Whereby it came to passe that whosoever alwaies shewed himselfe furious, was accounted a loyall friend, and hee that gain-said, was suspected. If any one of the contrary faction gaue any good and honest counsaile, it was not accepted: but if they could withstand it by any notorious deede, they had rather bee reuenged so, than they would not giue occasion to others to offer the like wrong to them. When any agreement was made and confirmed with a solemne oath, it lasted vntill one of the parties grew to bee the stronger, that hee might breake and violate the same, and by extreame wickednesse overcome the other; which proceeded of couetousnesse and desire of other mens goods. Hereupon those factions and part takings were kindled, which procured infinite euils to the whole countrey of Græcia, wherein there was no quietnesse, vntill it was quite ouerthrowne by seditions and ciuill warres. This is that which Demades obiected to the Athenians by way of reproch, that they neuer intreated of peace but in mourning gownes, namely, after they had lost many of their kinsfolke and friends in battels and skirmishes. Agefilas king of Lacedæmonia bewailed this misery, when he saw such cruell warres betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, people of one countrey, and although he had woone a great battell neere vnto Corinth with great losse of his enemies, and small hurt to his owne men, yet not reioycing, but rather being very sorrowfull, he vttered these words with a loud voice: O poore Græcia, how miserable art thou to slay with thine owne hands so many of thy valiant men, as would haue sufficed to discomfit in one battell all the Barbarians ioyned together. Histories tell vs that the Romanes came to that great Empire more by dissensions and ciuill warres, which they sowed amongst their neighbours, than by force of armes. For after they had kindled the fire in one nation, they maintained one side a certaine time, vntill in the end they overwhelmed both the one and the other. Thus they deceiued the Carthaginians, the Asians, the Gaules, and Græcia. Onely England was not quite subdued because it knew their practises, and turned all domesticall choler against the enemy when the danger

Math. 12. 25.
2. Sam. 24. 14.

VWhat community Plato required in his Common wealth.

Two kinds of warre.

The fruits of ciuill warre among the Græcians.

Demades reprocheth the Athenians.

Agefilas bewaileth the ciuill dissention of Græcia.

The prudence of Englishmen.

danger was common. Traian the Emperour writing to the Senate of Rome amongst other things sent these words: I recommend unto you above all things, friendship and brotherhood among your selves: because you know that in great commonwealths homewarres are more hurtfull than those that are made against strangers. For if kinsmen and neighbours had neuer begun to hate one another, and to warre one upon another, Demetrius had neuer overthrowne Rhodes, nor Alexander Tyrus, nor Marcellus Syracusa, nor Scipio Numantium. And indeede the Romane Empire fell from her greatnes by the same meanes of ciuill warre which they had long time nourished among others. Yea it is certaine, that in no place part-takings full of all kinde of cruelty, were so vsuall and so long time practised, or factions, and seditious were more cruell than in Rome. The first occasion thereof was their government, wherein the people alwaies set themselves against the Senate and the Nobility, the Senate seeking to rule without measure, and the people to increase their liberty. During these dissensions, it came to passe, that at one time 4000. and 500. slaues and banished men iugaded the Capitoll, and wanted little of making themselves lords of Rome. Appian hath written at large of their seditious and partialities, and saith that through ambition and couerousnesse one side daily sought to diminish the authority of the other. He saith that Marius Coriolanus being vpon this occasion, and in these dissensions drinen out of the citie contrary to right and reason, went to the Volsci, and warred on either side against his countrey, being the first banished person that tooke armes against Rome. And in deede, neither in the counsell, nor in the city, there was no sword drawne, nor man slaine in ciuill sedition, vntill Tiberius Gracchus fauouring the people, and making lawes in their behalfe was killed, and many others that were with him in the Capitoll neere the temple. Whereupon hatred and rancor increasing openly amongst them, infinite murders followed, and many of the chiefest euen the Consuls were slaine, the contempt of lawes and iudgements ensued, and in the end open warre, armies and troupes one against another with incredible thefts and cruelties. At last Cornelius Sylla, one of the seditious persons, seeking to redresse one euill with another (after these dissensions had continued about 50. yeares) made himselfe prince over the rest in many things, taking vpon him the office of a Dictator, who was wont in former time to be created in the greatest dangers of the commonwealth only for 6. moneths. But Sylla was chosen perpetuall Dictator, because necessity so required, as he said himself. After he had practised much violence, he continued in quietnes like a conqueror, & was thereupon turnamed the Happy. After his death seditious began afresh, & reuenging of those cruelties which he had committed, vntill Caius Caesar laid hold of the Seignory & principality, hauing discomfited & overcome Pompey, to whom he was before allied. For when they 2. fought by their plat-forms and deuices to command all, they could not abide one another within a while after, Pompey being vnwilling to haue an equall, and Caesar a superior. Afterward Brutus and Cassius being moued with desire either of rule, or of publike liberty, slue Caesar: whereupon the seditious grew greater than they were before, and the triumuerate war was opened against them, which preuailing for a time, was it selfe dissolued and brought to nothing. For Octavius onely of the three remained a peaceable possessor of the Romane Empire, being happy in all things, and feared of all men, leauing heires of his race to rule the Monarchie after him. Augustus being dead, the estate began vnder Tiberius his successor, a voluptuous Prince, to decline by little and little from the period of her greatnes, vntill in the end there remained no more than that which we see inclosed within the limits of Germany. Alexander Empire being the greatest that euer was, vanished away as a fire of Towe, through the diuision and disorder that was amongst his successors. The Empire of Constantinople through the part takings of Princes, is brought vnder the tyrannous and miserable power of an Ethnick and barbarous Turke. Wereade in Iosephus, that the kingdome of Iudza became subiect and tributarie to the Romanes, through the ciuill warres betweene Hircanus and Aristobulus, who were brothers. For Pompey being of Hircanus side, tooke the city of Hierusalem, and led away Aristobulus and his children prisoners with him, after the countrey had suffered infinite calamities by their domesticall diuisions. Which when Onias a holy man did well foresee, he withdrew himselfe into a secret place and would not take part either with the one or the other side. And being taken by Hircanus his men, they required him, that as once he obtained raine by his praies in the time of a drought, so he would now curse Aristobulus and all those of his faction: but he contrariwise lifting vp his hands to heauen, vttered these words. O God, king of the whole world, seeing these men among whom I stand, are thy people and they that are assailed thy Priests, I beseech thee humbly, that thou wouldest barken neither to these men against the other, nor to the other against these: for which holy praier he was stoned to death, such was the poisoned rage of this people

Traians letter to the Senate of Rome.

The Romane Empire decayed through seditious. The originall of the Roman seditious.

M. Coriolanus being banished contrary to right, tooke armes against his countrey. T. Gracchus the first that was slaine in Rome by sedition.

Sylla made himselfe perpetuall Dictator.

The Romane Empire began first to decline vnder Tiberius. Diuision overthrow Alexanders Empire. The cause of the ruine of Constantinople. The cause of the subiection of Iudza to the Romanes.

Onias praier.

Ciull warres
in Italy betweene the Guelphes and the Gibellins.

The great cruelty of the Guelphes and Gibellins.

By what tokens they know one another.
The originall
of this contention.

The diuision
of the houses of Yorke and Lancaster.

Henry the 6.
deprived of his kingdome
by the house
of Yorke.

The vnion of the house of Lancaster and Yorke.

Of ciuill wars
in Spaine.

The great iu-ridiction of Spaine.

Of ciuill dissention in Italy.
Germany
vexed with ciuill warres.

people one against another. Was there ever any folly, or rather fury like to that of the Guelphes and Gybellines in Italy, of whom the one side held with the Pope, and the other with the Emperor? The Italians vpon no other occasion but onely in fauour of these two names, entred into so extreame a quarrell throughout the whole countrey, that greater crueltie could not be wrought betweene the Infidels and Christians, than was committed amongst them. This contention continueth yet, insomuch that murders are euery where committed in the townes, even betweene naturall brethren, yea betweene the father and his sonnes, without all regard either of blood, or parentage. Their goods are spoiled, their houses razed, some banished, others slaine: and whilest euery one feareth least any reuenge should be laid vp in store for him, or for some other of his side, they kill many times little infants, whom the most barbarous men in the world would spare. These two factions fought continuallie through mortall hatred, so that they could not dwell together in one citie, but the stronger alwaies draue out and expelled the other. They knew one another by feathers, by the fashion of their hose, by cutting of bread, slicing of oranges, and by other marks: which is a very pernicious thing, and hath procured great destruction of people, and overthrow of townes. The Italians say, that this fire was first kindled at Pistoya betweene two brethren, the one called Guelph, and the other Gibellin, who quarrelling together, diuided the towne betweene them, whereupon the Gibellins were driven out. This separation, like to a contagious disease, vpon no other occasion was spread ouer all Italie, insomuch that afterward all that were at contention any where, were diuided into Guelphes and Gibellines. The Germanes thinke that these names came from their countrey and language: and that the Emperour Frederike the second, in whose time this diuision began, called his friends Gibellines, because he leaned vpon them, as a house doth vpon two strong wals that keepe it from falling, and those that were against him of the faction of Pope Gregorie the ninth, he called Guelphes, that is to say, woolues. What did England suffer by the diuision of the houses of Yorke and Lancaster, that gaue the white and red Roses in their armes? Which contention although it began when Henry the fourth who was Duke of Lancaster and Earle of Darbie, vsurped the kingdome vpon his cousin Richard the second, whom he caused to be slaine in prison, after he had compelled him to resigne his kinglie power and crowne of England, yet it was hottest in the reigne of king Henry the sixth, who succeeding his father and grandfather, was at Paris crowned king of England and France. Afterward, fauouring the house of Lancaster against the house of Yorke, they that held with the red Rose tooke armes against him, so that in the ende hee was deprived of his Estate, and shut vp as prisoner in the Tower of London, where hee was after put to death. These factions and ciuill warres (as Philip Comineus writeth) endured about eight and twentie yeares, wherein there died at sundrie battels and skirmishes aboue fourescore persons of the blood royall, with the flower of the nobilitie of England, besides an infinite number of the valiantest men and best warriors among the people. Many Lords were put in prison, or banished, leading the rest of their liues miserablie in strange countries: the auncient policie of the kingdome corrupted, iustice contemned, and the land impouerished, vntill in the ende the Earle of Richmond, overcame king Richard, enioied the kingdome quietlie, and was called Henry the seventh: hauing married Elizabeth daughter to Edward the fourth, both of them being the sole heires of the families of Lancaster and Yorke. By meanes of this marriage the dissention ceased in England, and the red and white Roses were ioyned together in one armes. There was no countrey more afflicted than Spaine, both by ciuill warres and by neighbour states, when it was diuided into many kingdomes. The Moores ouer ranne it on the one side, the French and Englishmen deuoured it on the other, taking part at the first with the dissentions that were in Castile betweene Don Pedro and Don Henry; next with the contentions that arose betwixt Castile and Portingale, which caused much euill to both the kingdomes. But since that Spaine hath bene vnited, it hath extended her dominion into Afrike, and into the new found Ilands, borne armes in Germanie, and in Hungarie, commanded ouer the chiefe Ilands of the Mediteranean sea, ouer Naples and Sicilia, ouer Millan and Flanders. Contrariwise, Italy hauing in former times her forces knit together, obtained the Empire of the world, but beeing now diuided into many Seignories and Potentates that agree badly together, and hauing suffered all the calamities in the world by ciuill warres, lieth open to the iniuries of strangers. Through the same cause the power of Germanie is greatlie diminished, whereni not long since the princes of Saxony were banded one against another: Iohn Fredericke, Philip Lantgraue of Hesse, the Duke of Wittemberg, with many free cities rebelled against the Emperor: the peasants arose against the

the Nobility to set themselves at libertie: the Anabaptists possessed Munster, make a botcher their king, and held out the siege for the space of two yeares. Hungaria, which had valiantly resisted the Turkes almost two hundred yeares together, was at length subdued by them, through the diuisions that were in the countrey, as Polonia is greatly threatened by the Moscouite. In Persia, after the death of king Iacob, his two sonnes strove for the gouernment of the countrey, but the Sophy Ismael comming in the meane time vpon them with his new religion, slue one of them in battell, and compelled the other to flie into Arabia, and so possessed the kingdome, which he left to his children. Phslip the eleuenth, Duke of Burgundie, easily subdued Dinan and Bouines in the country of Liege, which were separated onely by a riuer, after they had ouerthrowne themselves by their dissensions, whereas before he could not obtaine his purpose. And whilest the kings of Marrocke warred one with another for the estate, the Gouernor of Thunis and of Telenin made himselfe king, renting asunder his two prouinces from the rest to erect a kingdome. Concerning Frenchmen, they haue beene often and many times molested with Seditious and ciuill wars as well as others. The Nobilitie of France was almost all slaine at the battell of Fountenay neare to Auxerre, by the ciuill warres betweene Lotharius, Lewes, and Charles the balde. And Champaign lost so many of the Nobility in warre, that the Gentlewomen had this special priuiledge graunted them, to make their husbands noble. When king Iohn was prisoner in England, Charles his sonne Regent of France, being at Paris to gather money for his ranfome, there fell such a diuision betweene the king of Nauarre, who tooke part with the Parisians, and the Regent, that the people vnder the guiding of Marcel, Prouolt of the merchants, ranne to Charles his lodging, where the Marshals of Cleremount and Champaigne were slaine, euen in his chamber and presence, and their bodies drawne ouer the marble stones. The like was done to Reignold Dacy the kings Attorney, besides many other murders, so that the Regent had much adoe to saue himselfe without Paris. But the worst factions that euer were in France, were those of Burgundy and of Orleans, which caused a most grieuous and ciuill warre, that lasted 70. yeares, with murders, robberies, and vspeakeable cruelties. Both of them, one after another, called in the Englishmen to succour them, who afterward seized vpon the crowne. It was a pitifull thing to see France cruelly tormented both by her owne subiects and by strangers, to see it voide of right and equitie, without magistrates, without iudgments, without lawes, which had no abiding place amongst fire and force, where violence onely reigned. All this was procured by the ambition of these two houses, each of them seeking to obtaine the gouernment of the kingdome vnder Charles the sixt, whose wits failed him. By the meanes of these diuisions, Henry the fift king of England, taking to wife Katherine the yongest daughter of king Charles, was put in possession of Paris by the Duke of Burgundie, and proclaimed heire and Regent of France by the consent of three Estates held at Troy. But the death of this Henry, and the Duke of Burgundie forsaking the alliance of the Englishmen, with that valure and good behauiour of king Charles the seuenth, as also the loue and fidelitie of the Frenchmen, restored the kingdome to that estate wherein it is at this present. Now if France hath heretofore suffered so much by ciuill warres, and domesticall seditions, if all forraigne estates haue receiued so many sundry alterations and incredible wounds by the same meanes, how can we looke for lesse, nay rather haue wee not already seene the like or greater calamities amongst vs, through our dissensions and private quarrels betweene certaine houses contending one with another, being chiefly moued with ambition and desire to gouerne? Why doe wee not acknowledge this first cause of our miseries, that wee may lay aside all hatred crept in amongst vs vnder pretence of diuersitie of religion? that we may reunite our mindes so much diuided, to the good and common quietnesse of vs all, and liue vnder the obedience of our prince, with that fidelity for which Frenchmen haue bin alwaies praised aboue other nations? Doe not so many examples, both of auncient and later times make vs see thus much, that if we redresse not this contention, this goodly and flourishing kingdome, which heretofore hath growne great by the concord and obedience of our ancessors, is ready to fall into vtter ruine and subuersion, through our factions, diuisions, and part-takings? Shall this little that remaineth of the French monarchie, which in former times hath had all the Empire of Germany, the kingdomes of Hungary, Spaine, and Italy, and all the bounds of the Gaules to the riuer of Rhine, vnder the obedience of her lawes, shall it I say, be thus laid open as a prey, and that by her owne subiects, carried headlong with such passions, that they make the way plaine and readie for strangers to bring them vnder their miserable bondage? Shall it bee saide among our posterity that our selues

Hungaria lost by ciuill dissension.

Persia was subdued by the dissension of two brethren. Dinan and Bouines subdued through dissention.

France much troubled with ciuill warres. Women in Champaigne made their husbands noble.

Cruell war betweene the house of Burgundy and of Orleans.

The cause thereof. Henry the 5. proclaimed king of France.

Ambition and desire of gouernment the chiefe cause of the troubles in France.

The auncient limits of the French monarchie.

A comparisō.

Good counsel for al kings &
soueraigne
princes.

have encouraged them to vndertake that, which not long since, Spaine, Italie, England, the Low countries, the Pope, the Venetians, being all ioyned together against the house of France, durst not take in hand after the taking of Francis the first, and the losse of that famous battle? Not one of them durst enter into Fraunce to conquer it, knowing the lawes and nature of this Monarchie. For as a building laide vpon deepe foundations, and made of lasting stoffe, well knitt and ioyned together in euery part, feareth neither windes nor stormes, but easily resisteth all assaults and violence: so this kingdome will not easily admit any alteration and change, as long as all the members continue vnited and ioyned together vpon the foundation of their lawes. Therefore let the king, princes, their counsell, great and small, euery one in his place take order, that God may bee truly knowne, and sincerely serued according to his iust and righteous will: that honest behauiour may bee maintained, the authority of lawes kept, iustice administred, magistracy duly exercised, rewards and punishments distributed equally, that vertuous men may be honoured, and the wicked corrected. Otherwise, if we continue long diuided into companies, with defiances passing and repassing, if we persist in our woonted inuectiues and riots, and refer not all our actions to some good end, let vs not looke for lesse than for a generall desolation and pitifull overthrow of our country, appearing already in many places thereof, or at least for some horrible mutation and change of the Estate.

Of the causes that breede the change, corruption, and snall ruine of Monarchies and Policies.. Chap 64.

A M A-N A.

AS long as the phisition knoweth not the cause of his Patients disease, it is impossible for him to remedy the same, and to prescribe a medicine to the sicke party. A disease knowne (saith the Proverbe) is in a manner cured. So fareth it with Estates and Monarchies that are changed, marred, and in the end brought to ruine by diuers causes: which if they were well knowne to their princes and gouernors, might easily be preuented by prudence and reason, and fit remedies then applyed to those euils: that dispose & lead them to mutation, when the naturall corruption that is in them (as euery thing hath his proper and inward corruption of which it is eaten and consumed) beginneth to spread it selfe in the best part to marre all. Go to then (my Companions) hauing seene the nature of seditions, let vs seeke out the causes that stir them vp, wherby Estates and Monarchies are changed, marred, and in the end ouerthrowne.

A disease
knowne is almost cured.

The causes of diuision betweene subjects

A R A M. The diuision that is betweene subiects of one and the same Prince, ariseth for the most part of discontentment, wherewith some are moued vpon iniurie and contempt, or else of feare that men haue of the light, or to auoid some euill, or of great idlenesse, pover-ty and need.

Two causes of the franlike feauer of French diui-
sions.

A C H I O T B There are (as I take it) two causes intermingled, which breede this franlike feauer of our France, the one proceeding from the Estate, the other from religion. But let vs heare A S E R, to whom the handling of this subiect offered now vnto vs, belongeth.

A S E R. There is no beginning of any thing whatsoever so small, which through continuance and perfeuerance is not soone made great and strong, if vpon slight account thereof it bee not staied. Euery will (as Cicero saith) in the first sprout thereof may be easily stopped, but being inueterate, is more strong and vnealie to be suppressed. So that if it bee met withall before it appeare and breake forth, the danger is lesse, although it proceed from the necessity of naturall corruption, which is in all things that are created, and is to be seene even in things without sense, as Mildew in wheat, rottennesse in wood, rust in brasle and iron: yea euery thing is corrupted by it owne euill, howsoeuer it escapeth all outward harmes. Therefore as a good Phisition preuenteth diseases, and if one part bee suddenly touched with raging paine, aswageth the present euill, and then applyeth remedies to the causes of the disease: so a wise prince or gouernour of a Common wealth ought to preuent as much as is possible the ordinary changes of all Estates, which ouertake them either by outward force, or by inward diseases. When they begin, he must stay them whatsoever it cost him, and then looke what the causes are of those diseases, that are farthest from effect, and apply conuenient and apt remedies vnto them. Now it is certaine, that if a man would thoroughly meete with al hurtfull things, or otherwise cure any such euill when it hapneth, he must know their causes wherof the effect dependeth, which is the very entrance to al good helps & remedies whatsoever

Corruption is naturall in all things.

A prince compared to a Phisition.
To know the causes of euils
is the readiest
way to cure
them.

whatsoever. Fore-seene mischiefs (as the Poet saith) hurt not so much as those that come vn looked for. A wise man premeditateth that may happen, but it falleth out contrary to fooles. And if we haue neuer so small an in-sight into the condition and state of worldly things, we cannot in any wise doubt of this, that euery Commonwealth, after it is to come to the top of perfection, which is the flourishing estate thereof, hath but a short time of continuance: whether her ouerthrowe proceedeth from the violence of her enemies, when shee thinkes her selfe safest; or whether shee waxe olde through long tract of time, and so end by her inward diseases, or whether shee suddenly decay and fall downe with her owne weight by reason of some other hidden cause. Which changes of Commonwealths being matter sufficient to make a great booke, we are, according to the sequelle of our discourse, to consider chiefly of the causes that for the most part stirre vp sedition, and breede the alteration and finall ouerthrow of Estates and Monarchies. The Philosophers propound fowre causes of euery thing: The efficient, the materiall, the formall, and the small cause. The efficient cause of seditions is double, the one neere, the other remooued afar off. The neere or next cause, are the authors of seditions, by whose counsell, direction and helpe they are stirred vp and brought to passe. By the cause remooued afar off, I meane those things for which men are prouoked to raise seditions, and of which we are chiefly to intreat in this place. They are the matter of seditions against whom they are raised, as princes and magistrates, who are superiors, and sometime their subiects, being inferiors. The forme of seditions is the stirring vp of the people, noise, outcries, batteries, murders, ciuill warre, the taking of townes, spoiling of countries, burning and banishment. If it be of subiects, towards their lords and superiors, it is called rebellion: if betweene subiects or equals, it is called a faction. The end of seditions is that for which they are first mooued and stirred vp. Aristotle setteth downe fowre ends of seditions, namely, profit, and honour, with their contraries, losse and dishonour. For men are commonly mooued to sedition either through hope of profit and honour, or else through feare of losse and dishonour towards themselves or their friends, so that they desire the one and shun the other. Vnto profit we referre riches: to honour, magistracie, publicke offices and charges: to losse, pouerty: to dishonour, continuall iniury, contempt, and such like meanes. Which things although they are reckoned among the motives, or efficient causes of seditions, so farre forth they prouoke men to stirre vp seditions, yet they may bee ends also, because men conspire together either to obtaine or to eschue them. Therefore let vs handle the causes which mooue the people to murmur, & leade them from priuate and secret grudging, to publicke and open sedition, from which the changes, alterations, and finall ruines of Estates and Monarchies proceede. The couetousnesse of magistrates, and gouernors seemeth to bee a chiefe cause thereof, when they lay vpon their subiects great exactions, taxes, loanes, and other intolerable subsidies, whereby their patience is oftentimes turned into fury, and their hearts set vpon reuolting, are driuen forward to imitate them that forsooke Roboam for the same cause as the Scripture rehearseth. But forasmuch as all ciuill society is appointed to the end that men might keepe their goods safely vnder the protection and guiding of good gouernors, they that beare chiefe rule in estates, ought especially to provide that not onely publicke goods may be distributed and imployed according to common necessity and profite, but also that euery mans priuate goods may bee in safety. Publicke goods are thereuenewes of Seigniories, kingdomes and Empires, demaines, taxes, tributes, confiscations, exchets, subsidies, grants, and impositions brought in for the supply of publicke necessity. A man may say that couetousnesse, which is a wrongful desire of another mans goods, is committed in the publicke reuenues, when the money that commeth of them, is conuerted rather to priuate than to publicke vse, by those that haue the disposing thereof: which fault the Romanes called peculatus, and the iudgement giuen against it, Reperundarum. Now when such goods are waisted vnprofitable, or superfluously, princes, and Magistrates vse to lay immoderate and strange exactions vpon their subiects. Couetousnesse also is vsed in priuate goods, when the poorer or weaker sort are spoiled of their owne by the mightier. The people will hardly beare this kinde of vsurping, when they consider that they are tormented by those that should defend them: and this dealing is subiect to restitution before God. Histories are full of changes, seditions and destructions of commonwealths, arising of these causes of couetousnes, whereof we haue alledged many examples in our discourses. Vnder Charles the 6. king of France great seditions and robberies were practised by the Parisians, by reason of imposts and subsidies that were leuied of their subiects. The occasion of these comotions was because the farmers exacted a halfe-peny of a Consequence

cause of the When common weathbegin to alter

the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA

Four causes
of all things
The efficient causes of sedi-
tions

The materiall cause of sedi-
tions
The formall
cause
The difference
betweene a rebellion, and a faction Power finall
causes of sedi-
tions

the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA

Couetousnes
a principall
cause of sedition
King
14. 16.

Which are publicke goods
the hoildinA
the hoildinA
the hoildinA

When coue-
tousnes is committed in pub-
like goods

God requireth restitution of oppressors

Great sedi-tions began vp
on a small oc-
poore cation

Couetousnes
cause of the death of the nobility of Switzerland.
1. Sam. 8. 5.
Ambition the second cause
of seditions.
Honor the onely reward
of vertue.

Onely vertue
ought to open the gates
of honor.
Injury the third cause of sedition.

Why Cyrus
reuelted from his grandfather Astages.
Coriolanus.

Childeric slaine
by Bodilus.

Iustine 3.
Feare the fourth cause
of seditions.
Catiline.

What manner
of men are afraide of peace.

Feare was one cause that mooued Cesar
to seeke the Empire.
Excesse in authority and power is the fift cause of seditions.

What the O-stracisme was among the Athenians.
Many kings
ouerthrowne
by suffering
their seruants
grow too
great.

Contempt is the sixt cause
of seditions.

poore woman that sold water cressets. The couetousnes, bribery, and polling vsed by the Lords & Nobles of Switzerland, caused the Common people to fall to mutinie, and to deliuer themselves out of their slavery and bondage by horrible massacres; which they made of them, Vnder Ioel, and Abiah the sons of Samuel & Iudges ouer the Israelites, the people oppressed through their couetousnes, asked a king, wherupon the Estate of their gouernmēt was changed. The second cause that breedeth the alteration and ruine of Common wealths is ambition, or desire of honor, which then especially moueth men to murmure, when the vnworthy are aduāced & preferred before mē of desert. Honor is the only reward of vertue, & that which is more esteemed of euery lofty and noble heart, than all worldly goods. Therefore it is meete that in the distribution of publike charges, rewards & honors, regard be had to the quality, merit & sufficiency of men, that they may be giuen to worthy persons, & that such as are vnfit may be put back. Let vertue only & diligence open the gates of honor, and not money or fauor. We saw before many examples of the fruits of ambition, & we tast daily of some that are very bitter. The third cause that changeth and ouerturneth Estates and monarchies is injury, which hapneth whē they that are highest in authority, through too much insolency and pride offer wrong to the honour or person of their inferiors. A kingdome (saith the wise man) is translated from one nation to another through the iniustice, iniuries and contumelies offered by superiors. Cyrus the great reuelted from his grandfather Astages, ouercame him in battell, and translated the Monarchie of the Medes vnto the Persians, because of that iniurie which he offered vnto him, in casting him out into the fields as soon as he was borne, Coriolanus being vniustly banished his country, took armes, conquered a great part of the Roman dominion, and burned all to the gates of Rome, bringing their Estate to such an extremity, that it was ready to be destroyed, had not the women come towards him to pacifie him. Childeric king of France caused Bodilus to be whipped with rods, wherupon he slue him and his wife great with child. Iustine the third Emperor, was slaine by Atelius generall of his army, whose son he had murdered, & abused his wife to despite him therewith. Feare also is many times the cause of alteration & danger to a Common wealth, when guilty and conuicted persons moue sedition, and rebel against the Magistrates to preuent & auoid the punishment that is due to their faults. Catiline vrged with the consideration of his manifold wicked pranks, and with the feare of iudgement, conspired against his country, beeing assisted by Lentulus, Cethegus with many sacrilegious persons, murderers, adulterers, bankrupts, and other naughty liuers that stood in feare of iustice by reason of their misbehaviour. Neither may any man doubt but wicked men will rather trouble the Estate then stand in danger of their liues, or hazzard their goods. For besides the assurance which they haue conceiued to escape the iudgement of men by this means, they haue this further aduantage to fish in troubled waters: so that they are no lesse affraide of peace than of the plague, hauing in alleuents the same resolution before their eies that Catiline had, who saide that hee could not quench the fire begunne in his house, with water, and therefore would pull it downe and so quench it. This was one reason that mooued Cesar to lay holde of the estate, because his enemies threatned, that as soone as he was out of his offices they would cause him to giue an account how hee had discharged them. I would to God wee had not bought as deerely the same causes of our ciuil wars. Likewise too much authority and power both for wealth and friendship is dangerous in euery kinde of gouernment, so that great heede is to be taken that none grow to be vnmeasurable great. For men are subiect to corruption, neither can euery one sustaine wisely the prosperitie of fortune: which causeth them to seeke the alteration of popular and Aristocratical Common-wealths into Monarchies, and others to vsurpe kingdomes and Empires. This reason brought in the Ostracisme amongst the Athenians, which was a banishment for a time, wherby they brought downe them that seemed to exceede in greatnesse. This they vsed (as Plutarke rehearseth) against Themistocles, Aristides, and other excellent men, fearing least their authoritie, credite, and goood will of all men, should procure them a kingly power with the change of their popular gouernment. Many kings and princes that had some of their friends and seruants too great, were themselves or their children ouerthrowne by them afterward. Tiberius making Seian too mightie; Commodus, Perennius; Theodosius the second, Entrepinus; Iustinian, Bellisarius; Xerxes, Artaban, were in danger of their estate. The vnmeasurable authoritie of the Maiors of the palace, and of the Constables, changed the crowne of France from the race of Clouis to that of Charles Martell: and vpon the same occasion it was afterwaerd taken from that line, and transferred to another.

another cause greatly to be feared in euery Estate and Monarchy, as that which oftentimes breedeth their change and ouerthrow. It is very dangerous in two considerations especiall first, when some are contemned and excluded from publike offices and dignities which they deserue, and yet see them wholly in the power and disposition of some particular men. Whereupon both one and the other are moued to sedition, the contemned persons through enuie and desire of reuenge; they that haue the great charges in their hands, through contempt of the others, whome they seeke vtterly to exclude, and to driue them further off from all publike honours and authorities. Secondly, contempt is very pernicious, when inferiours contemne their superiours. They are commonly despised that haue neither vertue, courage, nor fortitude, that are not able to profite themselves or others, that are not laborious, painefull, nor any manner of way carefull. Where contempt is, there no obedience is to be had. This maketh the sonne disobedient to the father, the wife to the husband, the learner to the teacher, the seruant to the master. The opinion of prudence, iustice, constancy, knowledge, goodnesse, modesty, and of other vertues, nourisheth and preserueth the obedience of subiects towards their princes, and the contrary vices prouoke them to rebellion. Therefore as policies prosper when they are gouerned by prudent, iust, constant, valiant, and moderate men: so they are troubled with seditions through the ignorance, cowardlinesse, and intemperancie of princes, or else when they are too familiar with their inferiours, or when they are suddenly lift vp from base estate, or seeme too aged, or too yong, or poore, or miserable, all which things breede contempt. Wherefore this is set downe as a good rule to preserue the estate of a Monarchie: That the Prince must procure to himselfe loue, without the contempt or hatred of any, if it may be. For the obtaining whereof, there is no better way, than the iust distribution of rewards. The princes and Lords of France, because they were contemned by king Lewes the 11. who had none about him, nor fauoured any but men of low and base estate, gaue him battle at Montlhery (whereof the battle hath ever since retained the name) to the great perill of the Estate, and danger of the kings life if hee had not appeased the indignation and fury of the saide Princes and Lords, by his great prudence and policy. Moreouer, too much increase and vnproportionable growth is one cause that procureth the change and ruine of Common wealths. For as the body is made and compounded of parts, and ought to grow by proportion, that it may keep a iust measure: so euery common wealth, beeing compounded of orders or Estates, as it were of parts, they must bee maintained in concord one with another, by equall and due proportion obserued betweene each of them. For if one estate bee aduanced too much aboue another, dissention ariseth. As long as the three orders and Estates at Rome, namely, the Senatours, the Knights, and the People, were carried proportionably, their policie flourished: but after they dealt one against another through enuie, ambition, and couetousnesse; diuisions, and part-takings began. This caused many to commend equality so much, calling it the nursing mother of peace and amity betweene subiects: and contrariwise inequality, the beginning of all enmities, factions, hatred, and part-taking. But seeing it is meete that in euery well established policy there should be a difference of rights and priuiledges betwixt euery estate, equality may continue, if carefull prouision be made, that one estate go not too much before the other. The impunity of offences is one cause also from whence seditions and ciuill wars proceede, yea it is a matter of very great weight, and yet men make least account thereof. Wee spake of it before, but wee must of necessity often rub vp the remembrance thereof, as the wise Hebrewe doth by repeating so many times that admonition, that we should not be suretie for another: not that hee forbiddeth charity towards the poore, but that none should be a meane to let the wicked escape, vnlesse he will beare the punishment himselfe. This is that word which God sent to king Achab, after he had saued the life of Benhadad king of Syria, that hee made himselfe a pledge for another man, by suffering the wicked to liue, and therefore that it should cost him his life. Hitherto wee haue seene how the couetousnesse of princes, the ambition, or desire of honour in private men, iniury, and reprocab, feare in the guilty, excessse of authority and wealth, contempt, ouer great increase, or aduancement without proportion: and lastly, impunity of offences, procure commonly seditions in Estates and monarchies. Besides al these, extreame pouerty and excessse of wealth, idlenesse, & want of feare of the forren enemy, as we haue elswhere declared, change of Princes & laws, too great licence to seditions, Orators & Preachers, the natural disposition of places where men are borne, which maketh the more inclined to comotions & seditions, as Historiographers haue noted of Genes, Florence, & Flanders, with many other things may be said to be causes of ciuill wars, of alterations,

Who are most
subiect to contempt.
Contempt
breedeth disobedience.

Causes that mouue subiects to contemne their Princes.
A rule of estate

Lewes the 11.
fought withal
by his Nobles
because hee
contemned
them.

Ouer great inequality be-twene Estates in a commonwealth is the seuenth cause
of seditions.

Equality the mother of peace.
Impunity of offences the eighth cause of seditions.
The meaning of this precept *Be not surety
for another.*
1. King. 20. 42
Other causes of sedition.

Shame is some time cause of alteration of Estates.

Negligence a cause of change.
Two sorts of negligence.

Bishops neglecting their charge to deale
in worldly affaires, bring themselves in-
to contempt.
An Estate is not changed
all at one time
but by little and little.

Diffimilitude
a cause of change.

Examples of strangers that haue excelled
naturall Citizens out of their townes.

The Inhabitants of Geneua conspired
against strangers in their citie.
Caluine haz-
arded his life to appease
a tumult in Geneua.
Exod. i. 16.

changes, and ruine of Estates and policies. Among which wee note that shame is sometime a cause of change in the government of Common wealths, but it is without tumult or sedition. Thus it fell out in Herea, a towne of Arcadia, which was governed popularly, where men of no account were elected Magistrates by others like themselves: whereupon being mocked, they changed their manner of election in choosing by lot; that so they might haue a more lawfull excuse. There was seene not long since in the Councel of France such a number of Masters of Requests, and of Secretaries of the treasure, that very shame caused them to bee sent away, because it was not meete to intreate of great and weighty matters before such a multitude. Negligence likewise breedeth the change & overthrow of a politike estate. There are two sorts of negligence, the one in those that call, choose: or receiue into any great office, such men as are vnworthy, and care not for their charges: or that suffer such persons to ascend to the chiefe places of Magistracy, that are enemies to that forme of Common wealth, as if the chiefe men in Berne should chooseth an Auoyer, which office is contrary to the manner of liuing: or if the Venetians should chooseth a Duke, or the Cardinals a Pope, that were not of their religion: or if the king of Fraunce should create a Constable or Chancellour, that liked not a Royall or Monarchicall Estate. The other kinde of negligence, which is much more common, is in them that are called to a dignity, office, or Magistracy, and shew themselves retchlesse in that administration and exercise: as we see that most Bishops and Prelates neglect the duty of their charges, to imploy or bestow their time in worldly affaires, for which cause they grow into mistaking and contempt. From hence haue proceeded great offences, and marueilous troubles, which may more easily bee lamented, than taken away, or reformed, being such abuses as haue taken deepe roote. Moreouer, the alteration of policy is bred by other meanes by little and little, as when through dissimulation or otherwise, men suffer some part, albeit neuer so little of the lawe or politike Estate to bee cut off. Changes seldome fall out all at one time, if they are not very violent, but for the most part goe one by little and little, as the seasons of the yeare slide away softly from great heates to hard frosts, and from the frost and cold of winter to the heat of sommer. A lingring feuer afflicteth the patient so easily, that hee hardly perceiueh himselfe therein, but if it be suffered to continue without redresse in due time, it will turne to a hefticke feuer, and so consequently become incurable. So fareth it with an Estate and policy, whose authority waxeth contemptible, and is lost by little and little, when men are negligent in preuenting the same in due time. Hee that will consider the alteration hapned in Fraunce within these thirty yeares, shall finde it to be very great, as well in regard of religions, as of manners and lawes, which neuertheless came by little and little, and so continueth stil, greatly threatening a change of the estate. Here therefore I will distinguish betweene the change of lawes, customs, religion, and place, which is properly but an alteration, and the change of an estate, which is when the soueraignty goeth from one into the power of another. Diffimilitude also is the cause many times of sedition, and of change in the common wealth, which commeth to passe when the inhabitants of a place are not of the same nation, but many strangers are receiued into it, who perceiuing themselves to bee the stronger part, haue many times thrust the naturall Citizens out of their townes: whereof Aristotle alleadgeth many examples that fel so out in the Graecians cities. At Sienna, at Genes, at Zurich, at Cullen, the strangers being multiplied, draue out the Lords of those places, & slue most of them, because they were overcharged with exactions, euill intreated, and excluded from bearing of offices. They of Lindauia slue the Lords of the country, and changed the Aristocracy into a popular estate: & so did the inhabitants of Strausborough, who hated the Nobility in such sort, that they would not suffer any of them to enioy the great Estates and publike charges, vnles hee proued that his grandfather was one of the baser sort of the people. These examples moue naturall Inhabitants many times to ouer run strangers when they see the number of them waxe ouer great amongst them. One example hereof wee may note in the city of Geneua, into which when many strangers, as well Frenchmen as others retired for religion, the naturall citizens could neuer brookethem, although they were profitable to the city, making it rich and populous, whereas before it was poore, and small inhabited: but conspired many times to driue them out, as namely that conspiracy of one Perin, in the yeere 1556. which began to be put in execution, when Caluine ran into the midst of their naked swords to appease the tumult, as Beza writeth in his life. The same feare moued Pharaos, when he saw the Hebrews increase ouer fast amongst his subiects, to decree, that the Midwives should from that time forward, kill the male children at their birth. Now in receiuing receiuing of strangers, regard must be had to the number, that it bee not ouer great, and that their authoritie be not vnmeasurable. For otherwise it is necessary for trafficke sake, and for many other publike commodities, that some be receiued of others. Many other kindes of dissimilitude are found in Common-wealths, as dissimilitude of linage betweene the Nobility and Common people: of offices, betweene Iudges, Treasures, Souldiers, Priests: of professions, betweene Lawyers, Physitions, Diuines, and Philosophers: of occupations, betweene Bakers, Butchers, Shoemakers, Painters, Smiths, Carpenters: without which dissimilitudes no Common wealth can consist. Therefore they are not to be taken quite away, but onely the disorder that groweth amongst them, that so they may be reduced to a conuenient agreement, like to that which is betweene the diuers parts that are in the constitution of the world and of man. We may also call a dissimilitude, that difference which is of religions, as of the Iewes, Christians, Mahometists, Caphrants, Armenians, Gracians, Latines, Iacobites, Ethiopians: then betweene the Christians themselues, as Catholikes, Lutherans, Zwinglians, and Calvinists. Many haue said, and are yet of this opinion, that the chiefe cause of ciuill warres in France, proceedeth from this diuersity of religion. And to say truth, there is nothing that carieth men away with such vehement passions, as zeale of religion, for which they fight more willingly than for their liues, goods, wiues, and children. Through the diuersity hereof they that are nearest of kinne loose their naturall loue, they that are of the same countrey and language persecute one another as mortall enemies, and sundry nations abhorre one another for the same. These things are too well knowne amongst vs to require proofes thereof. And truly in respect of sedition and tumult, nothing is more dangerous, than for subiects to be diuided in opinion, whether it be in matters of estate, or of lawes and customes, or for religion. For if they be of diuers opinions, some labour for peace, and seeke to make others agree vnto it, who will neuer agree amongst themselues. And in truth it is a very hard matter to maintaine publike exercises of any religion whatsoever, when it is contrary to the religion of the people, or of the most of them, who many times cannot be kept within compasse neither by lawes nor Magistrates, vnlesse the force appointed to keepe them in bee very great. For wee saw that Thomas Emperour of Constantinople was cruelly slaine by the people amidst a great congregation in the Church, because he went about to pull downe Images. But I am of this opinion (yet ready to yeeld a better iudgement) that if men were honest and vpright, and walked in their calling, holily, they would neuer fight among themselues for religion. And if there had beene no other cause mingled therewith in our ciuill warres, we should not haue had experience of those miseries which daily ouerwhelme vs. The authoritie of a holy and free councill may by the grace of God ende all these dissensions: in the meane time let euery one seeke by good life and amendment of manners, to serue for a light to those that are out of the way, laying aside all part-taking, forgetting all iniuries, and taking vp againe our first vnity, concord, and friendship. Yeal doubt not, but that a Prince embracing with a true zeale the opinion of his religion, and neglecting the contrary, would abolish it without force or constraint, if God maintaine it not. For the minds of men resolu'd in a religion, are more confirmed therein if they bee resisted, but shrinke of themselves if compulsion be not vsed. Now for the end and conclusion of our discourse, laying apart the causes of seditions and ciuill wars, which bring alteration, and overthrow many times to Estates and Monarchies, whereof we haue particularly intreated, we will here comprehend, and reduce to a certaine number the causes of the changes of all common-wealths: namely, when the posterity of Princes faileth, and the greatest amongst them enter into ciuill warre for the Estate: when most of the subiects are extreame poore, and a few exceeding rich: when the diuision of offices and honors are vnequall: or else through extreame ambition and desire of commanding: through the reuenge of iniuries: through the cruelty and oppression of tyrants: through the feare of chastisement, which some haue that deserue it through the change of lawes and religion: through the greedy desire that some haue to enioy at will those pleasures which they seeke after: lastly, through the expulsion of such as defile the places of honour with excessive and beastly pleasures. All these things breed the change, corruption, and finall overthrow of flourishing Estates, and great Monarchies, and therefore all Princes, Gouvernors, & publike Rulers, ought carefully to looke vnto them.

Diuers kinds of dissimilitudes in common-wealths.

Whether di-
uersity of religion be a cause of ciuill
warre.

Diuersity of opinion among subiects dangerous in an Estate.

Thomas Em-perour of Constantinople slaine for pulling downe
of Images.

The causes that breed the change of all common-
wealths.

The ende of the sixteenth daies worke.

The seuenteenth daies worke.

Of the preservation of Estates and Monarchies, and of remedies to keepe them from sedition. Chap. 65.

Why Wise-dome is giuen
of God.

A SER. B

Wisd. 6. 21.
The praise of wisdom.

Contrary causes bring forth contrary effects.

Prou. 27. 20.

Choice cu-
stomes of seuen flourishing Estates.

Wisdom (saith Lactantius) is giuen of God to all men, that every one according to his ability and capacitie might seeke after things vnkowne, and examine that which he knoweth. And we must not thinke, that such as haue gone before vs many yeares and ages, did so possesse and vse her, that shee is now lesse forceable in vs. She cannot be wholly possessed no more than the light of the Sunne: and as the Sunne is the light of our eies, so is wisdom the light of mans heart. If your delight then (saith the Wise man) be in thrones and scepters, O kings of the people, honor wisdom, that ye may reigne for euer. Truly she is necessarie provision for them that would reigne, that they may doe it worthily, and safely maintaine their estate: yea she is no lesse requisite in every calling. For she illuminateth and sharpeneth the discourse of reason by the knowledge of things, she ruleth and conducteth the will to that which is the true and onely Good. Therefore seeing that wisdom, which is as much to say in regard of vs, as the searching out of the truth, is both offered, and needfull for all men, every one ought to be stirred vp to embrace it with a burning zeale and affection, that he may bring forth the fruites of perfect charitie, by applying it (next after the seruice of God) to the common profit of men. Which thing, seeing it hath prouoked our yong and vnexperienced yeares to vtter our former Morall and Politicall discourses, and to handle yesterday the causes that breede change and ruine to Estates and Monarchies; although such high matters surpasse the capacitie of our vnderstanding, yet let vs (my companions) follow with the same zeale our venturous enterprise, and as we haue profited in the schoole of this selfe same wisdom, let vs enter into the consideration of those meanes and remedies that are contrarie to the causes of corruption in policies and that may serue to their preservation. Albeit they may be knowne by the same causes that corrupt them, seeing contrarie effects proceed from contrary causes, and corruption is contrary to preservation. But the vnderstanding of this matter will be more cleare and profitable hereby, to them that will take the benefit thereof.

A M A N A. If all callings were content with their owne fortune and goods, if they would abstaine from other mens goods, and from offering them wrong, if they would be more intentive to amend their owne life, than to reprehend others, and submit themselves willingly to the obedience of their Magistrates, lawes, and ordinances, I thinke it would be a meane to cause every monarchie to flourish and to continue happy a long time.

A R A M. Equalitie (saith Solon) neuer breedeth sedition in the government of a Commonwealth, but is the nurling mother of peace and concord, and the maintainer of loue, whereby the vnity of his subiects is preserved. But as the grane and destruction are neuer glutted, (according to the saying of the Wise man) so mens eies are neuer satisfied. But the discourse of this matter here propounded belongeth to thee A C H I O T B.

A C H I O T B. That great louer of knowledge and vertue, Ptolemy king of Egypt, as he feasted one day seauen Embassadors of the best and most flourishing Commonwealths in his time, reasoned with them about their governments, that he might know which of them had the best policie, and was furnished with the best lawes & most commendable customes. The disputation was long, and the matter thoroughly debated among them with many reasons. But Ptolemy being desirous to be instructed by them in the best and rarest points, necessarie for the preservation of an Estate, prayed them to propound every one three of those customes and lawes that were most perfect in his Commonwealth. The Embassador of the Romanes beganne, and said: Wee haue the Temples in great respect and reuerence: wee are verie obedient to our gouernours: and wee punish wicked men and euill liuers senerely. The Carthaginian Embassador said: In the Commonwealth of Carthage, the Nobles neuer cease fighting, nor the Common people and Artificers labouring, nor the Philosophers teaching. The Sicilian Embassador said: In our Commonwealth iustice is exactly kept, merchandise exercised with truth.

truth, and all men account themselves equal. The Rhodian said: At Rhodes old men are honest, young men shamefast, and women solitarie, and of few words. The Athenian said: In our Commonwealth rich men are not suffered to be divided into factions, nor poore men to be idle, nor the gouernours to be ignorant. The Lacedæmonian said: In Sparta enuie reigneth not, for all are equal; nor covetousnesse, for all goods are common; nor sloth, for all labour. In our Commonwealth (said the Embassadour of the Sicyonians) voyages are not permitted, that they should not bring home new fashions at their retorne: Physitions are not suffered, least they should kill the scound: nor Orators to take vpon them the defence of causes and suites. If all these good customes were ioyntly kept in any one Estate, I doubt not but the greatnesse of it might be continued long, and all causes of sedition cut off. But to speake more plainly and particularly, and to handle the preseruatiō of Monarchies and Commonwealths, with the remedies that keepe them from sedition, I say first that Horace, that most learned Poet, had reason to begin his Satyres or profitable speeches with those men that are neuer contented, considering that the discontentment of mortall men is the fountaine and spring of all vices. For I pray you, what vice is not grounded vpon an vn-satiabie desire of hauing, as may appeare in all them that cannot content themselves with their present Estate, nor appoint an ende in that which they haue, but place it alwaies in that which they would haue. Couetousnesse committeth robberies, executeth murders, exerciseth spoyling, causeth battles, breedeth schismes, hindreth reformation, and the generall Councell, cloketh abuses, nourisheth ignorance, asketh iniustly, receiueth dishonestly, dissolueth bargaines, breaketh faith, peruerteth iudgements, and to conclude, it overturneth and confoundeth all right, both diuine and humane. Therefore couetousnesse is very fitly called an vnquenchable fire, an vn-satiabie desire, a bottomlesse gulfe. So that the contentation both of soueraigne Magistrates, and of such as are vnderneath them, and their moderate affections whereby they seeke to inuade and possesse other mens right, nor to heape vp treasures and riches, but direct their leuell to common profit onely, to gouerne prudently, and to order as it becommerh them whatsoeuer is vnder their authoritie: this I say, is a strong bonde to keepe every Commonwealth in a flourishing estate, and an vnconquerable bulwarke against all sedition. Many Princes being desirous to extend their limits vniustly, and to conquer new estates, haue oftentimes lost or diminished their owne dominion, besides the burdensome calamities, which they haue brought vpon their people. And when they haue placed vnder them couetous Gouernours and Magistrates, that were slaues to their purses, the ruine, or great trouble at least of their Estates followed after. Therefore Iethro said to Moses: Provide thou among all the people, men of courage, fearing God, men dealing truly, hating couetousnesse: and appoint such ouer them to bee Rulers ouer thousands, ouer hundreds, ouer fifties ouer tentes, to iudge the people at all times. Tiberius Nero knowing that his subiects were naturally giuen to tender greatly their owne profite, would not send any to succede (as the custome was before) and to take the place of the Gouernours and Lieutenants of his Prouinces, vntill the other were dead. For (said hee) when they perceiue that they draw neere the end of their office, they double their polling, and a new Gouernour doth as much: whereas otherwise, when they are once full gorged and satisfied, they are at the least occasioned thereby to cease from rauening, and to ease their people: namely, when they know that they shall alwaies enioy their power and authoritie. The custome that Aurelius Seuerus vsed, is much more praise woorthy. For when he sent Gouernours into the prouinces, hee caused their names to bee published many daies before, to the ende that whosoever knew any thing in them woorthy of reprehension, he should giue notice therof: and they that reported truly, were promoted to honor by him and slanderers grieuously punished. Hee gaue to all Magistrates golde, silver, seruants, and all necessary things, yea Concubines also, to the ende that in their charges they should not bee constrained by necessity to commit iniustice, or to extort vpon the people. Moreover, the modesty of Magistrates in commanding, serueth for a good remedy to retaine their subiects within their duty, especially, if to bring them forward the better, they adde to their commandements gentle perswasions grounded vpon liuely reasons, and holy admonitions, whereby they seeme willing rather to instruct their people, than by force to compell them to obedience. Thou shalt gouerne thy kingdome very well (saide one of the interpreters of Ptolemy) if imitating the gentlenesse of God in all things, thou vseth patience and long suffering. This is also one point that greatlie stayeth the alteration and chaunge of Commonwealths, when both great and small are contented with that Estate whereunto they are called, and are not carried awaie with ambition, to desire higher degrees Discontentment is the spring of all vices. The effects of couetousnes.

The contented minde of Magistrates is the first meane to preserue an estate

Exod. 18. 21.

Why Tiberius would not change his Lieutenants.

A notable custome vsed by Seuerus in making vnder-gouernours

The second meane to preserue an Estate

Of whom a prince holdeth his sovereignty. Subjects compared to a set of counters. The fourth meane. Magistrates must be punished as well as the common people. Aristotle misliked perpetuall Magistrates

General commissioners requisite in a Monarchy. The fifth meane.

Delay in punishing the wicked is dangerous. The sixth meane.

Geometrical proportion ought to be obserued in Commonwealths.

Vpon what men publike charges are to be bestowed.

Two sorts of equality.

The seventh meane.

The eighth.

The beginning of euils must be staid.

degrees of honour than their condition requireth. Againe, they ought not to respect their owne valure and desert so much, as to thinke that great Estates and honours are a due and necessary reward for their vertue: and that vpon their deniall, they haue iust cause to make some commotion in the Common wealth. But let them rather consider that the prince holdeth his soueraignty of God, and of the auncient lawes of the Estate: and that all his subjects in respect of him are but as a set of Counters, whereof hee maketh one to be one in value now, then to stand for a thousand, by and by for a hundred thousand, and afterward for nothing. If we haue lesse fauour and grace, we shall bee lesse enuied, which alwaies taketh hold of the greatest. Exact and precise obseruation of iustice is no lesse necessary for the preservation of Estates and Monarchies, as we haue elsewhere discoursed: and it ought to bee exercised not onely vpon the simple people, but also vpon Magistrates when they abuse their calling and dignitie. For when their faults are vnpunished and winked at to the oppression of the meaner sort, they are easily induced to murmore and to moue sedition. Aristotle approoued not this custom in Lacedemonia, that the power of the Senators was perpetuall during their life, and that they were exempted from correction, and from yeelding an account of their dooings: because (as he said) to appoint perpetuall Magistrates, is to kindle the fire of sedition in the Common wealth. But this is contrary to the opinion of Plato, and of many Politicks, albeit there is no want of arguments and excellent reasons, as well on their side who would haue Magistrates annuall, as on theirs that would haue them perpetual. But as contrary Estates ought to be governed by contrary means, so it is necessary that in a Monarchy some offices should be perpetuall, and other mutable. And if need be, generall Commissioners may be appointed, as it was practised in the time of Lewes the ninth, and of Philip the Faire. To this purpose Buda complaineth, because the Commissioners, had no authority ouer the Magistrates of France, especially ouer the Parliaments, as also because they were not perpetuall. Hee maketh a goodly discourse of them, and sheweth what manner of men ought to bee chosen thereunto. The speedy punishment of wicked and condemned persons, all delay set aside, is a good remedy to preserve policies. For when they see that for their offences and mischievous dealings they are daily taken, and examined, put to torture, condemned and executed, according to their deserts: if before their execution they haue any leasure and respite through the negligence of Magistrates, they seeke by all meanes to moue sedition and trouble in the Common wealth, hoping thereby to saue their liues, and to auoide that punishment vnto which their consciences iudge them to be indebted. The equall proportion and measure of all and euery particular part in a Politike body, according to the degrees of callings and persons, is necessary for the preservation of Estates and Monarchies, that there may bee equality not of things, but of proportions, and that degrees may bee kept. As for example, albeit the diuine Lawyer, Captaine, Counsellor, Treasurer, differ one from another, yet they must of necessity agree, and be made equall, not in their calling, but by like proportion, that euery one may execute his office without the hinderance of another. Therefore Plato said, that the publike estate is in a good case, if it be instituted according to Geometrical proportion, and all benefits bestowed accordingly. If the King giue the office of Chancellorship to a wise and learned man that loueth iustice and publike quietnesse: the office of Constables, or of the Marshallship of Fraunce, to good Captaines and such as are experienced in State affaires: the government of the Church to a Diuine of good life and manners, and one that is well skild in Ecclesiasticall government: the office of iustice to an honest Lawyer: the keeping of the treasure to a Treasurer of an vpright conscience. Then if euery one keepe his owne place, and performeth his duty without incroching vpon another, or hindering of him to the end that publike conueniency and agreement may not bee troubled, this order will make an equalitie betweene vnlike persons. For we finde two sorts of equality namely, equalitie of quantity, and of proportion. Equality of quantity is requisite in commutative iustice, that euery one may take as much as he ought. Equality of proportion is requisite in distributive iustice, and in rewarding men according to their desert. This equalitie (saith Plato) giueth the greatest honors to them that excell most in vertue, and the lesser places of dignity to such as are inferiour in vertue and learning, distributing to both that which belongeth vnto them by reason. Besides, the meanes alledged already by vs for the preservation of Estates and Monarchies, Aristotle setteth downe these that follow. Let nothing (saith he) bee done against the lawes and customes, which, as before we discoursed, are the chaines and bonds of all Empires, Powers, and Common wealth. Let remedy be vsed against the beginning of an euill equill, how small soeuer it bee. For oftentimes of a small occasion, as it were of one sparkle, a great fire of troubles is kindled in the Common-wealth. And as great stormes and tempests proceede from exhalations and vapours that are not seene: so seditions and ciuill warres begin for the most part of very light matters, which a man would neuer thinke should haue such an issue. Let no credit be giuen to crafty and subtil devices, inuented to deceiue common-wealths withall. These are meanes commonly practised by forraine and domestickall enemies to Estates, who thereby disguise the truth of matter: whereof we haue had good experience in France, when in the Councell of our Princes information hath bene giuen cleane contrary to the truth: insomuch that we haue felt the cruell hand of strangers before euer we would haue beleued that they had taken horse in their owne countrey. And therefore among such nourishers of our miseries, this prouerbe is rise: That a lye is alwaies good how little a while sooner it bee beleued. Let those that are placed in the offices of Magistracie, be haue themselves modestly both towards those that deale not at all in publike affaires and towards them that meddle therewith: offering no iniury to the one sort, and liuing friendly with the other. Let them that are to care for the safety of the Estate, watch alwaies, and stand vpon their guard, and oftentimes propound causes of feare, to make the subiects more attentiu and heedfull to that which they should doe. Let there be no contentions or quarrels betweene the Nobles, and let others bee preuented that are not yet ioyned to those dissensions before they enter into them. This is the chiefe thing at this day, whereunto our Kings and Princes ought especially to looke. For amongst their traines there is nothing but leagues and part-takings, from which nothing will proceed in the end but trouble and hurt to their Estate. Therefore they must take away all occasions of hatred and quarrelling, and remooue such farre from their court that loue contentions: because that as quarrellers of themselves tarry not long in seruice, so by their meanes princes loose other good seruants. And if they will not, or are afraid to put them from the Court, at leastwise let them take knowledge of all their enmities, factions, and discontentments that are amongst them & labour to ende them, not in outward shew onely, but by some good effect. Let them content such as are not well pleased, if they can iustly do it: let them grant meanes of safety to them that say they haue cause to distrust others: and let them reconcile professed enemies. But aboue all things let not the prince make himselfe a party in the contentions of his subiects, if the occasion of their strife be not grounded vpon the Estate. For in stead of keeping to himselfe the place of soveraigne Iudge, he shall bee onely the chiefe of a faction, and so bring his estate and life into danger. The punishment of rebels is one meane also to preferue estates and Common-wealths, and to preuent seditions, wherby they are altered and changed. But regard must be had (according to the counsell of Hypocrates) that medicines be not applied to incurable diseases. For when all the people, or the most of them are culpable, to punish all, is as much as to overthrow the Common-wealth. It is also a good meane and most vsuall for the auoiding of seditions, to take from the people their armour, and to haue fortresses fenced and furnished with all things necessary for them. For the neglecting of this giueth occasion to troublesome heads and to such as desire nouelties to execute their wicked purposes, and to trouble the estate: and the liberty of armour maketh them more fierce and insolent therein. Moreouer wee may comprehend that which is requisite and necessarie for the preferuation of every good Common-wealth, vnder five things: namely, let it be loued faithfully, defended manfully, adorned with nobility, ordred profitably, and gouerned prudently. It is naturally ingrafted into every living creature, to loue that place where it tooke beginning. The sauage beasts (saith Cassiodorus) loue woods and Forrests: birds loue the aire: fishes the sea and riuers: men loue the originall place of their birth and being: in a word, both men and beasts loue those places where they purpose and to liue continue long. He that is more in loue (saith Aristotle) with his priuate profite, than with publike wealth, looseth the name of a good citizen, and taketh vnto him the name of a wicked subiect. Therefore every one both great and small ought to dedicate all good gifts in them to the benefit of their countrey, louing their fellow subiects, and exercising their charges and callings faithfully. It is their duty also manfully to defend the Common-wealth against all forraine incursions: and hee that defendeth his countrey, defendeth himselfe and his. He that refuseth to die (as Cicero saith) in the defence of his countrey, dieth together with it: which being ouerthrowne, the inhabitants are therewithall destroyed. No man therefore ought to feare danger in defence of his countrey: and it is better to die for many, than with many. They that die (saith Iustinian the Emperor) in the defence of their Common-wealth, liue alwaies by glory. Therefore enery

The ninth.

The tenth.

The eleuenth.

The twelfth.

Contentious persons must be remooued from the Court.

Princes must labour by all meanes to end the contentions of their subiects.

They must not be parties in their subiects quarrels.

The thirteenth.

The fourteenth.

Five necessary things for the preferuation of every common-wealth.

All living creatures loue the place of their birth.

It is the duty of every subiect to defend his countrey.

one

The nobility
is the ornament of a Commonwealth.

Of the law
prosapia.

To whom the defence of a countrie chiefly belongeth

VVhat order
is.

The ende of order.

VVhat go-
uernment is.

Ignorance is no sufficient excuse for a magistrate.

What prudence is.

What Christi-tian Empire
is.

one ought to arme himselfe with manhood, which is one kinde of heroical fortitude, as the morall Philosophers say that he may be seruiceable for the safegard of his countrie in time of neede, and of a iust war. The Nobilitie is the ornament of euery Common-wealth. For commonly the Nobles are of greater abilitie, of better behauiour and more ciuill than the common people, than artificers, and men of base estate, because they haue beene brought vp from their infancie in all ciuility and amongst men of honour. Moreouer, to haue a noble heart and invincible to resist the enemy, great to exercise liberality, courteousnesse and honest in talke, bolde to execute, gentle to forgiue, are graces and vertues proceeding from honesty, which are not so commonly found among men of base condition, as among those that come of good and ancient stockes. For this cause there was in Rome a law called Prosapia, that is to say, the law of linage, whereby it was ordained, that they which descended from the race of the Fuluians, Torquates, and Fabritians, should haue the Consulship, when it so fell out, that the Senate disagreed about the election of Consuls. In like manner they that came of Lycurgus in Lacedæmon, of Cato in Vtica, of Thucydides in Galatia, were not onely priuiledged in their owne Provinces, but also greatly honoured of all nations. The defence and preseruatiō of the countrie belongeth chiefly to the Nobles, as they that haue greater vse and practise of weapons, than the common people haue, whome God and nature hath subiected to them, that they should bee their defendours and protectours. In this sort then is the common-wealth decked and adorned of the nobilitie, and by their meanes honoured of neighbour friends, and feared of her enemies. Next it must be ordered profitably. Where no order is, there is all confusion. And therefore as a good father of a familie taketh order in his house, and a Pilot in his ship: so the magistrate must appoint an order in his city and common-wealth. For all communitie is confusion, if by order it bee not brought to vnity. Order is the due disposition of all things. The order of the heauens, times, and seasons teacheth vs among other things the wisdom of the Creator, who hath appointed all diuine, celestiall and earthly things by a wonderfull disposition. Neither doth any thing make Magistrates of commonwealths more admired and commended, than the good order which they establish in them. The ende of all good order tendeth to profite, as the ende of confusion to losse and destruction. And if profit be to be considered in any thing, it is chiefly to bee thought vpon in a politike body, The more common and generall a good thing is (saith Aristotle) the more it is to bee esteemed aboue another. Therefore if it bee a good thing and commendable to appoint a profitable order in a house or ship: it is a great deale better, yea most excellent, to order a Commonwealth profitably. Last of all, a Commonwealth must bee gouerned prudently. Gouernment presupposeth order, because no man can rightly and duly gouerne without order. Gouernment is a right disposition of those things of which a man taketh charge vpon him to bring vpon them to a conuenient ende. Euery Monarch Emperor, King, Prince, Lord, Magistrate, Prelate, Iudge and such like, may bee called a Gouernour: in whome wisdom, patience, and diligence, are necessarily required for the discharge of their duties. Neither may ignorance or any error be receiued for sufficient excuse of him that hath taken vpon him a publike charge, and much lesse if he required and fought for it himselfe. Yea he may bee charged with the least fault, especially when it concerneth the Estate, or some greate matter wherein the Commonwealth hath interest. For this cause wee said, that the Commonwealth must be gouerned with Prudence. But Prudence (saith Aristotle) presupposeth wisdom, and the right reason of things that are to bee done. Without Prudence (saith Xenophon) wee can haue no vse at all of vertue. For in the administration either of priuate or publike matters, we can come to no good ende, without the direction of Prudence, which teacheth vs to prouide for all things to come, to order things present, and to call to minde things past. We haue hertofore discoursed more at large both of that vertue, and also of others requisite in euery Magistrate for the faithfull execution of his charge. Whereunto we will adde this thing onely, that euery gouernour must remember, that Lordship, Empire, kingdome, maiestie, dominion and power are rather heathen than Christian words: & that the Empire of a Christian prince is nothing else but a iust administration, protection and meane to doe good. Therefore when he beholdeth an innumerable multitude of his subiects, he is to thinke that so many millions of men depende of his carefulnesse, not to doe with them what pleaseth him, but to labour and trauell to make them better than when hee receiued them. And in all things wherein the safety of the Commonwealth consisteth, whether it bee in preventing the causes of change therein, or in redressing seditions which trouble it, hee must alwaies resolute with himselfe to bring his

his purpose to passe, how difficult soeuer the way be, releasing rather somewhat of the extremity of right, (as Lucius Papinius said) seeing the quietnes and safety of the people is the chiefest, and most vpright law among men that can be. So that when the Common wealth is in danger or in necessity, we must freely bestow vpon that blood and name, which is common to vs with all the members of the politike body, whatsoeuer cannot be kept backe without violating that common kindred, and the Estate of the Common wealth. So that if he hinder pulike benefite, and hurt the Estate, it is not to be called right any longer, as Appius Claudius saide, speaking of the authority of the Tribunes among the people of Rome. And it is a point of true and naturall prudence sometime to giue place to the times, But to necessity alwaies. A good Pilot neuer opposeth himselfe willfully against a tempest, but striketh saile and keepeth himselfe still: then weighing his anchors, he floteth safely vpon the waves, which not long before were swollen and lift vp to drowne him. If a man strue against a tempest and against heauen, doth he not euen blindfolde cast himselfe downe headlong, and as it were desperately seeke his owne destruction? Now if all these things hitherto mentioned by vs be diligently obserued, there is no doubt (God prospering all) but that the preservation of Estates and Monarchies, with good remedies to keepe them from trouble and sedition will follow after.

We must spare
no cost to help the common wealth.

Of the Harmonie and agreement that ought to be in the Dissimilitude or vnlike callings of subiects, by reason of the dutie and office of euery estate. Chap. 66.

A CHI-TOB. VVE saw before (my Companions) that a citie or ciuill company is nothing else but a multitude of men vnlike in estates or conditions, which communicate together in one place their artes, occupations, workes and exercises, that they may liue the better, and are obedient to the same lawes and magistrates. We learned also, that of such a dissimilitude and harmonie agreement ariseth by due proportion of one towards another in their diuers orders and estates, euen as the harmonie in musick consisteth of vnequall voices or sounds agreeing equally together. I am of opinion therefore, that to prouoke euery one particularly to seeke after and to practise this apt agreement, we are to consider severally of all the principall parts that are in a politike body well ordered, and to handle the seuerall duty and office of euery one of them, But I leaue this discourse of this matter to you.

A SER. As there is but one Lord, one faith, one Baptisme, one God and father of all, which is aboue all and through all, and in vs all: so all that beleue in him ought to be one, and to haue but one heart and one soule, euery one referring his gifts and graces to the exercise of perfect charity.

Eph. 4. 5. 6.

A MANA. O how happy a thing is it to see one flocke guided vnder one God and one king in one religion and policy. Although they be many members: yet they make but one body, of which euery one hath a like care. But let vs heare ARAM discourse at large vpon that which is here propounded vnto vs.

ARAM. As we see that in the body of this vniuersall frame, there is (as the Philosophers say) matter, forme, priuation, simplicity, mixture, substance, quantity, action, and passion, and that the whole world being compounded of vnlike elements, of earth, water, ayre, and fire, is notwithstanding preferred by Analogie and proportion, which they haue together: and as we see in a mans body, head, hands, feete, eies, nose, eares, in a house, the husband, wife, children, master seruants: in a politike body, Magistrates, Nobles, Common people, artificers: and that euery body mingled with heate, colde, drie and moist, is preferred by the same reason of analogie and proportion which they haue together: So it is in euery Common-wealth, well appointed and ordered. which consisteth of many and sundry subiects, is maintained by their vnitie, being brought to bee of one consent and will, and to communicate their workes, artes, and exercises together for common beenefite and profit. For euery one is best in his owne art, neither can all men do all things. And if it bee a very harde matter to be excellent in any one vocation, it is impossible to excell in all, and to exercise them duly. Now we may say that fixe things are necessarily required to frame a happy city & ciuill society, namely, sacrifices, iudgments, armes, riches artes, & aliments, vnto which fixe

All things
stand by proportion.

Sixe sundry callings of men necessary in euery
good common wealth.

No nation but adoreth some diuinity.

The sacrifices of Christians
Three sorts
of sacrifices.

Of priestes
and pastours.

Wherein the office of true
pastors con-
sisteth.

Esa. 56. 10. 11 Against dumb
dogs & coue-tous sheepe-
heards.

Tit. 1. 7. S. 9.
The qualities of a good Pa-
stour.

1. Pet. 5. 2. 3.

Vices to bee
a voided in a Pastor.

The duty of a good magistrate consisteth in foure
things.
Iustice distributed into se-
uen parts.

Of armes &
of the necessity of them.
What nobility
is.

things & works, sixe sorts of men are answerable, Pastors, magistrats, nobles, burgeses, artificers, and husbandmen. Therefore to begin the particular handling of the duty and office of these callings, and that as briefly as I can, we are first to note, that neuer any nation in all the world was so barbarous, or so far estranged from ciuility, that did not acknowledge & adore some diuine nature, and vse some kind of sacrifices, and so consequently that had not some priests to exercise them, and some proper ceremonies. Aristotle in his Politiques saith expressly that it is a necessary thing to haue priests in every city, to take care of the worshipp of the gods and of sacrifices. Every worke that we do (saith Augustine) to be ioyned neerer to God by a holy society, is a sacrifice. There are three general sorts of sacrifices: the first is the sacrifice of the soule, which we offer to God by contritiō, deuotion, contēplation & prayer, the second is of the body, which we offer to God by fasting, abstinence, or by suffering martyrdom to maintaine his law, iustice, & truih. The third sacrifice is of outward goods, when wee offer them vnto him in the works of charity according to his holy ordinance. So that if sacrifices & priests alwaies tooke place among the Barbarians, much more careful ought they to be to maintain this diuine mystery, that adore & perfectly know God. And as men haue liued vnder 3. lawes, the law of nature, the written law, & the law of Grace, so there were sacrifices & priests vnder every one of them. Melchisedech liued vnder the law of nature, Aaron vnder the written law, and vnder the law of Grace, vnder which we liue at this present, Iesus Christ that great and eternal Priest and sacrificer, who hath offered himselfe a sacrifice for our redemption, and hath left vs his disciples and Apostles & their successors to be our Pastors in the guiding of our soules vnder his testament & new couenant, which is the infallible rule of his holy and iust wil. Therefore let them that boast, that they are called of God to such an excellent charge, looke to discharge themselves faithfully, by teaching the truth, & leading a life agreeable to their doctrine. Otherwise if they sit in the chaire of pestilence (as Dauid speaketh) let them looke for an horrible iudgement of God vpon their soules, when he shall say vnto the by way of reproach, that in this world they sate in their pontificall seates, as the Scribes and Pharisees did long since in the chaire of Moses. Their watchmen (saith Esaie speaking of euill Pastours) are al blind, they haue no knowledge, they are dumb dogs: they cannot barked; they lie & sleepe, & delight in sleeping. These greedy dogs can neuer haue enough, & these sheepeheards canot vnderstand, for they all looke to their owne way, every one for his aduantage, and for his own purpose. But contrariwise, A pastor (saith Saint Paule) must bee vnreproachable, as Gods steward, not froward, not angry, not giuen to wine, no striker, not giuen to filthy lucre, but harberous, one that loueth goodnesse: wise, righteous, holy temperate, holding fast the faithfull word according to doctrine, that he also may bee able to exhort with wholesome doctrine, and improoue them that say against it. Feed the flocke of Christ, which dependeth vpon you (saith Saint Peter) caring not for it by constraint, but willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind: not as though ye were lords ouer Gods heritage, but that yee may bee enamples to the flocke. Therefore if Pastors preach the Gospel, giue example of good life by their workes, fight against the enemies of the truth with the weapons of charitie, praier, perswasions, testimonies of the holy Scripture: if they remooue from them couetousnesse, pride, dissolutenes, and superfluitie of expences, and walke in this sort in their vocation, the first place of honor is due to them amongst men, and a greater and vspeakeable prepared for them in heauen. The second thing that is necessarie in every Common-wealth and citie, are iudgements, and consequently magistrats to execute them. But because we discoursed at large of this matter before, wee will not stand long vpon it, but comprehend in few words the whole duty and office of a good Magistrate, which consisteth in foure things: in taking nothing vniustly from any body, in giuing to every one his owne, in despising his owne profite, and in preserving publike profite. He performeth these duties perfectly by the distribution of iustice into seuen parts: By procuring that God may be worshipped, that reuerence bee giuen to superiours, that concord bee amongst equals, that discipline bee used towards inferiours, patience towards enemies, mercy towards the poore, and that integrity of life proceede from himselfe. Now let vs consider of Armes, and of Nobles. Armes (as Varro saith) are all warlike instruments, seruing both to set vpon our enemies, and to defend our selues from their assaults and enterprises. They are necessary in a Common-wealth and citie for these three causes, to resist the outward force of enemies, and to keepe them in feare: to repress naughtie citizens, both by compelling them to obey magistrats and lawes, and by punishing the guilty: and last of all, to defend the libertie of subiects. The exercise and vse of armes, warres and battels, bath from all antiquitie beene committed to the Noble men. Nobilitie (as Aristotle saith) is a glittering excellencie proceeding from ancestours, and an honour that commeth from an auncient lineage linage and stocke, Or according (to Bortius Senerinus) Nobilitie: is a praise that proceedeth from the deserts of our Elders, and forefathers. Many make three kindes of Nobility one that is bred of vertue and of excellent deeds: the second that proceedeth from the knowledge of honest disciplines and true sciences, and the third that commeth from the scutcheions and Armes of our auncestours, or from riches. But to speake truly, there is no right Nobilitie, but that which springeth of vertue, and good conditions. For as hee is a theefe that stealeth, and hee vniust that doth vniustly: so hee is a base and vile person, that dealeth villanously. Hee boasteth in vaine of his great linage, and seeketh to bee esteemed for the nobilitie and vertue of his auncestours, that hath no goodnesse in him, nor commendable qualitie of his owne to ioyne with those of his predeceffours. Let no man please himselfe too much (saith Agapetus) in the nobilitie of his auncestours, for all men haue done for their stocke from whence they come: both they that are pricked vp in purple and fine linnen, and they that are afflicted with pouerty and sicknesse: as well they that are decked with crownes as they that lie naked vpon the strawe. Let vs not therefore bragge of our earthly race, but let vs glory in the integritie of maners. Although vice be in one that commeth of noble blood, yet it is alwaies lothsome and infamous: yea it doth so much the more appeare shameful and odious, as it is ioyned with greater nobilitie. But vertue is the very lively colour and ornament of nobility, and causeth it to be honoured for loue of it selfe onely. All kings and princes saith Plato came of slanes, and all slanes of kings. What profit is there saith Macrine the emperour writing to the Senate of Rome in nobility, if the heart of a prince be not replenished with bounty and gentlenes towards his subiects? The goods of fortune come oftentimes to the unworthy, but the vertue of the soule alwaies maketh a man worthy of the greatest praise. Nobilitie, riches, & such like, come from without a man, and are subiect to corruption, but iustice, bonnie, and other vertues, are not onely wonderfull because they come from the soule, but procure also to him that hath them and useth them vertuously, a perfection of all felicity. Yea it is far better and more commendable in a man, to leane to his posteritie a good beginning of nobilitie by vertue, than to defame by villany and wicked behauiour that praise which hee hath receiued from his predeceffours. Therefore we ought not to be puffed up with pride because we come of a great race, seeing that honor belongeth more to our progenitors than to vs, if we be not noble by our own vertue. Is not one God (as Malachy saith) father of vs al? he made the first kings of a poore, & base stocke, to teach vs that men ought not through arrogancy & vain boasting of their nobility, esteeme themselves better than others, but so farre forth only as his holy gifts & graces are more abundantly in them, Saul was chosen king as he was seeking his fathers asses: Dauid when he was shepheard, & the yongest of his brethre. The brier & the rose came of one & the same root, so noble men & vile persons came of one masse and lumpe. The brier is reiected because it pricketh, & the rose for her good smell is esteemed & held in mens hands. So he that maketh himselfe vile through vice, ought to be reiected, & he that is odoriferous and smelleth sweetly by good vertues and noble actions, ought to be esteemed, honoured and accounted noble of what race & stocke soeuer he commeth. True it is, that auncient nobilitie ioyned with excellent vertue, is very commendable among men, especiall in euery Monarchy well established of which the nobilitie is the chiefest pillar, being appointed by God, and approoued by the law of man, for their fidelitie towards their kings, and defence of their subiects, wherein the true duty and office of noble men consisteth. Riches are the fourth thing necessarie in euery commonwealth, and consequently Citizens, who commonly possesse them, and are settled from all antiquitie in towns, hauing rents, reuenues and possessions, and being as it were the stronge pillars of cities, and of the whole politicall body. Cicero saith, that riches are the sinewes of battles. For as the whole body of a man feeleth and mooueth by the sinews: so the body of the commonwealth receueth strength and power by riches to gather men of war together in defence of her liberty. For this cause Aristotle in his platforme of a happie commonwealth requireth abundance of wealth and money to helpe publike affaires at home, and warlike matters abroad. And in another place he saith, that a happie life consisteth in the perfect vse of vertue, assisted with bodily and external goods, as with instruments that serue to execute honest actions wel & vertuously. It is certaine that golde and siluer in respect of the soule, are neither good nor ill, but by good vsage they are made profitable for this life, and the abuse of them is hurtful both to the body & soule. And indeede riches of their owne nature are not to be condemned Abraham, Lot, Iacob, and Iob, were rich and holy men. Iosephus writeth that neuer any king either of the Hebrews, or of any other nation, left so great riches to his successor as Dauid did to Salomon. For he left him to build the temple withall, 10000 talents of gold, and 100000.

Three kinds
of nobility.

Which is right
nobility.

Macrines letter to the Senate
of Rome
touching
nobility.

Malach. 2. 10

When nobility
of birth is to be esteemed.

Of riches &
burgeses.

Riches are the sinewes of war.

They are necessary
in a Commonwealth.

The exceeding riches
that Dauid
left to Salomon.

The number of workmen about Salo-mons temple Augustus
maintained
yearly 44.
Legions of
souldiers.
The fruits of
the Romane Empire in the time of Augustus.

Of artes and Artificers.
What an Art or occupation
is.

Art is an imitation of nature.

Three things necessary for the life of
man.
The vse of Aliments.

The vse of
monie.

The vse of garments.

The duty of
all artificers.

Artificers of one Science
ought not to dwell all together.

of silver, besides infinite store of stuffe, of wonderfull cost and value, which he had caused to be prepared and made ready. The sumptuousnesse of that Temple, as it is described by this Historiographer, is wonderfull. Hee saith that it was made and finished in seven years, by 80000. Masons, 3200. Overseers, 30000. Hebrewes that hewed wood in the forest, & 7000. other that brought stones and such like matter for the worke. If the riches of the Romane Empire had not bin great, I meane both the publike and priuate wealth, it is certaine, that it had not so long time maintained it selfe in such a glorious and flourishing Estate, as the like was neuer before, causing the farthest and most vnknowne nations to stand in feare of her weapons. Hereof we haue good prooffe by that which we reade of Augustus Caesar, who ordinarily defraied the charges of 44. Legions, which amounted yearly to twelue millions of gold. But the Romane Empire was then come to the top of her greatnes, hauing for her bounds the riuer of Euphrates on the East side, the Ocean sea on the West, on the South side the fruitfull religion of Africa, and on the North side the riuers of Rhine and Danubius. At this day 50. kingdomes and estates are diuided out of that Monarchie. Therefore if the citizens of the common wealth possesse riches, if they imploy them vpon good workes, and that liberally for the tuition, defence and setting forth of their countrey, they behaue themselves like good citizens, borne to doe good, and to profite the Common-wealth. The fift thing necessary in euery good Common wealth and citie, are occupati- ons, and consequently craftsmen. An art is an habite of working according to right rea- son, as Aristides saith. Or else, an art is the knowledge of some certaine thing gotten by vse, instruction, or reason, tending to necessarie vse, for mans life. Some arts consist in Speculation, and others in practise. Wee call Speculation Theoricall, that is to say, Specu- lative: and Action practicall, that is to say, Actiue. This word Artificer is deriued of the of the word Arte. Now because that nature is most perfect next to God, the nearer that art approacheth to nature, the better and perfecter it is, as appeareth in images and pictures: so that arte is nothing lesse but an imitation of nature. Those Artes that are commonly called Mechanicall, or handy craftes, whereby they differ from liberall artes, of which wee haue al- ready discovered, are of diuers sorts. For the better vnderstanding of them wee will presup- pose that man hath need of three temporall things for the maintenance of this life, namely of Aliments, Houses, and Cloathing. He standeth in neede of Aliments to restore the consump- tion of radicall moysture, wasted by naturall heate, (as the weeke consumeth the oyle in the lampe) I say to restore it againe by moist nourishment, as by bread, wine, flesh, and other ali- ments, without which a man could not liue. These nutriments are provided and prepared by men of Occupations, as by Butchers, Fishmongers, Bakers, Cookes, Vintners, and other handicraftsmen, which serue and looke to the prouision of victuals. Next, men haue neede of houses, that euery one may haue his priuate place of refuge to keepe his bo- dy, family, and goods, vnder couert: and these are edifices and frames erected by the arte and building, and made by Masons, Carpenters Geometricians, Sawyers, Iohners, and other handy crafts that are occupied in caruing. Likewise a city, in respect both of ornament and of defence, standeth in neede of wals, towers, bulwarks, rampires, and other things of de- fence, as also of temples and other common places, all which cannot be made without the artes of building and of Masonry. The third thing which men stand in neede of, are gar- ments to cloth themselves withall, to preserue naturall heat, & to keep out external cold, & these are provided by Mercers, Drapers, Tailors, Hosiers, & such like. Besides the aboue na- med things, we stand in need of armor & of horses to defend our liberty & for our greate co- modity, & so consequently Armerors, Glazers, Sadlers, Spurmakes, Smiths, & such like are necessary. Likewise for the preseruatiou and recouerie of our health, wee must honour the Phisition, Chirurgion, Apothecarie, Drug seller and such like. The duty and office of all arti- ficers, is to auoide idlenes sloth, and negligence, and especially to vse no deceit in their artes, but to referre the end of their labours more to common profite than to their priuate gaine. And for the auoiding of Ingrossers, it is very expedient that the crafts men should bee diui- ded into diuers parts of the city, and not placed all on a rowe in one quarter thereof, as they doe in the townes of Afrike, and in many cities of Europe. For besides the discommodities in great townes, when euery quarter hath not in it such artificers as are commonly necessarie, it is to bee feared that there will bee among them Ingrossers to forestall the merchandise and wares: or else iealousie and quarrelles are to bee feared, if one sell better cheape than an other, euen before his eies that refused to take that mony. It is true that such artificers as are least required, as men that liue by the hammer, may bee ranged in one quarter, that thereby they may be separated from men of learning & quietnes. The sixt &

last thing necessary in a Commonwealth remaineth to be considered of, namely, Aliments, and consequently labourers. We haue already spoken of Aliments: but as for that which concerneth husbandry especially, there is no other arte, that doth more awaken the minde of man, that rauisheth his senses more, that affordeth greater pleasure, or is more necessarie and profitable for the life of man, than husbandry. Moreover nothing fauoureth of greater antiquitie, nothing doth better discover the greatnesse of the workes, of God, nothing doth cast tooorth more liuely markes and beames, of a wonderfull diuinitie, than husbandry. For most of other arts were inuented long time after man was created of God, and augmented since by the industry of many. Onely husbandrie gaue sufficient testimony of it selfe, and of the incomprehensible power of God, when presently after the creation of the elements, there came out of the bowels of the earth all kinde of herbes and plants garnished with their proper vertues for the seruice and commodity of men. Man himselfe also by a diuine and naturall instinct hath bene from the beginning more inclined and disposed to the tillage of the earth, than to any other study and vocation whatsoeuer: as we reade of our first Fathers, who commonly called themselves laborers of the earth, and feeders of cattell. Husbandrie and the countrey life were so much commended and esteemed of the ancients, that many of them haue written sundry bookes therof in Greeke, and Latine: and many monarches haue heretofore left their great places, and contemned their purple robes and diademes, that they might giue themselves to the manuring of the countrey commodities. Cyrus was neuer better pleased and contented, than when he might be dressing of some goodly peece of ground, and setting of certaine number of trees checkerwise. Dioclesian forlooke the scepter of his Empire, that he might withdraw himselfe into the fields, and tirm with his owne hands, trees grafts, seuerall plots of ground, and gardens. Besides in husbandry and the countrey life, profite aboundeth with pleasure, and gaine with delight. As for profite it is very euident. For a good husbandman is alwaies provided for bread, wine, flesh, fruite, wood, and other aliments. And concerning pleasure, it is incredible to one that hath skill and will to consider of the maruels of nature, besides a thousand delights, with exercises as pleasant & profitable for his health as can be. And that benefite which is most excellent & chiefest of all, I meane tranquillitie of minde, may more easily be obtained by the Muses, darlings, and louers of knowledge in the midst of the open filds and pleasant sound of waters, than amongst the noise of fuits and dissensions wherewith cities are replenished. It belongeth to the duty of laborers to liue in their simplicity, and to do their endeavour in tilling the fields. For the performing herof they stand in neede of three things: of skill to know the nature of the soile, and the seasons of sowing and gathering: of will to be diligent and carefull to continue in their countrey labor: and lastly of abilitie to prouide oxen, horses, cattle, and other instruments of husbandry. By this discourse therefore we may see what things are most requisite and necessary for the institution of a happy commonwealth, & that no man is so industrious, witty or prudent, that of himselfe without the helpe of another he can liue without society, and minister to himselfe all necessary things. For this cause the fellowship of many together was found out, that by teaching, iudging, defending, giuing, taking, changing, seruing and communicating their workes and exercises one with another, they might liue well and commodiously together. Which thing will vndoubtedly come to passe in euery commonwealth, when euery one walking in his vocation, directeth his will and worke to the seruice of God, his Prince and countrey.

Of Aliments
and labourers
The praise of husbandry.

The Antiqui-Thereof.

Men haue bene alwaies
more inclined to husbandry
than to any other vocation.
Princes haue
forfaken their diademes to fall to husbandry.

Cyrus.
Dioclesianus.
Profite and pleasure are ioyned together in husbandry.

The countrey
fitter for students than the city.

The duty of husband-men
Three things necessary for them.

Euery commonwealth
must bee al-
waies prouid-
ed against al
euents both of peace and war.

Of Peace, and Warre. Chap. 67

A R A M. Iustinian the Emperor in the Preface of his Institutions saith: That it is necessary for the imperiall maiesty to haue respect to two times, namely, of peace and war, that it may be provided against all euents either of the one or the other. Lawes and good politike statutes are necessary for it in time of peace, that the prouinces may bee quietly governed: but in the time of war it must alwaies haue armour ready and conuenient forces, to helpe friends, to resist enemies, and to containe disobedient subiects within compasse. Now hauing hitherto intreated of that policie, which chiefly respecteth the time of peace, wee must hereafter (my companions) refer to our discourses that small knowledge which we haue of warre-like discipline. And first I thinke we must oppose these times of peace and warre one against the other, and consider of their cleane contrary effects, that wee may be so much the more easily led and perswaded to desire and procure that which is best and most profitable for euery estate and monarchie. Therefore I propound vnto you this matter to discourse vpon.

Rom. 11. 18.
Col. 3. 15.

A CHITOR. If it be possible, as much as in you is (saith the Apostle) haue peace with all men: and let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which ye are called in one body. For truly without peace all riches is but pouerty, all mirth but mourning, all life but death. But no man can perfectly know the benefit of peace, that hath had no triall of the burthen of warre.

Leuit. 26. 3. 6.
14. 15. 16.

A SER. If ye walke in my ordinances (saith the eternall God) I will send peace in the land: but if ye will not obey me, but despise mine ordinances, I will send a sword vpon you, that shall avenge the quarrell of my covenant, and ye shall be deliuered into the hand of the enemy. Now let vs heare A MANA discourse vpon that which is here propounded vnto vs.

Lycurgus referred all his lawes to war, appointing the Ilotes onely to deale with occupations.

Numa referred all his lawes to peace.

The keeping of Ianus temple shut, was a signe of peace among the Romans.

The discomforts of a long peace.

A MANA. Lycurgus entring into the gouernment of the Lacedæmonians, and finding their estate greatly corrupted, determined with himselfe to change their whole Policie. For he thought that if he should onely make some particular lawes and ordinances, it would doe no more good, than a slender medicine would profite a corrupt body full of many diseases, before order were taken for the purging, resoluing, and consuming of the euill humours, that a new forme and rule of life might afterward be prescribed. His enterprise although great and difficult, yet fell out very well, and his lawes were receiued and approoued of the people, after a little force and feare wherewith at first they were restrained. But this law-maker referred all his lawes to warre and to victory, and kept his subiects in continuall exercise of armes, not suffering them to learne any other science or handy-craft, vnto which hee appointed the Ilotes onely, who were men brought in subiection by the right of warre. Whereby Lycurgus seemeth to haue beene of this minde, that force ought to be mistresse in all worldly matters, and that other things serue to no purpose if they want Armes, which by a certaine right of warre that shall alwaies continue amongst men, bring in subiection to Conquerours the persons and goods of those whom they overcome. It seemeth also he thought that there was neuer any true peace among men, but onely in name, and that all Princes and people liue in continuall distrust one of another, and doe nothing else for the most part but watch how to surprise each other, (as Plutarke elegantly setteth it out) notwithstanding all leagues and goodly agreements that passe betweene them. Numa Pompilius, second king of the Romanes cleane contrary to Lycurgus, was so farre in loue with peace, and referred all his lawes in such sort thereunto, that during his reigne, there was neither warre, nor ciuill dissention, nor any motion of nouelty in the gouernment of the Common-wealth. Much lesse was there any enmity or enuie conceiued against him particularly, or conspiracie against his person through desire of ruling, but all occasions of warre being extinguished and remooued, the Temple of Ianus was continually kept shut for the space of forty yeares, which was a signe of peace amongst the Romanes. For not onely at Rome the people were tractable through the example of the iustice, clemency, and goodnesse of king Numa, but also in the townes round about there was a maruellous alteration of manners: insomuch that as the beames of a cleere Sunne are dispersed abroad, so there was shed in the hearts of men a secret desire to liue in peace, to labour the ground, to bring vp their children quietly, and to serue and honor their gods. And Plutarke writeth in his life, that in his time there was nothing but feasts, plaies, sacrifices, and bankets throughout all Italy: so that a man might say, that the wisdom of Numa was a liuely fountaine of all goodnesse and honesty, out of which many riuers issued to water all Italy; and that his peaceable prudence was communicated as it were from hand to hand vnto the whole world. Now, although these two men haue beene greatly praised and commended for sundry rare vertues, yet all men approoue not the extremities which they followed in this forme of gouernment. For as hee is pernicious that mooueth and continueth warre onely to subdue his neighbours, to inlarge the borders of his Countrey, and to vsurpe other mens right, which sauoureth more of brutishnesse than of humanity: so a long peace bringeth with it many discomforts, making men insolent commonly through too great prosperity, as also nice, lauish, and effeminate, through abundance of wealth and idleness. Therefore Plato, Aristotle, and Polybius, reprove Lycurgus, because he propounded onely the exercise of the vertue of warre to his Citizens, which is the least of those foure, that are necessary for the establishment & preservation of euery Empire: saying, that all his lawes were well ordained to make men valiant, but not iust, temperate, and prudent. On the other side, they that are too much affected to peace and quietnes, weaken themselves by little and little before they be aware, and by their example mollifie the courage

courage of youth, wherby they lie open to the iniuries of those that invade them, and so loose their libertie, not being able to defend their persons and goods. But as the world is compounded of foure elements, by whose mixture it is so made, that it is both seene and touched, and withall is preserved in such loue and concord, that it cannot bee dissolved by any other than by him that made it: so every publike estate must bee established by foure vertues, by whose harmony and agreement it is preserved. And as the fire and the earth were first created to make the whole frame subiect to sight and feeling, and then the water and the aire mingled with them, that the dissimilitude of those extremes might bee tempered according to proportion: so fortitude and iustice are first required in the ordaining of commonwealths, because they cannot continue without law and strength; and next prudence and temperance being ioyned with them, moderate rigour and remissnesse of both. Again; as by these natures of which all things are made, being dispersed aboue and beneath, and on all sides, the world is preserved and continued, so that light things are kept from ascending through the weight of heavy things, and contrariwise heauie things helde aloft, that they fall not: so by these foure vertues dispersed amongst men, a commonwealth well instituted and guided by discipline, is maintained. And although by reason of the varietie and change of humane affaires it cannot continue so long, and so adorned as the world, yet it will abide many yeares. Moreover, as the elements are bred one of another, & alter to and fro, going into, and returning continually from the first matter, which receiveth them into it selfe, for which cause they cannot be seene simple, but mixed: whereupon ariseth such a temperature of all things, that they wither not by drought, nor burne with heate, neither are overwhelmed with two great moisture, nor grow stiffe with excessive colde: so these vertues whereby cities are instituted, must be mingled one with another, and agree together for the mutuall preservation, wisdom being President over them, in which they are all contained. For they cannot maintaine themselves one without another, nor keepe their vigor and dignity. Iustice without temperance is rigor: fortitude separated from iustice is rashnesse and cruelty, and without prudence iustice is but craft and subtletie. To conclude, temperance without fortitude ought rather to be called cowardlinesse and nicenesse: wherby we see that they are so enterlaced, and depende in such sort one of another, that they cannot bee separated. If it fall out otherwise, that estate wherein such disorder taketh place, must of necessity be vtterly ouerthrowne or changed. Out of these learned Philosophicall discourses wee will draw a very good lesson: namely, that in euery Estate well instituted for continuance, this temperature of the foure vertues must necessarily be kept, that men may bee instructed how to gouerne themselves well both in time of peace and of war, and obserue such a moderation therein, that knowing how to deale in both times they may bee ready and fit for war when necessity vrgeth, hauing this ende before them to attaine to peace, which must alwaies be preferred, as rest is before trauell, and good before euill, as we shall easily vnderstand by considering their contrary effects. It is certaine that Philosophie is best exercised in time of peace. For when there is no trouble of war, the spirit is quiet, and fit for every honest kinde of rest, so that arts and sciences go well forward, lawes are in force, iustice flourisheth, vertue sheweth her effects better, vice languisheth, the zeale of piety increaseth, the discipline of the church is authorized, both the noble & meane man preserveth and augmenteth his wealth, trade and trafficke is free: briefly, euery one receiveth good & commodity, & so consequently the whole body of the commonwealth. But if we looke to those effects, which the time of war commonly bringeth forth, the desire of hauing is awaked, couetousnes increaseth, iustice falleth to the ground, force and violence beareth sway, spoiling reigneth, riot is set at liberty, wicked men, are in authority, good men oppressed, innocency troden vnder foot, maidens & wiues deflowred, countries wasted, houses burnt, Churches destroyed, tombes broken down, goods spoiled, murders committed, al vertue banished from amongst men, vice honoured, the laws contemned & broken, the seruice of God forsaken, the estate of the Church derided, the nobility and people burdened with infinite charges and costs, all kinde of trades hindered: briefly, there is no calamity or misery that aboundeth not in the common-wealth, in time of war. We may iudge that kingdome happy, wherein the Prince is obedient to the law of God and nature, Magistrates to the Prince, private men to Magistrates, children to their Fathers, seruants to their Masters, and subiects being linked in loue one with another, and all of them with their Prince, enjoy the sweetnesse of peace, and true quietnesse of minde. But warre is cleane contrary thereunto, and souldiers are sworne enemies to that kinde of life. For warre maketh men barbarous, mutinous, and cruell, as peace maketh them

Excellent comparisons
betweene the composition
of the world,
and of euery
happie Common wealth.

How the ver-
tues are knit together and depend one of another.

Peace is to be preferred before war.
The effect of
peace.
The effect of war.

War maketh men cruell, &
peace gentle.

curteous and tractable. Wee readethat Englishmen were in times past so seditious and vntameable, that not onely their Princes could not doe what they would, but also the English merchants were of necessity lodged apart by themselves. For so the towne of Antwarpe was constrained to doe, where there was one house common for all merchant strangers, except Englishmen, who had a house by themselves, because they could not abide to be ioyned with others. The chiefe cause of that strange quality was because their countrey bordered vpon two estates and nations that were their enemies: namely, vpon the Frenchmen and Scots, with whom they had continuall warre: but since they concluded a peace, and ioyned in league with France and Scotland, they became very milde and ciuill. And contrariwise the Frenchmen, who were inferiour to no nation whatsoeuer, in curtesie and humanity, are greatly changed from their naturall disposition, and become sauage since the ciuill warres began. The like (as Plutarke saith) happened to the Inhabitants of Sicilia, who by meanes of continuall warre grew to beelike brute beasts. Archidamus king of Lacedæmonia, knowing well the effects of peace and warre here briefly touched by vs, and hearing that the Elians sent succours to the Archadians to warre against him, tooke occasion to write vnto them after the Laconicall manner, in stead of a long discourse. Archidamus to the Elians: Peace is a goodly thing. And another time he gaue a notable testimony how farre he preferred peace before war, when he made this answer to one that commended him, because he had obtained a battell against the foresaid Archadians: It had beene better if we had overcome them by prudence rather than by force. The selfe same reason of louing peace, and abhorring the breakers thereof, was the cause why Cato in a full Senate opposed himselfe against the request which Cæsars friends made, that the people should offer sacrifice by way of thanksgiving to the gods, for the notable victories which he had gotten against the Germanes, of whom he had surprised and discomfited 300000. I am (saith Cato) rather of this opinion, that he should be deliuered into their hands whom hee hath wronged without cause by violating the peace, which they had with the people of Rome, that they may punish him as they thinke good, to the end that the whole fault of breaking faith and promise with them, may be cast vpon him alone, and not be laid vpon the city, which is no cause at all thereof. And to say truth, wise men are greatly to feare all beginnings of warre. For being in the end growne to some ripenesse, after that some men wanting experience in worldly affaires, haue rashly and vnskilfully sowne the seed thereof, hardly can the greatest and wisest kings plucke it vp againe without great labor and perill. Therefore they that are too desirous and hasty to begin warre, peruert the order of reason: because they begin by execution and force, which ought to be last, after due consultation. But he deserueth greater honour and praise that procureth peace and winneth the enemies hearts by loue, than he that obtaineth victorie by shedding their blood cruellie. For this onely reason (saith Cicero) we must begin war, that we may liue in peace, and not receiue wrong: but this must be done after we haue required satisfaction for the iniury offered. It was for these considerations that Phocion, the great Athenian capitaine laboured to stop the war, which the people of Athens had determined to make against the Macedonians, at the perswasion of Leosthenes. And being demanded when he would counsell the Athenians to make warre, when I see (quoth he) that the yong men are fully resoluéd not to leaue their ranks, that rich men contribute money willingly, and Orators abstaine from robbing the Commonwealth. Neuerthelesse the armie was leuiéd against his counsell, and many wondring at the greatnes & beauty thereof, asked him how he liked that preparation: It is faire for one brunt (saith Phocion) but I feare the returne and continuance of the war: because I see not that the citie hath any other means to get money, or other Vessels and men of war, beside these. And his foresight was approoued by the event. For although Leosthenes prospered in the beginning of his enterprise (whereupon Phocion beeing demanded whether hee would not gladly haue done all those great and excellent things, answered that hee would, but not haue omitted that counsell which he gaue) yet in the end he was slaine in that voyage, the Græcian armie ouerthrowne by Antipater and Craterus two Macedonians, and the citie of Athens brought to that extremitie, that it was constrained to send a blanke for capitulations of peace, and to receiue within it a garrison of strangers. Thus it falleth out commonly to those that seeke for warre by all meanes either by right or wrong. Every prince that desireth it in that manner, stirreth vp against himselfe both the hatred and weapons of his neighbours, hee vexeth and grieueth his subiects vnworthilie, seeking rather to rule over them by violence, than to gaine their good will by iustice; hee quite ouerthroweth his country, preferring dominion, and greatnesse of his owne glory, before the benefit, quietnesse, and

Archidamus letter to the Elians.

Cato misliked Cæsar for breaking of peace.

Wherefore
and when we must begin
to warre.
Phocion dis-
swaded the Athenians
from warre.

The fruits of
vniust warre.

and safety thereof: and oftentime he diminisheth his owne authority, and is brought in subiection to his enemies, whilst he laboureth to possesse another mans right by force. Augustus the Emperor said, that to haue a good and lawfull warre, it must be commended by the gods, and iustified by the Philosophers. And Elins Spartianus affirmeth, that Traian onely of all the Romane Emperors was neuer overcome in battell, because he vnderooke no war, except the cause thereof was very iust. But we may say, that no warre betweene Christians is so iustified, but that still there remaineth some cause of scruple. The testimony of Antigenus the Elder, wherein he accuseth himselfe, is very notable to shew what great wickednesse and iniustice is in warre, when hee vsed this speech to a Philosopher that offered and dedicated vnto him a treatise, which he had made of iustice: Thou art a foole, my friend, to come and tell me of iustice, when thou seest me beate downe other mens townes. Cesar answered little lesse to Metellus a Tribune of the people, who being delirous to keepe him from taking the money that was in the common treasury, alleadged vnto him the lawes that forbad it: to whom this Monarch replied, that the time of warre, and the time of lawes were twaine. Moreover, wee see, that famine and the pestilence commonly follow war. For the abundance of all things being wasted, want of victuals must of necessity succeed, whereupon many diseases grow. Briefly, it bringeth with it nothing but a heape of all euils and miseries, and easily draweth and allureth the violence and euill disposition of many to follow the state of the time. For they that desire a change, are very glad of such an occasion to ground their plat-formes vpon: which they could not doe in time of peace, because men are then of a better iudgement and affection, as well in publike as in priuate matters. But whatsoeuer we haue spoken of the miseries that follow war, warlike discipline must not be suffered to degenerate in a common-wealth well established: seeing there is neuer want of euill neighbours that are desirous to incroach vpon other men borders, and seeing the lawes, iustice, subiects, and the whole state, are vnder the protection of Armes, as it were vnder a mightie buckler. And forasmuch as the defence of our life, and pursuite of the eues is warranted both by the law of God, of nature, and of man, it followeth that the subiects must needs bee trained vp in feates of Armes, both defensive and offensive, that they may be a buckler to the good, and a barre to the bad. Wherein the example of Augustus is very notable, who in time of an assured peace would not dissolve and dismisse the forty legions, but sent them to the Provinces and borders of those nations that were most barbarous, to keepe them in warlike discipline, and withall to take away as neare as he could, all occasion of ciuill warre. Whereof Constantine the Great, had sorrowfull experience, when he discharged his bands of souldiers, whereby hee opened the gates vnto his enemies, who after that invaded the Romane Empire on all sides. For the conclusion therefore of our discourse, let vs learne to desire peace rather than war, the one being a certaine signe of the blessing of God vpon his people, and the other of his wrath and malediction. Let the Prince thinke with himselfe (as Traian wrote to the Senate) that he is called not to war, but to gouerne: not to kill his enemies, but to roote out vices: not so much to goe forth to war, as to tarry in the common wealth: not to take another mans goods from him, but to do iustice to euery one, especially considering that in war a Prince can fight but in the place of one, at which times he is wanting to many in the common wealth. And yet because the sword is put into the Magistrates hand, for the preseruacion of publike peace, he cannot imploie or vse it better than in resisting, breaking, and beating downe their attempts, that tyrannically seeke to trouble it, being led with ambition and desire to enlarge their bounds with other mens right. Now, because the greater part of Potentates, and neighbour Princes direct their purposes to this marke, it is very expedient and necessary in euery well ordered estate, that the youth, especially the nobilitie should be trained vp and exercised in feates of Armes, to the end that in time of necessity, and for common profit, they may bee apt and ready to serue their Prince and country.

When a warre is lawfull. Traian neuer vnderooke vniust warre. Antigenus testimony of the iniustice of warre. Cesar.

Famine & the plague follow warre. Malecontents are glad of warre. Causes why the exercise of armes must alwaies continue.

Augustus kept 40. legions in continuall exercise of warlike discipline. Constantine the great.

Good considerations for a prince.

Of the ancient Discipline, and order of War. Chap. 68.

AMANA. BVt following our purpose, which is to discourse of the state of warre, according to the small experience that our age affoordeth, and our state hath gathered, wee are now to speake my (companions) of warlike discipline, which for the excellent order thereof vsed in auncient time, is so much the more woorthy to be noted, as ours is to be contemned, for the great disorder that is scene in it. Therefore I leaue the

the handling of this matter to you.

A R A M Discipline among souldiors is the cause that order is kept in all matters of war, which procureth in armies obedience and victorie.

A C H I T O B The vnbridled licence that is vsed now adaies among souldiors, breedeth such boldnes in them, that all warlike discipline is supplanted thereby. But let vs heare A S E A discourse of this matter.

It is not the weapon that maketh a warriour.
From whence
valure proceedeth.

Three things
necessarily required in men
of warre.
Good will commeth
from good institution.
Reuerence
from the wis-
dome and experience of Captaines.
Obedience is wrought in them by the diligence of Heads.

The vertue
of the Captaines is much in war.

The ancient order of the Romanes
army.

The Romans
diuided their army into three parts.

A S E R. If we appoint to euery one (saith Socrates in Plato) his seuerall art whereunto he is aptest by nature, and which he must vse all his life time, forsaking all other trades, to the end that obseruing oportunities, he may discharge it the better, there is no doubt but that in warlike discipline, which is a great deale more excellent than any other trade, greater leasure, greater cunning and practise is necessarily required. For if a man take a Target, or some other warlike weapon and instrument in his hand, hee is not by and by fit to fight, much lesse of sufficient courage to serue manfully, if he bee not long before prepared thereunto by sound reasons and resolutions. It is no worke of an houre, or of a day, to perswade men, that if they will get praise, they must settle themselves to sustaine all trauels, to assay all perils, and to hold this opinion constantly, that it is more to be desired to die fighting in a good and iust quarrell, than to escape with life by flying away. But that which breedeth and nourisheth such thoughts in mens hearts, is the good education and institution of youth in the discipline of vertue, and in the knowledge of Fortitude and Magnanimitie, which are inseparably followed of honour and immortall glory: whereby all feare of enemies is taken away, and watching traouelling, suffering obeying, well liked of, that they may bring to passe their noble enterprises. The assyrians, Persians, Grecians and Romanes, whose deedes of Armes are almost incredible, had alwaies in singular recommendation the maintenance of warlike discipline, but their chiefe desire was to imprint these three things in the hearts of their souldiors. Willingnes, Reuerence, and Obedience of which things the happy conduct of all war dependeth. They that were well brought vp and instructed in vertue, could not want good will to execute vertuous actions. Those Heads and leaders of armies that were wel chosen, and had wisdom and experience, did by their wonderfull vertue prouoke euery one to reuerence them. Moreouer, this Maxime of warre was diligently practised of the Heades: namely, to make their souldiors more deuout and obedient to their commandements, than affectioned to any other thing, how gainefull soeuer it were. At this day, as the former education and instruction is wanting, so the Heads and Captaines are insufficient. And from thence proceedeth the disorder and disobedience of men of warre, whereupon losse of the battle and destruction of the Armie followeth in steade of victorie. But that wee may begin to consider of this ancient warlike discipline, we will here onely weigh the order of the Roman armie and battles, who excelled all nations in feates of Armes: and then we wil looke into that great obedience & seuer rule of liuing, that was obserued amog the men of war. We shal not find in al the Roman Histories any battle of greater or more importace between the people of Rome, and any other nation, than that which they had with the Latines when Torquatus and Decius were Consuls. For as the Latines by loosing the battle were brought in to bondage, so should the Romanes haue beene, if they had not woone it. Titus Limius is of this opinion, who maketh both the armies in all respects alike, both for number, vertue, resolution and order, and putteth the difference onely in the vertue of the Captaines, which hee supposeth was greater on the Romans side, and so consequently cause of their victorie. The likenes and equalitie of these two hoasts proceeded of this, because they had long time followed and practised feates of armes together, vsing the same order, language, and weapons, and keeping the selfe same manner of ordering their battles, insomuch that both their orders and their Captaines had the same names. Now this was the order of the Roman armie: their whole hoast was diuided into three principall parts, whereof the first consisted of pikemen. the second of the chiefe Gentlemen and Lords, the third was called the rere ward, and euery part was chiefly compounded of foot men, being accompanied with a certaine number of horsemen. Their battles being ordered in this sort, they placed pike men in the forward, right behinde them were the noble men, and in the third place behinde they appointed their rere ward, which they called by the name of Triarii. They had also certaine troups of horsemen, both on the right and left side of euery part of their armie, whom they called wings, in respect of the place which they had, because they seemed to bee the winges of that body. They set the forward close together in the forefront, that it might both break in vpon the enemy, and sustaine the on set. The battle because it was not to fight first, but to suc-

cour

succour the foreward when it was either put to the woorst or driven backe, was not ioyned so close, but kept their ranks wider asunder, so that it might without disorder to it selfe receiue the foreward within it, if by any mishap or breach of aray, it should bee constrained to retire. The rereward had their ranks farther distant one fro another than the battell, that it might bee able to receiue within it both the foreward and the battell when neede required. Their battles then being thus ranged, they began the skirmish, and if their pike men were driven backe and vanquished, they retired into the distances, and voides spaces of the noblemen. Then both of them being knit together in one, made one bodie of two battles, and so began the fight againe. But if they both being ioyned together were put to the woorst, they gathered themselves together in the wide & large ranks that were left for them in the rereward of the Triarii. And then these three parts ioyned in one, renewed the fight, and so either lost or woone the battell, being vnable to repaire themselves againe. Therefore when the rereward entred into the conflict, the armie was in danger: whereupon arose that prouerbe, Res redacta est ad Triarios, which is as much to say in Englishe, as The matter is brought to the Rereward, and to the extremitie. Now the captaines of these our times, hauing forsaken all order of ancient discipline, make no account of this ordinance of warre although it bee well considered, it will bee found a matter of great importance. For hee that ordereth his host so that he may repaire himselfe thrice in one battell, must haue fortune his enemy three sundry times before he can loose it, and be vtterly ouerthrowne. Whereas hee that trusteth onely to the first encounter, as the most doat this day, offereth himselfe rashly vnto danger and losse. For one onely disorder, one small vertue may carie the victory from him. Now that which hindereth our armies from repairing themselves thrice, is the lacke of skill to gather one battell into another. Wee also appoint onely a foreward and a maine battell for the most part, and lay the hope and strength of the armie vpon the horsemen: whereas the auncient made most account of the footemen. So that if the horsemen receiuing the onset should haue the repulse, and their aray broken, the rest were easily to bee dealt withal: besides, that commonly the footmen are disordered by their owne horsemen, being compelled to retire. For this the Switzers, called by some masters of these late wars, when they purpose to fight, especially on the Frenchmens side, are very carefull to haue the horsemen on the one side, and not to follow next after them, to the end that being wide of them if by mishap they should be repulsed, yet they might not ouer-run and disorder them. And this hath bene oftentimes noted, that the Frenchmen according to the aduantage or discomfort of the first brunt giuen by their forward or battell, haue bin partakers of the like issue and euent afterward: so that if they were put the woorst in the first encounter, their enemy was in a manner assured of the victorie. This caused Titus Livius to write in many places, that Frenchmen in the beginning of a battell are more then men, but in the ende lesse than women. But that which causeth them to breake their order so quickly, may bee better knowne if we set down here 2. kinde of armies, the one where there is fury & order, as there was in the Romane armie, in which, according to the testimony of all histories, good order through continuance of time had planted such a warlike discipline, that nothing was done amongst them but by rule. They did neither eate nor sleepe, nor deale in any other warlike or priuate action, without the appointment of the Councell, or Heade of the army. So that all vertue being thus settled amongst them, they exercise their fury by meanes, and as time and occasion serued: neither could any difficulty arise, that could quaille their resolution well begun, or cause them to be discouraged, by reason of their good order which refreshed them and strengthened their courage, that was nourished with the hope of victory, which is neuer wanting as long as good orders are truly obserued. But in the other kinde of army, there fury beareth swaie, and not orders, as it falleth out often in the French armies, if victory doth not follow their first assaie. For their fury, wherein their hope consisted, is not succoured with settled vertue, neither haue they any other confidence but in their fury, so that as soone as they are somewhat cooled, and see neuer so little disorder and breach of aray, they are presently discomfited. Contrariwise, the Romanes being lesse afraide of perils, because of their good order, fought firmly and resolutely together without any distrust of the victorie, being as couragious & vertuous in the end as in the beginning: yea the harder they were charged with weapons, the more were they inflamed and set on fire. Moreover, concerning their warlike discipline, it may easily bee knowne by that speech which Titus Livius rehearseth of Papirius Cursor, who complained of the corruption that began to grow in their armie, for the which hee would haue punished Fabius Generall of the horsemen. No

The benefite of this Romane order.

The wisdom of the Switzers fighting on the Frenchmens side.

Frenchmen loosing the first encounter, loose also the victory

Some armies are furious, & yet keepe good order.

Good orders in armies is neuer without hope of victorie. In the French armies is fury without order

The ancient warlike discipline of the Romanes.

What maner
of campe the ancient Ro-manes had.
Of the ancient obedience
of souldiers
to their captaines.

Of the execution that was shewed vpon souldiers that offended.

The tithing of armies was most seuer.

How Cap-
taines were punished if they offeded.

Aurelius letter to a Tribune touching warlike
discipline.

The corruption of warlike discipline in these daies.

man (saith he) beareth any reuerence either to men, or to the gods. The Edicts of the capitaine, of the Caronell, and of the soothsaires are not obserued. The souldiers goe wandring vp and downe like vagabonds, both in countries that are at peace with vs, & also in our enemies lands: they discharge themselves at their pleasure, and forget their oath. The Ensignes are desolate, and not followed. Besides, they ioinc not together as they are commanded, nor consider whether it be by day or by night, whether in a place of aduantage, or of disadvantage. They fight without the Capitaines commandement: they keepe not their ranks and signes. Briefly, whereas war was wont to be solempne and sacred, it is disordered, inconsiderate and guided at all aduerture, after the manner of the euerie. But as long as warlike discipline tooke place among the ancient Romanes, their campe was a schoole of honour, of sobriety, of chastity, of iustice, & of al vertue, so that noman might reuenge his owne iniuries, or proceede of him selfe peremptorily. They knew not what it was to liue at discretion, much lesse to go a foraging, to rob, steale, beate, or murder, as men do now adaies. And as touching obedience towards their capitaines, it was very wonderfull. For they feared not to preferre it before the safety of their owne liues, and before all victory. At the battell of Cannas the Romane knights seeing the Consul alight and certaine others with him because he was hurt, & thinking that he had commanded them all to do so, they presently left their horses, which was the cause of their ouerthrow. And this did Hannibal then declare with a loud voice, saying: I would not desire rather to haue them deliuered to me bound, than as they be. The executions that were shewed vpon the disobedient and offenders were full of rigour, and the quality of their punishments maruelous strange. For the Heads of armies sometime sticked not to cause a whole legion to passe through the dikes, (which consisted of 6000. footmen, & 500. horsemen) for some notable fault committed by them. But among all their terrible executions, the tithing of armies was most seuer, when every tenth man throughout a whole host was by lot put to death. Now kinde of punishment could be found that was more fearefull for the correcting of a multitude than this which they practised especially when the chiefe author, and they that were the procurers of some notorious fact, were not knowne. For then had it bin too much to haue chastised the whole company: and if some had bene corrected, and others left vnpunished, innocents preadventure should haue suffered, and the guilty escaped scot free. Whereas by tithing, they that were punished, could not complaine but of the lot: and the rest were kept in feare, least the like faults should fall out againe amongst them. Whereupon they obserued one another, that as many as did not their duty might be knowne and chastised. The Capitaines and Heads of armies were no lesse rigorously handled by them that had the soueraignty of the Estate, if they did capitulate, or make any agreement with the enemies, to the detriment and disadvantage of the Commonwealth. For they sent them backe againe naked, and not the Heads onely, but also all that had any charge in the armie, and consented to the composition that the enemies might returne vpon their heads all the sin of breaking that oath which they had taken, and that appointment which they had sworn to. The Emperor Aurelius laboured earnestly to bring in againe the ancient discipline of war, and to cause it to be strictly obserued: whereof his letter is a sufficient testimony, being written by him to a Tribune of warre, in these words. If thou wilt bee a Tribune, or rather if thou wilt liue, restraine the souldiers hands, that none steale another mans henne or touch his sheepe. Let no man take a grape, or spoile and treade downe the corne. Let no man exact of his Oast oyle, salt, or wood, but let euery one be content with his allowance. Let them enrich themselves with the pray of their enemies, and not with the teares of our subiects. Let their armour bee glazed and cleane: their hose and shooes good and strong. Let new apparell, drine away the olde and let them keep their wages in their purse, and not spend it in tanerns. Let them lay aside bracelets & rings. Let euery one dresse his owne horse, and one helpe another. Let the Phisitions and Chirurgions looke to them with out mony, & let soothsayers haue nothing giuen them. Let them liue chastly in their Oasts houses: and let such as are mutinous and giuen to quarrelling, be punished and corrected. Let them trench their camp euery day as if they were nere their enemy. Behold surely an excellent forme of warlike discipline expressly in few words, which is so farre from our bebauiour, that the people in these daies would thinke they were fauourably dealt withall, if the souldiers tooke no more from them, but that which this Emperor forbiddeth his to take vpon paine of life. And truly the vnmeasurable licence that is granted them, causeth the souldiers to enter into the field onely to spoile and robbe, and to etchue the fight. And in stead of helping one another, and taking care euery one of his owne horse, there is not a souldier so beggerlike, but will haue his foure Lackeis, so that a thousand souldiers in these daies will bee more chargeable to the people, than twenty thousand that are well ordered would be. If a Romane souldier had committed adultery

adulterie with his Oasts wife, Aurelius caused him to be torne in sunder with two trees bow. Aurelius punished adulterie and theft committed by his souldiers, with death. True punishment of souldiers redresseth many disorders amongst them.

ed downe one against another. It was death also to take an egge. If hee went out of his ranke whilest the armie marched, he had the bastannado. Oftentimes for one simple fault a whole Legion was discharged and the captaine severely punished: and yet for all this rigour, the souldiers loued the Emperour as their father. He also gaue them their pay well and truly, and rewarded liberally such as did their duty. This is the way to redresse so many disorders and calamities as are seene in our armies, and to restore in some sort that warlike discipline which is abolished. For souldiers alledge this as an excuse for all their wicked deedes, that they are not paid, and many would not be paid, that so they might cloke their robberies. When the small tax, and since that the payment of fifty thousand footemen, was laide vpon the subiects, the king promised to imploy that money vpon no other vse, than vpon the payment of his men at war, as also to keepe that money apart from his ordinary receipts. But because this is not duly obserued, the people are doubly vexed: for they pay their money, & yet are polled on all sides. Notwithstanding all these ordinary charges, the poore peasants would thinke themselves happy if they were discharged by erecting of victualing tents for the men of war, as they haue bin forced to do of late years. Now what good issue can bee hoped for, when the souldiers through an vnbrideled licence, sacke, spoile, and burne the poore subiects? This hath alwaies bin seene, that houses, families, kingdomes and Empires, haue come to ruine and pouerty, because the poore were contemned, and the subiects giuen ouer to the robberies of souldiers. The immoderate licence of the Pretorian souldiers (who were to the Emperors as the Ianizaries are to the Turke) and of other men of warre, was no small helpe to ouerthrow the Romane Empire. For taking vpon them to elect Emperors at their pleasure, one was chosen in one armie and another else where, and presently murdered by those that had elected them. Their insolency also caused seditions and ciuill warres, whereupon those kingdomes & countries that were vnder the Romane obedience, reuolted. And it cometh to passe oftentimes, that their vnruely behauiour incenseth the people in such sort against them, that their destruction followeth. As it hapned to all the Frenchmen that were in the Ile of Sicilia, in the yeare 1281. vpon Easter day, at the first peale of Euen song, at what time they were all put to death by a secret conspiracy for their insolencies and whoordomes: whereupon this Prouerbe doth yet remaine among vs, The Sicilian Euen song. There is no corner of this kingdome where the people being halie mad through the iniuries received from the men of warre, haue not committed infinite and cruell massacres. We may not here forget to propound the wise and warlike discipline of Belizarins, lieutenant Generall to the Emperour Iustinian, who for valure and temperance was equall to the ancient Romanes (as histories testifie of him) which was the cause that he conquered all Italy possessed by the Barbarians. Not long since during the warre of Piemount (which was a very schoole of vertue, and of warlike knowledge) the peasant, husbandman, and artificer, were suffered quietly at the worke, the war continuing betweene warriors onely for the possession, and not the ruine of the countrey. And as the people were then glad to receiue amongst them such armies, so they despaire no lesse at this day, because all warlike discipline, all policy both diuine and humane, is in such sort extinguished, yea all kinde of humanitie and society which is to be seene amongst barbarous people; that it is lawfull for Frenchmen to sacke, spoile, and put to ranfome Frenchmen that are many times of the same side, faith and condition, and that without punishment. But let vs not looke for prosperity and good successe in our enterprises, before there be some other order and discipline obserued.

The end of the seuenteenth daies worke.

The eighteenth daies worke.

Of the Office and dutie of a Generall. Chap. 67.

A S E R. IHose men commonly prosper in their affaires that vnderstand them thoroughly, and manage them well and diligently: considering aduisedly what hath bene heretofore, that they may in some sort iudge of that which is to come, because all worldly things haue euermore some agreement with the ages past. Which cometh

Time and occasion are diligently to be weighed in all matters.

The good or ill successe of an army dependeth of the captaine

A captaine must not offend twise in warre.

Prudence gotten by vse must be hastened forward by knowledge

No man ought to be generall before he haue obtained the renowne of a valiant man.

Cimon preferred an army of Harts before an army of Lions. What Captaines are worthiest of their charge. Coruinius oration to his soldiers.

meth of this, that beeing the workes of men, they haue had, and will alwaies haue like formes, and therefore must of necessity haue like effects. But the cause of the good or euill successe of men (in respect of mans nature) consisteth in this, that the meanes and manner of proceeding iumpe with the time, wherein the very condition thereof, and the occasion offered, is diligently to be obserued. And if this consideration taketh place in all priuate affaires, it is much more necessary in warre, wherein a light fault oftentimes procureth losse and ouerthrow to a whole armie, whose good or ill happe dependeth of the Heade and leader thereof, according as hee is either woorthy or vnwoorthy of his charge. My opinion therefore is (my Companion) that we alledge in this place what soeuer we know belongeth to his duty and office. I propound now the discourse of this matter to you.

A M A N A. Men disdain commonly to obey such as know not how to command well. Therefore every Generall of an army ought to labor carefully, that men may behold & see a certaine greatnes, magnanimity and constancy in all his dooings.

A R A M A. Generall must be had in estimation of his souldiers, and of that reputation, that they may giue credit to his prudence: otherwise an army doth quickly become rebellious, and troublesome to be guided. But let vs learne more amplie of ACHITOB whatsoeuer concerneth this matter.

ACHITOB. Lamachus a great Athenian Captaine saide, that no man must offend twise in warre, because the faults are of so great weight, that for the most part they bring with them the ouerthrow of the state, or losse of life to those that committe them, and therefore that it was a hard and dangerous matter to haue experience thereof. So that prudence gotten by vse ought to be hastened forward, because it is dearly bought and so long a coming that oftentimes death preuenteth it. It must be hastened forward by the diligent enquiry of those things that haue fallen out both before and since our time, that wee may become wise by other mens perils. For this cause it is very necessary, that whosoever taketh vpon him the honour of guiding an army should exercise his mind as much as in science, and in the knowledge of Histories, as he doth his body in all martiall actes, that so hee may diligently obserue the deeds of famous personages, see how they gouerned themselves in warres, and examine the causes of their victory, thereby to flie the one and to follow the other. And because it is against reason, that a well armed man should obey him that is vnarmed, or that they should take the rudder out of the Pilots hand to save the ship in a storme, that haue no skil in seafaring matters: it is very requisite that whosoever vndertaketh to commaund an army, should first haue gotten a good report of all men for his valure and greatnes of courage wher by his authority will be reuerenced, as beeing bestowed vpon one that is woorthy of it: forasmuch as titles of dignity do not honour men, but men are an ornament to titles. Now if souldiers haue conceived a good opinion of the desert and valure of their Captaine, it will be a sharpe spurre to prickethem forward in well dooing, and cause them to honour and to loue his commandements. For true zeale of vertue, that is to say, the desire to imitate it, is not imprinted in mens hearts, but through a singular good will and reuerence towards that partie that worketh the impression. It was not then without good cause, that the Auncients greatly esteemed the dignity of a Generall, beeing ioyned with prowesse, knowledge & experience: seeing the happy or vnhappy euent of warre ordinarily depend thereof (next to the chiefe cause proceeding from God) as wee shewed yesterday what Titus Linius wrote of the battle betweene the Romanes and the Latines. For this reason Cimon a great man of Athens saide, that hee had rather haue an armie of Harts guided by a Lyon, than an armie of Lyons hauing a Hart to their Captaine. Now if wee desire to vnderstand in few words what manner of men are most woorthy of such charges, wee may learne it by the answer that one of the wisest Interpreters made to Ptolemy concerning this matter: They (saide hee) that excele in prowesse and iustice, preferre the safety of mens liues before victory. But to discourse more particularly of the duty and office of the head of an army, Valerius Coruinius Generall of the Romanes against the Samnites, to whom he was ready to giue battle, encouraged his souldiours to doe well in few words, and taught euery one how he should proceed to obtaine the place and degree of a Captaine. A man must consider well (quoth he vnto them) under whose conducti- on he entreteth into battle, whether vnder one that can cause himselfe to be heard as if he were some goodly Orator, that hath a braue tongue, but otherwise is a Novice and unskilfull in all points of war, or vnder such a one as hath skill himselfe to handle his weapon, to march first before the ensignes, and to doe his duty in the hottest of his fight. I would not souldiours, that yee should follow my wordes, but my deedes

I set before you an example ioyned with the instruction and discipline as bee that hath gotten three Consulships with his arme not without exceeding praise. Hereby wee learne, that the auncient Captaines and heades of armies had this laudable custome to make Orations to their men of warre thereby to make them more couragious, as appeareth in all histories both Greeke and Latine. This fashion is now lost together with the rest of warlike discipline: at least wise there is no account made of it in Fraunce, whereupon it commeth to passe, that many great men are but badly followed and serued in warre. For as hee that standeth in neede of the faithfull seruice of men ought to win them rather by gentlenes & good turns, than by authority & rigor: so he that would haue prompt & resolute soldiours for war, that he may vse their seruice in time of need, must make much of them, and allare them to his obedience by liberality, and by good and gracious speeches. For in troth they must be good friendes and affectionate seruitors vnto a man, that setting all excuses aside (of which there is neuer any want) are to fight for him: they must neither bee enuious at his prosperity, nor traiterous in his aduersity. And there is no doubt but that in a matter of great importance, the graue exhortations of a Generall, grounded vpon good reasons and examples, greatly encourage and hartten a whole armie, in somuch that it will make them as hardie as Lyons that before were as fearefull as sheepe. Moreover, if he that is esteemed and iudged to be valiant and noble minded, sheweth foorth effects answerable thereunto, he doubleth the courage and strength of his army: as contrariwise, the least shew of cowardlines, discouragement or astonishment shewed by him, draweth after it the vtter ruine of his souldiours. But to returne to the duty and office of a good Captaine of an army, as the best worke that a man can doe, is first to bee honest and vertuous: and then to take order that himselfe and his family may haue abundantly all things necessary for this life: so euery wise and well aduised leader of men of warre, must dispose and prepare himselfe to the same end, and foresee that nothing be wanting vnto them, neither munitions of warre nor victuals. Hee must not thinke to make new prouision when necessity vrgeth him, but euen then when he is best furnished, hee must bee carefull for the time to come. Whereby taking all occasion of complaining from the souldiours, he shall be better beloued and obeyed, and more feared and redoubted of his enemies. To this purpose Cyrus saide to his chiefe men of war: My friendes, I reioyce greatly that you and your men are contented that ye haue abundance of all things, and that wee haue wherewith to doe good to euery one according to his vertue. Notwithstanding we must consider what were the principall causes of these good things, and if ye looke narrowly ye shall find, that watching, trauel, continuance in labor, and diligence haue giuen vs these riches. Therefore ye must shew your selues vertuous also hereafter, holding this for certaine, that ye shall obtaine great store of riches and contentation of mind by obedience, constancy, vertue, sustaining of trauel, and by courage in vertuous and perillous enterprises. Moreover, a good captaine of an army must be very carefull that hee neuer suffer his hoast to be idle: but cause his souldiours either to annoy the enemy, or to do themselves good. It is a burthen something to nourish an idle body, much more a whole family, but especially an army, and not to keepe them occupied. His meaning that warreth of necessity, or through ambition, is to gette or keepe that which is gotten, and to proceed in such sort, that he may enrich, and not impoverish his countrey. Therefore both for conquering, and for the maintenance and preservation of that which is his owne already, hee must necessarily beware of vnprofitable expences and doe all things for common commoditie. So that whosoeuer would thoroughly put in practise these two points, he had neede to follow that custome, which the auncient Romans vsed, namely, at the beginning to make them short and terrible, as wee vse to say. For entering into the felde with great power and strength, they dispatched their warre speedily within few daies: in somuch that all their iournies made against their Latines, Samnits, and Tuscans were ended, some in six, other in ten, and the longest in twenty daies. And although afterward they were constrained to keepe the fieldes a longer time, by reason of the distance of places and countries, yet they did not therefore giue over the following of their first purpose, but ended as soone as they could, their enterprises of warre by quicke battles, according as place and time suffered. True it is, that a prudent captaine must beskilfull to take the enemy at aduantage: but if it bee so that he cannot, the better and more venturous man he thinks himselfe & those that follow him to be, so much the more paines is required of him for his owne & their preservation, as men vse to keepe safely those things which they account deere, & to lay them vp in a sure place. The dignity of a Head of an army, is in truth greatly to bee accounted of, especially when it is ioyned with prowesse and experience, the chiefe point whereof is to saue him that must saue all the rest. Therefore Timotheus and Athenian Captaine, and luring A dion flum Captains vsed

in old time to make orations
to their soldiers.

Captaines
ought to make much of their soldiers.

The benefit of making orati-ons to soldiers.

A good cap-
taine must be alwaies furnished with munitions and victuals.

Cyrus Oration to his cap-
taines.

A good cap-
taine must neuer suffer his army to be idle.

War ought to be speedily
ended.

A good captain must not be over ven-turous.

A general
must not rashly hazard
himselfe.

When he ought to venture himselfe.

Antonius preferred the life
of one citizen
before the death of a thousand enemies.

Scipio would
haue al waies
tried before the sword were used in warre.

When Augustus would haue battle
giuen.

Narſes alwaies wept the night before he gaue battle

Two faults to be eschued of euery captain.

A good generall must al-
waies feare
the worst.

I had not thought it, a dangerous
speech in a captaine.

A good cap-
taine must haue skill to discerne the situation of places.

The benefite
of Geometrie
in a Generall.
Philopame-
nus in time of peace studied the discipline
of warre.

Chares also another captaine shewed one day openly vnto the Athenians, the skers of many wounds which he had receiued in his body, and his shield also that was spoiled and thrust through with many pushes of a pike: but now (quoth he) I am of another minde. For when I besieged the city of Samos, I was very much ashamed that an arrow shot from the walles fell hard by me, beeing then two venturous a yong man, and hazarding my selfe more rashly than became the Head of so great an army. And yet when it greatly profiteth the whole enterprise, and is a matter of no small importance, that the Generall of the army should put his life in danger, then he must yeeld, and imploy his person, not sparing himselfe, nor giuing place to their words who say, that a good and wise Captaine ought to die of age, or at least to be old. But where small benefite ariseth if he prosper well, and contrariwise, an vniuersall losse and generall hurt to all, if any thing but well betide him, no wise man will require it, or be of the opinion, that he should venture himselfe as a common souldiour doth, whereby he being the Generall should be in danger of destruction. And yet in the meane while he must not be lesse carefull ouer the safety of those valiant men that follow him, or thrust them into danger but very warily, remembring the saying of that good Emperour Antonius, That he had rather saue one citizen, than put a thousand enemies to death. The answer of Scipio was very like it, when he was earnestly requested by the souldiours at the siege of Numantia to giue an assault. I had rather (quoth he) haue the life of one Romane, than the death of all the Numantines. He vsed also to say, that all things ought to bee assailed in warre before the sword be taken in hand. And indeed there is no greater victorie than that which is gotten without shedding of blood. Sylla, Tyberius, Caligula and Nero had no skill, but to command and to kill: but that good Augustus, Titus, and Traian, were alwaies ready to sollicite, to request, and to agree by forgiving. Augustus also said, that although a prince were mightie, yet if he were wise, he would neuer giue battell vnlesse there were more apparant profit in the victory, than losse if the enemy should ouercome. And indeed he neuer gaue battell but vpon necessity. We reade of that great captaine Narſes, who subdued the Goths, vanquished the Bactrians, and ouercame the Germanes, that hee neuer gaue his enemies battell, but hee wept in the Temple the night before. Theodosius the Emperour suffered not his men to assault any towne, nor to lay siege vnto it before ten daies were past, causing this proclamation to be made vnto them, that he granted these ten daies to the end they might accept and tast of his clemency before they had experience of his power. It is a common saying, that it is not enough for a Captaine to know how to leade his men well to the fight, vnlesse he fore-see also the meanes to retire and to saue them in time of neede. And it is no lesse fault in a Captaine to fall into an inconuenience vnlooked for, than through too much mistrust to let slip an occasion of doing some great exploit when it is offered. For want of experience breedeth rashnesse in the one, and taketh away boldnesse from the other. Neither must a good Captaine onely vse present occasion well, but he must also iudge wisely of that which is to come, distrustling alwaies the doubtfull issue of all enterprises of warre. For this cause the ancient Generals of armies, both Greekes and Latines neuer marched but in armour, nor incamped, although they were farre from their enemies, but they closed their campe round about with a trench. And when Leonidas was demanded the reason hereof, he answered, Because as the sea hath his sands, gulfes, and rockes, so hath warre his, among which none is more perillous and hurtfull than this of, I had not thought it. Among other things necessary in a captaine, the knowledge of nature, and of the situation of places is very requisite: which is to know how the mountaines are lift vp, how the vallies hang, how the champions fields are couched together, and to know the nature and course of riuers, & the breadth of marishes. This is profitable in two respects. First a man learneth thereby to know his owne country, and so to be more skilfull to defend it. Secondly, hauing by that meanes had good practise of the seate of that countrey, he may easily conceiue the situation of another place, of which sometime he must necessarily consider. So that if a Generall be wanting herein, he is destitute of the chiefe vertue which a good captaine ought to haue. For it is that which teacheth him to finde out the enemy, to incampe himselfe, to guide an host, to set his men in aray for the battell, and to take the aduantage at the siege of a towne. Among other great praises that authors giue to Philopameus prince of the Acheans, they forget not this, that in time of peace he studied diligently how he might war more skilfully. And when he was in the fields with his friends, he would stand still many times and conferre with them, vling such like speeches: If the enemy were in this mountaine, and wee here with our campe, who shall haue the aduantage, and how might wee seeke him out, marching on in battell? If we would retire, how should we doe? If they retired, how should we follow follow them? Thus in the way he set before them all the chances that might happen to a camp then he would heare their opinions, and after set downe his owne, confirming it with reasons. This he did so well, that by reason of these continuall disputations and cogitations, no hinderance could befall him whē he guided an armie, which he could not redresse. Xenophon sheweth in Cyrus his life, that being ready to set forward in that voiage which he vndertook against the king of Armenia, he said familiarly to his men, that this iourney was but one of those huntings which they had so often practised with him. Hee willed those whom hee sent to lie in ambush vpon the mountaines, to remēber when & how they went to pitch their nets vpon the smal hils: and to those that went to begin the skirmish, he said, that they resembled such as went to rouse a beast out of his den, to driue him to their nettes. This noble prince shee'd well that his exercise of hunting was not vnprofitable vnto him (as indeede it is a true patterne of warre) but that it did helpe him greatly to iudge of the nature and seate of those places which hee frequented in his countries. And because all lands are like in some things, the perfect knowledge of one country (which often vse of hunting bringeth) may helpe one to iudge well of another, Publius Decius Tribune of the soldiers in the armie which Cornelius the Consul led against the Samnites, beholding the Roman hoast brought into a vally where they might easily be inclosed of the enemies, went to the Consul, and said, Doe you marke, O Cornelius, the top of this mountaine aboue our enemy? It is the fortresse of our hope and safety if we make halt to take it, seeing the blinde Samnites haue forsaken it. Wee see then how profitable, yea how necessary it is for a Captaine to know the being and nature of countries, which helpeth a man much in that principall point touched before by me, namely, to compell our enemies to fight when he perceiueth that he is the stronger, & hath the aduantage of them: and if he be the weaker, to keepe himselfe from such places where he may be compelled thereunto. This is that wherby Cains Marius, who was six times Consul, got the renoune to be one of the greatest captaines in his time. For although he were generall of many armies, and fought three great battles, yet he was so warie in all his enterprises, that he neuer gaue his enemies occasion to set vpon him, and to force him to fight. And that was a notable answer which he made to the Generall of his enemies, who willed him to come out of his campe to battell, if hee were such a great captaine as men reported him to be. Not so (quoth he,) but if thou art the great captaine, compell mee to it whether I will or no. This is one thing also wherein the Head of an armie must be very vigilant, that all secrecies be closely kept among the captains of his hoast. For great affaires neuer haue good successe when they are discovered before they take effect. To this purpose Suetonius saith, that no man euer heard Iulius Caesar say, To morrow we will doe that, and to day this thing: but wee will do this now, and as for to morrow we wil consider what is then to be done. And Plutarke saith in his treatise of Policie, that Lucius Metellus being demanded by a Captaine of his when hee would giue battle, said, If I were sure that my shirt knew the least thought in my hart, I would present lie burne it, and neuer weare any other. Therefore affaires of war may be handled and debated of by many, but the resolution of them must be done secretly, and knowen of few men: otherwise, they would be sooner disclosed and published than concluded. Notwithstanding it is very necessary, that the Generall should oftentimes call a councell, so that it be of expert and auncient men, and of such as are prudent and voide of rashnesse. But in all cares of necessity a man must not stand long in seeking for reason, but suddenly set vpon them. For many times sundry captaines haue vndone themselves in wars vpon no other occasion, but because they lingred in taking counsel, when they should without losse of time haue wrought some notable enterprise. Moreouer, for the instruction and pattern of the duty and office of a good head and captaine of an army, we can alledge none more worthy to be imitated than Cato of Vtica, a Consul of Rome, who had the guiding of a legion when he first took charge vpon him. For from that time forward he thought, that it was not royall or magnificall to be vertuous alone, being but one body: and therefore hee studied to make all that were vnder his charge like himselfe. Which that he might bring to passe, he took not from them the feare of his authority, but added reason thereunto, shewing and teaching them their dutie in euery point, and alwaies ioining to his exhortations reward, for those that did well, and punishment for such as did euil. So that it was hard to say, whether he had made them more apt for peace or for war, more valiant or more iust, because they were so stout and eager against their enemies and so gentle and gracious to their friends, so feareful to do euill, and so readie to obtaine honour. The vertue of Pompey is also worthy to be followed, of euery great captaine, for the temperance that was in him, for his skill in arms, eloquence in speech,

Cyrus resembleth his going to war to hunting.

Hunting is an image of war.

P. Decius.

C. Marius neuer gaue his enemies occasion to force him to fight.

The captaine of an armie must be very secret.

I. Caesar very secret in time of warre. L. Metellus. Affaires of war must be debated by many, but concluded by few. Urgent occasions in war require short deliberation.

Cato a notable patterne for all captaine to follow.

Pompey.

How Cato
diuided the spoile.

fidelity in word, as also because he was to be spoken with, and so lovingly entertained every one. And if with these things the example of the same Cato be followed in his prudent liberality, and diuision of the spoiles and riches of the enemies, that captaine that so behaueth himselfe shall deserue eternall praise, and please all those that follow him. For when this vertuous captaine had taken many townes in Spaine, he neuer referued more for himselfe than what hee did eate and drinke there. He deliuered to every one of his souldiers a pound weight of siluer, saying, that it was better that many should returne to their houses from the warre with siluer, than a few with gold: and as for the captaines hee said, that during their charges and governments they should not grow and increase in any thing but in honor and glory. For the conclusion therefore of our speech, we note, that a Generall of an armie desirous to be obeyed (which is necessary) must behaue himselfe so, that his souldiers may thinke him worthy to prouide and care for their necessary affaires. Which thing will come to passe, when they see that he is couragious and carefull, that he keepeth his place and the maiestie of his degree well, that he punisheth offenders, and laboreth not his men in vaine, but is liberal, and performeth his promises made vnto them.

Of the choise of Souldiors, of the manner how to exhort them to fight, and how victorie is to be vsed. Chap. 70.

One godly man in a campe is in place of many.

Souldiors
ought to begin their war
with praier,
and end with praise and thank-giuing

Why a man must vse his owne subiects
in warre.

Three causes
from whence
proceeded the ruine of the Romane Empire.

ACHILLES T O B. A Gamemmon generall Captaine of the Grecians before Troy, speaking of Achilles, and being grieved because herefused to succour them, hauing beene offended by him, said, That a man beloued of God is in the place of many men in a campe, and farre better than a whole company that is unruly, and cannot be governed but with great paine and care. This reason was the cause that good men here-tofore were greatly honoured in warre, and much sought after by great captaines, because they were very religious, and vnderooke nothing before they had praied to their gods, and offered sacrifices after the maner of their country. Also after they had done some great exploit, they were not slothfull to giue them thanks, by offerings and hymnes sung to their praise. But all these good considerations haue no more place amongst vs, than the rest of their warlike discipline, principally in that no regard is had what manner of men are to be vsed in seruice, but onely how a great number may be had. And many times he that is knowne to be a bold murderer, and giuen ouer to all wickednes, shall be preferred to an office before an honest man: and which is more, we despise our owne country-men, whom the welfare of our countrie concerneth as well as our selues, and rather trust strangers & hirelings, who seeke nothing but destruction, so that we our selues also bewaile, but too late, the mischiefes that haue light vpon vs. For this cause I propound vnto you (my Companions) to discourse vpon, the election and choise which is to be considered of, in taking such men of war to whom a man may safely commit himselfe: and if you thinke good, you may speake somewhat also of the manner of exhortation to fight vsed by the Ancients, because I touched it by the way in my former discourse: and lastly how victory ought to be vsed, which commonly followeth good order and discipline of warre, whereof we haue hitherto discoursed.

ASER. Forasmuch as the chiefe force of an armie consisteth in the sincere and constant good will of the souldiers toward him for whom they fight, it is not to be sought for elsewhere than in his owne natural Subiects, to whom prosperity and good successe is common with the Prince,

A MANA. My friends (quoth Cyrus to his men of warre) I haue chosen you, not because I haue had prooffe heretofore of your manhood, but because from my young yeares I haue knowne you ready to do those things, which we in this Country account honest, and to eschue all dishonesty. This cannot be truly said of strangers neuer scene before, who come out of their Country to enrich themselves with the ouerthrow of their neighbours. But it belongeth to thee ARAM to handle this matter heere propounded vnto vs.

ARAM. If we consider diligently of the causes, from whence came the ruine of the Romane Empire, we shall finde, that those meanes which the wisest Emperors inuented for the safety and preservation thereof, turned in the end to the destruction of it. First, the ordinary armies placed by Augustus neare to Rome, and in the borders of his estate, ouerthrew many of his successors, and euen the Empire it selfe, which they would sometimes set to sale, and deliuer vp vnto him that gaue most for it. Next, the translation of the Empire which

Constantine

Constantine the great made from Rome to Bizantium, afterward called by his name Constantinople, thereby to make it more sure against the Persians and other people of Asia, greatly hastened forward the overthrow of the same. For when hee carried thither the chiefe strength and wealth of Rome, and diuided the Empire into the East and West, he weakened it very much, so that the West was first destroyed, and then the East, which if they had continued vnited and knit together, might for a long time, and in a manner for ever, haue resisted all inuasions. Thirdly, when the Emperours thought to strengthen themselves with strange hired, and forren power, called to their succour, as namely, the Gothes, thereby weakening their owne forces and naturall strength of the Empire, they put ere they were aware, Rome and Italy, and consequently the other Provinces, into the hands of the Barbarians. Yea we finde, that the greatest calamities that euer happened to Common wealths diuided was when the Citizens were seuered among themselves, and called in strangers to helpe the who vsing often to go that way, at the least made themselves masters ouer them. The Germanes called by the Sequani to their succour against those of Antun: compelled them to deliuer halfe their land vnto them: and at length they droue awaie all the naturall people of the countrey, and became Lords of the greatest part of the Gaules territorie. But not to goe so farre off, it is high time for vs to grow wise by our owne perill. The factions of the houses of Orleans and of Burgundie, called in the Englishmen into Fraunce, who by this meane set such footing therein, that they possessed a great part thereof a long time after. What lacked in our time why the French men blinded and carried away with partialities (and God graunt they may throughly know it) did not bring their countrey to that extremitie of miseries, as to submit it to the seruice and slavery of a strange yoke, vnder the colour of begging helpe at their hands? What letteth why there was not plaied among vs, of vs, and by vs, the cruellest and most sorrowfull tragedie that euer was, when men came hither from all quarters to behold the sight? Would not a man haue thought, that both great and small had wittingly purposed to overthrow the goodliest & most noble kingdome of the world, and themselves withall, and so in the ende haue shamefully lost the glory & renowne, which their ancestors had woorthily gotten for them? Now if any good happe hath turned this tempest from vs against our wils, at the least let vs call to minde the danger wherein we had willingly cast ourselves, and let vs not forget the admonition that was giuen vs by those barbarous fellows, whose Captaines and Counsellours asked vs why we called them in, when a little before their departure out of this kingdome, they were complained vnto for the extortions and cruelties which their men practised. What think you (said they) is the intent and purpose of our men in following vs, but to enrich themselves with your overthrow? Agree among your selues and neuer call vs more, except ye minde to tast of that which shall be worse. But let vs enter into the particular consideration of the perill and hurt that commeth by forren and mercenary souldiors that we may know whom wee ought rather to vse. The armes wherewith a Prince defendeth his countrey, are either his owne, or hired of strangers, or sent to his succour by some Prince his friend, or else mingled of both together. They that maintaine, that it is necessary for the prosperity and preseruacion of euery happy Common wealth, not to vse forren helpe, say, that hired force and succour of strangers is woorth nothing, but rather dangerous, and that if a Prince thinke to ground the assurance of his Estate vpon forren force, hee cannot safely doe it. For they agree not easily together, they doe all for profit, and will bee neither well ordered nor obedient. On the other side, they are not ouer faithfull, they are all in their brauery among friends, but hartlesse among enemies. They neither feare God, nor are faithfull to men. The reason thereof is this, because no loue, nor any other occasion holdeth them but pay, and hope of spoile. Which is no sufficient cause to moue them to die willingly in his seruice, whose subiects they are not, and whose ruine they desire, rather than his increase. The last destruction of Italy came by no other thing, than because it trusted a long time to forren & hired forces, which brought something to passe for some men, but as soon as another stranger came, they shewed what they were. Hereupon it came, that king Charly the eight easily ouer ranne all Italy with chalke, as wee vse to speake, that is to say, that without resistance hee sent before to take vp his lodging, because they that should haue withstood him, and were called in to keepe the countrey, did of their owne accord take his part. But there is a further matter. Strange hired Captaines either are excellent men, or haue nothing in them. If they be valiant, the Prince is not to trust them. For out of doubt they will seeke to make themselves great, either by his overthrow that is their master, or by destroying others against his will. And if the Captaines haue no valure in them, hee

The diuision
of the Empire weakened the same.

Dangerous to an Estate to call in forrain
succors.

As appeareth
by the Sequani.

By the french
men.

The end that forraigne soldi ers propound
to themselves

Reasons why
forraigne force is woorth no thing.

The cause of the last destru ction of Italy

The discom
modity of bringing in hired captaines

Dangerous
for a Prince to call in a Potentate to succour him.

Examples of the change of Estates by means of forren succour

Charles the fift, bound by oath not to bring any forren souldiers
into Germanie.

Charles 7.
made decrees
for French
souldiers.

What inconueniences France is fallen into by hiring Swit-
zers.
Francis the first established 7. legions of footmen.

cannot hope for any thing but for the cause of his owne perdition. Succour is most hurtfull to an Estate, when some Potentate is called in with his forces for aide and defence. Those souldiers may well bee good and profitable for themselves, but are alwaies hurtfull to such as call them. For if a man loose the field, he is ouerthrowne: if he winne it, he is their prisoner. Such succour is a great deale more to be feared, than hired strength, which obeyeth the Prince that calleth them, and requireth their helpe. But when a man receiueth in an armie vnited, and accustomed to obey the Captaine that conducteth and bringeth them in, his destruction is already prepared, and cannot be auoided, who openeth the doore of his owne house to let, in an enemy stronger than himselfe. Therefore it were expedient for euery Prince to trie all waies before he haue recourse to such men for helpe and succour. And who-soeuer shall reade and consider well the times that are past, and run ouer the present state of things, he shall see, that whereas one prospered well, an infinite number were deceiued and abused. For a Commowwealth, or an ambitious Prince, could not wish to haue a better occasion whereby to get the possession of a City, Seignory, or Prouince, than when hee is required to send his army to defend it. But what? The ambition, desire of reuenge, or some other affection of men is so great, that to accomplish once their present will, they forget all duty, and cast behinde them the care of all danger and inconuenience whatsoever, that may light vpon them. The Herules, Gothes, and Lumbards by these meanes became Lords of Italy: the Frenchmen of the Gaules countrie, the Englishmen of great Britaine, the Scots of Scotland after they had driven out the Britons, and Picts, who called them in for succour. The Turkes made themselves Lords of the East Empire, and of the kingdome of Hungarie, beeing likewise required of helpe by the Emperors of Constantinople, and by the States of Hungarie. Not long since Carradin a Pirate, beeing called by the inhabitants of Alger to driue the Spaniards out of the fortresse, after he had vanquished them, he slue Selim Prince of the towne, and made himselfe king, leauing the estate to his brother Arradin Barberossa. And Saladine a Tartarian Captaine, beeing called by the Calipha and Inhabitants of Caire to driue the Christians out of Soria, after the victorie slue the Calipha, and became absolute Lord thereof. The foresight which the Princes of Germanie had of the perill and hurt that all strangers bring to an estate, caused them to binde the Emperour Charles the fift, by the twelfth article of conditions, vnto which he sware before hee received the Imperiall crowne, that he should not bring in any forren souldiers into Germanie. And yet thorough the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Flemings that came into the country, being called in against the Protestants, there wanted little of changing the estate of Almain into an hereditary kingdome. Which had beene soone done if king Henry the second had not staid it by his French power: for which cause hee was called by bookes published, and arches erected in their countrie, Protector of the Empire, and deliuerer of the Princes; who since haue concluded among themselves, that they will neuer choose a forren Prince. Charles the seuenth king of France, hauing by his great good successe and vertue, deliuered France of Englishmen, and knowing well that it was necessary for him to bee furnished with his owne forces, instituted the decrees of horsemen, and of the companies of footemen. After that, king Lewes his sonne abolished his footemen, and began to leuy Switzers: which being likewise practised by other kings his successors, many men haue noted, that by countenancing the Switzers, they haue caused their owne forces to degenerate and grow out of vse, disannulled the footemen, and tied their horsemen to other footmen: insomuch that since they haue beene vsed to fight in company of the Switzers, they thinke that they cannot obtaine the victory, nor yet fight without them. Therefore the prudence of king Francis the first, must needs be honoured with exceeding great praise, in that he established seven legions of footmen, accounting 6000. men to a legion: so that there could be no better deuice for the maintenance of warlike discipline, nor more necessarie for the preservation of this kingdome, if those good ordinances that were made to this end be well marked. Neuerthelesse they were abolished in his raigne, established againe by Henry the second his successor, and after that abrogated. I am of opinion that if these ancient institutions both of horsemen and footmen were reuiued, they would be a good meane, whereby we might alwaies haue men of warre to defend this kingdome, to conquer that which is taken from it, and to helpe our friends: whereas now wee are faine to vse the seruice of vnskilfull men that are made captaines before euer they were soldiors, or else of necessity compelled to beg and to buy very deere the succour of forren nations. My meaning is not that a Prince should neuer vse the helpe of others, but alwaies take his owne forces collected among his subiects: Nay I say to

to the contrary, that it must needs be profitable for him to vse the succors of his Alies, so that they be ioynd with him in league offensive & defensive. For by this means, he doth not only make himself stronger, but withal taketh away both that aid from his enemy, which he might otherwise have drawne from thence, and occasion also from al men to make war with the one, except they will haue the other also their enemy. But aboue all things, let no Prince trust so much to the succour of his alies, except himself with his subiects be of greater strength. And if alies are to be feared when they are stronger in another countrey, what assurance may a man haue of forren souldiers, that are at no league either offensive or defensive with vs? Now if vpon the due consideration of these things, souldiers be carefully trained vp in good discipline of war, which may be collected out of many institutions that are extant, and if the guiding of them be giuen to good, vertuous, and expert Captaines, led onely with a desire to do their duty to their King and countrey, this kingdome will be feared of strangers, and without feare it selfe of their assaults and enterprises. Especially if in the Prince his absence, the soueraigne authority of commanding absolutely in the army, be committed into the hands of a captaine woorthy his charge, as we haue discoursed, who is able to win the hearts of men, and to prouoke them to their duty by liuely and learned reasons: as namely, That all men must die, and therefore that it were two great follie in a man to refuse to die for publike profit, which bringeth vnto vs immortall glory, seeing that he must once of necessity yeeld up his life: that a glorious death is alway to be preferred before a shamefull life stained with reproch: briefly, if he can ground his exhortations vpon the occasion of taking armes, of time, place, estate and condition of the enemies, and of the good that will come to them, if they obtaine victory. But in all these things the iustice and equity of the cause of war, is that which most of all maketh good men couragious, who otherwise neuer ought to fight. We may reade a million of goodly orations made in the time of war, & set forth in one volume, with which euery wise and prudent Captaine may helpe himselfe according as occasion is offered. Now, if that ancient order and discipline, of which we haue hitherto discoursed, and which may be learned more at large in their excellent writings, were renewed and imitated by our armies, as the late vse and practise of Armes exercised at this day, is apt and fit for the same, being more terrible than that of the Ancients, who had no gunpowder, no doubt but great obedience of souldiers towards their Captaines would arise of it, whereas nowadaies in steade of commanding, they haue nothing left but an humble request to be vsed towards their souldiers, who neuertheless turne it into contempt and want of courage. But if true obedience were ioynd with good order, the hope of prosperous successe in our enterprises would be far greater. Now when our affaires succeed happily, so that we haue our enemies at aduantage, or haue gotten some victory, wee must beware least insolency blinde vs in such sort, that trusting to our good hap, we goe beyond our bounds, and loose the occasion of certaine and sure benefit, through hope of some greater good as yet vncertaine. Hannibal, after the discomfiture of the Romanes, at Cannas, sent men to Carthage to cary newes of his victory, and withall to demand a new supply. Whereupon the Senate was long in deliberating what was to be done. Hannibal, a prudent olde man was of opinion, that they were to vse the victory wisely, and to make peace with the Romans, which they might obtaine of them with honest conditions, and not to expect the hazard of an other battell. Hee said that the Carthaginians ought to be satisfied with this declaration already made to the Romans, that they were such men as could stand against them: and therefore seeing they had woone one victory of them, they should not venture the losse of it, in hope of a greater. This prudent counsell was not followed, although afterward the Senate did acknowledge it for the best, when that occasion was lost. Alexander the Great had already conquered all the East, when the commonwealth of Tyrus, being great and mighty, because the city was scituated in the water (as Venice is) and astonished at the greatnes and fame of that Monarchs power, sent their Embassadors vnto him to offer what obedience and subiection he would require, vpon condition that neither he nor his men would enter into the city. Alexander disdainig that one city should shut their gates against him, to whom the whole world was open, sent them backe againe without accepting their offer, & went thither to pitch his Campe against it. After he had continued the siege towre monthes, he thought within himselfe, that one onely Towne would shorten his glory more than all his other conquests had done before: whereupon he purposed to try an agreement by offering that vnto them which themselves had required before. But then the Tyrians were waxen so lusty and bolde, that they did not onely refuse his proffers, but also executed as many as came to conclude with them: Whereupon Alexander being moued with indignation, caused an assault to be made with such heat and violence,

How a Prince may vse the succours of his Alies.

How a Captaine should exhort his souldiers.

How victory is to be vsed.

Examples of such as knew not how to vse victory wisely & to take opportunity offered.

The Tyrians besieged and subdued by Alexander.

It is not good to fight with desperate men.

Iohn King of France taken by the English
men.

Gaston de Foix.

Small armies that ouercame
great.

Victory commeth onely
from God.
Valiant men are full of compassion.
No true victory without clemencie.
Ring-leaders of euill are to be punished,
and the multitude to be pardon ed

that he tooke and sacked the towne, put some of the inhabitants to the edge of the sword, and made the residue seruants and slaues. Agreement and composition is alwaies to be preferred before continuance of warre. And how soeuer a man may seeme to bee assured, and as it were certaine of the victory, yet ought hee to doubt the vncertainty of humane things. That couragious and valiant Hannibal, being called out of Italy by his countrey men to succour them against the Romans, by whom they were besieged, when his army was yet whole, demanded peace of them before he would enter into battell, because hee saw that if he lost it, he brought his country into bondage. What then would another do, that hath lesse vertue and experience than he? But men fall into the error of the vncertain hope, vpon which staying themselves without further consideration, they are ouerthrowne. Sometimes when we contemne our enemy too much, and bring him into a desperate estate, wee make him more venturous to vndertake, and violent to execute any dangerous matter. Despaire (saith Tubero) is the last but the strongest assault, and a most inuincible tower. For this cause the ancient Romane Captaines were very diligent and carefull to lay all kinde of necessity to fight vpon their men, and to take it from their enemies by opening vnto them passages to escape, which they might haue shut vp against them. King Iohn, because hee would not make peace with the English host, which desired to escape onely with life, was taken and carried prisoner into England, and his army consisting of forty or fifty thousand men, was discomfited by tenne thousand Englishmen, some say more, some lesse. Gaston de Foix, hauing woone the battell at Rauenna, and following a Squadron of Spaniards that fledde, lost life, and made all that a preie vnto the enemy, which he had conquered before in Italy. Ancient histories are full of such examples, and namely of small armies that ouercame those that were great and mighty. Darius against Alexander, Pompey against Cesar, Hannibal against Scipio, Marcus Antonius against Augustus, Mithridates against Sylla, had greater forces without comparison than their enemies. Therefore good Traian said, that To accept, of warre, to gather a great number of men, to put them in order, to giue battell, appertaineth to men; but to giue victory was the work of God onely: so that great armies preuaile but little against the wrath of the Highest. If then we would know a good way how we shall neuer be vanquished, wee must not trust to our armour or force, but alwaies call vpon God to direct our counsels for the best. By this also we shall be perswaded to vse victory mildly, seeing it is the property of valiant men to be gentle and gracious, ready to forgive, and to haue compassion of them that suffer and endure affliction. There is no true victory (as Marcus Aurelius wrote to Popilius captain of the Parthians) but that which carieth with it some clemencie: so that a rigorous and cruell man may not in reason be called victorious. And it is most true, that to overcome is humane, but the action of pardoning is diuine. As touching the sacking and ouerthrow of towne taken in warre, carefull heede (saith Cicero) must be taken, that nothing be done rashly or cruelty. For it is the property of a noble heart to punish such onely as are most guiltie and the authors of euill, and to saue the multitude. Briefly, to obserue in all things whatsoever is right and honest, to be valiant and gentle, to be an enemy to those that do vniustly, favorable to the afflicted, seuer to quarrellers, and full of equitie to suppliants, are those praise woorthy qualities for which Alexander, Iulius Cesar, Scipio, Hannibal, Cyrus, and many other both Greeke and Romane Captaines are most commended, who ought to be imitated in the art of war by all excellent men.

Of a happie Life. Chap. 71.

Humane sciences are but darknes in regard of the word of God

AR AM VVE haue hitherto discoursed (my companions) of vertues and vices, for which the life of man is praised or dispraised in all estates and conditions whereunto the variety of manners, and inclinations to sundry studies and workes all men, and make them fit. Wherein we haue chiefly followed the endes and bounds of honesty & equitie propounded by Morall Philosophers, from whence they draw particular duties, and all actions of vertue, vling a very commendable and excellent order and disposition. Now seeing we are come to the end of the cause of our assembly, as we began it with the true and Christian knowledge of the creation of man, and of the end of his being vnkowne to so many great personages in the world, who are lightened onely with humane sciences, which are but darknesse in regard of that heavenly light, the eternall word of God that guideth the soules of the beleeuers; I thinke that wee ought also to ende and breake vp this our meeting together with the manner of a happie life and death, according to those ends andes that are propounded vnto vs by the infallible rule of all vertue and truth, which if they be not so subtilty set downe and disputed, as the Philosophie of the Ancients is, yet the least they are without comparison better and more certaine. Go to then, let vs heare you discourse first of a happy Life.

A CHITOB. Blessed are they (saith the Prophet) that dwell in the house of God, and that evermore praise him, having his waies in their hearts. He will give them grace and glory, and will withhold no good thing from them that walke uprightly.

ASER. What happier life can we require, than that which Saint Iohn calleth eternall life: namely, To know onely truly God, and Iesus Christ whom he hath sent? But it belongeth to thee A MANA to feede our spirits with this excellent subiect.

A MANA. Although the spirit of God, teaching his iust and holy will by a doctrine that is simple and voide of all vaine shew of words, hath not alwaies obserued and kept so strictly such a certaine order and methode, to prepare and to direct their liues that shall beleue in him, as the Philosophers did, who affected the greatest shew outwardly that they could, thereby to make manifest the sharpnesse of their wit, and the greatnesse of their humane vnderstanding, yet may we easily gather out of this diuine doctrine (which doth more deface all glittering shew and beauty of humane sciences, than the Sunne excelleth darkenes) a most excellent order, teaching vs to frame a happy life according to the mould & patterne of true and heavenly vertue. This order consisteth of two parts; the one imprinting in our hearts the loue of iustice, the other giuing vnto vs a certaine rule, that will not suffer vs to wander, hither and thither, nor to slip aside in the framing of our life. Concerning the first point, the Scripture is full of very good reasons to incline our hearts to loue that Good, which indeede is to bee desired, I meane perfect righteousness. With what foundation could it begin better, than by admonishing vs to be sanctified, because our God is holly? Whereunto the reason is added, that although wee were gone astray as sheepe scattered and dispersed in the Labyrinth of this world, yet wee hath gathered vs together, to ioyne vs to himselfe. When wee heare mention made of the coniunction of God with vs, we must remember, that the bond thereof is holiness, and that we must direct our steps thither, as to the end of our calling, that we may bee transformed into the true image of God, which through sinne was defaced in the first man, and consequently in vs. Moreover, to moue vs the more to imbrace that onely & true God the spirit of God teacheth vs, that as he hath reconciled vs vnto himselfe in his sonne Iesus Christ, so he hath appointed him to be vnto vs an example & patterne, vnto which we must, conforme our selues. This heavenly word also taketh occasion to exhort vs thereunto in infinite places, drawing his reasons from all the benefits of God, and from all the parts of our salvation. As when it is said: That seeing God hath giuen himselfe to be our Father, we are to bee accused of notable ingratitude, if we behaue not our selues as his children. Seeing Iesus Christ hath cleansed vs by the washing of his blood, and hath communicated this purification vnto vs by baptisme, there is no reason why we should defile our selues with new filthines. Seeing he hath ioyned and ingrafted vs into his body, we must carefully looke, that wee defile not our selues in any sort, being members of his body. Seeing hee that is our Head is gone vnto heauen, wee must lay aside all earthly affections, and aspire with all our heart to that heavenly life. Seeing the holy Ghost hath consecrated vs to bee the temples of God, wee must labour and strue that the glory of God may bee exalted in vs, and beware that we receiue no pollution. Seeing our soules and bodies are fore-appointed to enioy that immortalitie of the kingdome of heauen, and the incorruptible crowne of God his glory, we must endeavour to keepe both one and the other pure and unspotted, untill the day of the Lord. Beholde surely good grounds, meete to frame and institute a happy life, by and to moue a christian to bring forth the effects of such an excellent and woorthy title through the loue of righteousness, having this marke alwaies before his eyes to direct all his actions therunto: namely, to aspire to that perfection which God commandeth. From which although the affections of our flesh seeke to seperate vs, and the difficulties are great, so that is impossible for vs to attaine perfection in this mortall prison, yet let vs leaue off to follow that way which wee haue once begun, looking to our marke in purity, & prightnes, and simplicity, & striving to come to our end, vntil we perfectly see that soueraigne goodnes, when hauing cut off the infirmity of our flesh, & being made partakers of that goodnesse in full measure, wee shall bee receiued of God into his heavenly kingdome. Let vs now come to the second point. Although the Lawe of God comprised in tenne Commandements, and those tenne also contained onely in two, hath a most excellent methode and well ordered disposition, whereby to direct our life, and to make it happie, yet it hath pleased our good Master, his eternall Sonne, to frame

Psal. 84. 5. 11.

Iohn. 17. 3.

Of the loue
of righteous-
nesse.
Leuit. 19. 2.
1. Pet. 1. 15. 26

Holines is the end of our calling.

Christ is a pasterne of righteousnes
vnto vs.

Malach. 1. 6.
Eph. 5. 26. 30

Col. 3. 1. 2.
1. Cor. 6. 19.
1. Thes. 5. 9.

We must al-
waies strue
to come to perfection.

them

What the duty of every faithfull man
is.

Rom. 12. 12.

What it is to consecrate our selues to God

Gal. 2. 20.

The loue of God breedeth
in vs a dislike of our selues.

Math. 16. 24

Fruites of the deniall of our selues.

Selueloue is cause of the most of our imperfections
The definition of charity

1. Cor. 13. 4.

The effect of true charity towards our neighbour.

The naturall
inclination of man.

them that are his by an exquisite doctrine, according to that rule which hee had giuen vnto them in his Law. The beginning of that way which hee taketh, is after this fortynamely, to teach them that it is the duty of every faithfull man, to offer his body a liuing, holy, and acceptable sacrifice to God, wherein consisteth the chiefest point of that seruice which wee owe vnto him. Then he goeth on to exhort vs, that we would not fashion our selues to this world, but be changed by the renewing of our minde, that wee may proue what is the good will of God. That is no small reason to say that we must consecrate and dedicate our selues to God, that from hence forward we should neither thinke, speake, meditate, or do any thing but to his glory. For it is not lawful to apply any thing that is consecrated to a prophane vse. Now if wee be not our owne, but belong to the Lord, wee may thereby see both how to auoide error, and whither we must direct al the parts of our life: namely, to the rule of his holy and iust will. Let vs not propound to our selues this ende, to seeke after that which is expedient for vs according to the flesh. Let vs forget our selues as much as may bee, and all things that are about vs. We are the Lords, let vs liue and die to him, and let his will and wisdom gouerne all our actions. Let all the parts of our life be referred to him as to their onely ende: and let all our humane reason yeelde and retire, that the holy Ghost may haue a place in vs; and that our reason may be subiect to his direction, to the ende we may no more liue of our selues, but haue Iesus Christ to liue & reigne within vs. I liue (saith Saint Paul) yet not I now, but Christ liueth in me. Truly he that hath Iesus Christ liuing in him, and that liueth in Iesus Christ, liueth no more in himselfe, and careth least for himselfe. For if all true loue hath such force within the heart where it is placed, that it careth not for it selfe, but delighteth in, and is altogether partaker of the thing that it loueth: how much stronger shall the heavenly loue be to withdraw all our affections from the earth vnto the things of the Spirit? O good Iesus, O loue of my soule (saith Saint Augustine) as often as loue beginneth in mee, it endeth with hatred in thee: but when it beginneth in thee, I come to the hatred of my selfe: so that the scope of thy loue is nothing else but dislike of our selues. Therefore our Sauour said to his disciples, that if any man would follow him, he should forsake himselfe. Moreover, after the heart of man is once possessed with this deniall of himselfe, first, all pride, haughtinesse, and ostentation, are banished out of the soule: next conuetsuene, intemperance, superfluitie, desire of honour, and of all delights, with the rest of those vices that are engendred through the loue of our selues. Contrariwise, where the deniall of our selues reigneth, not, there is man giuen ouer to all kind of villanie, without shame or blushing: or if any shew of vertue appeare in his actions it is corrupted before God through a wicked desire of glory. Most of our imperfections proceede from the loue of our selues, which hindereth vs from discharging our duty towards God and towards our neighbours, according to charity. Charity is nothing else but to loue God for himselfe, and our neighbour for his sake: I say, to loue God, because he is the soueraigne good, and because the greatnesse of his goodnesse deserueth it: to loue our neighbours, because the image of God shineth in them, whom hee hath substituted in his place, that we should acknowledge towards them the benefits which he hath bestowed vpon vs. And who is able to performe those duties that S. Paul requireth in charity, vnlesse he hath renounced himselfe, that he may seeke nothing but the profit of his neighbor, Loue (saith he) suffereth long: it is bountifull, it enuieth not: it doth not boast: it is not puffed vp: it disdaineth not, it seeketh not her own things: it is not prouoked to anger, and so forth. If that only saying were there that we must not seeke our owne profite, it should be of no smal force with our nature, which draweth vs so much to the loue of our selues, that we forget what we owe to our neighbours. But if we would faithfully discharge this duty, let vs whilest we do good, and exercise the offices of humanity, remember this rule: That wee are Stewards of all that God hath giuen vs, whereby we may helpe our neighbour, and that one day wee shall giue account how wee haue executed our charge limited vnto us in the practise of charitie, by a true and sound affection of friendship. Which thing will haue place amongst vs, when we take vpon vs their persons that stand in neede of succour, when we pity their misery, as if we felt and sustained it, and when wee are touched with the same affection of mercie to helpe them, that is in vs to helpe our selues. As for that which onely concerneth our duty towards God, the deniall of our selues will make vs patient and meeke. And when our affections pricke vs forward to seeke how wee may liue in rest and ease, the scripture alwaies bringeth vs backe to this, that resigning our selues and all that we haue, into the hands of God, we should submit the desires of our heart to him, that we may tame them, and bring them vnder his yoke. We are led with a furious kinde of intemperance, and with an vnbridled lust, in desiring credit and honor, in seeking after power and might might, in heaping vp of riches, and in gathering together whatsoever wee iudge meete for pompe and magnificence. On the other side, we maruellously feare and hate pouerty, basenes, and ignominy, and flie from them as much as we can. Hereupon we see in what disquietnesse of minde all they are, that order their liues after their owne counsell, how many waies they assay to attaine to that, vnto which their ambition and couetousnes carrieth them. But they that submit themselues wholly vnder the yoke of Gods will, neuer intangle themselues in these snares. For first, they neither desire, hope or imagine of any other meanes to prosper by, than the blessing of God: and therefore they stay and rest themselues assuredly thereupon, as vpon that which is able to giue them a good issue in all things, & true felicity, which cannot in any wise be in the doings of wicked men, what false prosperitie soeuer appeareth in the eyes of flesh. Hereof it commeth, that they aspire not through iniustice or other sinister meanes to any worldly goods, but contemne them, seeking after the only true goods, which turne them not aside from innocencie. For they are assuredly perswaded that the blessing of god is not extended vpon the workers of iniquity, but only vpon such as are vpriight in their thoughts and workes. Moreouer it serueth for a bridle to restrain them, that they burne not with a disordered desire of worldly goods, because they hold this for certaine, that the blessing of God cannot helpe them to obtaine that which is cleane contrary to his word, whereby we are commanded to withdraw our whole heart from this world, that we may lift it vp in the meditation of eternall happines. The Lord (saith Iustine Martyr) will not honour his children with worldly happines, for a reward of their pietie. For those things that are subiect to corruption cannot be a recompence to good men for their vertue: because they are circumscribed and limited by the change of the mortall estate of vertuous men, who are deprived altogether of them at the time of their death. And as good men are not said or accounted to be of the world, so their glory, riches, and wealth, are not in the earth. So that in what estate soeuer a Christian man is, he feeleth himselfe alwaies moued to giue glory to God, and iudgeth that all things are appointed by him in such sort, as is most expedient for his saluation. If aduersity presse him, and the miseries of mans life seeke to make him distrust the grace & fauour of God, or to murmur against him through impatiencie, he striveth so much the more on the other side to consider of his heauenly iustice and goodnes, in that he chastiseth him iustly, and for his benefite: and arming himselfe with patience, he expecteth with a quiet and thankfull minde the issue of God his ordinance, whereunto he wholly submitteth himselfe. Besides, he considereth how God calleth all his to beare their crosse, and teacheth them to prepare themselves to sustaine a hard and laborious life, full of travell and of infinite kindes of euils, vnto which Iesus Christ their head was first made subiect. Where this consolation followeth presently vpon it, that such a life is a preparation to follow him into his eternall glory. Yea the more we are afflicted and endure miseries, the more is our society with Christ Iesus certainly confirmed unto vs. Now the chiefe rule propounded vnto vs by the spirit of God concerning this matter is, that with what kinde of tribulation soeuer we are afflicted, we should looke to this ende, to acquaint our selues with the contempt of this present life, that we may thereby be brought on to meditate vpon the life to come. But because this diuine wisdom knoweth full well that wee are inclined and led with a blinde and euen brutish loue of this world, it vseth a very apt reason to draw vs backe and to awake our sluggishnesse, that our heart should not bee too much setled vpon such a foolish loue. There is none of vs that will not seeme to aspire throughout the whole course of his life to a heauenly immortality: yea to strue for the obtaining of it. For we are ashamed not to excell the brute beasts in something, whose condition would seeme to bee more happy then ours, if we had no hope of eternity after death. Neuerthelesse, if a man examine the counsels, deliberations, enterprises and works of euery one, he shall finde nothing but earth in them, being such as tend altogether to the commodity of this life. Now this blockishnes proceedeth fro hence, that our vnderstanding is as it were dimmed with that vaine brightnes which riches, honors, and powers haue in outward shew, whereby it is hindered fro looking farther. In like maner our heart being pressed with the affectious of the flesh, which propounded vnto it couetousnes, ambition, and all other carnal desires, our soule is at length perswaded to seeke for her felicitie vpon earth. The Lord therefore to meete with his mischief teacheth his seruants to know the vanity of this present life, by exercising them daily with diuers miseries. Hee sendeth them no prosperity, which is not mingled with greater aduersity, that by learning to contemne altogether this earthly life, they may frame their harts to desire and to meditate vpon the life to come. Wherefore when they try by afflictions, that this

Corruptible things are no sufficient recompence for vertuous men

Rom. 8. 18.

Math. 16. 24.

25.

Rom. 8. 17.

How God teacheth vs to know the vanity of this life.

We must not hate the blessings of this life.

The comfort
of the godly
in the midst
of troubles.

Isai. 25. 8.
Apoc. 7. 17.

The [some] of our duty towards, God.

The true vse
of temporall
things.

Wherein a happie life consisteth.

present life, considered in it selfe, is full of disquietnesse, of troubles, altogether miserable, and in no respect happy, that all the wealth thereof and in so great estimation, is transitorie and vncertaine, vaine, and mingled with infinite miseries, they conclude therupon that nothing is to be sought or hoped for in this world but calamity, and that the crowne of glory and true felicitie is to be looked for else-where, namely, in heauen. Notwithstanding, as long as they enioy this life, he would not haue them so to contemne it, as to grow into a hatred thereof, or to be vnthankfull to God for the benefits which they daily receiue therein of his Maiestie, but rather to account it a speciall gift of his heauenly clemency, in that through the midst of those tribulations which they endure, he maketh a way and entrance for them vnto eternall life. For which, and for those infinite blessings which they receiue also in this life of his goodnesse, they acknowledge that they are bound to yeelde vnto him immortall thanks, labouring onely to vnfolde themselves out of this ouer great desire of man, carried away with the disordinate loue of this life, that they may transfer their chiefe affection to the celestiall and heauenly life. And seeing it is so, that all the faithfull, as long as they remaine vpon earth, are as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, to the end they might bee made comformable to their head Christ Iesus, surely they should bee accounted passing wretched, if they did not lift their mindes on high to surmount all that is in the world, and to goe beyond the regard and care of things present. On the contrary side, if they haue once lift vp their thoughts aboue the earth, when they shall see the vniust prosper in the world, when themselves shall be vnghently handled by them, when they shall endure reproch, when they shall be polled or afflicted with any kinde of iniury, their comfort in all these evils will bee to haue the last day before their eyes, in which they know that the Lord will gather his faithfull ones together into the rest of his kingdome, that he wil wipe away the teares from their eies, crowne them with glory, clothe them with gladnesse, satisfie them with the exceeding sweetnesse of his delicacies, exalt them vnto his high mansion, in a word, make them partakers of his happinesse. In the meantime going on their course with all tranquility and ioy of spirit, they are cheefully to giue vnto God that homage and worship that is due vnto him, submitting themselves wholly to his greatnes, and receiuing with al reuerence his commandements. Next, they must put that trust and barty assurance in him, which they haue receiued by knowing him aright, attributing to him all wisdom, iustice, goodnesse, vertue & truth, and making this account, that all their happinesse is in communicating with him. Inuocati^o followeth, whereby their soules must haue recourse vnto him as to their onely hope, whē they are pressed with any necessity. In the last place is thanksgiuing, which is that acknowledgement, whereby all praise is giuen vnto him. Vnder these foure points, of worship, trust, prayer, and thanksgiuing, all those innumerable duties which wee owe to God, may well bee comprehended. Moreouer, the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of that which is immortall and heauenly, will teach vs the right vse of earthly goods created of God for the seruice of man, as necessary helpes for this life. Which things wee must not neglect in such sort, that we neuer vse them but vpon constraint and necessity, taking no delight in them as if we were sencelesse blocks. Much lesse may wee abuse them by ouer great lust in superfluity and delights, but apply them to that end for which God hath created and appointed them for our good, and not for our hurt, namely, that should sustaine, nourish, preferue and delight our nature, vsing them in all temperance and mediocritie with thanksgiuing. So that we are to vse these goods as though we vsed them not, that is to say our chiefe affection and desire must be so smally set vpon them as if wee were wholly deprived of them: and we must be disposed and affected as well to sustaine pouerty patiently and with a quiet minde, as to vse abundance moderately. Especially let vs referre the true and holy vse of all our earthly commodities to the workes of charity, as wee haue already touched knowing that all things are so giuen vnto vs by the goodnesse of God, and appointed for our commoditie, as things committed to our trust, of which wee must one day giue account before his maiestie. For the conclusion therefore of our speech, wee learne that the life of a Christian is a perpetuall study and exercise of the mortification of the flesh, vntill it bee so thoroughly dead, that the Spirit of God may reigne fully in his soule. We learne also that our whole life ought to be a meditation & exercise of godlines, because we are called to sanctificati^o: that true happines of life in this world consisteth therein, namely, whē being regenerated by baptisme & the Spirit of God, we haue the loue of righteousness thoroughly imprinted in our harts, & follow the diuine rule thereof by directing al our actiōs to the glory of our God & profit of our neighbors. Wherefore euery one of vs must take his calling for a principle and ground, and for a station assigned of God, vnto which we must direct our leuell, withdrawing our minds from the yoke and bondage of those naturall perturbations that are in vs. We must not be led with ambition and desire to take holde of many fundrie matters at once, being assured, that euery worke done according to our calling, how contemptible soeuer it be among men, shineth before God, and shall be rewarded by him, being accounted very precious in his sight.

of death. Chap. 72

A MANA

NO man ought to be ignorant of this, that after God had created man in the beginning, hee placed him in a garden and paradise full of all pleasures, and delights, and gaue him leaue to vse all things contained therein, the fruite of the knowledge of good and euill onely excepted, which was expressly forbidden. Neuertheless being vnable to keepe himselfe in that high degree and great dignity, he fell by disobedience: so that thinking to make choise of life, he chose the fruit of death, as God had foretolde him saying, Whensoever thou eatest of this fruite of the knowledge of good and euill, thou shalt die the death: which thing fell vpon him, and vpon all his posterity. Whereby we see, that the reward and recompence of sinne, is death, not onely bodily death, but which is more, spirituall, whereby we are banished and shut out of the heavenly kingdome and inheritance, if we apprehend not that great grace and mercy of the father offered to all that draw neere vnto him by true confidence in Iesus Christ: to the ende (as the Apostle saith) that as sin reigned vnto death, so grace might reigne by righteousnesse vnto eternall life through Iesus Christ our Lord. And this is the onely way whereby to passe from death to life, when wee shall be subiect to no condemnation or affliction. Moreouer, neither sword, famine, nor any other misery can hurt vs, so not temporall death, which (according to mans iudgement) is the extreamest of all miseries, shall in any sort confound vs, but rather be a meane and pleasant way for vs to passe by from pryson and bondage to ioyfull liberty, and from miserie to happiness. Therefore my companions, as death is the end of all men, happy to the elect, and vnhappie to the reprobate, so let vs finish our discourses with the handling thereof.

Gen. 2. 17.

Rom. 6. 23.

Rom. 5. 21.

Temporall death is the way that leadeth the godly from bondage to blessednesse.

A RAM. Nothing but death and the end of this bodily life is able to accomplish the wish and desire of a faithfull Christian. For the spirit being then deliuered, as it were out of a noisome and filthy prison, reioyseth with freedome and liberty in those pleasant places, which it seeketh after and desireth so earnestly.

Heb. 9. 27.

Ecclus. 7. 36.

ACHITO. It is declared that all men must once die. And therefore (as the Wis. man saith) what soeuer thou taketh in hand, remember the end, and thou shalt neuer do amisse. Now ASER, as thou beganst to lay the foundation of our Academy, so make thou an ende of it with the treatise of Death that endeth all things.

ASER. It is no maruell if naturall sense be moued & astonished, when we heare that our body must bee seperated from the soule. But it is in no wise tollerable, that a Christian heart should not haue so much light as to surmount and suppress this feare whatsoeuer it be, by a greater comfort and consolation. For if we consider that this tabernacle of our body which is weake, vicious, corruptible, casuall, & inclining to putrefaction, is dissolued and as it were pulled downe by death, that it may afterward be restored to a perfect, firme, incorruptible and heavenly glory, shall not this certaine assurance compell vs to desire earnestly that which nature flieth and abhorreth? If we consider that by death we are called home from a miserable exile, to dwell in our countrey, yea in our celestiall countrey, shall we not conceiue singular consolation thereby? But some men may say, that all things desire to continue in their being. For the same cause I say, we ought to aspire to the immortalitie to come, where wee haue a settled estate, which is not seene at all vpon earth. How commeth it to passe, that the brute beasts and senceles creatures, euen wood and stones, hauing as it were some feeling of their vanity and corruption, are in expectation of the iudgement day that they may be deliuered fro their corruption, & yet we that haue some light of nature, and boast that we are illuminated by the spirit of God, lift not vp our eies about this earthly putrefaction, whē we talke of our being? But what shal we say of those men (whose number alas is very great) who quenching al natural light, & apposing themselves directly against the testimonies of truth, which presse their consciences and sound daily in their eares, dare yet doubt of, yea impudently deny this day of iudgement, & the change of this mortall life in a second, which is

The comfort of euery true christian against death.

Rom. 8. 12.

Against Atheists and Epicures that deny the immortality of the soule.

Plato proueth that there is a iudgement to come, & a second life.

How good men are discerned from the wicked.

The afflictions of the godly in this world proueth a second life.

Three kinds of death.
Apoc. 20. 6.

Why the faithfull ought to desire death.

What the life of man is.

immortall? If the word of God so expressly set downe for our assurance bee of so little credit that it will not satisfie them, yet how is it that they are not conuincd by the writings of so many Ethnike and heathen Philosophers, who make the immortality of the soule out of doubt, and by the consideration of the being of this life conclud a iudgement to come, which bringeth perpetuall happinesse and felicity to the soules of the blessed, and euerlasting misery and paine to them that are vnhappy? Plato vnder the name of Socrates may serue for a fit teacher for such Epicures and Atheists that will not heare the heavenly word of the Almighty. *From whence cometh it (saith he) that we see so many wicked men passe the course of their daies in worldly happines and felicity, and die in great rest and quietnes, whereas on the other side so many good men liue and die in great afflictions, and most hard calamities. The reason is, because God doth not punish and chastise all the wicked vpon the earth, to the end men may know, that there is a iudgement to come wherein the vngodlines of such men shall be corrected. Neither doth hee recompence all good men with blessings in this world, to the end they may hope that there is a place in the other life where the vertuous shall be rewarded. Likewise he doth not punish all the wicked, nor reward all good men here beneath lest men should thinke that the vertuous followed vertue in hope of a carnall & earthly reward, or eschewed vice for feare of punishments, and torments in this world. For so vertue should be no more vertue, seeing there is no action that may carry the surname of vertuous, if the intent of him that doth it be in hope of some earthly and carnall recompence, and not for the love of vertue it selfe, and that he may be accepted of God, and so conceine hope of eternall rewards in the other life. Also hee punisheth and correcteth some wicked men vpon earth, and rewardeth some good men, lest if good men onely were afflicted, & the wicked suffered in quiet, men might be brought to beleue that there were no providence, and that the diuine nature had no care of vs, and so all men would giue ouer themselves to follow iniustice. By the sequelle of this speech Plato inferreth and proueth, that there is one God that hath care ouer his creatures, and that naturally euery spirit loueth him better that striveth to resemble him in manners and fashions of liuing, that reuerenceth and honoureth him, than those that feare him not, but despise him whose conditions are altogether vnlike his. Moreover, hee proueth evidently, that good men in feare and reuerence of the Deity, strue to imitate it by good works done to the benefite and safety of others: and contrariwise, that the wicked despise God and all lawes both diuine and humane: whereupon it followeth that God loueth good men, and hateth the wicked. And because wee see that good men are subiect to calamity and ignominy in this world, we must therefore vndoubtedly confesse that there is another life after this, wherein good men are eternally rewarded, and the wicked punished. Otherwise, it would follow, that God cared more for the wicked than for the good, which were too absurd to grant. From hence that diuine Philosopher draweth this conclusion: that the life of a wise man ought to bee a perpetuall meditation of death, and that the very feare to die, and not any desire to liue, is that which maketh death fearefull to them that know not the immortality of the soules. Now then ought not these men to blush for shame, that dare doubt of the second life, and future iudgement, when they heare this discourse of an Ethnike and Pagan, destitute of that true light of God, and sincere religion which is manifested to vs in Iesus Christ? Truly nothing is more clere in al the holy Scripture, than that as before the first day mentioned in Genesis, all things were possessed of Eternity, so that there was neither time, nor yeare, nor moneth, nor season, but al things were in thar Eternity, so when the last day shall come, all shall bee eternall for the felicity of the good, and torment of the wicked. But to returne to our speech of death the word of God giueth vs to vnderstand of three kinds of death: the one is the separation of the soule from the body, with the dissolution of the body vntill the resurrection, and of this is our present discourse. The second is the death of sinne, as it is said oftentimes, that they are dead that nourish themselves in sinne. The third is called in the Apocalyps, the second death, and sometimes eternall death, vnto which the wicked shall bee condemned in the last iudgement. Therefore to continue our speech of corporall and temperall death, if the doctrine of the Sonne of God bee neuer so little apprehended of vs by faith, wee shall see cleerly enough that the faithfull ought to haue that in great request, which to humane sense seemeth neither happy, nor to bee desired, seeing it turneth to their saluation. It belongeth to him that will not goe vnto Iesus Christ, to feare death: and to be vnwilling to goe to Christ, is a badge of such a one as will not reigne with him. What traeller hauing passed many dangerous waies, reioyceth not when hee draweth neere to his country? and who is not content to depart out of an old ruinous house? What pleasure haue we in this world, which draweth neere to an end euery day, and which sellet vnto vs so deare those pleasures that we receiue therein? What other thing is this life but a perpetuall battle and a sharpe skirmish, wherein wee are one while hurt with enuy, another while with ambition, and by and by with* some

some other vice, besides the sudden onsets giuen vpon our bodies by a thousand sort of diseases, and floods of aduersities vpon our spirits? Who then will not say with Saint Paul, I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ? Why doe wee daily pray that the kingdome of God should come, if it be not for the desire which we ought to haue to see the fulfilling thereof in the other life? We haue a thousand testimonies in the Scripture, that the death of the body is a certaine way by which we passe into that true and eternall life, and into our owne countrey. Flesh and blood (saith S. Paul) cannot inherite the kingdome of God, neither doth corruption inherite incorruption. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortall must put on immortality: then shall be fulfilled that which is writen: Death is swallowed up in victory. They that beleue in Iesus Christ haue already overcome death, sinne, and hell. And therefore contemning death they may say: O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory? The sting of death is sinne, and the strength of sin is the law: but thanks be vnto God which hath giuen vs victory through our Lord Iesus Christ. He that hath raised up the Lord Iesus, shall raise vs up also. Our conuersation is in heauen, from whence also we looke for the Saniour, euen the Lord Iesus Christ, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like vnto his glorious body, according to the working, whereby he is euen able to subdune all things vnder himselfe. Ye are dead (saith he to the Colossians) and your life is hid with Iesus Christ in God. When Christ which is our life shall appeare, then shall ye also appeare with him in glory. My brethren (saith hee to the Thessalonians) I would not haue you ignorant concerning them which are asleepe, that ye sorrow not euen as other which haue no hope. For if we beleue that Iesus is dead, and is risen, euen so them which sleepe in Iesus will God bring with him. Iesus Christ (saith he to the Hebrewes) was partaker of flesh and blood: that is to say, was truly man, that he might destroy through death, him that had the power of death, that is, the diuell. And that he might deliuer all them, who for feare of death were all their life time subiect to bondage. God hath saved vs, and called vs with an holy calling (as he saith to Timothie) not according to our workes, but according to his owne purpose and grace, which was giuen to vs through Christ Iesus before the world was, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saniour Iesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality vnto light through the Gospell. I am sure (saith Iob) that my redeemer liueth, and he shall stand the last on the earth. And though after my skin wormes destroy this body, yet shall I see God in my flesh. Whom I my selfe shall see and mine eyes shall behold, and none other for me. Iesus Christ is our head, and we are his members. This head cannot be without his members, neither can forsake them. Where Christ is, there shall we be also. He that considereth diligently these places of Scripture, and infinite others contained therein, it cannot be but he should haue great ioy and comfort in his heart against all feare and horror of death. And then comming to compare the miseries which neuer leaue this life, with that vnspeakable happinesse and felicity, which eye hath not seene, neither eare hath heard, neither came into mans heart, which God hath prepared in the second and eternall life for all faithfull beleeuers: a Christian will not onely passe over this mortall life with ease and without trouble, but will euen contemne and make no account of it, in respect of that which is immortall. But to whom is death sweete if not to them that labour? The poore hireling is well at ease when he hath done his daies worke. So death is alwaies sweete to the afflicted, but to them that put their trust in worldly things, the remembrance thereof is bitter. Now then the children of God are not afraid of death, but (as Cyprian writeth in an Epistle sent to the Martyrs of Christ) he that once hath overcome death in his owne person, doth daily overcome him in his members: so that we haue Iesus Christ not onely a beholder of our combats, but also an assistant and fighter with vs. And by his grace abounding in the hearts of the faithfull, they are so much the more bent to meditate vpon the benefits of the future and eternall life, as they see that they are enuironed with greater store of miseries in this fading and transitory life. Then comparing both together they find nothing more easie than to finish sweetely their race, and to value the one as little, as they account the other absolute in all felicity. Moreover, seeing heauen is our countrey, what is the earth else but a passage in a strange land? And because it is accursed vnto vs for sinne, it is nothing else but the place of our banishment. If our departure out of this world be an entrance to life, what is this world but a sepulcher? And to dwell here what is it else but to bee plunged in death? If it be liberty to be deliuered out of this body, what is the body but a prison? And if it bee our chiefe happinesse to enioy the presence of our God, is it not a misery not to enioy it? Now vntill we goe out of this world, we shall be as it were separated from God. Wherefore if this earthly life be compared with the heavenly, no doubt but it may be contemned and accounted as it were dung. True it is that we must not hate it, but so far forth as it keepeth vs in subiection to sinne. And yet whilest we desire to see the end of it, we must not be carelesse

1. Cor. 15. 50
53, 54, 55, 56
57.

2. Cor. 4. 14.
Phil. 3. 20, 21

Col. 3. 3, 4.

1. Thess. 4. 13.
14.

Heb. 2. 14, 11.

2. Tim. 1. 9, 10.

Iob 19. 25,
26, 27.

Ioh. 12. & 17

1. Cor. 2. 9.

Who they bee
that feare not death.

A comparison
betweene
this life and that which is eternall.

Psal. 123.

Tit. 2. 13.

Luk. 21. 28.

How death
cannot hurt.

Psal. 116. 19.

to keepe our selues in it to the good pleasure of God, that our longing may be farre from all murmuring and impatiencie. For our life is as a station, wherein the Lord God hath placed vs, that wee should abide in it vntill he call vs backe againe. S. Paul indeed bewailed his estate, because he was kept as it were bound in the prison of his body longer than he would, and groined with a burning desire vntill he was deliuered: but withall to shew his obedience to the will of God, he protested that he was ready for both, because he knew himselfe indebted for the glorifying of his name, whether it were by death or by life. For it belongeth to him to determine what is expediēt for his glory. Wherefore it behooueth vs to liue & die vnto him, let vs leaue both our life & death to his good pleasure, but yet so that we alwaies desire rather to dy thē to liue, & be ready cheerfully to renounce this life, whensoever it pleaseth the Lord, because it holds vs vnder sin. And let vs hold this Maxime, that no man hath throughly profited in the school of Christ Iesus, but he that with ioy & gladnes expecteth the day of death, & of the last resurrectiō. S. Paul in his Epistle to Timus describeth al the faithful by this marke: and the Scripture when it propoundeth vnto vs matter of reioycing, calleth vs backe thither: Reioyce (saith the Lord in Luke) and lift up our heads, for your redemption draweth neare. It were absurd that that thing should breed nothing but sorrow and astonishment in vs, which Christ thought was fit matter to worke ioy in vs. Now then, seeing death is dead to them that beleue in him, there is nothing in death which a man ought to feare. It is true that the image thereof is hideous and terrible, because that besides the violent taking away of life, it representeth vnto vs the wrath of God, which biteth like a serpent; but now the venome of it is taken away and cannot hurt vs. And as through the brazen serpent which Moses lift vp in the wildernes, the liuing serpents died, and their venome hurt not the Israelites: so our death dieth, and is notable in any sort to hurt vs, if we behold with the eies of faith the death of Iesus Christ. Briefly, it is nothing but an image and shadow of death, and the beginning and entrance vnto true life. Wherefore concluding our present speech, let vs learne that as our miserable nature had brought vs to the like condition of death: so the grace of God maketh this difference, that some, namely the wicked, die to their destruction, and others which are the children of God led by his Spirit and word, die to liue more happily, so that their very death is precious in the sight of God. And although the lust of our flesh, being blind and earthly, strueth continually against the desires of the spirit, seeking to separate vs as farre as it can from our soueraigne Good: yet let vs haue this ingrauen in our hearts, that they are happy that know the vanity of this world, more happy that let not their affections vpon it, and they most happy that are taken out of it to be with God in the kingdome of heauen.

The end of this Academie.

Ἐν τῇ πόλει τῆς ἑλλάδος.

THE SECOND PART OF
THE FRENCH
ACADEMIE.

Wherein, as it were by a naturall history
of the body and soule of man, the creation, matter, composition, forme, nature, profite and vse of
all the parts of the frame of man are handled,
with the naturall causes of all affections, vertues
and vices, and chiefly the nature, powers,
workes and immortalitie of
the Soule.

By PETER DE LA PRIMAUVDAVE Esquire, Lord
of the same place and of Barre.

And translated out of the second Edition, which was reuiewed and augmented by the Author.

LONDON,
Printed for Thomas Adams.
1618.

THE SECOND PART OF
THE FRENCH
ACADEMIE

Wherein, as it were by a natural history of the body and soul of man, the creation, manner composition, form, nature, profits and use of all the parts of the frame of man are handled
with the natural causes of all affections, virtues
and vices, and chiefly the nature, powers,
weakness and immortality of the Soul.

By PIERRE DE LA PRIMAVERE, Esquire, Lord
of the same place and of Buge.

And translated out of the second Edition, which was reviewed and augmented by the Author.

LONDON
Printed for Thomas Aldrich
1618.

TO THE CHRISTIAN

READER GRACE AND PEACE.

SENECA the Philosopher reporteth (gentle Reader) that the looking glasse was first inuented to this end, that man might use it as a meane to know himselfe the better by. Now besides that in a glasse wee may attaine to some kinde of knowledge of our selues when wee take a view of our owne countenance, and of the lineaments and proportion of our bodies outwardly, Socrates applied the same to a further use for the instruction of maners. For as Apuleius writeth of him, he earnestly perswaded his Auditors to looke often into a glasse, and to beholde themselves therein, to this intent, that hee which thought himselfe beautifull and faire, might take occasion thereby to auoide al kinde of deformity in manners and conuersation, whereby that beauty of his would bee greatly blemished: and that whosoever perceined by the glasse any defect of comeliness in his countenance, might labour so much the more seriously by the helpe of vertue and inward graces of the minde to recompence the outward wants and imperfections of his body. In which respect this booke may most fitly be resembled to a glasse, as that which affordeth vnto vs both these uses in far more excellent manner than can be performed by any looking glasse how rare and surpassing soener it be. For euen the best of that kinde doeth represent vnto our eyes only so much of the surface of our owne bodies as is directly before it, but as for the hinder parts we take no view of them by a glasse, much lesse is it able to giue vs a sight of the internall members of our bodies, whereby we may attaine to any profitable knowledge of them. But if wee take a diligent view of this booke, and with the eyes both of body and minde looke intently vpon the same, it will in most euident manner represent vnto vs not onely the outward members of mans body both before and behinde and on euery side, but euen the most hidden and inward parts thereof, which otherwise before life haue left the body cannot possibly be seene of any man. Here may you behold all the bones as it were the frame and timberworke of mans body, yea the very foundation vpon which all the residue of the building is laide. Heere may you see the exquisite frame and composition of the head, as it were the vpper lodging of this house, the seuerall ventricles of the braine, as so many sundry chambers for the entertainment of the Animall spirits: the singular workmanship of the eyes, as of the lights and windowes, appertaining to this pallace of mans body: the matter and forme of the humors in the eyes, as it were the cristall glasse set in the windowes, together with the eye-lids, as casements to open & shut, to receiue in or keepe out the light as neede requireth, besides the eyebrowses as penthouses to defend those windowes from the violence of stormy weather, What should I speake of the eares, as of high watch towers whereby warning is giuen to the internall senses so often as any aduersary noise giueth notice of enemies approaching to annoy this good castle? The mouth is it not as the doore that receiveth in all kinde of provision meete for the reparation and maintenance of this great building, as occasion serueth? It is a world to thinke what excellent workmanship appeareth in the voice and tongue of man, and singular uses it hath very requisite for the perfection of this piece of worke. Now if we shall descend and enter into the contemplation, as of the breast, as of the middle story of this building, and consider what with what goodly householde stuffe those roomes are adorned, who is able either with tongue to utter, or with heart to conceiue, the rare deuises, the precious Iewells the singular art there to bee found? What an exceeding faire roome is the dining chamber of the heart, the receptacle of the will and affections, the shoppe wherein the vitall spirits are wrought, and the forge from whence is deriued that fire and heate which warmeth the whole house? And least this fire should breake forth into such a flame as might bring perill of burning to this goodly building, the chamber of the heart is daily and continually refreshed with coole blasts proceeding

The Epistle to the Reader.

ding from the lungs as from an outward roome that is built round about a great part thereof. Here also is to be scene the Artery which as a lively conduite carrieth forth continually most christall streames of vitall spirits into every roome and office of the house. Betwixt this second story and the third is laide the Midriffe as a store that maketh a seperation betwene the instruments of the vitall parts being the implements of that middle roome, and the naturall instruments of the neather story which serue both for the upholding and maintenance of the whole building, and also containeth in it matter for the erecting of a new frame, which is to stand after the former is come to his full period. In this third story or partition is to bee scene the stomake, which being as it were the kitchen of the body receiueth at the doore of the mouth all such meates and drinckes as are requisite for the keeping of it in sufficient reparations and for the defence of it against two mighty enemies Hunger and Thirst, who by continuall undermining of the same, labor, to lay it euen with the ground. And because nothing can be prepared in the kitchen without heate, and the maintenance thereof besides the naturall heat of the stomake it is compassed on the right side with the liver, on the left with the spleene, behinde with the muscles of the chinebone before with kal, above it hath the haert and midriffe, and within it are sundry vitall spirits, from all which as from so many seuerall fires, it receiueth heat for the better dressing and concocting of that which is conueyed into it. Neither are the gutters and sinkes necessarily belonging to every house, wanting to the perfection of this beautifull building of mans body: as may appeare by the guts and other parts of baser seruice, without which it is not possible that this frame should long continue. Now besides the singular delight & pleasure, which this naturall knowledge of our owne bodies yeeldeth vnto our minds, the profite and commoditie that issueth here from is great and manifolde. For first in regard of our selues, if we were thoroughly acquainted with the Anatomy of our bodies, with the substance and situation, with the forme and qualities, with the vses and offices of every part and member of the same, it is out of all question, that by the knowledgethereof, we might both preuent many diseases and infirmities, which through want thereof would seaze vpon vs, and being overtaken with any, might recover our selues more speedily by a wise and skilfull cariage of our selues according to the same. Neither is it laide vpon every one to haue so much skill as is requisite for him that maketh profession of that art towards all men, but onely so far forth as may serue for the preservation of his owne health eyther in imploying the talent of his priuate knowledge, or in yeelding himselfe more readily vnto the wise direction of the skilfull Physitian. Secondly as Salomon sendeth vs to the industriens nature of the Pismire to learne diligence and forecasse in our calling, so the Apostle taketh occasion by the variety of members in one body, so reprehend two sorts of people in the Church of Corinth, both such as were caried away with enuy towards their superiours, themselves being indued with meaner gifts, and those also who being furnished with more excellent ornaments of Gods spirit, were puffed up with pride in themselves and with disdain towards others of fewer graces. And this being the second vse that ariseth from this naturall knowledge of our bodies, offreth it selfe in most plentifull manner to be obserued by vs, in every part and member of the same. What a notable lesson of good neighbour hood are we taught by the view and contemplation of mans face? For as many seuerall members of different vses are so artificially knit and linked together in one face, that not one of them is any impediment or hinderance, vnto another in the execution of his office: so wee are instructed thereby how to carry our selues towards our neighbours, every one to containe himselfe within the limits of his seuerall calling, and not to intrench one vpon another as the manner of a great many is, that are not contented with their owne estate. Againe, in the second story of this frame when wee consider the lungs, which are the bellowes of the voice, are placed so neere the heart that they compass it round about, are not all men thereby admonished, that their speech is but the interpreter of the heart, and the messenger thereof? that the mouth must like a good seruant attend vpon the heart, and vster nothing but that which it receiueth first from the same? that no man ought to imitate the example of Hyppolytus in Euripedes, who being admonished of his Nurse to remember his Oath, made her this mishappen answer, ἢ γὰρ ἐδωκεν, ἢ ἔειπεν ἀπαρτα? The tongue hath sworne, but the minde is unsworne? As many hollow harted subiects of late daies behaue themselves towards her Maiesty, hauing receiued a dispensation so to do from Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, whose goodly posie was set downe in certaine tokens sent to all such as were to bee reconciled vnto him, Fili mi da mihi cor & sufficet, My son, giue mee thy hart, and it sufficeth, which is all one as if he had said sweare and for sweare thy selfe if thou wilt say thou art a good subiect, go to the church, do whatsoeuer is commanded thee, so then let mee haue thy heart, it skilleth not who haue thy tongue, thy hands, and all the rest of thy body. Elibu being of another spirit, was better instructed in the knowledge of this neere connection, which naturally ought to be betwene the heart and the tongue: and therefore speaking to his friend Iob he telleth him, that his words would bee in the vprightnesse of his heart: Whereas they that follow not this course of nature, but violently draw their tongue to utter that which is farre disagreeing from the meaning of the heart, are branded for the same by the kingly Propbet Dauid with this marke of infamy, that they are men of two hearts, or of a double heart, which is monstrous in nature. The like instruction to this we are taught in that the tongue is placed so neere vnder the braine, which is the seat of the minde and vnderstanding part of man, as it were at the feet of her schoolemaster, to the intent it should not speake vnadvisedly

Prou. 6. 6.
3. Cor. 12.

Iob. 33. 3.
Psal. 12. 2.

Prou. 14. 27.
and 16. 23.

The Epistle to the Reader.

vnadvisedly & hand ouer head, as we vse to say, but with great deliberation, both in regard of the matter it selfe to be deliuered by speech and also of the circumstances of time, place, and persons, which are not to be neglected. For looke how preposterous it is to set the cart before the horse, so is it for the tongue to run before the wit, and to utter it knoweth not well what, hauing receiued no direction from the same. And therefore Salomon putting the name of heart for the minde and vnderstanding part of man, saith, Prou. 15. 28. and 16. 23. that a righteous mans heart meditateth or pondereth what it shall answer: and that the hart of the wise guideth his mouth prudently. Neither is it slightly to be passed ouer, that euery one hauing two eyes that serue for seeing, two eares for hearing, two nostrils for smelling, two feete for going, hath yet but one soft and fleshy tongue for sundry vses, and that tyed fast with strings, and compassed about with gums, teeth, and lips, as with a double wall to teach men thereby, that the tongue being a very unruly member, had neede to be bridled and hemmed in on euery side, least it breake forth into a world of wickednesse, and breede destruction to the whole body. Now if we looke into the middle story of this building, there we shall see that although the heart be the fountaine of life, and the root of all the vi-tall spirits that are dispersed into euery part and member of the body, yet it cannot want either the coole refreshing it hath from the lungs, or the veine-pipes proceeding from the liuer, or the moouing strings
 it hath from the sinewes, or the necessary defence of the ribbes and bones, which as strong bulwarks and rampires fence it in on euery side. Euen so fareth it with the great and mightie men of this world, who although in regarde of their power and authority ouer others, they seeme to haue their lines and liuelhoods at their becke and commandement, yet they are so farre from being able of themselves to maintaine their honours and high places without the necessary aide of the inferiour sort, as that without them they should want wherewith to uphold their owne lines. But this appeareth yet more euident in the lower story of this frame, where the guttes and intrayles of the body as it were the sinks of an house haue their a-bidding. For although in regard of their vse they may seeme to be the basest and most abiect parts of the body, yet if we consider the necessity of them, we shall see that a man may better spare a principall member of his body then the least gut that is in his belly. Euen so fareth it with the polstike body of a commonwealth, in which the base Artisan will sooner be missed oftentimes, then he that carrieth a greater port, and is aduanced to a higher roome and office in the same. A third vse that may bee made of this booke as it were of a christall glasse worthy the looking into, is that singular delight and pleasure which may bee reaped, by the view and consideration of the harmony betweene this terrestriall frame, and the celestial habitation of the heauens, when they are compared together. And as that famous sentence, γὰρ οὐρανός, Know thy selfe, is reported of many to haue descended from the heauens, so surely it will be small furtherance to a man whereby he may attaine to a better knowledge of himselfe, if he seriously obserue what a great agreement there is betweene him and the heauens, wherunto the very situation of his countenance lift up towards heauen, doeth as it were lead him by the hand. First therefore if wee consider the originall of them both, wee finde in holy Writ, that as God is said to haue made the heauens in the beginning, so also it is there related, that not long after hee made man after his owne image and committed vnto him the soueraignty ouer the earth and ouer all lining and moouing creatures vnder the cope of heauen. Neither can it be truly saide that howsoeuer the Lord himselfe formed the first man, and breathed in his face the breath of life, yet since that first creation he hath not intermedled at all with the continuall propagation of mankind, but hath surrendered all his working power into the hands of nature, by whose powerfull operation the matter of mens bodies is brought to this glorious perfection, Gen. 1. 1. 26.
 which wee see it hath when it first appeareth in the world. For this is to speake after the manner of meere naturall men, that haue not as yet learned the language of Canaan, as is plaine if wee call to minde what the kingly Prophet saith vnto the Lord, that it was he that possessed his raignes, and that couered him in his mothers wombe. Which also is more manifestly taught by that holy mā Iob, who confident Psal. 139. 13.
 ly affirmeth, that it was the Lord who had powred him out as milke, & turned him to cruddes Iob. 10. 10. 11
 like cheefe: that he had clothed him with skinne & flesh, & ioyned him together with bones and sinewes. Wherefore as it was the eternall God, who first turned the body of the heauens into that roundnes, gathered the light into the bodies of the celestiall lamps, fixed the stars in the firmament, endued each planet with his seuerall motion, & clothed the inferiour world with this glorious circumference: so the same God at the first planted Adam as the roote of mankind, and euer since hath caused his whole race and euery seuerall person as so many branches to issue and grow out of his loynes. He turned the eyes into that roundnesse, he planted the eares as watch towers in the vpper part of the head, he placed the tongue, fastened the teeth, stretched out the sinewes, he watred the veines with blood, gaue massines to the bones and clothed the flesh with a fine skine as with a garment, he seuered the fingers and toes, caused the feete to walke, and the hands to gripe. Hee, and none but he giueth sight to the eyes, hearing to the eares, taste, to the tongue, smelling to the nostrilles, and feeling to the fingers. Who but he hath endued the lungs with breathing, the heart with the spirits of life, the stomacke with concoction, the liuer with the making of blood, and womens breasts, with the making of milke: Who hath fashioned the instruments of hearing in
 the

The Epistle to the Reader.

the head like to a hamer and an anuile, the hart in the body like a piramide, and made the spleene in substance like a sponge? Who hath covered the heade with haire for comelines, & beared the skine thogh with infinite pores for euacuation? In a word, who hath giuen beauty to the whole body, and to each member his seuerall operation? What father, what mother, what workeman hath wrought these things, but the only wise and immortall God? But to proceede, as the sunne, moone, & celestiall stars and planets haue a double motion, the one common with the whole body of the heauens, the other proper and peculiar according to the nature of euery seuerall star: so haue the parts of mans body two motions, wherof the one dependeth of the motion of the whole body, and is therefore vniuersall, and the other is particular according to the infet nature and disposition of each seuerall member. And to descend to a more speciall comparison of one particular thing with another, how doth the diuerse operations of the animall spirit (whose seate is in the braine) concur with the different workings of the sunne in the firmament upon the inferiour bodies here below upon the face of the earth? We see that through the selfesame reflexion of the sunbeames, the the clay is hardened, and the waxe made soft: that the light of the sun is comfortable to some eyes, whereas other become worse through the brightnes of the same, that it worketh otherwise upon a thicke body then upon a thin, upon a hard then upon a soft, upon a plant then upon a stone, upon the earth then upon the water. So the Animall spirit being distributed into sundry parts and members of the body worketh diuersly in each of them according to the diuerse nature, composition and temperament of euery one. For being imparted to the eyes by the optike sinewes it giueth sight: to the eares by certaine passages, it worketh hearing: to the tongues by small Nerves, it breedeth tasting: in a word, being dispersed into the muscles and skine by meanes of certaine sinowie threedes concurring in manner of a net, it infuseth feeling throughout the whole body. And as it often falleth out that wee are deprived of the heate and light of the Sunne, when either some thicke cloude, or the body of the Moone, or some such thing is interposed & put between vs and the same: so wee quickly see and feele the want of the Animall spirit, when any thicke clammy humor, or winde, or melancholike fumes, or any such impediment stoppe the passages and hinder the working thereof, as is to be seene in them that are taken with the palsey, apoplexie, madnesse, nummesse, and such like. It is no lesse delectable then strange to consider in how many things the Sunne as it were the heart of the heauens, agreeth with the heart of man, which may not vnfitly be called the sunne of the body. For as the Sunne being the chiefe of the Planets occupieth the middle place among those wandring starres, hauing the rest as his garde both aboue and beneath him, so imploy as neede requireth both for their owne safetie and the good of the inferiour worlde: so the heart being the chiefe member of the body, is seated in the middle story of the same, hauing the other parts both aboue and beneath it & on euery side, employing them according to their seuerall offices for the upholding and preseruacion of the whole frame. And as the Sunn is the store-house of that celestiall heate, which together with a diuine and quickning spirit working in the bowelles of the earth maketh it a fruitfull Mother, & tender Nurse for the bringing forth and preseruacion of all things: so the heart is the hart from whence proceedeth all that infet and natie heate, which being conueyed with the vital spirits into euery member of the body maketh them lively and powerfull to performe those duties that are eniyned them. Concerning the motion of the heart, as it agreeth with the Sunne in this that they both haue a double motion, so in that the heart being the first that receiueth life and motion, is the Originall of all motion in the body it resemblith the whole heauens, of which dependeth all naturall motions of inferiour bodies whatsoeuer. Againe the two eyes in the heade represent the two chiefe lights in the firmament. And as there are both simple starres in the heauens, namely the Sunne, Moone, Saturne, Iupiter, Mercurie with the rest, and also compound as the Charles-waine, the Lion, both the beares and others: so in the bodie there are simple or similar parties, as the sinewes, bones, arteries, vienes, &c. and compound partes, as the heart, liuer, braine, stomacke, lungs & such like. Moreouer, it is certaine, that the Planets, howsoeuer in regarde of their moouing to and fro they are said to be wandring starres, haue yet their certaine limites in the heauens, especially in the Zodiake, in which as in their dwelling houses they exercise those naturall powers wherewith all they are endued, as the proper mansion of the sunne is in Leo, of the Moone in Cancer, of Saturne in Capricorne, of Iupiter in Sagittarius, and so of the rest. In like manner, although the body of man be so framed, as that there is no one part but it is seruiceable vnto all, yet there are certaine seuerall places appointed as peculiar shops for each facultie to worke in especially, as the braine for the Animall spirit, the heart for the Vitall, and the liuer for the Naturall: the gall is the receptacle for choller, the spleene for Melancholy, the sucking veines serue to purge the blood from the serous substance of it, & so of the other powers and parts of the body. To conclude this third use (for a day would not suffice to utter al that might bee spoken in this matter) as the Sunne by reason of his Annuall progresse through the twelue signes maketh a sensible diuision of the year into foure parts, which haue their different seasons & qualities: if they fall out according to the course of nature, and so likewise the Moone by her race quartereth the moneth accordingly: euen so fareth it with the body of man in regarde of his whole age, which being considered from the beginning vnto the ending, agreeth very fitly to those seuerall seasons both for number and predominant qualities, if the threede of life be not cut off in the midway by the razor of death. For the body of man in his first age, which is his childhood, is moist & hot, and so is the former part of the yeare called the spring, as also the first part of the moneth from the new moon to the ending of the 1 quarter. In the second part of mens age, which is his flourishing & youthful time, the body of man is hot & dry, such as are the qualities of the second part of the yeare or summer season, & of the second part of the month, which is from the first quarter to the full Moone. Thirdly, the body of man in the third part of his age, commonly called mans age, is cold & moist, according to the disposition of the third part of the yeare called Autumne, & of that season of the moone, which is from the full to the last quarter. To conclude, in the 4. and last quarter of mans age, called old age, his body is cold and dry, like to the winter season, and to the fourth part of the moneth, which is from the last quarter to the next new moone. Now as these three former uses of the Anatomy of mans mans body, serue for the commoditie and delight of man, so the fourth is the same that ought to be made, not only of the body of man, but as Salomon teacheth vs of all the creatures both in heauen & earth, & that is the glory of God. For the Lord hauing set in his visible creatures euident marks of himselfe and of his eternitie, power, goodnesse, wisdom & providence, as the Apostle teacheth, what remaineth but that man for whose sake & seruice the Lord created all things, should thereby acknowledge his soueraigne Lord, and returne vnto him all glory, praise, and dutifull obedience for the same. That we ought to make this use of the Anatomieall consideratiō of our bodies, the kingly prophet Dauid teacheth vs most diuinely by his owne example; when after a view taken, of the admirable work of God in fashioning him in his mothers womb, he breaketh forth into this saying, I will praise thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made, maruellous are thy works: & my soule knoweth it wel.

The Epistle to the Reader.

And surely vnles we tread in the steps of this worthy king and propound this as the scope of all our travels in searching out the seuerall parts of our bodies, that God our creator and gracious preseruer may be prayssed, worshipped, & feared thereby, we shall neuer know our selues aright, & as we ought to do, but rather ioyn with the most part of men who not vsing their skil in this behalfe as a ladder to climbe vpbv vnto God, stick fast in the very matter and forme of their bodies, so that many of them become meere Naturalists and very Atheists. One special cause wherof, as I take it, is because they lay not the ground and foundation of their skil in the holy Scriptures, the fountain of all sound knowledge, which teach vs, that it is the Lord that made vs and that formed vs from the womb, but follow after some small streams of this knowledge, euen such as are polluted with the inuention of mans braine, placing the course of nature in the procreation of mankind (which is but an effect of Gods almightie working power, in the roome of God himselfe the supreme cause of al. In which respect they may not vnjustly be resembled to Moles that are alwaies plodding in the earth, or to swine that finding acorns vpon the ground, neuer look vp to the tree from which they fall. They forget that mans eies are therefore set in the head, which is the upper part of the body rather then in his breast, belly, or feet, because he should be admonished thereby to lift vp his mind vnto heauen & heauenly things: & therefore Plato saith that mens eyes were set in a body erected & looking upward, that they might be as guides to lead the to the knowledge of God, vpon the sight of the celestiall light, & notice taken of the heauenly motions. Otherwise, although a mans skill be neuer so great, although he knoweth the way of the stars, the wals of the world, the foundations of the earth the top of the heauens, yet if he be ignorant of the creator & moderatour of them al, it shall profit him nothing. But as no man is to look for graps of thornes, or figs of thistles, so we must not thinke that Epicures & Atheists wil ouce either labor to know God or open their lips to praise him, when as yet they haue not learned to beleene that he is, much lesse that he is a rewarder of them that seeke him. And surely of all Satrans delusions wrought by him in the hearts of unbeleeners, this monstrous error of Atheisme is most ougly, as that which is destitute of all shew of reason, wherby it might insinuate it selfe into the hart of man. For howsoeuer in regard of mans natural corruptiō, hunger & thirst is not more incident vnto him then is error in religion & aberration in manners, yet for any man not to see and acknowledge by the dim candle of nature, that God is, that his providence watcheth ouer all, that the soule of man is immortall, and that after this life there is a place of happiness for the good and of torments for the wicked, is as I may term it, a supernaturall error, or rather cleane against reason, religion, and nature & all. The truth wherof appeareth both by the common consent of all nations, who haue generally approued those points, as inuolable principles & maximes in nature, and also by the iudgement of the sounder sort of Philosophers and Lawmakers amongst the heathen, who knowing that all mens consciences did naturally acknowledge not onely a being of a diuine power, but a subiection also therunto pretended that their Lawes and superstitions came from some one or tiber of cheir supposed gods and goddes: as Minos King of the Cretensians made the people beleene that hee had receiued his lawes of Iupiter, Lycurgus the Lacedemonian lawmaker of Apollos oracle, Numa Pompilius a Romane king of Egeria the Nymph, and so the rest of others. And in truth, they that deny the diuine essence, what doe they but deny themselves, and the being of all things in the world besides? For as Aratus the heathen poet teacheth, which is also conformed vnto vs by the Apostle Paul, In God we liue, mooue and haue our being: so that without him it is impossible we should haue any being one moment of an houre. And it is strange to consider how these reasonable beasts (for men I dare not call them) standing so much vpon reason & sense as they would seeme to do, cannot in reason conceiue that this great variety and exquisite order, which they behold, and see

Rom. 1. 20.

Psal. 139. 24

Isay 44. 2.

Heb. 11. 6.

Act. 17.

The Epistle to the Reader.

in nature & natural things, must of necessity haue some superior cause from which they received both their first being, & their continuall preservation in the same. When they look upon any excellent picture, they presently iudge, as the truth is, that it was wrought by some cunning painter, & every curious building leadeth all men to the consideration of some exquisite master builder that framed it. And shall not the view of the world, & the knowledge of so many admirable things therein as are subiect to all our senses, constrain vs to acknowledge a superior cause and creator of them all? Doth any ship saile his right course without a Pilot? or is there any city well governed without a Magistrate? And shall any surmize, that the celestiall lights could obserue their right motion without the direction of him that made them? or that the terrestriall globe of the earth could continue so well ordered by the course of nature, were it not that all things are upholden by him that framed them all? But such is the blockishnes of these Epicurian beasts that they will belceue nothing but that which they may see with their eies, and take knowledge of by the light of their bodies. As though, if their eies were plucked out of their head there could be no sun in the heauens, nor light in the world because themselves were in darkenesse and could see nothing. How many things are there in nature which cannot be seen, & yet no man maketh any question of their being, no not they themselves, who notwithstanding deny that there is any diuine nature, any immortall soule, Angel or spirit, because they are not visible & subiect to sight. Can any of them see the wind, look upon the voice of man, behold the sweet harmony of musick? Nay, can they take a view of the hearts in their bodies, or of the braines in their heads? Are they therefore without heart & brainlesse? Surely it seemeth they are cleane voyd of braine, wit, and common sense, that mayle all their beliese so fast to the sight of their bodily eies. And yet were it so that they would not most wilfully contradict the euidence of their owne hearts, they should there behold with the eies of their mind as it were in a cristall glasse that which may be knowne of God. Nay the holy Ghost proceedeth further, and telleth vs, that euen our bodily eies may and doe after a sort looke upon the eternall power and Godhead, which are seene by the creation of the world, being viewed in the workes thereof. And because it may so fall out by the iust iudgement of God, that these beetle eied Atheists may as well be deprived of their bodily eies, as they want the sight of their mindes, the creator and Lord of the whole world, hath set such marks of his Deitie in his workes that such as haue onely the direction of nature may euen with their eies closed up, touch & handle him if they will but grope after him, in whom we all liue, moue and haue our being. What should I presse them with the certaine testimony of their owne hearts and consciences, which will they, will they, draw them to a fearfull acknowledgement of the mighty power of God, whensoever either by his terrible voice of thunder he shaketh their hearts, or by some irreuerable disease, as a messenger of death, he summoneth them to appeare before his tribunall seate and throne of iustice. But there needeth no other prooffe to conuince them then the words of their own mouths. For doe not their horrible oathes wher by they blaspheme the maiesty of God, & as much as lyeth in them teare him in pieces, beare witnes against themselves that the Lord whom they despise in that monstrous manner hath a being, howsoever otherwise they deny the same? And if no reason wil sinke into their brains, yet me thinks the weight of Gods iudgements which haue from time to time ceased extraordinarily vpon these Atheists that haue sprung up in the world, should cause them more seriously to consider of their miserable estate.

It is reported of Protagoras, who was one of the first of that stamp, that being banished from Athens, and his books publickly burnt, he was drowned in the sea as he sailed into Sicilia. Diagoras was violently slain by certain men whom the Athenians had hired with money for that purpose, Epicurus also, who placed his felicity in corporall pleasures, died miserably in a vessell of hot water, after that he had bin foureene daies together extremely tormented with the stone in the bladder. Lucianus, surnamed by his own countrymen the blasphemer, as he behaued himselfe most curiously in barking both against the gods of the heathen, and against Christ Iesus the Saviour of the world, so his end was thereafter by being torn in peeces & deuoured of dogs. Plinie the elder denying the immortality of the soule of man and placing Nature a creature in steade of God the Creatour, whilst he was ouer curious in searching out the cause of the burning of Etna, was choaked with the smoke that issued from it. A iust punishment for him to end his life by smoke, who esteemed his soule to bee no better then a little vapour. Cassius being a professed Scholler of Epicurus & Brutus most brutishly railing vpon the providence of God because his enterprises against Cæsar succeeded not to his desire, were both overtaken with the renenging hand of God, the one of them causing his seruant to be his Butcher, & the other emburning his hands in his own blood. The like befell Lucretius a most notorious Atheist, who being deprived of the right vse of his senses, abused by him to the denying of God and of all religion, slew himselfe in the midst of his madnesse. Pope Iohn the 13. may worthily be enrolled in this band, as he that was not ashamed to put up a supplication to the diuell to send him good luck at dice: and one day in the midst of his iollity he tooke a cup of wine and dranke to the diuell. But by the iust iudgement of God he was stabbed in with a dagger by one who tooke him committing adultery with his wife, so that he died thereof within eight daies after. Leo the tenth Pope of that name, who thought there was neither heauen nor hell after this life, and blasphemously said that the Gospell of Christ was but a fable, was sodainely striken dead with an extreame laughter which hee fell into by reason of news brought him of the slaughter and overthrow of certaine French men in Italie by his means.

The Epistle to the Reader.

means. The French histories make mention of one Frances Rabelais, who having sucked in this poison of Atheisme made a mocke at al religion, as Lucretius his forerunner had done before him: but the selfe same author & defender of true religion, that tooke from Lucretius al use of reason, did so deprive this beast of of all sense, that as he led a brutish life, so he died like a swine in the midst of his drunkennes, deriding those that spake unto him of God & of his mercy. Iodellus likewise a French poet, & a professed Atheist, as hee Iodellus. gaue himself in his life time to write tragedies, so he made a right tragicall end. For having through gluttony & riot wasted his patrimony and wealth, he fell into such extreme needes, that he was miserably famished for want of sustenance, It would aske a long time to set downe the iudgements of God that haue iustly overtaken sundry others of the abominable crew: only I wil rehearse one history worthy our knowledge concerning this matter, mentioned by Enguerran in the second volume of his histories. In the reigne of Lewes the 11. and upon the fift day of Iune 1464. there happened (saith hee) a wonderfull accident in the palace at Paris, whilest there was a controuersie in pleading between the Bishop of Angiers and a rich citizen of that towne whom the Bishop accused of notorious Atheisme, namely, that he had said in the hearing of many, that he beleued not there was any God or diuinitie, either any heauen or hell. Now as the Bishops advocat rehearsed these words the place wherein they were pleading troubled very sore, in so much that with the shaking a stone fel downe from the top to the bottom, but hurt nobody, albeit they were taken with a great feare. Whereupon they went all presently out out of the place untill the next day when the matter was to be heard againe. And then also the said roome began to shake againe, so that one of the sommers of the chamber sprang out of the mortesse, and bowed downward two feet, but fell not. Al that were present supposed they should haue died no other death, which caused them so violently to rush out, that for hast some left their hats, some their caps, some their slippers behind them, neither durst any plead more there before it was throughly mended. Now albeit Enguerran speaketh nothing of the determination of that suite, yet forasmuch as nothing cometh to passe by bapazard (as they vse to speak) but all things are guided by the good providence of God, it is out of question, that the Lord would teach vs hereby, how we should detest and abhor such execrable thoughts & speeches, seeing the very dumb creatures, as the stones, the timber, and the earth it selfe (which of it owne nature is immovable) were it so affected with the horror thereof, that they could not abide it so much as to heare it spoken of without shaking. But here some will say unto me, that this labor might well haue bin spared, considering that the sunbeams of the Gospel which breaketh forth so cleerely in all quarters of the land will quickly discry if any such ongly bird should once begin to peep out of the shell within the nest of this Iland. And if the Athenians being were heathen men banished Protagoras out of the territories, and burnt the Books in a publick place because in the beginning of one of them he called the deity into question, we may not think but that in this land ouerspread with the knowledge of God, this monstrous brood shal be ripped in the head so soone as euer it shal dare to shew it selfe. Indeed a man would thinke that Atheisme should not once bee dreamed of, or named amongst vs, considering that we liue in those times of which the Prophet foretold, That the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord, & the waters that couer the sea, that all the children of the Church should be taught of the Lord, so that one neighbor shal not teach another, saying, know the Lord, for they shal al know me from the least of them to the greatest, saith the Lord. So a man would thinke that France, hauing bin for these these 30. yeares & upward almost continually scourged with ciuil wars, & that for the cause of religion, should be so far from being steined with the least spot of Atheisme, as that it might now at the length truly say with the Prophet Dauid. It is good for mee that I was afflicted, for thereby I haue learned to keepe thy law. And yet both this our author and some other of that nation, knowing that this infection haue seized upon many of their country men, haue laboured by their writings to suppress the same. And surely it is greatly to be feared, that as their disguised attire couereth the bodies of many of our people & maketh them deformed, so this poison of Atheisme hath praised ibe narrow seas & islanded in the hartes of no small number, so their viter destruction both of body and soule. Neither is this the feare of some few without any ground, but of a great many wise & godly Christians, who seeing the generall prophaneesse of mens liues almost euery where, both publickly cry out against the present infection, & plainly bewaile the future euils that necessarily follow the same. And albeit peradventure there be none amongst vs, that are so far gone in Atheisme, as Lignerolles a French Courtier of late dayes was, who is said to haue made open profession thereof, yet if the tree may be iudged by the fruites, & the outward effects of mens liues do shew shew the inward affections of their hearts, he that hath but halfe an eye may see, that there are a great many amongst vs of those foolish men of whom Dauid speaketh. Who say in their hearts that there is no God. In the forefront of which company, the students of Machiuel's principles & practisers of his precepts may worthily bee raunged. This bad fellow whose works are no lesse accounted of among his followers, then were Apollos Oracles amongst the Heathen, nay then the sacred Scriptures are among sound Christians, blushed not to belch out these horrible blasphemies against pure religion, & so against God the Author thereof, namely, That the religion of the heathen made them stout and courageous, whereas Christian religion maketh the professors thereof base minded, timorous, and fit to become

F. Rabelais

Iodellus.

A citizen of Angiers.

Isaiah 11.9.

8.54.13.

Ier 31.34.

Psalm 119.71

Psalm 14.1.

The Epistle to the Reader.

become a prey to every one: that since men fell from the religion of the Heathen, they became so corrupt that they would beleue neither God nor the Diuel, that Moses so possessed the land of Iudea, as the Gothes did by strong hande vsurp part of the Romane Empire. These & such like positions are spued out by this hel bound sometime against true religion, other whiles against the religion and Church of Rome, sometimes also taxing the religion of the heathen, of falsehood and consinage, so that in truth he would haue all religio to be of like accompt with his disciples, except it be so far forth as the pretence & shew of religion may serue to set forward & effect their wicked policies. And for this cause he setteth down this rule for every Prince and Magistrate to frame his religion by, namely, that he should pretend to bee very religious and deuout, although it be but in hypocrisie. And to this hee addeth a second precept no lesse impious, that a Prince should with tooth and naile maintaine false miracles and vntruths in religion, so long as his people may thereby be kept in greater obedience. Now what fruits we are to expect from the students of this profession, let all men iudge that haue any sparkes of pure religion glowing in their hearts. Vnto these may be added, such as tread in the steps of Lamech, who derided the iudgement of God upon Caine, such as walke in the waies of Ismael, who mocked Isaac in regard of the promise: & such as those irreligious persons were of whom Peter speaketh, who in iesting wise asked what was become of the promise of Christ his coming to iudgement. That there are such amongst vs, euen in these times wherein we liue, let the testimony which one of that crew gaue lately of himselfe when the heauie hand of God by sicknesse summoned him to giue him an accompt of his desolate life. He being one day aduised of his friends to leaue his bad course of life, which otherwise would bring him to utter destruction, scoffing returned them this answer: Tush (quoth he) what is he better that dyeth in his bed then he that endeth his life at Tyburn? And being further urged to doubt the losse of his soule in hell fire for euer although he feared not death in this world, he replied, Hell? What talke you of Hell to me? I knowe if I once come there, I shall haue the company of better then my selfe: I shall also meet with some knaues in that place, and so long as I shall not sit there alone, my care is the lesse. But you are mad folks (quoth he) for if I feared the Iudges of the Bench no more then I dread the iudgements of God, I would before I slept diue into one karles bags or other, & make merry with the shels I found in them so long as they would last. The voice of a meere Atheist, and so afterwards he pronounced of himselfe when he was checked in conscience by the mighty hand of GOD. And yet this fellow in his life time and in the midst of his greatest ruffe, had the Presse at commandment to publish his lasciuious Pamphlets, whereby he infected the hearts of many yong Gentlemen and others with his poisonous platforms of loue, & diueltish discourses of fancies fust so that their minds were no lesse possessed with the toys of his irreligious braine, then their chambers & studies were pestred with his lewd and wanton books. And if the rest of his crew may be permitted so casily as he did without controlment to instill their venomous inuentions into the minds of our English youth by means of printing, what other thing can we looke for, but that the whole land should speedily be ouerflown with the deadly waters of all impieties, when as the flood gates of Atheisme are thus set wide open? Are they not grown already to this boldnes, that they dare to gird at the greatest personages of all estates and calling vnder the fables of sauage beasts, not sparing the very dead that lie in their graues, that the holy Apostles, the blessed virgin Mary, the glorious kingdome of Heauen it selfe must be brought in as it were upon a stage to play their seuerall parts, according as the humour of euery irreligious head shall dispose, them? And whereas godly learned men, and some that haue spoken of their owne experience, haue in their books that are allowed by authoritie, rearmed Stage plaiers and Theaters, The school of abuse, the schoole of baudery, the nest of the diuel & sinke of all sin, the chaire of pestilence, the pope of the diuel, the soueraign place of Satan, yet this commendation of them hath lately passed the Presse that they are rare exercises of vertue. It were too long to set down the Catalogue of those lewd & lasciuious books, which haue mustred themselves of late yeers in Pauls Churchyard, as chosen souldiers ready to fight vnder the diuels banner: of which it may be truly said that they preuaile no lesse (if not more) to the vpholding of Atheisme in this light of the Gospell, then the Legend of Lies, Huon of Burdeaux, King Arthur, with the rest of that rabble, were of force to maintaine Popery in the daies of ignorance. Wherefore my humble sute is to all such as may by vertue of authority stay the violent course of Atheisme daily spread abroad by these pernicious Pamphlets, that they would lay to their helping hand for the speedy redresse therof. And as for those that reape the gaine of iniquity by the sale of such infectious stufes, oh what a sweet smelling sacrifice should they offer vnto the Lord, if they would gather all such hurtful Books together, & cause them to passe through the fire in the midst of that yard, where now they are so commonly sold. Hereby it would come to passe, that the land being purged of so great contagion as droppeth out of the pens of such godlesse braines, the Lord would withdraw his beaui hand, which now many waies presseth vs sore, the preaching of the Gospell would preuaile mightily as it did in Ephesus after the like sacrifice, and yong Gentlemen and others would employ good houres, vpon better studies: which the Lord grant for his mercies sake, A M E N.

THE FORESPEACH OF THE INTERSPEAKERS IN THIS ACADEMIE, WHEREIN IS HANDLED the cause of their future discourses touching the naturall historie of man.

The names of the discourfers.

A S E R, which signifieth Felicitie, A M A N A, Truth, A R A M, Excellencie,
A C H I T O B, Brother of goodnesse.

A S E R, My companions, I greatly bewaile the miserie of our age, wherein so many Epicures and Atheists liue, as are daily discouered amongst vs in all estates and callings. True it is, that the disagreement in matters of Religion amongst them that beare the name of Christians is very great, and causeth much trouble in the Church: neuerthelesse, I doubt not but that agreement might soone be made, if the word of God only might be the iudge of true and false religion. For all that feare God, and are carefull to do nothing contrary to their duty, that account the holy scriptures to be the true doctrine of the Spirit of God, and are assuredly perswaded, that there is another life after this, and a iudge before whom they must appeare, they, I say, are not so hardly induced to peace and concord, but that a man may hope well of them. But they that feare nothing, that call all things into question, that esteeme all religion to be opinions onely tormenting mens braines: they likewise that stiffly resist even the truth it selfe, whereof their owne consciences conuince them, labouring as much as lyeth in them to extinguish not onely the light of God within them, but that also which they learne in his word, such monsters, I say, will trouble all Christendome more then the contentions about religion, vnlesse the goodnesse of God provide some conuenient remedy for the same. For they must bee taught to beleue one God, one Iesus Christ, the immortality of the soule, the resurrection of the body, a second everlasting life full of ioy and happinesse for good and iust men, but full of grieve and paine for the wicked and vniust: generally, they must be taught to beleue whatsoeuer we learne in the holy scriptures concerning the creation and end of euery nature. These things being spirituall and heavenly cannot be seene nor comprehended without a celestially and supernaturall light, nor without spirituall eyes, ioyned with the vertue and power of the spirit of God, who onely is able to clarifie our eyes and to giue them sight. For albeit God gaue spirituall eyes to man, when he endued him with a reasonable and vnderstanding soule, yet they are euen blind through sin;
if they alwaies haue not God that great and everlasting Sunne to illuminate them with his diuine light: as the eyes of the body remaine in darkenesse, when bodily light is taken from them. Hereupon they are called blinde in the holy scripture, that haue not the true knowledge of God by the light of his word. For although they that are most ignorant haue some little knowledge and sence of the diuinity by that small remnant of naturall light, which man recei-ued at his first creation, neuerthelesse because this sparkle is so small in regard of that darknesse,

Matth. 13. 14.
Iohn 9. 39.

which filleth the minde of man, it is not sufficient to leade them to God, and to the right way of saluation. Therefore they soone goe astray and wander hither and thither, and for the most part follow superstition in place of religion, and lies in stead of truth: because it is an easie matter for the diuell to disguise his inuentions vnder a false shew of piety, that they may not discern betweene truth and falsehood, betweene that which God liketh and which he disliketh. For seeing the sparke of naturall light in mans vnderstanding is so small, there needeth no great troubling of the spirit, neither any great impediments to bee cast in his way to confound and amaze him, and to take away, or vtterly to ouerthrow his iudgement, whereby to make him as vnable to iudge of the truth, as a blind man is to iudge of colours. But they are in farre worse case that voluntarily seporate themselves from all truth, both naturall and supernaturall. For they easily beleue that, which the Epicures long since taught against the immortalitie of soules, and against the providence of God towards men: insomuch that they hold this for most certaine, that the soule perisheth as the body doth, and that there is no God that intermedleth in the government of humane affaires, but that they are guided either by fortune or by prudence, or by the folly of men, according as matters fall out.

I quake to think that such monsters are to be found amongst them that beare the name of Christians, and haue in former times receiued the markes & seales of Christianitie in the Church of Iesus Christ. But my quaking is doubled, when I consider, that many of them that professe learning and humane philosophie, and that are thought to haue most skilfull sharpe and subtil wits, are not onely infected with this execrable Atheisme, but professe it, open a schoole thereof, and know how to poison many with it. For as there was neuer yet opinion, error or heresie so strange or monstrous in the world that hath not alwaies found men ynough to receiue it, so long as there were Authors and masters to set it abroad, so these professors of Atheisme are neuer without great store of disciples: because after this manner God punisheth the curiosity ingratitude, and perversenesse of men, the contempt of his word and hatred of the truth, which is commonly in them, as also the pleasure they take in vanitie and lies. Therefore God by his iust iudgement giueth them ouer into a reprobate sence, so that they cannot but alwaies reiect the truth, and imbrace error and lying, as hee often threatneth them by the mouth of his Prophets and Apostles. Examples hereof wee see daily in such as thinke themselves the wisest men, who haue this in their cogitation (if they dare not speake it openly) that it belongeth not to men of wit to beleue in God and his word, but to such as are simple and foolish: not to these great and noble spirits that flie aboue the clouds, who in truth know more then they should, to bring them to that place of weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We are to liue (my companions) amongst such kinde of men, and I suppose that ye, as well as my selfe, haue heard some of them speake: especially since of late times the seruice of Princes hath longer retained vs neere vnto them, then wee were wont in our young yeares when the study of good letters did wholly possesse vs. Therefore wee ought to bee very desirous to fortifie our selues daily with strong and powerfull reasons against whatsoever wee may heare vttered by these scornors of all piety: not for feare that we shall at any time bee deceiued by them (for I am most assured of the graces and gifts, which wee haue receiued from God) but that we may haue abundantly wherewith to resist the vaine and weake arguments of these deceiuers, when wee light among them, especially in the company of ignorant folkes, whom they may easily draw to their side if wee should bee silent. Besides, although wee should not bee able to confound them by reason of their obstinacy, yet wee shall at the last giue them occasion to thinke more seriously of their error. I know well what small account they make of the testimonies of holy Scriptures, and how they esteeme of them but as of fables and dreames made by some doters and idle persons: forso they call the Patriarks, Prophets, and Apostles. As for the writings of Philosophers, they will beleue Epicurus, Pliny, Lucretius, Lucian, and others of their sect, who deny all diuinity, and the immortality of soules. But they will giue no credite to any thing that we fetch from the sayings of Pithagoras, and Socrates, and from the writings of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Plutarch, and an infinite number of other excellent Philosophers of all Nations, who haue all taught, that there is a diuine providence and iustice, & that the soule is immortal. What shall we say then? Where shall we seeke for arguments which they will vouchsafe to heare? I haue heard them say sometimes, that they would giue credite to naturall Philosophy in those things wherein the causes are prooued by their effects. Now if we take this course to prooue vnto them a godhead, his providence, his future iudgement, and the immortality of the soule, which way soeuer wee turne our selues, either vpward or downward, on the right hand or on the left, we shall find testimonies euery where, which they may not in any wise reiect.

For

Esay. 29. 14.

2. Tim. 3. 13.

2. Thess. 2. 10.

11, 12.

For we haue nature, the necessity of causes, proportion & similitude, the life, decency & dignity of man, the goodnesse of God, the vtilitie that commeth by mankind proceeding from the bounty of God, all which with one common consent, and as it were with one voice do teach and cry, that there is one God creator and gouernour of the whole world, and that the soule of man cannot be mortall. Hereof it is, that the holy Ghost doth often propound vnto vs in holy scriptures this whole visible world as a great booke of nature and of true natural diuinitie all the creatures as preachers and generall witnessers of God their creatour of his workes and of his glory. Neuerthelesse there are but few that haue such eyes as are requisite for the reading of this booke, or fit eares to heare the voice, & to vnderstand the sermons of these naturall preachers, no not amongst them that are most skilfull and best studied in the searching out of nature, & haue greatest knowledge of natural things, of liberall arts, & of all humane philosophy. For there are as many, yea moe, to whom in this respect the selfe same thing is befallen, which long since befell to the first and greatest Philosophers, vnto whom Saint Paul obiectioneth this by way of reproch, that when they knew God by the workes of the creation of the world (wherein he maketh his power, his eternall and inuisible Godhead, as it were visible vnto vs) they did not glorifie him as God, but withheld the truth in vnrighteousnes. And yet it will not be a hard matter for vs (God being our helper) to make it manifest, by the consideration, not only of the whole frame, but of the least creature therein, especially of the body and soule of man (who is a little world,) and of the creation, nature, dignitie and excellency of both his parts, how not onely the simplest and most ignorant may and ought to learne to know God and his providence ouer euery nature, and so to honor and to glorifie him, as hee hath bound them thereunto, but also how the wisest ought to direct all their skill and knowledge which they haue in naturall philosophie, to this selfe same end. As for those that make open profession of Atheisme and refuse the testimonies, which God in his word setteth downe vnto vs, of himselfe, of his providence, and of all things belonging to the saluation and soueraigne good of men, they shall haue yet, will they nil they, ynough probable reasons to proue all these things, so that we may easily conuince and proue vnto them by these testimonies, which euery one of them carieth about in himselfe, both the immortality of the soule, as also the religion of God and of his providence. For these three things are so linked together, that in no wise they cannot, neither ought to be separated: so that he which admitteth the one, must of necessity approue the others, and if he doubt of the one, he reiecteth all.

Rom. 1. 18.
19, &c.

As therefore (my companions) some yeeres past after our returne from warre, wee tooke occasion vpon the corruption that then was in all the estates of France, and the forlorne manners which raigned in euery one, to meete together and to discourse in our Academie of the institution in good manners, and of the meanes to liue well and hapily, to the end in renewing the memory of our former studies wee might beginne to direct our life to that principall end, which the Philosophers appoint thereof, namely vertuous actions: So I thinke that even now wee haue an other good occasion to reade in this great booke of nature, and to bring one to another whatsoever wee haue learned concerning the nature of man. For first wee haue leaue in regard of our Princes seruice, to recreate our selues for a while in our owne houses. Againe, the selfe same place where wee mette so fitly, and wherein wee began our former discourses of Philosophy, doth inuite vs to proceede in them. Moreover, wee doubt not of the combate, which is prepared for vs when wee shall visite our neighbours and friendes, amongst whome many professe themselves better Philosophers than good Christians. We know also into what streights we haue been brought in our matters courts: and let vs not hope that the perill will bee lesse when their seruice recall vs neere vnto them. Wherefore wee shall doe well to arme our selues now with all the reasons & testimonies which wee haue in nature against that Epicurian doctrine, whose onely drift, is by denying the immortalitie of the soule to turne men from all religion and feare of God. For thus doing, wee shall not onely greatly profite our selues, but them also, who beeing in danger to be seduced by such deceiuers shall heare vs now and then reason with them: who feeling themselves conuincd by naturall reasons wherein they supposed to haue greatest strength will not be so bold to vomit their passion before others, but shall bee constrained to digest it by themselves to their owne confusion and overthrow. I desire therefore (my companions) to know how you stand affected towards this my intent and purpose.

Mat. 24.

A M A N A. If euer there were age, wherein those signes of the end of the world which the spirit of God hath foretold vs, haue bin seene, it is this, wherein they are so apparant, that there is no one body, if he be not deprived of all discourse of reason, who doth not acknowledge them very evidently. For we are fallen into those times wherein store of false prophets are arisen, and have seduced many, wherein all iniquity is increased, and charity altogether frozen. Which thing hath discovered not onely many false religions, but also Atheisme, which is far worse. For without doubt they that are altogether void of religion, are farther off from true religion then they that follow one that is false. And yet there are as many, yea more at this day that doe openly shewe themselves to be Atheists and Epicures, then there are of those that are taken for good Christians. If in outward shewe they professe religion, it is but to couer themselves vnder the vale thereof, to the end that men should not take them for such as they are indeed, as also that they might keepe company with the best. But in their hearts, and amongst their companions they mocke and laugh at all religion, at all feare of God, and whatsoever els is taught vs by his word touching any other life then this, wherein joy is prepared for the good, and torments for the wicked. Now if there were nothing els to doe, but conuince such men of error and lying, the matter were easie: for they cary all their witnessses and their condemnation with them: but they are not so easily confounded. For a man is conuincd when he is constrained to acknowledge in his conscience that hee hath no reason whereby he is able to withstand and gain say that truth, which is shewed vnto him and which condemneth him. But if he be obstinate, headstrong, wickedly giuen, and froward he will neuer leaue kicking against the pricke, but perseuere in his headinesse and obstinacy, and in his maliciousnes and perversenes. For when reason faileth him, hee armeth himselfe with impudencie, like to a bold murtherer, or to a shameles harlot that will blush at nothing. Therefore Chrysostome said not without reason, that heretikes may well bee conuincd, but not confounded. For they do but wipe their mouth, as Salomon speaketh of an harlot, which presently after boasteth that she is an honest woman. But howsoever wicked men strue to blindfold their vnderstanding, and to harden their hart against the iudgement of God, yet it is neuer propounded vnto them, but wil they nil they, they feeble themselves pricked and pressed with some sence thereof. True it is, that it is not so with them as the children of God are touched, as they of whom it is written, that after they had heard the preaching of Saint Peter, they were pricked in their hearts, whereby they were led to true repentance, because they had bin touched to the quicke by the word. But it is said of the reprobate and of them that are hardened, of which sort are all Atheists, that God hath giuen them a pricking spirit, by reason of their bitter heart, which causeth them alwaies to increase in bitterness, to frette and chafe against God, when they feeble themselves pressed by his word and by his iudgement.

Aa. 2. 37.

Therefore I am of opinion (my companions) that for this cause, and for those reasons which ASER recited vnto vs, we are now to call to memorie all the testimonies that wee can bring of God and of his providence, of his iudgement, and of the immortalitie of mens soules, by the consideration of the nature of man, and of his parts, the body and soule expecting when sometime hereafter God shall giue vs grace to contemplate the selfe same things in euery nature, and in al this great visible world. For no doubt but such kind of contemplation will furnish vs sufficiently with arguments to conuince all Epicures and Atheists, and to constrain them to acknowledge in their conscience a diuine iustice, and an eternall life. The heauens (saith the Prophet) declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth the worke of his handes. This hie ornament, this firmament so cleare, and face of heauen so sumptuous to behold, is a thing full of greatnesse. Therein we may behold the Master builder thereof, cloathed with the whole frame as with a garment, which is a sure testimonie of his power and vertue. He who cannot fall within the compasse of mans grosse senses, maketh himselfe as it were visible in his terrible workes. This world is vnto vs a learned schoole, wherein the praise of God doth preach it selfe. It is a goodly large and rich shop, wherein this soueraine and most excellent workman layeth open all his works, to this end, that he might be known by them. It is a temple, wherein there is no creature so little, but it is as it were a similitude and resemblance of the creator thereof, to shew and manifest him vnto vs. In a word, it is a Theatre, where the diuine essence, his iustice, his providence, his loue, his wisdom have their working by a wonderful vertue in euery creature, euen from the highest heauen vnto the center of the earth. Aske the beasts (saith Iob) and they shall teach thee, and the fowles of the heauen and they shall tell thee, or speake to the earth and it shall shew thee, or the fishes of the sea, & they shall declare vnto thee. Who is ignorant of all these, but that the hand of the Lord hath made these? But truly there shineth in man more then in all other creatures, a beame of the diuinity, and a proportionable image and similitude of his nature, in that God hath framed him of an immortal soule,

Psal. 19. 1.

What wee learne by the view of the world

soule, capable of vnderstanding, and of reason, to make him partaker of his eternall glory and felicity. O Lord (saith the Psalmist) How marvellous is thy name in all the world? What is man that thou art mindfull of him? and the sonne of man that thou vifitest him? Thou hast made him a little lower then God, and crowned him with glory and worship. Thou hast made him to haue dominion in the works of shine hands; thou hast put all things vnder his feete. But withall, as God hath more expressly created man after his owne image, then any other visible nature, & therefore more excellent then the heauenes or the earth, or any thing containd in them, so hee hath singularly bound him to know and to honour him, in which thing he hath placed his soueraigne Good. But man being exalted by God to that honour, that hee might attaine to so great felicity, could not coceiue or acknowledge it: which is the cause that wee see so many, who following the corruption of mans nature, are not only become like to brute beasts, but much more vnthankfully, yea farre more forgetfull and miserable then they. The Oxe knoweth his owner, and the Asse his masters crib, but man will not know God his creatour, of whom he holdeth body, soule, and goods. What a horrible shame is it, that the Oxe and the Asse, which are such dull beasts, should giue greater honor and obedience to man, of whom they receiue their foode, then man doth to God, of whom he hath and daily doth receiue so many benefits? Let vs make hast therefore (my companions) to goe to the schoole of nature. For if wee profit well therein, I doubt not but we shall easily come to the knowledge of the creator thereof, and of the chiefe end of our being.

ARAM. All things created haue their proper motion, which they follow according to that loue that every one of them beareth to his naturall disposition. For the heauens continue alwaies constant in their naturall motions. And as the fire and ayre naturally loue to bee aboue, and therefore draw thitherward without ceasing: so the water and earth loue to keepe below, so that they alwaies bend that waies. So that none of the elements can finde any stay or resting place vntill they be come to those places which God hath appointed for them. Plants cast their rootes downward, and their branches vpward, every one following therein his nature. For a plant being to receiue his nourishment from the earth by meanes of his rootes, which are vnto it in stead of mouthes and veines to suck & draw necessary sustenance for the preseruacion of it selfe, sendeth them alwaies into the ground, and disperseth them all about according as they can finde nourishment: but the stalke, stocke branches and boughs, which are to be nourished in the ayre, alwaies disperse themselues, draw and ascend vpward. Beasts hauing sense, doe much more shew that liking which they haue to follow their naturall inclination. For we see that by their proper apprehension & appetite, they are driuen hither and thither to seeke & follow after that which they desire and loue, being agreeable to their nature: and to flie from that which they hate, as being contrary thereunto. Likewise men, who onely of all other mortall creatures were by creation made partakers of reason, haue their proper motion conuenient to their nature. For being created to attaine to that soueraigne and eternall Good, which is set before them in the diuine essence, they haue receiued from the infinite goodnes power and vertue to wish for that Good, with a desire to apply and ioyne themselues thereunto. Wherefore all men are naturally pricked and driuen forward with a loue & desire tending to that Good: as well because of that naturall agreement which they haue with the same Idea of Good, which is God (their soules being of a celestially and immortal essence) as also because this Good is of that nature that it ought to be loued of every nature, yea so much the more loued as there is greater measure of reason in the creature to know it. But this desire naturally ingrafted in every mans heart, which prouoketh and keepeth men in a loue and liking of every thing which they thinke meet to content and satisfie them, & which they seeke after in diuers things as their affections lead them, differeth much from that desire, which by heavenly grace is planted a new in those, whom God according to his good pleasure and alwaies iust will, hath chosen and elected to euerlasting happines, and pricked forward, guideth & leadeth them to that principall end for which they were created. For although the other sort of men, being heires of that corruption that hath ouerspread the whole nature of man by the meanes of the sin of the first father of all, be driuen forward in soule & spirit, yea many times not thinking thereof to their naturall desire of obtaining that Good: yet they seeke it as blind men that go by groping, but cannot finde it, because the darkness of error & ignorance, wherewith their vnderstanding is ouerwhelmed, hinders them from looking directly towards that Good, and causeth them to wander out of that onely way that could lead them vnto it. So that in stead of looking vnto God, and to celestially and heavenly things, they stay themselues about earthly & corruptible things, vnto which the neerer they labour

Psal. 1. 4. 5. 6

Psal. 32. 9.

Isai. 1. 3.

Euery creature hath his proper motion and disposition.

The difference betweene the naturall & supernaturall desire of man to good.

1. Cor. 2. 14.

Isay. 64. 4.

Psal. 16. 11.

How we may
see God.How Plato
came to the knowledge of God.

labour to approach, the farther off they are from the end of their wishes & desires. For this cause the blessed Apostle saith, that the naturall man perceiveth not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishnesse vnto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But they that are illuminated, and guided by heavenly and supernaturall light, and whose vnderstanding is framed by the spirit of God, to receiue it, know then how they are carried by their proper motion to the contemplation of the true Good, in the enioying whereof they shall once for euer be made partakers of a felicitie, which eye neuer saw, nor care heard, neither came into mans heart: I meane, when by dissoluing the mortall tabernacle of this bodie, they shall bee clothed with glorious immortality, and shall see him face to face who is all in all: in whom they shall bee satisfied, according to the doctrine of the Prophet, In thy presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for euermore. This is that (my companions) which ought to whet vs on to direct our light streight to that place whereat wee ought to lenill, namely to heauen, and not looke to any other thing then to God, who is the scope, which we desire and shall one day attaine vnto. Now if wee can not see this white so farre off, and much lesse come vnto it without direction, GOD is come neare vnto vs in the person of his Sonne Iesus Christ, who being the brightnesse of his glory, hath left vs his word for a sure guide, besides so many testimonies of his providence and goodnesse ouer all creatures, that wee daily behold him as it were visible in them. For the ruled motions of the heauens, the wonderfull workmanship of so many starry tents, the connexion, agreement, force, vertue and beauty of the Elements: the situation, firmenesse, and spreading of the earth amidst the waters, and so many sundrie natures and creatures in this whole frame of the world: all these things I say, are so many interpreters to teach vs that God is the efficient cause of them, and that he is manifested in them and by them, as their finall cause. But the glasse wherein we may yet better behold him is man: in whom shineth and is imprinted an image of the diuine essence, which is not found againe in any visible creature; and that is reason and vnderstanding, whereof by creation he was made partaker as well as the Angels. This is the chiefe and principall worke of the creation, whereby God meant to giue such a Being to his creatures and spirituall natures, to the end he might communicate his wisedome and goodnes with them, and thereby lead them to eternall felicitie. Wherefore if it be good for men to consider the works of God in his creatures, and in their nature created by him, and that for the reasons and ends declared by vs, it is better and more necessary that they should do the same thing in their owne person and nature, wherein there are almost as many maruailous workes of the almighty power of God, as there are in that whole frame besides, and in all other creatures. Therefore that sentence which saith, Know thy selfe, was not without good reason so much praised and renowned amongst all the ancient Greeke & Latine Philosophers, as that which is worthy to be taken for a heauenly oracle, and a sentence pronounced by the mouth of God. For whosoever shal know himselfe wel, cannot faile to know God his creator, and to honour him as hee ought, if he follow the chiefe end for which man was created, as well as the residue of the creatures. Plato in his Phædrus, and in the tenth booke of Lawes, searching and inquiring by the meanes of motion, what was the substance, nature and immortality of the soule, attained to the vnderstanding of the diuine essence. Aristotle also taking the same way in his 8. booke of naturall Philosophy, sheweth that hee knew God vnder the name of the first moouer, who was perpetuall and vnmoueable. But wee may attaine to the knowledge of God and of our selues, a great deale better then all the Philosophers could, who were ignorant of the true beginning and end of things, if we be guided by the word, which is the light of the truth, and whereof all the humane philosophy of the wisest that were, is but a little shadow. Now then, if vnder this heauenly guide we feede our spirits with a doctrine that teacheth man to know himselfe well, we begin at that science which of all other is most necessary, profitable, and pleasant: I say necessary, as that which guideth and leadeth vs as it were by the hand to finde out God; profitable, because it bringeth a maruailous commoditie to this present life, both in regard of bodily health, as also of ruling all our actions according to vertue; and pleasant, because a man may see therein as it were in a sacred temple all the images of the wonderfull workes of the world.

ACHITO. I cannot but greatly commend those Philosophers that reprehended and condemned them, who spent all their time onely in the contemplation of heauen and earth, and of the nature of other creatures, and in the meane while descended not into themselves, to know themselves and their nature, but especially their soule. For what wil it profit a man to take

